"I didn't say they wouldn't be, either." Harry stared directly into the older wizard's eyes. Augustus reminded him much of Lucius Malfoy as he had been when they were still doing the truce-dance, but worse, in a way, because Lucius was perfectly aware that he was being a bastard, and enjoyed it. Augustus seemed to think that this proud coldness was the only way he could act, and compliance with his wishes the only reasonable thing to do. "That was Tybalt's condition for agreeing to speak with you. He wanted his partner and his best friend at his side. I didn't think those were unreasonable requests."

Augustus, amazingly, sat down, but shook his head so that his long pale hair, braided with bells, rang and shifted. Harry actually found that encouraging. If Augustus wanted to remind Harry about his training as a war wizard, that was a sign that he was less than perfectly confident. "You know Miss Pemberley by now, I would assume, my—Harry. You know that she will interrupt, make a scene, and do anything that she can to disrupt matters."

"I don't think she will," said Harry. "She was the one who asked for me to try and manage your reconciliation. But I acknowledge that she might not be able to control herself. If she does show a sign of starting to interrupt in any way, then I'll cast a Silencio on her. She's not Starrise by blood, and she wasn't the one who was part of Tybalt's original offense against you." Harry had to fight hard not to curl his lip when he said "offense," but he succeeded. "She has no reason to talk."

Augustus nodded, once. "I must say, Harry, that you are being more reasonable about this than I expected," he murmured.

"Why?" Harry kept an eye on the door of the Room. McGonagall had promised to send Tybalt, John, and Honoria to him the moment they arrived, and since she would be with her friends, Honoria couldn't come flying in as a gull. But he still thought he would have only a moment between the door opening and the first insult being hurled, unless he managed to get in between Tybalt and his uncle with formalities. "I don't want discord among my allies, Merlin knows."

"Ah, but your mother was Muggleborn," said Augustus smoothly. "I thought you would at once attack me for my—what would be the term? Unreasonable prejudice, is what Tybalt has called it. I thought you would insist loudly that of course they are equal to purebloods in each and every way, and should be able to marry into any pureblood family they want."

"I do believe that." Harry tensed, then shook his head when he realized that the flicker of movement he'd seen was his own shadow. In shifting his weight from foot to foot, he'd managed to send it skittering across the door.

"What?" Augustus sounded unsettled.

Harry turned his head and frowned at the man. "I don't insist that my allies think exactly like I do," he said shortly. "What would be the point of that? You have your own mind, your own soul, your own beliefs. You've seen mine, and you can't object to them too badly, or you wouldn't have chosen to join the alliance. I can hope to persuade you as time passes, but I won't force you. I certainly won't attack you."

Augustus stared hard at him. Harry rolled his eyes, and then turned swiftly back the other way as the door opened.

Honorio came in first, clad in a flowing robe much like a gown, ornamented with illusions of letters that spelled out Tybalt's name with several exclamation marks after it. Harry narrowed his eyes warningly at her, and she did no more than pout at him. At least the letters didn't seem to spell anything insulting to Augustus, Harry saw with relief.

Tybalt followed her. He wore a blood-red robe touched with threads of blue. John, at his side, wore red touched with gold. Harry stifled a groan. John's robe said that he could and would declare blood-feud if the negotiations didn't go to his liking; it was a reference back to the old days of wizarding politics when "blood and gold" would have been the reward a displeased family tried to claim from others. Tybalt wore only slightly less offensive colors, proclaiming his willingness to accept either blood or a sky untouched by a cloud—the cloud in this case being the presence of a relative he hated.

Harry felt frustration start churning in his gut, and decided abruptly that he might as well speak it out. Both Augustus and Tybalt, for all their agreement, had come prepared to undermine the negotiations. Why should he have to put up with that? He was the one who was doing something he didn't have to do, putting himself in the way of a family quarrel, and if neither party would take it seriously, then he didn't intend to waste his time here. He had dozens of more productive things he could be doing than trying to reconcile people who refused to be reconciled.

"Change the colors of your robes, now," he snapped at Tybalt and John. "Or admit that you just came to play games, and then we can all leave."

Tybalt had his mouth open, probably to insult his uncle, but he shut it. He stared at Harry. Harry frowned back at him. The sensation of eyes on him didn't bother him at all when he was angry at the person in question.

Tybalt decided to play dumb—not a wise choice when it was only his actions that were stupid. "But, Harry," he chirped, "we wanted to wear these colors. I think they look particularly fine on us." He looked at John as if he were about to shag his partner in the middle of the floor.

John returned the look. Harry could hear Augustus's bells shake as he shifted in place.

"You knew perfectly well what you were doing," said Harry flatly. "Change them, now. I mean it."

"But you have to fulfill the life debt," Honoria said. "I asked you for to try and reconcile Tybalt and Augustus, and—"

"That's what I'm doing," said Harry. "I got them in the same room. I'm prepared to play diplomat if they actually want to try. If not, then I will send them home like misbehaving children." He frowned at Honoria. "And, while we're at it, Honoria, you should know that it's forbidden for the person owed the life debt to do something that makes it harder for the other wizard to pay them back, unless they deliberately use difficult wording in the initial request. You know what these colors mean, and you let them wear them anyway."

Honoria's face was pale now. "I thought—I thought it would be funny," she said. "A joke."

"And yet, I am not laughing." Harry spun around and faced Augustus. "I apologize, sir. I didn't know they would do this."

Augustus inclined his head, his eyes glinting, and chose to say nothing at all. Harry wondered if that was wisdom on his part or sadistic amusement—if he was perhaps looking forward to seeing how Harry would deal with two wizards and a witch he obviously did regard as disobedient youngsters.

"I wanted to wear these colors," said John then, spinning Harry back around. "Tybalt did tell me what they mean, but I wanted to wear them because they express what I feel."

Harry had his answer. "So you came never intending to reconcile at all." He nodded. "That's good to know. Well, now you've had your joke and your insult, and the terms of my life debt to Miss Pemberley are fulfilled. She asked that I try to reconcile your partner and his uncle. I've tried. That's enough."

“How can you take him seriously?” Tybalt demanded. “Look at him, the pompous braggart! Bells in his hair, of all the stupid affectations! And he’s prejudiced against Muggleborns, and your mother was one, and you know that’s not right, Harry. How can you defend—“

“An heir who turns against the legacy of his bloodline?” Augustus asked, his voice soft and mocking. “A boy who is a traitor to the memory of his mother? I would wonder more if Harry were trying to defend you. He renounced his legacy rather than try to be an heir of the Potter line when he knew it would be impossible for him, and he gave up his parents rather than continue to mock and torment them. If only you could follow his example, Tybalt.”

“I am not a traitor to the memory of my mother! Take that—“

“You are.” Augustus leaned forward, the gold-bound white staff in his hand glinting. Harry had backed out of the space between them. “Alba would be horrified, could she see the elder son she bore. Defying everything his uncle asked of him, turning his back on his family instead of—“

“She would be horrified if she could see?” Tybalt’s face was as red and pale-splotchy as someone in the early stages of dragonpox. “I thought you believed she did see. You certainly talk about her as often as if she were still alive. You were always a little bit obsessed with her, in fact, uncle. I wonder, is the rumor I heard about you two true? That you didn’t have separate beds until you were seventeen?”

Augustus lurched to his feet with a wordless roar and a mighty clash of bells, and lowered his staff. Harry felt it begin to shake with magic. Augustus was one of those wizards who stored some of his power in another object, and could cast it back wandlessly when he had need. Merlin knew what spell he was thinking about using on his nephew right now.

Harry shook his head and reached out to the Room of Requirement. It manifested a stone wall between Augustus and Tybalt, quickly enough that they both stopped yelling in astonishment. Harry walked to the door, though he did turn to survey them briefly.

“If you don’t both leave Hogwarts quietly and go home without attempting to hurt each other,” he said, “then I will know, and I will cast you both out of the alliance. I won’t stand for my allies attacking each other. I declare the terms of the life debt fulfilled, and this experiment a failure, and both of you closer in family resemblance than you probably like to think, given your shared flair for insults. I’m disappointed in both of you. I suppose it’s useless to remind you that, in fact, I am the one who’s fifteen years old here?”

He stepped out of the Room and shut the door behind him, half-wishing it would just keep them cooped up in there. But someone might die if it did.

He went to tell Snape and Draco—they were both in the dungeons, with Snape helping Draco with an experimental potion he wanted to try—that he was going to the Ministry. If people would be children, Harry would go and do something more productive. Sometimes, Rufus hated having to follow the rules.

In this case, the rules said that he was not allowed to hex people just for breathing, even if all three of those people were Aurors who had failed him in various ways. He had to remain in the anteroom to Tullianum, where Shackbolt, Mallory, and Dagle waited under the eyes of three considerably more rule-abiding Aurors, and pretend to be concentrating on his paperwork. Harry had owed to say that he was coming to speak about pressing charges, or not, “later in the afternoon.” And since Rufus had been the one to send him a Portkey set for any time between noon and six in the evening, he was the one who’d condemned himself to sitting in one place until Harry arrived.

Dagle breathed as if he were thinking of arguments to excuse his actions, and just barely restraining himself from saying them. Mallory breathed huffily, coming out at the end with a sigh—a pattern Rufus was familiar with, since he’d crouched beside her before in ambush. Shackbolt breathed like an old man. All of them were claiming that Dumbledore’s compulsion spell had caused them to act the way they had. Rufus disbelieved Dagle, at the least, but there was nothing he could do about it; both Veritaserum and Legilimency were illegal unless the person in question consented to them, and none of the prisoners had. The next step was up to Harry.

A soft gleam came from off to the side, and the prisoners all turned expectantly towards it. Rufus was pleased to see that their guards, at least, kept their wands trained on the prisoners, not the gleam. The light resolved into a whirling Harry, who recovered his balance neatly and slid the bottle cap back into his pocket.

“Sir,” he said to Rufus, with a nod, and then turned and looked at the prisoners. His mouth tightened. Rufus could see his eyes suddenly looking older, but wasn’t entirely sure what emotion made them look so. Harry said nothing else, his eyes intent on Mallory’s face, so Rufus took it on himself to make the introductions.

“Kingsley Shacklebolt,” he said. “Order of the Phoenix member until I sacked him, and now claiming that Dumbledore compelled him to try and murder you. Fiona Mallory, once Head Auror, and now claiming that Dumbledore’s spell compelled her to torture your parents—“

“It did,” said Mallory loudly. “I would have managed to restrain myself if it hadn’t been for the spell.”

Rufus shot her a hard glance. Come down to it, I don’t believe her, either. Mallory was his greatest failure. He was the one who had put her in charge of the Aurors, and he should have removed her altogether when he first found her hurting the Potters, not merely forbidden her to handle the case. “And Homer Digne, Muggleborn Auror and undercover Order of the Phoenix member, claiming that he only wrote articles under the name Argus Veritaserum and sent them to the Daily Prophet because Dumbledore forced him to do that.”

“But you also let someone have access to Dumbledore,” Harry told Digne. “Didn’t you? So that means that you had to have known what you were doing before the spell even took effect.”

Rufus grinned. He knew it was a harsh and frightening expression, but merely knowing that didn’t much inspire him to change it. He had believed that, too, but Digne refused to comment one way or the other, probably so that he wouldn’t reveal whoever else had been in on his crime. Even Wilmot hadn't been able to get the information out of him. Harry could, perhaps, get him to reveal who had been at Dumbledore, and then Rufus would be one step closer to thoroughly cleansing his Ministry.

Diggle's face retained the same bored expression it had since he had come to the anteroom. "I was a victim of the spell," he said. "And of Dumbledore's reputation. I believed him to be a good man. Now I know he is not."

"You didn't believe the accusations of child abuse," said Harry. "But you believe him to be an evil man because he compelled you?"

Diggle shrugged. "Yes."

Rufus ground the teeth. The man wasn't even trying hard to pretend he was innocent. But rules forbade Rufus from using any of the tools that would have proven his guilt. Diggle had a convenient excuse, a too-convenient one, in that thrice-bedamned spell. He could escape prosecution entirely, at least if Harry declined to press charges, and the Daily Prophet was of course claiming that they had no idea the man sending them the articles had been an Order of the Phoenix member. Rufus wished, as he often had, that someone had invented a spell that would force all reporters to write only the truth. Just for one day. One day is all I ask for.

"I don't believe you," said Harry softly.

Diggle tensed. "Are you using Legilimency on me?" he demanded, and Rufus blinked in astonishment. Diggle hadn't shown any signs of losing his composure since the day in Rufus's office when he'd tried to draw his wand and Wilmot had stopped him. Now his shoulders were hunched, and his voice snapped out the words. "You know that's illegal."

Rufus leaned back in his chair and raised his eyebrows. It's Harry's presence, I think. That's upsetting him. Merlin, how Diggle must hate the boy.

Harry looked calmly at the ex-Auror. "I'm not using Legilimency on you. I just said that I don't believe you. You were in the Order. You believed in what Dumbledore was doing. You let someone have access to him even though you knew that he would be able to cast magic if he was freed of the Still-Beetle confinement—magic that could potentially have a number of disastrous effects on me or on anyone else he disliked. You might have believed you were doing the right thing before the compulsion, but what you did was still illegal and dangerous."

Diggle hissed through his teeth. "I don't believe in him now," he said—entirely unconvincingly. Rufus snorted. I might be forced to let him go if we can't prove anything against him, but I can certainly sack him.

"I think you do," said Harry quietly. "And I don't think that I can let you walk out of here. Granted, you might not attack me again, but you might attack someone else I care about. You caused a great deal of potential damage to other people's minds, even if only indirectly. You took away their free will." Rufus hid a smile at the chill gleam in Harry's eyes. "I'm going to press charges for that." He turned and nodded at Rufus. "Libel for a start, and I'd certainly think indirect magical endangerment is a potential charge, since he had to have known that any spell Dumbledore cast would be bound to affect me."

"Very true," Rufus agreed gravely, trying to keep from laughing. "We'll charge him, then."

"You can't!" Diggle spat. "You have no evidence!"

"I have someone who would be willing to help me procure some," said Harry brightly. "Does the name Henrietta Bulstrode mean anything to you, Diggle?"

Rufus saw the whiplash of shock that crossed the man's face. He recovered to sneer, "She has no evidence, either," but he hadn't been quick enough. Rufus made a quiet note to investigate Diggle's connection to Henrietta Bulstrode, and any visits he might have made to her.

Harry nodded at him, and turned to Mallory, giving her a searching stare. “Do you really think that you would have been able to control yourself, if not for Dumbledore’s spell?” he asked.

Mallory looked down. Rufus recognized the gesture. Fiona was ashamed of herself, and was trying to hold strong in the face of that shame. It overwhelmed her, though. It usually did. She was so used to thinking of herself in the right that when something did prick her conscience, it had to be a strong sting.

“I—I think so,” she whispered. “I was taken off the case because I bothered them before. I had maintained my distance for a few months by the time I lost control and cursed them. I could feel the desire to do it growing stronger and stronger, but I didn’t tell anyone for fear of being sacked. Yes, I think it was the spell.”

Harry stared at her bowed head for a long moment. Rufus could not tell what he was thinking. Finally, he sighed and said, “I won’t press charges, Minister. I still don’t want her anywhere near Lily or James, mind—not assigned to patrol the corridors that contain their cells, even. But no, no charges.”

Rufus nodded. In truth, it was a bit irregular to ask if Harry wanted to press charges against Mallory at all, but Lily and James had no right to do so from prison, and the Ministry itself was concerned in her case, so Rufus hadn’t felt right prosecuting her without giving Harry a say. As it was, any further punishment would be up to Amelia Bones, as her immediate supervisor, since there was no doubt that she had done it; only her motivation was in question. Rufus was fairly sure that Amelia would arrange to sack Mallory quietly.

It was a worse end than he had once dreamed of when he hired Mallory despite her past and her issues, but a better one than she would have had if Harry had decided to bring up charges, perhaps for mental pain.

That left Shacklebolt. Harry chewed his lip for a long moment as he stared at the tall man, who kept his head bowed over his hands. Then he said, “And why did you use the Killing Curse? Why not just a spell that might stun me or Obliviate me and keep me from testifying in the trial?"

Shacklebolt huddled down in the chair, but his voice, though flat, was clear. "Because that wasn't the compulsion that took hold of me. It said you were supposed to be dead, not just incapable of hurting your parents further."

Harry nodded slowly. "And how long did you feel that compulsion?"

"That one? Since just that morning." Shacklebolt looked up. His eyes were haunted, but Rufus could not be sure how much of that was real. Shacklebolt had been a wonderful actor when he was still an Auror; it had taken Rufus's suspicions, that he had a greater loyalty to a Light Lord than to the Ministry, months to coalesce. "Before that, I just felt the same vague disgust that I think everyone under the compulsion felt."

Harry held still for a long time, his face unhappy. Then he asked, "Did you work towards my destruction, or the destruction of anyone I hold dear, at all before the compulsion spell was cast?"

Shacklebolt stiffened. Then he said, "I don't think you're allowed to ask me that. Is he?" Absurdly, he glanced at Rufus.

Rufus tilted his head. "He's potentially going to charge you for attempted murder and using an Unforgivable," he said helpfully. "I'd say he's allowed to ask you anything he damn well pleases." Sometimes, there are ways to get around the rules.

Shacklebolt squirmed. Then he said, "No," but his pause and his question to Rufus had marked him. Harry's eyes narrowed.

"I don't wish to charge him," he said coolly. "But there were other people on the street with me that morning, and he cast the Killing Curse more than once. I think you should talk to Lucius Malfoy, Minister. He might be interested to know that Shacklebolt's first victim would have been his own son, if I hadn't knocked Draco to the ground."

“But that was an accident!” Shacklebolt exclaimed. “I was under a compulsion at the time. I had no idea—”

“I don’t believe you,” said Harry steadily. “I really don’t. I’m not going to charge you with anything, but that’s as far as I’ll take it. I don’t know what else to do in this situation, so I’ll leave it in the Ministry’s capable hands.” He glanced at Rufus with his eyebrows raised, and Rufus inclined his head. Without someone charging him, Shacklebolt couldn’t remain in Tullianum for much longer, but Rufus was sure that Mr. Malfoy would be highly interested in keeping the man who had almost hurt his son from making a reappearance.

It’ll probably end in snapping his wand, Rufus thought, but he was not entirely displeased. They didn’t really need to imprison or execute Shacklebolt, simply make sure that he couldn’t do any more harm—or else that he was useful to their cause, whether or not he wanted to be. Releasing him, and then keeping tabs on him, to see who else he contacted, was an option, as well.

“Then I think I have no other business here,” said Harry crisply. “Thank you for inviting me to be part of this, Minister. I’ll file charges against Digne through my guardian, and—”

Digne moved. He’d sat back down in his chair, half-slumped, ever since Harry had first spoken of filing charges, but now he uncoiled and shot straight at Harry. He had no wand, but he did have something small and glittering in his hand, something that shone like steel, and which Rufus could not believe the Tullianum guards hadn’t found and taken away.

Harry stepped calmly to the side, so that Digne’s stabbing hand soared past his shoulder, and then concentrated on the man’s feet. An invisible rope tangled them and appeared to pull tight. The next instant, Digne was dangling upside down above the floor, his robes falling to cover his head and the knife plummeting out of his hand to ring on the hard stone. The three Aurors in the room belatedly swore and lifted their wands to point at him, though two of them turned back to Mallory and Shacklebolt before Rufus had to snap at them.

Harry, breathing slightly faster, looked at Rufus and said, "Do you think a charge of attempted murder without the compulsion would be more trouble than it's worth?"

"No," said Rufus flatly. All his amusement at the events of the afternoon drained away. He was going to figure out how Diggle had got that knife. It seemed he still had plants in his Ministry. In such cases, he was more than willing to bend the rules. "I think it would be an excellent idea, and you may press that charge through your guardian as well, if you want."

Harry winced. "I would prefer the Ministry handle it, actually, sir. If Professor Snape hears that I was almost killed when visiting the Ministry on my own, I'll have to have guards again for at least a month."

Rufus nodded. Veritaserum blends well with pumpkin juice. "I'll handle it, Mr. Pot—Harry."

"Thank you, sir," said Harry quietly. "Do you have a Portkey that will take me back?"

"Grip the Portkey I gave you and say Portus again," said Rufus. He gave the boy a quick glance, making absolutely sure that he wasn't damaged, and then focused on Diggle again as Harry nodded to him and vanished. The man had no excuse to claim compulsion now. And he knew who the person had been who had caused Dumbledore's magic to spread.

He was going to talk. Rufus was not amused by murder attempts of any kind, especially ones that happened right in front of him. Harry hesitated outside the small room in which he'd had his last talk with Vera, and swallowed. He had to admit that he was only here because of his promise to Draco. It would have been—well, not better, but all right not to speak with her for a while, right? He'd originally planned to use this evening for research, but Thomas had told him to send the book on Greek witches and anything else he thought might help to the Ministry Auror office, care of his wife, who was now Head Auror, so that Voldemort wouldn't see them communicating. Harry had obeyed that command so enthusiastically that he now had no likely books left to look at.

He could have used this for something else, though. His healing wasn't less important than other things, it was just, well—

“You may go in, Harry.”

Harry jumped and glanced over his shoulder. Vera stood behind him, her smile patient and her eyes either not amused or simply inscrutable, so that he had no chance of telling what she was feeling. Harry bowed his head, swallowed, and pushed the door open.

The room remained almost as it had been, with the strange white chairs and the large fireplace, but now paintings hung on the wall, formless blue designs that Harry supposed might comfort Vera and be a touch of the Sanctuary in a strange place. There was a sprawled mass of cloth on the chair where Vera had sat last time, which she moved to take her seat. Harry wondered if she was actually making something, or only putting stitches together for fun. Then she looked up at him, and he didn't have any excuse to avoid sitting down in his own chair.

“Your Malfoy thinks you've been avoiding me,” said Vera quietly.

“I haven't,” said Harry. “I really haven't. I just got caught up in other things, and thought this could wait.”

Vera cocked her head at him. “And you think that is a true statement, rather than a relic of your training to put yourself last?”

“Yes.” It was important they understand that. Harry didn't intend to ever go backwards again. “You've heard about the situation with Durmstrang? And Ariadne's Web? And the children trapped there?”

“Your Malfoy has told me something of it.”

Harry nodded. "I have to do something to help them. I'm a vates; I want to break the web. And they're just children. It's not like they chose to take sides in this war, or chose their parents' politics, or ever asked to be caught up in what Bellatrix Lestrange is going to do to them. Someone has to stop that, and no one else has found a solution so far. So why shouldn't I try?"

Vera calmly pressed a strand of brown hair back behind her ear as it tried to escape its tight roll, never looking away from him while she did it. Harry squirmed. He could tell himself that she'd seen his soul already and knew things about him that not even he did, but that didn't keep the intense physical pressure of her gaze from bothering him.

"There is no reason you should not try," Vera agreed, after a silence that Harry thought went on much too long, and made him think things he didn't want to think. "But there is no reason that you should blame yourself for this happening, or for failing to find a solution immediately."

Harry clenched his teeth, and then swallowed. "I am part of the reason this happened," he murmured. "I'm part of the war."

"Do you truly blame yourself?"

Harry shook his head. "It's complicated."

"I have no pressing appointments, Harry, I assure you." Vera smiled at him. "Take as long as you like to speak."

And that was another reason he still felt uncomfortable talking to her, Harry thought. Vera appeared to really believe that the outside world stopped when she was feeling him out, as though no one else could possibly need her help. Harry never forgot that the world was turning, that people were suffering and dying, that magical creatures were imprisoned elsewhere. It was one of the things that put him in an agony of impatience. He wanted to heal himself, yes, but couldn't people see that it would have to fit in and around the gaps of larger, more important tasks?

He paused. Something about the thought seemed familiar, but from the other side, as if it were something he had once argued against. After a few instants of sifting through his memories, he found it.

He'd told Draco, after Draco cast the Killing Curse, that there was no getting past the business of daily life, that he couldn't simply fulfill his duties and then relax. There were always more duties coming up. There were always new crises appearing. There was always the chance that something more pressing would distract him from healing or from the time set aside for pleasure.

He'd said that to comfort Draco, but it was true, wasn't it? He survived by putting his head down and pushing.

And that meant that, if he was serious about healing, he couldn't rush through all his other duties and then heal. More duties would appear like toadstools. He had to accept them, be ready for them. There was never a time when he could stop living and heal. He would have to integrate healing into his life and push through it just like any other task.

"Ah," said Vera. "I see by your scowl that you appear to have arrived at a conclusion."

Harry sighed and resisted the urge to put his head in his arms. It would ultimately make him feel childish, which wouldn't give him the comfort he was seeking right now. "Yes, I have," he said unwillingly. "I can't put this off and hope a better day comes for dealing with it. That day will never come, not as long as Voldemort is alive, and maybe not after, either. I'm a vates, after all, and I have to be available to help the magical creatures. I would always think I was going to heal myself after I freed the sirens, or negotiated a peace with the nundus, or helped this or that or the other species. It would never end, would it?"

"It would not," Vera confirmed calmly. "And, Harry, you should consider that if you heal yourself, you will become a stronger vates."

Harry cocked his head. "I wouldn't have expected you to say that, since you're so insistent on my healing myself for myself."

"It is, nonetheless, something that will happen. I simply do not think you should make it your primary goal, to heal for others." Vera leaned forward. "You have had your talk with your Malfoy as I requested, and heard what he wanted. Tell me, what did you think of it?"

Harry blinked at the change of subject, but went with it. It was easier than thinking about making room for yet another commitment in his round of days. "It was strange. I had some idea he'd want those things, but I still can't get used to the idea of his wanting them with me."

"And why not?"

Harry shook his head impatiently. "Because I don't know why he loves me yet. He could have those things with other people. Why with me?"

"Have you asked him that?"

Harry frowned. "I don't think he'd answer me. He acts resigned to the huge gap between the way he sees me and the way I see myself. Maybe he doesn't have the words? And it's rather self-centered and childish, to ask for a list of reasons why someone else loves you. It's like asking for praise."

"You do have the right to ask for that, you know," said Vera softly. "I think you need to hear it. Others receive words of praise freely throughout their lives. You have received precious few."

Harry glanced away, feeling his cheeks heat. "But it would embarrass me further," he said.

"Why?"

Harry ground his teeth. "I suppose it's the training," he said reluctantly. He knew how Vera would react to this, and Draco, too; they saw the training as something he should never have had to endure. But enough good things came from it that Harry wanted to keep some of it. What would happen if he did ask Draco to do things like list why he loved Harry? It could propel Harry on a downhill slope that would end with him being selfish, and the wizarding world could not afford yet another selfish wizard with Lord-level power.

“Try it,” Vera told him calmly. “If it makes you feel too uncomfortable, then ask your Malfoy to stop. But you could do worse than this as a first step. You need to understand why others love you, if they can articulate those reasons, in order to accept your bonds with them.” She smiled slightly. “Your relationships are almost all the result of conscious choice, Harry. Perhaps it should not have been that way, perhaps you should be able to have unselfconscious, completely spontaneous trust in others, but it is that way.” Harry nodded, grateful she understood. “You know the reasons that you love others. So you will need to know the reasons others love you.”

Harry nodded a second time, reluctant, but convinced she was right. He’d said as much to Draco and Snape the day his parents were sentenced. He couldn’t imagine why they’d chosen him, out of all the people in the wizarding world, to give as much trust and love as they had. Other people could have fulfilled their needs equally well, and probably better, since they wouldn’t have the problems Harry had. So he would have to not only ask them why they’d chosen him, but remain in the room while they told him.

And, hopefully, not die of embarrassment.

“And what of your progress on other fronts?” Vera asked him then. “Have you tried to relearn pleasure in taste, in warmth, in other places that you have been exiled from?”

“I don’t see the point,” said Harry, convinced that he needed to bring this up now, or he probably never would. “What does it matter what porridge tastes like to me? Or chocolate?”

Vera frowned at him for the first time. “We have spoken of this already, Harry. It matters for the same reason it matters to other people.”

“But they’re them, and I’m me,” said Harry. “I’ve had the training, and I’m sorry for it, but there it is. I think I should be putting more effort into overcoming other things than how I feel when I eat eggs.”

"I did see your Malfoy encouraging you to vary your palate," Vera murmured. "But if you think other things are more important, Harry, then of course we should concentrate on them. You will ask your Malfoy why he loves you?"

Harry winced. "Is that a command?"

"An encouragement," said Vera. "A task that even you agree is important, and which I would like you to accomplish before I speak with you again. Along with asking him why he thinks it's important for you to eat food other than porridge. Perhaps he will have an answer that changes your mind."

"That's what I'm afraid of," Harry muttered, and then blinked. He hadn't known that was in there.

Vera leaned forward, suddenly looking more like a hawk than a wren. "Why, Harry? Why should you be afraid of learning to eat as others do, to laugh as others do, to enjoy the simple pleasures in life? It is honest fear, I can see that from your eyes, and not simply the relic of the training. Why?"

Harry swallowed. "What happens if I become selfish because of it, and turn into a Dark Lord?" There, it was out in the open, no matter how stupid it sounded, and at least Vera knew what he was thinking.

Vera watched him for a long moment. Then she said, "You fear that a great deal, don't you?" Harry nodded. "Why?"

"Not just because my mother and Dumbledore thought I would become a Dark Lord," said Harry, forcing himself through the thoughts for the first time. "Not just because I can do things like swallow magic. I used to think that was it, but...I have all this magic. And the biggest characteristic that both Dumbledore and Voldemort share, besides their power, is that they want what they want, and they don't care much about what others want. I know that Lily trained me to be too unselfish, but maybe that's better than what I would turn into if I started caring too much about my wants." He stared at Vera, wondering what her response would be.

It was gentle, at least, and she certainly didn't tell him that he was stupid for thinking as he did. "There is no path absolutely free from evil, Harry," she said quietly. "Even freedom can go too far, if you were to force someone to be free against her will. There is no certainty. I can understand why you would cling to the certainties that you have, but this is simply one more thing that needs to melt and change. You are at least conscious and aware of your actions if you are trying to enjoy the small pleasures of life, while, if you are secure in the thought that you cannot possibly be selfish, you might hurt others."

Harry bowed his head and nodded. He'd seen what absolute conviction of his own rightness did to Dumbledore. It seemed strange that conviction of unselfishness could lead to that, but people could be fanatics for any cause.

Vera came to him and gently kissed his forehead. "That is all for now, Harry. Go and find your Malfoy, and ask him why he loves you. I think you will find his answers enlightening, and a good deal less embarrassing than you might suppose."

Vera would know, Harry thought, as he nodded to her and took his leave. She'd seen Draco's soul. She'd talked with him. She probably knew all the reasons for his love for Harry, even the ones he couldn't articulate.

Perversely, that just made him surer that he would be embarrassed by it. Vera had a great deal more faith in him than he did in himself.

"Harry?"

Harry looked up and blinked. He'd run straight into Draco—probably not by coincidence, since Draco had known where he would go this evening. Draco regarded him with concern, and Harry shook his head and forced a smile.

"I'm all right," he said quietly, and put his arm around Draco's shoulders.

“Do you want to tell me what she said?”

Harry hesitated, then shook his head again. “Not yet,” he added. “I will sometime.” He’d had enough embarrassment today, what with the disastrous attempt to reconcile Tybalt and Augustus, and the fact that he hadn’t even seen Digne’s knife until the man lunged at him. He really would walk around for hours with a permanently red face if Draco started telling him why he loved him.

“All right,” said Draco.

Harry closed his eyes and leaned against him, feeling Draco’s arm curl around his shoulders in turn, for one moment taking comfort in the fact that, no matter how large and loud the world outside what they shared, Draco was there. And maybe it wasn’t cheating, wasn’t hiding, to take pleasure in his company and his gentleness and his love.

Maybe.

Chapter Fifty-One: The Choir Invisible

Harry heard the screaming in his dreams.

He opened his eyes slowly at first, certain he would find himself in another vision of Voldemort torturing someone. He wondered grimly how bad the vision must have been to have broken through his Occlumency barrier—or if Voldemort had managed to find some way through the grass that sealed off their link, just to show him these special visions of pain.

But, to his surprise, though he found himself standing in a dark, misty environment he knew must be a dream, he didn't see Voldemort anywhere. He felt slick grass beneath his feet, and, a moment later, noticed the thick lash of rain that must have been falling all the time. He tilted his head up, blinking, and brushed his fringe back from his face when it tried to cling.

He made out a huge shape arcing overhead, but it refused to resolve into anything he knew—a dragon, for example, or a hippogriff. It turned in circles, maddeningly elusive, and screamed, and screamed, and screamed.

The screaming began to prick up and down Harry's spine. He could feel his magic responding to it, which was not something he would have expected. He swallowed and crossed his arms over his stomach defensively, readying a shield in case the creature should swoop down and try to rend him open. He had no idea why he was viewing this scene as yet, and no idea what shields he might be able to conjure—or what damage he might be able to take—in this dream state.

The screaming grew louder and louder, and abruptly died away, like a crack of thunder that had reached the limit of its roll. Harry squinted determinedly upward, wondering if he could see the creature now.

He made out what he thought was a spiked tail, swaying lazily above a taloned paw. Then the paw came down in his direction, powered by a leg like a crushing pillar.

Harry dropped to the ground and rolled out of the way; there was no point in trying to keep his feet on unknown terrain, made worse to balance on by the rainwater. The leg made the ground shake hard enough as it came down to throw him a few feet in the air. Harry tucked his arms around his head as he landed, and probably saved his glasses from being broken.

He scrambled into a kneel, and stared at the thing as it turned its head towards him. It was still unformed, or seemed so, in the rushing rain, but he thought he could make out glinting eyes and teeth.

There was a familiarity about the creature, but the only thing Harry could really compare it to was a dragon, and he knew of no dragons who sounded like they were screaming. Dragons sang, in Acies's terms, and roared, in everyone else's. And he really should have recognized a dragon's shape, after such close acquaintance with them during the Triwizard Tournament.

He tried to calm down, and to make his voice calm when he spoke. "What is your name? What is your kindred? Do you need help? I am vates, and I think that I might be able to—"

The creature screamed at him, its breath deep and rotten with various horrid smells. Harry choked, and went with the blast of sound that bore him further into the dark place, wherever they were—it felt flat and grassy, at least. He wouldn't question the dragon, the thing, if it didn't want to be questioned.

He hit something, probably a boulder, and this time came up with a shield sparking around him. The creature snaked a long neck towards him, bending at odd angles. It paused when it saw the shield, and Harry saw something in the hovering golden eyes—he still couldn't see the face that supposedly encased them—which might have been doubt.

Harry switched to Parseltongue, concentrating on the snakelike curves of the neck. If it was a serpent of some kind, then of course it wouldn't have understood English and his offer to be vates to it. "Are you hurt? Do you need help? What are you? Why have you brought me here?"

The creature held absolutely still. Harry waited, holding his breath until he couldn't do it any longer and let it out with a whoosh.

As if that were the signal it'd been waiting for, the creature lashed out, smashing him in the side with its heavily muscled neck. Harry felt himself fly over the obstruction at his back and land in another grassy path. He gasped in pain, and then again when his hand flew out to catch him too late and he hit his face in the mud.

He sat up, swiping at his mud-covered glasses, until he realized it was useless and he had to pull them off. The creature was right in front of him when he could see again, its mouth open to reveal teeth longer than his arms.

Harry concentrated desperately on trying to wake up.

The creature drew in its breath and screamed, even as the dream shattered.

The scream pursued Harry into waking light, provided by Fawkes, who sat near his head on the pillow and chirped in concern. It took Harry a long moment to realize that, rather than the creature screaming into his ear, he was hearing thunder. He shuddered and turned to face the phoenix, stroking his feathers and breathing harshly.

Wait.

He felt pain when he inhaled and exhaled, not just the terror of the dream. Harry pulled up his pyjama shirt and moved to the side, so that he could see his own ribs in Fawkes's light. He grimaced when he saw bruises, already turning purple and green like night-blooming flowers.

He listened critically to his own breath and felt his own pain, then shook his head. No, he was fairly sure that he didn't have any broken ribs. He'd felt that when Quirrell cursed him with Crucio in his and Connor's first year, and this pain wasn't as sharp.

“What the fuck,” he murmured, for lack of anything better to say.

He sat where he was for a time, rubbing Fawkes’s head absently, shifting so that his movements wouldn’t disturb Argutus, who lay curled up beside him with his head on his tail. He searched his mind for references to a creature who could do this, and came up with nothing. There were, Merlin knew, dangerous and wonderful fantastic beasts in the world, especially ones that Harry didn’t know much about, but he had not heard even a rumor of one like this.

And it had seemed to have a personal enmity against him, as though he had done something that hurt it. That screaming—

He was still hearing the screaming. Or something like it.

Harry closed his eyes, concentrating. The screaming faded as he listened, though, faded into the thunder that shook the castle.

The thunder.

Harry felt his eyes flare open. The creature was connected to the storms. It had to be. It had been raining in the dream, hadn’t it? And the screaming had faded into the thunder when he woke. Perhaps this was Voldemort’s plan, to conjure a beast to hunt him in his dreams. It seemed indirect and wasteful, but then, Voldemort had never made sensible plans.

There was only one way Harry really knew of to get answers. He would have to go outside, which he hadn’t been since the storms started, and try to sense what magic might be stalking him.

He slid across the bed, wincing as twinges from his ribs announced themselves, and made it to his curtains without trouble. When he opened them, though, he jumped. Draco stood there, his eyebrows raised.

“And you were going where?” he asked.

“Just outside,” Harry said, flushing and not understanding why. It wasn’t like he had been doing anything dangerous, after all. The beast that had come stalking him in his dreams wasn't his fault. "I think I might have a clue to the magic powering the storms, whatever Voldemort is going to do on Midwinter that's stirring the weather up so much. But I haven't been close enough to the rain and the lightning to see if there really is magic behind it. I should recognize his magic, if it's there." And that would explain why my magic in the dream responded, too. I am his magical heir, and it might have sensed the familiarity of his power. "So I'm going outside to see what I can feel."

"Alone?"

Harry gave him an annoyed glance. "Well, yes. It's just a walk on the grounds, Draco, and I thought you were asleep."

"You woke me up with your little groans and complaints," said Draco. Harry was glad that he'd dropped his pyjama top in time to hide the bruises. "And there's no such thing as a little walk on the grounds with you, Harry. You'll find a mad murderer lurking with a knife under the Whomping Willow, or one of Hagrid's pets escaped and trying to find a way to get into the castle. I'm coming with you." He turned to fetch one of his cloaks, presumably, from his trunk.

"Draco," Harry whined, and knew he was whining. But it was bad enough that his own sleep was disturbed and he had suspicions of Voldemort's magic riding the storms. He didn't want Draco exposed to either annoyance or danger.

Draco looked at him over his shoulder. "You could always do the sensible thing and stay inside, Harry."

"I should know tonight," said Harry, and decided that he would have to tell Draco the truth to get past the skeptical expression on his face. "I had a dream or a vision, one of the two. Not about Voldemort," he added hastily, when Draco's face tightened. "But a creature hunted me, one I've never seen before. Its cry faded into the thunder when I woke. I thought I should at least investigate the connection between it and the storms."

"Did it hurt you?"

Harry kept his face blank with an effort. "Just a bit."

Draco hissed at him under his breath. "We're going to Madam Pomfrey when we're done here," he said, and flung his cloak over his head. Harry knew it had enchantments to make it impervious to rain and snow, and took some comfort in the fact that at least Draco wouldn't get wet.

"I don't need to go to Madam Pomfrey," he said, and knew that he was whining again. Somehow his simple little adventure had turned into this. Harry didn't know why this always happened to him. In first year, he had slipped out after Quirrell into the Forbidden Forest and seen him kill a unicorn and drink its blood, and no one had objected to that.

"Unless you can manage to heal yourself, yes, you do," said Draco, and held out the edge of his cloak. "Come on, beneath here. I know that the magic on yours isn't as good."

Harry scowled at him as he tied a pair of robes on over his pyjamas and trudged over to him. "And, of course, the fact that it'll give you a chance to hold me doesn't factor at all into your plans," he muttered.

Draco grinned at him and slipped an arm around his waist as Harry stepped under the cloak. Luckily, the arm gripped him beneath the ring of bruises that went around his ribs, and so Harry didn't need to wince and pull away. "I wouldn't be Slytherin if I admitted to something like that, Harry," he said innocently.

Harry chose to cast a Disillusionment Charm over them instead of replying. Snape often patrolled the dungeons at night, and though it was probably too late for the prefects to be out, there was always the chance of running into someone else, too.

Draco's hold never varied as they crept up the dungeon corridors and towards the front doors, even when they were on the stairs and it was awkward to maneuver with Draco's arm around his waist. Harry tried a few pointed glances and half-tugs away to no avail. Besides, he soon had enough to do, keeping his breath from rasping through his lungs in pain. He had to get outside and see what was happening with the storms, and if Draco saw how badly he'd been bruised, there was the chance that he wouldn't let that happen.

They reached the entrance hall. Harry could hear the storm much better now. The thunder sounded like someone being tortured, so loud that he wondered how anyone in Gryffindor Tower or Ravenclaw Tower got any sleep. He would have noticed dark circles beneath Connor's eyes, though, so he suspected that McGonagall and Flitwick had cast charms on the outer walls to damp the sound.

"This way," Draco murmured, and propelled Harry across the entrance hall towards the doors.

"I know it's that way," said Harry, but didn't try to walk the distance on his own. It wouldn't work, and would just prove embarrassing, so he might as well go along with what Draco wanted to do.

Halfway to the doors, they met a reflected shimmer of movement that indicated someone else was using a Disillusionment Charm. Harry raised his eyebrows, and then decided he had to at least know who it was. Finite Incantatem, he thought, concentrating on the shimmer.

The spell broke and revealed Hermione creeping intently towards the staircase, her face set. Draco drew breath for an exclamation, but Harry clamped an arm around his waist in return and squeezed, making him do nothing more than huff. Hermione stopped and looked around in suspicion, but obviously didn't see them. A moment later, she noticed she was visible, squeaked, and recast the Charm on herself.

Draco waited until they heard the faint sound of her footsteps on the staircase, and then whispered, "Why did you stop me from saying anything, Harry? That's prime taunting material, right there! You know she's on her way back from the Hufflepuff common room—"

"And that's why you're not to tease her," Harry whispered furiously. "How would you like it if we were in different Houses and someone caught you on the way back to the dungeons?"

Draco shook his head. “Wouldn’t have happened. We were both always going to be Slytherins.”

Harry gave up. Sometimes, Draco was impossible. “This way,” he said instead, and this time, he was the one to lead the way to the doors.

They crept out through them, and into the heart of the storm.

Harry felt the magic at once, curling like a snake on the back of the thunder, clenching its talons around the lightning, split and scattered and sparkling in every drop of rain that fell to earth. The wards woven into Hogwarts’s stones had kept him from feeling it before; that was the only explanation for the intense difference between inside and outside. Harry put out a shaky hand, gripping at nothing, only to feel Draco take it and hold it.

The wind picked up, and Harry realized he had been at least partially wrong. The beast’s cry wasn’t just thunder. It was the swift flow of the air, building to gale force, a more varied sound than screaming, but still incredibly loud. He shuddered. There was a mind behind that wind and that thunder, and the mind did not care about hurting others. It would not stalk them out of some sadistic need to torture, but it would sweep them out of the way without even noticing them, as casually as a wizard might step on an ant.

“Harry?” Draco’s voice sounded far away, and not only because the storm was roaring like a wild thing.

Harry edged a few steps further away from the entrance, letting the doors of Hogwarts drop shut behind him. He had to get closer to the storm, had to find the answer to this nagging sense of familiarity. There was—there was something more than sentience here, something more than magic. He’d felt it before, he knew what it was, but he couldn’t identify it now. Why not?

“Harry!”

Harry felt rain shove his fringe away from his face like harsh fingers, and realized he’d stepped out from under the cloak. He didn’t think he could care. There was a pulling force here that he'd only felt once before: with the singing, many-legged creature imprisoned in Grimmauld Place. This wasn't the same song, exactly—that one was far more musical, without the rough edges of wind and thunder—but this was a song. If he could hear the words, if he could make out the notes, then he would know who was singing, and he thought that was important.

He reached out slowly towards the magic, his own power writhing around his body in inchoate streams of light.

Then the storm noticed him.

Harry felt the focus of the great mind sharpen and point at him, like an arrowhead. Still, he couldn't find it in himself to feel frightened. He was only vaguely aware of Draco hammering on the light behind him; his magic had tightened, forming a barrier between them.

Harry looked up.

The lightning came down.

He felt it hit him like a bite, like a clamping of jaws around his waist. He snapped sideways, once, and every muscle in his body rang. The song he heard changed to a deepening croon, and then the magic draped over him, a mingling of the electric shock he would have expected to feel and hundreds of small, pinching, champing mouths. They were trying to drain his magic, and Harry, stumbling, dazed, was almost of a mind to let them.

Then he heard a hiss close to his ankles, and dazzling light flared above him, to the accompaniment of Fawkes's indignant voice.

The song turned into a hiss, considerably less pleasant to listen to than what Harry recognized as Argutus's insults in Parseltongue. The magic drew back from Harry and lurched up, coiling like a cobra, looking from Argutus to Fawkes as if wondering who it should hit first.

Fawkes dived at it, his talons widespread, his song fearless. The magic turned, its decision obviously made.

Harry woke.

He flung out his hand, and the light that had been keeping Draco away from him turned into a blade that carved the darkness facing him. The darkness writhed and screamed, more in annoyance and anger than pain, Harry thought, and jumped away from him. Now it had almost the form of the beast in his dream, though considerably smaller, bending its neck back towards him, the golden eyes and the long, sharp teeth gleaming in the midst of a body he couldn't see very well.

"Go away," Harry said, and heard Fawkes strengthen his words with a warble. Fire streamed from the phoenix, turning the raindrops to steam before they landed. Argutus was coiled around his ankle, still hissing in agitation, and the darkness watched all of them with wild, contemptuous eyes. "I will not allow you to harm them, whatever you might do to me."

The creature continued watching him for a moment. Then it laughed, a rolling, deep belly laugh that said it could wait for a time when Harry wouldn't escape it, and turned and sprang for the clouds. Wings like wet patches on stone opened around it, and beat once, and then it was gone, dissipated into the roaring, stalking force of a power that, Harry realized, he had felt before.

It wasn't any plan of Voldemort's stirring up the storms, after all. This was the wild Dark, the same force that walked the night skies on Walpurgis Night.

And Midwinter was coming up—longest night of the year, a night without a moon.

Harry felt his mouth tighten. This was worse news than Voldemort, by far.

He shook his head and stooped down so that Argutus could crawl up his left arm. Fawkes landed on his shoulder, both balance and voice unsteady for a moment. His head ducked to brush against Harry's cheek, and Harry winced. The feathers would leave a faint burn. Fawkes had been worried.

Someone else had been, too, and Draco pulled Harry firmly against him, murmuring, "I don't know whether I should kiss you or punch you, to tell you the truth. Or take you to Madam Pomfrey and make sure that she feeds you enough Dreamless Sleep to last you for the next three days."

Harry winced and tugged himself backward as Draco's arms came in contact with the bruises. He ignored Draco's hurt expression for a moment to feel at the edges of his magic. At last, he nodded, satisfied. If the wild Dark had permanently swallowed any of his power, he really couldn't tell. He felt fine.

Well, except for the bruises, and the fact that he'd put his life in danger again without meaning to, and the wild worry in Argutus's voice as he loosed a stream of admonitions, and Draco's silence that throbbed like a toothache.

"I'm sorry," Harry said quietly, turning to him. "But that was the creature from the dream I had before we came out here. It hit me along the ribs with its neck, and when I woke, I found that I carried the bruises."

Draco's expression changed, but to one not that much better. "And when were you planning to tell me about this?"

"Um. After I found out about the storms?"

Draco closed his eyes and shook his head. "I hope it was worth it, Harry, because you frightened me to death." He kept his head turned away, and Harry suspected he knew why when his voice was choked up a moment later. "I thought you were going to die, damn you."

Harry thought of saying that Draco should be used to that by now, but kept the words behind his teeth. Now wasn't a time for jokes. "I know," he said quietly. "I'm sorry."

“I’ll get it through your head someday that your life is worth more than the knowledge you get by risking it,” Draco breathed. Harry wasn’t sure if it was a promise or a prayer. “Someday.”

“I hope so,” Harry said. It wasn’t that he liked worrying people, he thought, as he told Draco where to put his arm so that he could support Harry into the school but not press on any of the bruises. He didn’t even particularly enjoy risking his life, unless he was doing it in a plan he was fairly sure would work out and could anticipate and exult in the adrenaline rush.

But—well, sometimes risking his life was the only way to learn anything. And what he had learned tonight had been worth the risk.

Of course, he still didn’t necessarily know what it meant, what had stirred the wild Dark up so, and why it had chosen this Midwinter to strike when it normally only grew this active around Walpurgis. He knew someone who would know, though.

“You’re staying here for the night, Mr. Pot—Harry.” Madam Pomfrey, her hair half-wild from sleep, had woken up when Draco insistently called for her, but she wasn’t very happy about it. She’d run her wand over his ribs, and then looked even less happy. “You have a few internal injuries, easily cured with potions, and rest.” She jabbed her wand at him as if she would cast a sleep spell right there. “And your ribs are fractured, though not broken. You’re going to sleep, and then you’ll stay in bed until at least noon tomorrow.”

“But it was sleep that caused me to get the injuries in the first place,” Harry protested, ignoring Draco’s little satisfied noise. “How can you be sure that I won’t have another dream like that?”

Madam Pomfrey gave a sharp little sigh, a white triangle of skin appearing around her nostrils. “I am sure of nothing where you are concerned, Harry,” she muttered. “But Dreamless Sleep at least seems like a reasonable precaution, and I will set a spell to warn me if you manifest any unexpected wounds.”

Harry squirmed. This was exactly what he'd hoped to avoid. "Can I wait half an hour to take the Potion, Madam Pomfrey?" he asked, and smiled dazzlingly at her. "I have to talk to someone first."

"You are not firecalling anyone at this time of night," the matron began.

"It's not a firecall," said Harry. "Just a spell that I can use which contacts them right away. I promise, I won't take more than half an hour." Unless she changes her mind at the end of the half hour, he thought hopefully. He hated Dreamless Sleep. It always made him slower to react in the morning, and in the middle of a War, a split second's reaction time could make the difference between life and death.

Madam Pomfrey stared harder at him. "You're not going to take the Potion unless I agree to this, are you?" she asked.

Harry painted a contrite expression across his face. "No. Sorry."

The matron shook her head heavily and went to fetch the vial of dark potion from a cabinet on the far wall. "Half an hour, Harry," she said, as she set it down on the table beside the bed as heavily as a troll had ever dropped a club. "And you'll take these potions now." She held out what Harry recognized as healing potions for internal injuries and fractured bones. He nodded and drank them, wishing absently that whoever had invented these had looked into making them taste sweeter.

"I should go back to sleep," said Madam Pomfrey, and looked fiercely at Draco. Harry expected her to send him back to the Slytherin common room, but she said only, "You'll make sure that he takes the Dreamless Sleep, Mr. Malfoy? And then stay here, in a separate bed?"

Draco flushed, but nodded. "You can count on me, Madam," he said.

"Good," said Madam Pomfrey, and glared one final time at Harry, as if she could make him safer by looking. Then she went back to her private room in the back of the hospital wing.

Harry sighed as he saw the look on Draco's face. He was no doubt taking the Dreamless Sleep now. But Draco appeared content to wait for at least the same period of time that the matron had said he could have, so Harry touched his left wrist and whispered the communication spell.

A moment later, Henrietta Bulstrode, sounding very awake for this time of night, said, "Yes, vates? What can I do for you?"

Harry shrugged his discomfort off—just because vates sounded like a title when she said it didn't mean she meant it that way—and pressed forward in his task. "I need to know what you know about the wild Dark," he said. "Other than Thomas Rhangnara, I think you have the largest library, and he's busy researching ways to break past Ariadne's Web right now."

"Of course," said Henrietta, not even asking why he needed it. "I know a good deal about it without even looking in a book, vates; some of my ancestors once tried to harness the magic at Walpurgis, before they gave it up as a bad idea. What have you learned about it?"

"It's in motion now," said Harry. "These storms that are plaguing the British Isles come from it. It confronted me in my dreams tonight, and then when I stepped out into the storm. I think it plans to strike at Midwinter, when the moon will be dark."

There was a long moment of stillness. Then Henrietta said softly, "Someone has roused the Dark, then. I think it must be the Dark Lord, and not you. Powerful wizards draw its attention, but you haven't done anything to actively irritate it, have you?"

"No," said Harry, ignoring the way Fawkes chirped on his shoulder. The phoenix had a different opinion, but Harry didn't have to let that influence his response to Henrietta. "But I was under the impression that it could strike back any time it wanted, and it would, too, whether or not someone had actively irritated it."

“No,” said Henrietta. “It is above us. Most of the time, it plays in the spaces between the stars and ignores us. Walpurgis draws its attention, and so does the proclamation of a new Dark Lord, but very little else. However, I believe that Voldemort tried to capture it this past Walpurgis, did he not?”

Harry swore beneath his breath. “He did,” he said, ignoring Draco’s raised eyebrow. “I suppose I thought it would take its vengeance before now.”

“No,” said Henrietta calmly. “It will wait for Midwinter, the time when the world is furthest from light—and the blackening of the moon will add to its power. It means to play, I think, or it would not have come hunting you. My family has a story of an ancestor facing it one Midwinter in the form of a mighty storm. That storm might have destroyed Britain, but the Dark lost interest and wandered away. This time, I do not think we can count on that.”

“Definitely not.” Harry shuddered at the memory of the wild Dark’s golden eyes, very interested in him. It had obviously tried to take his magic just because it could. It might want to punish Voldemort, but from what Henrietta was saying, it wouldn’t at all object to killing whatever was in its path. “Is there any way to tell where the brunt of the storm will fall? Or is it just wherever Voldemort is going to be that night?”

“No,” said Henrietta. “The Dark has a sense of ceremony when it comes hunting like this—as you’ve surmised for yourself, or it would have taken its vengeance already, without the buildup to Midwinter. It intends for this to be more than a simple vengeance-taking. It wants attention, rather like a spoiled child. That is the reason it has reached out to you, vates, beyond your magic, I think. In my ancestor’s story, it chose Stonehenge, both because that was the place he’d tried to capture it and because the most powerful wizard in those days was a druid who loved the stones. It will almost certainly find it amusing to choose a place that connects you and Voldemort, a place where something powerful and Dark happened.”

Harry felt himself freeze, and Draco shift beside him. He forced the words past his tight throat. "Where something powerful and Dark happened? Or where something almost happened?"

Henrietta's voice turned uncertain for the first time. "That, I will have to look up. It's been a long time since I studied the books on the character and temper of the wild Dark. My family's stories always served me well for most of my needs. But I think it will choose the Darkest occurrence it can, and that means a successful ritual, say, would please it better than one that failed to happen."

That eliminates the Chamber of Secrets and the Shrieking Shack, then.

"Vates?" Henrietta's voice was concerned. "Do you think you know where the storm will come down?"

Harry coughed, and managed to speak again. "I do," he said. "There are really only two places it could. The house in Godric's Hollow where Voldemort gave me my curse scar, or—" He made himself say it. "The graveyard where I lost my hand."

Draco leaned against him. Fawkes crooned. Argutus lifted his head. "I think I know how to control my visions now," he said. "That's why I spent the time away from you that I did, working on them. I can show you, if I can just concentrate."

"I am sorry, vates," Henrietta's voice murmured. "It will almost certainly be the graveyard. The giving of the curse scar involved Dark magic, yes, but that was longer ago. And would I be right in saying that you do not personally remember it?"

"Right," Harry whispered.

"Again, I will have to look up confirmation, but from what I know of the wild Dark, if it's decided to make you a piece in its game, it will want to hurt you as much as possible. And the graveyard holds more and worse memories for you. Yes, it will be there."

“All right,” Harry breathed. He managed to kick his brain past the memories it wanted to show him. “Then I’ll find out where Tom Riddle was buried. He used his father’s bone in the ritual to revive himself, along with my blood. Whatever graveyard it is, we’ll find it, and we’ll know where to go and block the storm.”

“I would say that you cannot block the storm, but I know that you must try,” said Henrietta. “I will go to my library and see if I can learn anything about the wild Dark that might help, or might contradict what we know now. Farewell, vates. Try to rest.”

“Farewell,” Harry echoed blankly, and then he felt the spell ease and vanish.

He closed his eyes and counted to ten, in Mermish, in his head. The memories, which had gripped him like the jaws of the lightning around his waist, slowly eased the same way the spell had. Then he could let himself feel Fawkes on his shoulder again, and Argutus coiled tightly around his left wrist, and—

And Draco holding the vial of Dreamless Sleep Potion to his lips.

“Draco!” he tried to say, but choked. He ended up swallowing most of the potion, resigned to it. He didn’t think it had been quite half an hour, but he was in no position to object. Draco eased him back so that he could lie on the pillows.

“Sorry,” he whispered into Harry’s ear. “But you’ve just had a pretty hard shock. You deserve a while to rest after this, I think.”

Harry closed his eyes. He had a few moments before the potion, swirling in the center of his mind like a maelstrom, covered the whole thing. He murmured sleepily and shifted position.

“Harry?” Draco sounded as if he were on the other side of an ocean. “Can you block the storm at all, do you think? I thought no mortal wizard could stop the wild Dark.”

“I don’t know,” Harry murmured. “But just because it’s impossible doesn’t mean I can get out of trying.”

Draco was silent then. Harry felt his hand for just a moment more before the potion carried him away. The last thought he remembered was absurd gratitude to the wild Dark. This was a problem so overwhelming that he couldn’t feel bad about devoting all his efforts towards solving it, at least until Midwinter arrived.

Draco knew Harry had fallen asleep almost instantly—Dreamless Sleep always affected him that way after the initial pause—but he stayed there, staring down into his face, fighting the temptation to curl up in the same bed as Harry after all. Only the remembrance of Harry’s injuries, including the bruises flaring along his ribs like the marks of clutching fingers, kept him from doing it. He might jostle Harry in his sleep and hurt him further.

Merlin, Harry. He closed his eyes, but then the vision of Harry caught and tossed by the lightning was there. The lightning had grown around him, wild and weird and disgusting like nothing Draco had seen before, sucking as if it would pull Harry’s skin off his bones. The fear had struck Draco like a blade, the idea that he might lose Harry never so present as it had been in that moment.

Now, worse than the fear was the despair. No matter what I can do, I can never keep him safe.

Draco took a deep breath and sat back in his chair, and made himself face the thought. It was one of the things Vera had spoken to him about, and her gentle words rushed past his ears like the sigh of a breeze.

“You love your Harry fiercely enough to go through any storms beside him, I can see that. What you must know now is that the storms are unlikely to end. You dream of a haven where you can live with him and be untroubled, but that will not happen. Your Harry will forever cast himself into danger’s path. He does not know the meaning of relaxation, he is only slowly learning the meaning of pleasure, and he will never learn to look aside from the suffering of others. You must decide if you can bear that, and the wounds it will put on your heart.”

Draco shut his eyes. He had scoffed a bit at Vera's pronouncement, because while he knew she could see souls, she couldn't predict the future. She couldn't know that Harry would never consent to say he had done enough and retreat from the world.

Now, Draco had to admit that knowledge of the basis of someone's character could be a kind of prediction, if you knew them well enough. And Vera knew them both well enough.

Could he bear this?

The answer was there, though, before he asked the question. Yes. He was too deeply tangled up in Harry to pull back now, without ripping apart half of what he was. Oh, he could heal from those wounds—Vera would probably say that; his father, who did not believe in needing people, would certainly say that—but he didn't want to. So, yes, he could bear this, because he must.

So he had to decide how he was going to bear it.

Draco narrowed his eyes and pushed his hair back from his forehead. Madam Pomfrey had cast warming and drying charms on them, but Draco still thought he could feel the pressure of the rain, and the wind, and the eyes of the lightning-creature that had hurt Harry. The pressure didn't make him weary, or frustrated with Harry, or even very frightened. It just pissed him off.

I am going to bear this, but not like a little suffering wife, or a best friend dragged along against his will. I am going to bear this the way I want to bear it. Harry knows what I want. I won't settle for less, because I shouldn't have to. I deserve what I want from him. And I'm going to make a place for myself in the midst of all the storms and dragons and oceans and Dark Lords he has to face.

I was here first. They can sod off. I can bear this because I know I'm the most important person in the world to him. If I'm not, then I'll get upset, but not before. Harry might help other people, but he's going to share his life with me. And I'm going to be beside him, not behind him.

As spiky and snarly as he felt, Draco wasn't sure he'd be able to sleep, but, surprisingly, slumber descended the moment he curled up in the hospital bed across from Harry's, despite the memory of the storm and the soft light shining from Fawkes. He supposed, as the ground slid out from under him and tipped him down into the abyss, that this was what the sleep of the just felt like.

Surely no one in the world can be as right as I am at this moment.

Chapter Fifty-Two: Harry Plays the “Boy-Who-Lived”

“You cannot mean to do this.” Snape seemed to be under the impression that if he said that often enough, then Harry would wake up from the spell Snape seemed to be convinced he was under, and decide not to do this.

“But I do.” Harry looked aside from the conjured mirror and studied his guardian over his shoulder. “I admit, stepping into the storm is a risk, but it has to be in public, or I can’t trust that the warning will get to everyone in time.”

“And you think they will listen to you.” That was flat.

“I do,” Harry repeated. He looked again in the mirror, then gave a shrug, irritated at himself. He’d wanted to look appropriately warrior-like, so that those who listened to his press conference would take his warning seriously, but other than the grim expression on his face—that was no problem—he had to admit he didn’t know what would make him look that way. He would be speaking to a mixed audience of Light and Dark wizards, too, which further complicated the problem. In the end, he’d gone for ordinary dark robes, though he’d left the Slytherin tie off, so that he wouldn’t look like a schoolboy. He’d also bared his left arm, both because he liked the symbolic gesture of revealing he didn’t have the Dark Mark and to emphasize his missing hand. If he could remind his audience that he’d lost some of himself to this war, they would be more likely to listen.

“I wish you did not have to do this,” Snape muttered behind him. “Not only the storms might kill you. An Order of the Phoenix member with a knife—” Harry hoped he hadn’t jumped at that, since Snape still didn’t know about Diggle “—a Death Eater with the Killing Curse on her lips, or someone determined to avenge Dumbledore’s imprisonment would do just as well.”

“I know,” said Harry. “But I’ve explained the reasons why.” He had, multiple times, including the reasons that Scrimgeour had added to his list when he first contacted the Minister and asked if he thought the press conference was a good idea. Snape was stubborn, but he was also, in this case, helpless to stop the conference from going ahead.

“You have. And I will be at your shoulder.” That alone seemed to give Snape any confidence.

Harry just nodded and got ready to leave Snape’s private rooms for the entrance hall. He’d tried to get Snape to stay here, since there really were Death Eaters hunting him, but Snape had just looked at him, and that was that.

They met Draco outside the door; he’d fussed himself into readiness in their bedroom. Harry almost envied him his deep green robes with the Malfoy crest, for all that they looked uncomfortable. They proclaimed Draco’s status and allegiances clearly and undeniably. Lacking a last name and a Declaration for either Dark or Light, Harry’s options were limited.

Of course, sending a mixed message is the only truthful thing I can do. I just hope that it doesn’t dilute the impact of that message.

“Ready?” Draco looked at Harry’s bared left arm, started to frown for a moment, then seemed to catch on to the gesture and nodded. Then he frowned anyway. “Do you think I should show my left arm as well?”

“It’d be a shame to ruin the robes,” said Harry, less because he thought that was true than because he wanted no more fussing. It was already two-o’clock, and the press conference was at three. They had to get off Hogwarts grounds and then Apparate to the vicinity of the Ministry. Then, no doubt, the press of people would hold them up before they could get to the stage where the Minister had arranged for them to have the conference. “Let’s leave.”

Draco exchanged a look with Snape that Harry didn’t bother to translate, since he knew it would be uncomplimentary to him. He led the way out of the dungeons, only to pause when he saw his brother waiting near the front doors, tugging at the collar of his own formal robes as if they constricted his breathing.

“Connor?” Harry could not imagine why Connor wanted to come. He’d offered his brother the opportunity to attend the press conference with him already, and Connor had quietly refused, saying that he thought people would get confused if the former Boy-Who-Lived appeared with the current one. “Have you changed your mind?”

“Not exactly,” said Connor. “But I just thought of something I should do, and this is the best chance to do it. I want as many people to know as possible.” His face was pale, but determined.

Draco made a little growling noise. Harry knew what he was thinking. Your brother shouldn’t take over the spotlight. Of course he would be trying to do that. Just like a Gryffindor.

Harry spoke quickly, to cut the impending tantrum off. “You’re welcome, of course, Connor.” He glanced at Snape. “You can Side-Along Apparate Draco, and I’ll Apparate my brother?”

Snape said nothing for long moments, and Harry wondered if he would send Connor back to Gryffindor Tower after all. The two of them were getting along a bit better in their practice dueling sessions, but it was still nothing to brag about.

“That would be acceptable,” said Snape at last, and Harry relaxed. He would have to seriously reconsider having another of these conferences in the future. The sheer amount of fuss involved in them was making him allergic to them, and he hadn’t even had one yet, properly.

They stepped out into the rain, and Harry tensed. It had been a week since the storm’s attack. That didn’t seem to make any difference to his jumpiness, though, especially now that he could hear the song and feel the magic behind the rain and thunder. His brain kept reminding him that they were now only ten days from Midwinter, and that all their preparations to counter the wild Dark’s stroke might not be enough.

But nothing hit them. Snape cast Impervious Charms on their cloaks to keep the rain from soaking them through, and shields above their heads to keep them from being pelted. Harry nodded; he should have thought of that himself. He was going to arrive in public with his hair wild as it was, thanks to its refusal to obey a comb. He would at least like to avoid having it soaked and windblown.

“This way.”

Snape led them towards the road to Hogsmeade. Harry found himself walking between Draco and his brother. Draco maintained a silence no doubt born of a superiority complex. Harry knew for a fact that he hadn't been in a public situation like this very often, either, but he acted as if he had, and that could make all the difference. Pureblood rituals were good at training a wizard or witch to maintain an uncaring attitude.

Connor, of course, chewed on his lip and did such a good job of messing his own hair up that the wind didn't need to help. Harry opened his mouth to say something, then shut it again and shook his head. Connor was nervous enough about—whatever this was. He assumed his brother didn't want him to know what it was, or he would have said something already. Scolding him would only raise his nerves.

Draco, of course, didn't know how to leave well enough alone. “Quit burrowing, Potter,” he said, in a distant, lofty tone that almost perfectly imitated Lucius's. “If your thoughts aren't already in your head, pawing at your hair won't help you find them.”

Connor, just about to run his fingers through his hair again, flushed and dropped his hand to his side. “You don't know anything about what I'm doing, Malfoy,” he snapped.

“No, I don't.” Draco was now wearing the politely neutral expression that Harry suspected both the elder Malfoys favored for boring dinner parties. “Why don't you tell me, and then I'll have some idea?”

“I would, if I thought that you could keep—”

“Enough.”

Snape's pointedly single word put an end to the conversation, and after that they walked in silence. Harry had thought he'd be grateful for it, but he found the silence sharpening the thoughts in his head, sending them tumbling into one another, revolving in odd patterns. He wondered, as he had since he'd sent the letters to Skeeter and Scrimgeour asking about this, if it were really the right thing to do. The Ministry, after all, could have announced the facts about the wild Dark and told people to stay inside on Midwinter night as easily as Harry.

But people were used to ignoring the Ministry, treating their announcements as a bit of a joke; almost a year of Scrimgeour in office hadn't yet changed that. And a secondhand report that Harry planned to fight the storms wouldn't command as much credibility as a proclamation from Harry himself. He badly wanted to give what reassurance he could. By now, most of wizarding Britain would know these weren't natural storms—if only because it was the eleventh of December and no snow had fallen yet, only this constant, steady rain—and Harry would rather they realize the true cause than panic.

And know someone is doing something about it. There's that, too.

Harry shifted restlessly, which jostled Argutus, who was curled around his left arm and under his robe, the only concession he'd made to the chill of the air and the rain. He slid his head out the slit in the sleeve, and flicked his tongue at Harry. "Everything will be all right," he said. "I showed you in the vision."

Harry managed a tense smile. It was true that Argutus had managed to conjure a vision of what looked like Britain, and maybe even part of Europe, with a tracery of light across it, surrounded by intense darkness. Harry had given the description to his allies, in the hopes that someone might know something about it. Augustus Starrise had answered at once, saying excitedly that it resembled some cooperative rituals he knew of. Now he was organizing the Light wizards who were either allied to Harry or owed his Light allies favors. He was confident they would help Harry to resist the storm when it came.

Harry wasn't as confident. Argutus's scales showed what might happen, like a prophecy, rather than what would happen, with the sharpness and clarity of a necromancer's vision. He hoped they were doing the right thing, but he couldn't be sure. And none of his allies had felt the sheer screaming power of the wild Dark as he had. It had carried him like a child when they struck back against Voldemort at Walpurgis. It could do the same thing now, especially when it was angry and wanted to—play with Harry.

Henrietta had contacted him several times over the course of the last week, but had been unable to add anything to her original guess about why the Dark was after Harry. It wanted his attention, and it wanted to eat his magic if it could—Harry had seen that much in the lightning attack—and it could be miffed for its own reasons. Henrietta had argued that its motive mattered less than the fact that it was apparently drawing Harry into the dance it was doing with Voldemort, the same way that the other Dark storm had drawn both her ancestor and a powerful druid into a dance. Harry had reluctantly agreed.

Even if it wasn't pulling at me, I would still have to face it. I'm the only one who might possibly harness enough power to stop it.

He shivered. Snape gave him a sharp glance. "Do you need me to renew the charms on your cloak, Harry?" he asked.

Harry shook his head. "I'm fine," he whispered. He did feel a faint chill from the rain, in fact, but only now that Snape had called his attention to it. He felt a far greater chill from the fact that he would be going up against one of the mightiest forces of magic in the world, and that he was powerful, and backed by allies, but without the sheer strength the Dark had casually displayed to him.

And it would be stronger than ever come Midwinter, with the moon, which somewhat lessened its influence now, gone.

Harry shook his head and lengthened his stride. He had to stop worrying about what might happen. There was only what he could plan until he actually entered the battle, and then what would happen. He would control as much of that as he could, but he remembered

Lily telling him that battle plans only lasted until the battle began. Then they shattered, always.

I'll do what I can. And right now, that's warn the wizarding public about what's coming.

Above him, the thunder screamed. It sounded smug.

"Welcome, Harry." Scrimgeour was rising to his feet, his face grave and his yellow eyes more intent than Harry had ever seen them. This was the Minister's public face, he thought, the one he would don in times of war and natural disaster. "Thank you for coming. I think this is the best solution."

Harry nodded. He was somewhat astonished the Minister had seen him in the midst of the dozen Aurors who'd met them at the Apparition point and escorted them to the platform. Perhaps Scrimgeour just knew he had to be in there somewhere.

He climbed the steps of the platform, feeling Impervious Charms and wards part for him and then slam back together again. He wondered, half-humorously, if there was one to prevent rotten vegetables or saliva from hitting him. The wizarding public in older times had sometimes been demonstrative.

He scanned the faces of the wizards already waiting and watching. The reporters were closest to the stage, of course; there was the flash of Skeeter's glasses, and several bursting lights registered the presence of photographers. Next to Skeeter was a woman with severely pulled-back hair and a practiced sneer, who seemed to spend most of her time sneering at Skeeter. Harry suspected she was Melinda Honeywhistle, Skeeter's most frequent rival for the front page of the Prophet. Next to her stood a somber man, and next to him a wizard in the tattiest robes Harry had ever seen, and then more men and women, professional or unprofessional as their papers, or perhaps their reputations, dictated. Harry didn't know any others by sight.

He knew the wizards and witches gathered beyond the reporters, though, or at least he knew of them. These would be the same kind of people who had come to witness his parents' trial—hungry for a hint of explanation, rejoicing in whatever came their way. They looked less eager now than they had then, more worried, but they still stared at him with open curiosity. Harry nodded. It would be the spectators who came to the press conference; more ordinary citizens would be content to read what he said in the newspapers.

Aurors moved through the crowd, registering wands and glaring at anyone who got too rowdy. It took Harry a moment to realize they weren't the only Ministry officials there. Wizards in nondescript dark robes slithered through the spectators more gracefully than the Aurors, and sometimes paused as if they were only ordinary people idly jostling for a better spot.

Harry raised his eyebrows. Unspeakables. Scrimgeour is taking my security seriously, it seems.

Well, it was in public, and the last time Scrimgeour had seen him, Diggle had tried to kill him. Harry supposed he'd won the right to feel a little paranoid.

He glanced over his shoulder, to see how the others were settling. Draco had taken one of the chairs near the back of the stage and adopted a perfect pose and perfect bored face. Snape was sitting beside him, scowling as if he hated every foot separating Harry and him. Connor was talking earnestly to Scrimgeour. Harry cocked his head, then remembered Connor saying last summer that he'd written Scrimgeour several times about the trial and struck up a relationship with him. Harry supposed he was seeing the results of those letters now.

"Mr. Potter," said an unfamiliar voice.

Harry kept his head turned, as though he had no idea who that surname belonged to. A moment later, Skeeter's tone, honed to precise nastiness, said, "Really, Melinda, you might try reading the Prophet once in a while. It would enlarge your grammatical skills as well as your knowledge of current events. Harry renounced his parents' name at his parents' trial. Do try to keep up."

Melinda Honeywhistle growled under her breath and said, "Harry," in a tone that implied she hated it. She would be someone used to making formalities into a mockery, Harry thought distantly as he turned and faced her.

"Yes, ma'am?" he asked.

"Would you mind answering a few questions before the conference begins?" She beamed up at him—the expression was patently false; Skeeter was better at this, Harry thought—and tapped her quill against her notebook. "Strictly off the record, I promise."

Harry gave her an empty, polite smile. "Sorry, ma'am, I can't. I promised that I'd save all my announcements for the conference itself, and that doesn't begin until the Minister says it will." He turned back to the conversation between Scrimgeour and his brother. The Minister had bent down now, and was speaking in a low, rapid voice. Connor listened raptly, nodding now and then. Harry frowned. What in the world can he have planned?

"Oh, come, Mr. Potter—"

"Melinda, really," said Skeeter, her voice holding just the right amount of shock.

"Harry, I mean." Honeywhistle said that as if it were a talisman against her forgetting his proper name again. "Surely it won't hurt to answer just a few questions? Nothing about what brings you here today, I promise. I'm doing a human interest piece about victims of child abuse, and I'd just like to talk to both you and your brother quickly, not at all in-depth."

Harry could see Snape rising to his feet. Uh-oh. Tempting as it was to let Snape deal with Honeywhistle, Harry didn't want the press conference to start off with the kind of spell incident that would make headlines overshadowing his announcement. "I'm afraid that's impossible, ma'am," he said. "Here comes the Minister, anyway."

That was true. Scrimgeour had spun away from Connor with a nod, and Connor took his seat, looking satisfied. Scrimgeour did pause halfway across the stage to give Snape a look. It was a very clear look. Snape sat back down.

“Back a few steps, ladies, if you please,” said Scrimgeour, his face tight and his eyes on fire. Harry wondered if he had a grudge against Honeywhistle in particular, or if he just hated people violating the proprieties at events like this. Both Honeywhistle and Skeeter stepped away from the stage, and Scrimgeour tapped his wand against his throat. “Sonus,” he said, even as he glanced at Harry.

Harry nodded, just slightly.

Scrimgeour faced the chattering reporters and crowd and coughed. The sound echoed several times around the expanse of cobblestones, warded with extensive charms to turn away Muggle notice and entrance, where the Ministry had chosen to build the platform. Most of the people who’d been talking jumped at once and turned their attention back to the Minister.

“Thank you for coming,” said Scrimgeour. Even with the charm amplifying his voice, it was just the right volume, Harry thought, grave and courteous without being overwhelming. He’d obviously learned public speaking along with every other Ministerial duty that mattered. He paused for a moment, as if measuring up the threats that the Aurors and Unspeakables might have missed, and then continued. “This is a press conference arranged through the Ministry, though with the cooperation of Harry, who until recently was Harry Potter. He has an announcement that concerns the safety of the whole of wizarding Britain. With that in mind, here he is, to make his announcement. Questions will only be permitted after he has finished speaking.” He said the last with a significant glance at Melinda Honeywhistle, and then tapped his throat to silence his own voice, nodding at Harry.

Harry was not going to trust to Sonus; he didn’t have the Minister’s experience with it. He used a charm he’d found during his research on Ariadne’s Web, instead, when he’d had the idea, born from a half-crazed lack of sleep, that he might be able to send a wind through the lightning ward around Durmstrang.

“Insusurro,” he murmured, and the air near everyone’s ears altered, vibrating in tune with his voice, carrying it to them as if he were standing next to them and speaking at normal volume. More than one person jumped when he began giving his prepared speech, but at least they wouldn’t miss anything important.

“My name is Harry, as you know,” he said, turning his head from side to side, meeting as many of their eyes as he could. His heart had begun to pound a few minutes ago, but now it retreated into a hard, steady beat. This really wasn’t much different than addressing his allies, especially since he didn’t need to raise his voice to insure he was heard. “Until recently, as the Minister says, I was Harry Potter. But one thing about me has not changed, and that is the extent of my magic and my commitment to using it to guarantee freedom for as many wizards and magical creatures as I can.”

He let a few of the restraints on his magic slip. Harry heard people gasp as they felt his power for the first time. He let it flurry above their heads, an invisible presence for the most part—unless someone else saw it visually, he supposed—but transforming the rain into soft flakes of snow.

The thunder screamed at him, the Dark magic feeling and responding to his strength. Harry let a grim smile pull at his lips as he brought down the barriers on himself again, and it promptly began raining harder than ever. He couldn’t have proved his point better if he tried.

“The wild Dark has been provoked,” he said. “This is the magic that opposes the Light, that runs in the dark spaces between the stars, that dances on Walpurgis Night.” The majority of the people in the crowd looked frightened, and Harry didn’t blame them. They were Light wizards. The wild Dark was the stuff of nightmares to them, or stories their parents had used to frighten them. “It intends to come sweeping in on Midwinter night, the solstice, when the moon will be dark. That is a time of power for it. As a prelude to that, it has hatched these storms, but all of these storms are nothing next to what it intends to bring down on Midwinter.”

He heard murmurs of rising panic, and knew he didn’t dare let them advance too far. He held up his left arm, and saw multiple eyes fix on it, noting the missing sleeve and the missing hand. Argutus was, thankfully, keeping out of sight.

“I intend to fight it,” he said quietly. “If it were only hunting Voldemort, I would not condemn it, but it will destroy anything in its path. And I challenge power that does that.” He turned his arm over. “No matter what it costs me. No matter what kind of power it is, Dark or Light. I will protect you as best as I can. I must ask that you take precautions that night. Do not travel if at all possible on the twenty-first of December, and set up your strongest wards. Beware of Dark magical creatures; they may become bolder as the wild Dark nears. Do not go outside.”

They stared at him, their mouths slightly parted. That had happened to even Skeeter and Honeywhistle, Harry saw with a gush of amusement.

He turned and looked upwards. As they’d planned before he left Hogwarts, Fawkes chose that moment to appear, flaring into being above the platform with a ringing cry that challenged the Dark and negated it. The rain around him turned into a corona of steam as he coasted down and landed on Harry’s right arm, upraised to receive him. The phoenix tossed his head back and loosed a deep, thrilling song. Harry could see it strengthening and comforting the people who watched the platform, much as it had done for him in the Chamber of Secrets.

Fascinated, awed looks had already appeared on their faces, even before Fawkes began to sing. Harry suspected few of them would ever have been so close to a phoenix before, and they would be remembering that Fawkes was a creature of ultimate Light.

“I am going to fight this,” said Harry. “I promise you. I am not a Declared Lord, but I have the power of one. That power is now turned to protecting you, defending you, serving you—healing you if necessary when the storm has passed.” He tilted his head, aware of a quiet strength rising in him. He wasn’t sure if it’d come because he called it, or if it came from the trust growing in their faces, or if he was starting to believe his own carefully orchestrated show. “I will defeat it, with the help of the Light.”

Fawkes spread his wings and sang again. His feathers were not quite burning, but shifting from color to color, red on gold on blue. Harry had to tear his eyes away before he was mesmerized along with all the other spectators. Fawkes seemed to be taking the approach of the wild Dark quite as seriously as he was. The phoenix had grown brighter and brighter in the past few days, and he sang more often.

"I am doing this because I am vates," Harry added. He suspected that at least a few questions would concern what he had to gain from this, when he was neither a Light Lord nor a Dark one. "I still support the rights of magical creatures, and would like to see all of them free. I still support the repeal of the anti-werewolf laws, among others." He felt Scrimgeour's quick, stabbing glance, but didn't look aside from the crowd to meet it. It was remarkable, really, how he felt right now. These were his people—his to serve and defend and protect, since they couldn't do it themselves. A sweet shiver ran down his spine. If he fought the wild Dark, he would only be doing what he was supposed to be doing, what he had wanted to do ever since Narcissa had written to him in the persona of Starborn and suggested that a powerful wizard need not become a Lord. "But I count wizards and witches as among those I protect. And the wild Dark is no one's friend now that it has started hunting. I will oppose it."

He waited a moment longer, his arm uplifted beneath Fawkes's body, the rain around them hissing away before it managed to touch them.

Then he dropped his arm, and Fawkes rose above his head, hovering with wings spread like an eagle's, singing with all his might. A burst of radiance traveled from him over the heads of the crowd, and then he settled on Harry's shoulder, head bowed so that his plumes brushed Harry's neck. Harry raised his hand and scratched gently at the downy breast feathers.

"I will take questions now," he said quietly.

Skeeter tried, she really did, but Melinda Honeywhistle still managed to ask the first one. "Does this mean that you're Declaring for Light, vates?" she asked, apparently deciding that she preferred that to his first name.

Harry laughed. "Did I say I was?"

"You have a phoenix on your shoulder," said Honeywhistle, even as her Quick-Quotes Quill stabbed and rustled over the paper. "You said that you were going to use Light magic to fight the Dark. I think it's a reasonable assumption."

"Reasonable assumptions are often wrong, ma'am." Harry found that he was enjoying himself. He'd told the truth, and what dramatic elements he'd used were really part of him—no borrowed phoenixes here. "In this case, Fawkes has been bonded to me since this spring, and that was his choice. He used to belong to Albus Dumbledore, but abandoned him when he started disapproving of Dumbledore's choices." Mouths opened at that, and quills rustled faster. Fawkes crooned to confirm it. "And I said I would be using Light magic because one uses Light magic to fight the wild Dark. It would simply absorb and consume Dark Arts. That does not mean I am loyal to Light to the exclusion of all else, as a Declaration would imply."

Honeywhistle tried to ask something else, but this time, Skeeter managed to get in. "Do you intend to stand poised between Dark and Light the rest of your life, Harry?" she asked. Her eyes gleamed with interest. Harry was sure that she was dreaming of the front page of the Prophet again, though what headline she'd use, he didn't know.

"As long as I live, yes," said Harry. "A vates must, and I'll only Declare for Dark or Light if I fail as vates. I don't intend to fail."

"What advantages would you say that using both Dark and Light magic offers?" Skeeter asked.

Harry cocked his head. He could give a light, easy answer about his range of magic being greater, of course, but that wasn't what he wanted to do. He wanted to say something that would make people understand how he truly felt, and not just the practical advantages of it. Then, they might see their way clearer to following his ideals, and not just following him.

"It lets me be without fear," he said, knowing she would hear him thanks to the charm guiding the words to her ear. "Not that I'm never scared, of course, but it means that I don't have to fear Dark or Light because I don't understand them, the way that can happen when a Declared wizard becomes too invested in his own allegiance. In some ways, it's not much different from being undeclared altogether, but I understand that most undeclared wizards still don't use Dark Arts."

"Are you saying you do?" That was the wizard in the tatty robes, leaning forward intently.

Harry lifted his eyebrows. "I have, yes."

"Can you give some examples of places and times where you think Dark Arts are permissible?" That was a witch standing behind Honeywhistle, bouncing up and down on her toes to be noticed. "After all, the Ministry has banned them, and for good reasons in most cases."

"In most cases," Harry agreed. "But I have used what is classified as Dark magic to cut some of the webs on magical creatures, and in battle against Voldemort." It was rather funny to see the witch stop bouncing and shiver, as though Voldemort would appear and hex her for listening to his name. "I've also been the victim of curses like that. It helps to know what your enemy's going to use against you."

"Would you advocate the Ministry lifting the bans on Dark Arts?" the witch pressed, apparently over her fear of the Dark Lord.

"I would not advocate the Ministry doing anything in particular about them," Harry murmured, aware that Scrimgeour was watching him. "Taken together, they're too broad a category to simply ban or lift the ban on. There are some individual spells I might lobby for, yes. Certainly not the Unforgivable Curses, and not most of the spells Voldemort's Death Eaters use."

The witch tried to ask another question, but a wizard using Sonorus bested her. "Harry!" he boomed. "Is it true that you consider the rights of centaurs and werewolves more important than the rights of wizards and witches?"

Harry bowed his head. "Thank you for letting me know of a deficiency in my spell, sir. I shall correct it right away."

"What?" The booming voice was baffled now.

Harry looked up and smiled sweetly in his direction. "I cast a charm that would enable everyone to hear me during my speech," he said. "But it must have a weakness in it, because you didn't hear me say that I count wizards and witches among those I protect. I'll look into that before I cast the spell again."

Snickers interrupted the wizard's attempt to bluster through that, and someone else called out, "Do you see yourself bound to oppose Voldemort because you're the Boy-Who-Lived?"

Harry snorted. "I'm bound to oppose him because I have the power to do so, and I see that there's a problem. The person who sees the problem and can correct it has the responsibility to do so, in my view."

"But what about the prophecy that says you're supposed to defeat him?" the same reporter, probably—she was far enough back that Harry couldn't see her in the general press—persisted. "The one you spoke about in your parents' trial?"

Harry cocked his head. "That is perhaps a reason, but only a secondary one. My parents counted on that to save them and excuse their actions. I plan never to do so."

There were a few more questions, but most of them were repetitions of what had gone before, or far enough away from the topic at hand that Harry turned them aside with a light jest and refused to answer. At last, the reporters looked at each other and apparently had no more to say. Harry smiled. That was one of the advantages of being as straightforward and speaking as much truth as possible. It left few holds for anyone to grab his words and try to spin them, though he was sure some of the stories they published about this would manage to do it.

"If that is all?" Scrimgeour, who'd cast Sonorus on himself again, asked, and was answered by nodding heads. "Then Mr. Connor Potter would like to make an announcement."

Harry stepped aside, and watched curiously as his brother marched to the front of the stage. He was probably chewing his lip again, and his voice was a bit too loud when he spoke. But the content of his announcement would take attention away from the way he said it. It certainly snared Harry's.

"I'm going to Declare for Light," said Connor. "I just wanted everyone to know that. That doesn't mean my brother is," he added. Harry wondered, through his daze, if it was instinct that led him to think the reporters would try to link their announcements, or if he just wanted to make absolutely clear that his actions didn't control Harry's. "But I am."

The reporters threw questions at him, of course. Connor rode most of them out admirably, though once or twice he stammered. Harry watched his back thoughtfully, but managed a smile when Connor turned to him.

Of course he has the right to make whatever Declaration he likes. And I can't say it's a surprise, really. Connor's always been more Light-minded. If he's spoken with Scrimgeour and Remus and others who are loyal to the Light over these past few months, it's not surprising they've convinced him.

I just hope this doesn't put a rift between us.

Connor finally stepped back from the edge of the platform with a defiant little toss of his head that Harry recognized; it meant that he was going to go ride his broom, and nothing Lily or James said would stop him. But that was all right. It was probably the attitude he would need to weather the storm his announcement would cause.

He caught Harry's eye, and smiled uncertainly. "We're all right?" he whispered, then winced as he realized he hadn't taken Sonorus off. He quickly removed it.

Harry nodded to him. "Of course."

Connor smiled in relief.

Harry glanced around one more time, but the crowd was already dispersing—the wizards and witches who had come in search of entertainment to look for something more entertaining, the reporters racing to write their stories first and launch them on the wizarding world. Harry relaxed and glanced up at Scrimgeour, who had come to a stop next to him, frowning.

"You meant what you said about Dark Arts and anti-werewolf laws, didn't you." Scrimgeour's voice was more resigned than anything else.

Harry arched his eyebrows. "You know I did."

Scrimgeour nodded. "I have a few pieces of information for you," he said. "The first is that one of our Muggleborn Aurors located the place you were looking for. The graveyard where Tom Riddle is buried is in a town called Little Hangleton." He handed Harry a sheaf of parchment. "Here's the map and the information on how to get there. It turns out there are Apparition points not too far from it. The Ministry actually handled a murder case there about fifty years ago. Strange case," he added, with a shake of his head. "A wizard named Morfin Gaunt confessed to the murder of the Riddles."

Harry swallowed, his hand closing convulsively on the parchment. "I don't think it was him."

"Probably not," said Scrimgeour dryly. "The second piece of information is that I questioned Diggle, and he confessed to letting a woman named Hestia Jones in to see Dumbledore."

"He did?" Harry blinked. From what he had seen of Diggle, he hadn't thought a wild elephant could drag a confession out of the man.

"Yes. Strangest thing, really. He was willing to talk after he had a bit of pumpkin juice with breakfast."

Harry narrowed his eyes. Scrimgeour looked a bit too innocent. Before he could say anything, though, the Minister went on. "We've confirmed that Hestia Jones has connections with Order of the Phoenix members. We'll be bringing her in for questioning today." He looked straight at Harry. "She was the only one who helped Dumbledore cast the compulsion spell, from what Diggle said, but she can lead us to others. We'll have the rest of them yet."

Harry nodded slowly. "Thank you."

"Diggle shouldn't have done what he did," said Scrimgeour, narrowing his eyes in turn. "I dislike attempted murder, Harry, and just because it's attempted murder on you doesn't make it any less serious. Rather the opposite, in fact."

"What."

It wasn't a question. Harry froze, then turned his head slowly, inch by inch, to meet Snape's eyes. He hadn't heard his guardian come up behind him.

"I had heard nothing of this," Snape said. Draco stood next to him, looking equally furious.

Harry looked around for help, but Scrimgeour had discreetly stepped away, and Connor just happened to be facing the other direction. Fawkes cocked his head and crooned as if to say that Harry really should have known better, then took off in a flap of wings. Argus was silent.

"You will be explaining on the way back to Hogwarts why you failed to inform us of this," said Snape, even as their escort of Aurors came forward again.

Woefully, Harry bowed his head and followed.

Intermission: That Which Burns Shall Rise Again

There were Aurors at her door.

Hestia Jones knew that, but it didn't stop her from penning the last line in the letter she was sending, the code that would tell the Order of the Phoenix member that she could be trusted, and that this was a true message that had the approval of Dumbledore, not a prank or a matter of minor importance. She tied the letter to the leg of the waiting owl, a small one which would attract barely any attention, especially now that dusk was falling and non-magical owls as well as magical ones were in motion.

"Go, now," she whispered to the owl, pausing to scratch its head. "You know who you have to find."

The owl hooted enthusiastically and took wing through the back window of her flat, the only one that was open. Hestia smiled. That window looked out over an alley of wizarding London, one too small for a human to get through on foot. No one would be watching there.

So. It was done, now. Her last message was gone, and she had done her part to make sure that the influence of the Light would not die, even though they had caught Kingsley Shacklebolt and Homer Digne.

"Hestia Jones!" The Auror at the door was using an impressive-sounding growl, as though he imagined that would make her surrender faster. "Undo your locking charms and surrender your wand."

Hestia, whose wand was on a table across the room, sniffed, but made no attempt to move. Her eyes were on the vanishing owl. They remained that way even when the Aurors at last blasted aside her door and stamped into the room, pulling her arms roughly behind her back as they arrested her.

None of them understood. She had known that, of course, but she confirmed their lack of comprehension when she looked into their eyes. Hestia glanced down at the floor to hide her smile.

The Order of the Phoenix was not some spreading vine they could cut down and stamp on and burn and be done with. It was a group of people with the same beliefs, people whose minds were touched with Light, who knew that no matter the unfortunate pressure of some accusations and some Dark wizards who pretended to be Light in power, the group's mission—fighting against Dark Lords—must continue. They would be the ones who weren't fooled, the ones who saw with the clear eyes of their namesake. When Harry Potter revealed himself to be the Dark Lord that Hestia knew he was, they would be ready, even if some of their members were in prison.

And she knew there was another person, his existence hinted at in whispers, who could make use of them, even if Lord Dumbledore was tried and condemned and stripped of his magic. He could have been a Light Lord, but he had preferred to let his protégé, Albus, claim the title. Now that he knew he was needed, he would come out of seclusion, and he would find the Order of the Phoenix ready and waiting to assist him.

After all, Hestia thought, as the Aurors searched her for knives or magical artifacts or extra wands, when a phoenix burns, it rises again. They really ought to have known that about us.

The serene smile remained on her face even as the Aurors shoved her out the door and Apparated with her to Tullianum. Snape sat on one side of his private rooms and stared at Harry. The boy stared back, arms crossed over his chest as if he were cold. Draco stood beside him, his hand twitching as if he wanted to clutch Harry's shoulder in reassurance. He always drew his hand back, though, when he met Snape's eyes. Both of them knew how serious this was.

Harry had nearly died, again, the day he went to the Ministry to speak with Scrimgeour about Shackbolt, Mallory, and Diggle. And he had not told them.

Snape would have tried yelling, but he didn't think any of them could bear it. Besides, it hadn't made an impact on Harry before. Nor had scolding, or the urgent pleas to tell them when his life was in danger.

Snape wasn't even entirely sure what had prompted Harry to keep silent this time. It was not as though he would want to protect Diggle, since the Ministry was charging him with attempted murder anyway. That much he had confirmed before he shut down and stared at Snape and Draco both with blank green eyes.

So Snape decided to speak of the emotion that most drove him at the moment, and, judging from the expression on Draco's face when he thought no one was looking, drove him, too.

"I am sorry that you do not trust us yet, Harry," he said quietly.

Harry blinked and jerked his head up. "What are you talking about?" he asked. "I trust you. Of course I trust you." He glanced up at Draco and tried to smile. The smile withered when Draco just stared back at him.

"Then why keep silent?" Snape asked.

Harry shook his head. "I don't know if I can explain it," he said. "But—well, the Aurors were most concerned about the fact that Diggle had a knife at all, not about his almost killing me. It was a pathetic attempt. I took care of it as soon as it happened. Scrimgeour is worried, of course, but he worries all the time anyway." He tried another smile, this time with slightly more success. "Why should I worry you with telling you about it?"

Snape sighed. Even to his ears, it had a weary sound. "Because I want to know, Harry," he said. "And when you do not tell me of these attempts, something so vital and important as your nearly dying, it does make me feel as though you don't trust me."

"Me, too," said Draco, crouching down beside Harry's seat so that Harry couldn't help but see him. "I'm not sure whether I think that you don't trust us not to get angry at you or don't trust us not to rush out and eviscerate the bastard responsible, but either way, I'd rather that you told us."

Harry shrank into a corner of the couch. "But I nearly die all the time," he said. "You've even seen most of those happen. Why should one more time matter?"

Draco glanced back at Snape. Snape drew in a deep breath and controlled his immediate response. That Harry could even ask such a question showed how differently he thought about this kind of thing from most people. Snape couldn't snap out that Harry's life was of course important, because he wouldn't understand.

"Because your life is important to me, Harry," he said. "To us," he amended, when Draco opened his mouth. "You cannot imagine how important."

"But I know that," said Harry. "That's the reason I don't tell you about all of the murder attempts. I don't want you to spend your lives in a constant state of fear."

"I would rather do that than have a false happiness," said Snape, arriving at the crux of the matter at last. "I would rather know that you are in danger and be ready to protect you than fondly imagine nothing is wrong and have an unexpected threat come at you from behind."

"You could also, you know, always hold back from going into danger," said Draco, with the Malfoy trick of putting the force of a yell into a whisper, which Snape had heard only Lucius master before.

Harry sighed. "That's not going to happen, Draco, not with as many times as I don't even realize that my life might hang in the balance, or with as many times as I need to experience danger to make a new ally trust me."

"You still let people have too much of you," said Draco, resting his hand on Harry's shoulder as though he thought that would make him more likely to listen. "You don't need to experience danger to make them trust you. It's just the most expedient way for that other person. But not for us, Harry. We would rather that you stayed safe."

Harry looked away, biting at his lip. Snape nodded slowly. Draco had hit on the one argument that might actually convince Harry to think before he plunged into danger. It was not as good as making him value his own life for its own sake, but it was a start.

“And you would rather have the worry, too?” Harry whispered. “I don’t need to protect you from knowing?”

“No,” said Snape forcefully, not intending to let this sign of sense get away. Harry’s eyes returned to his face. “At the moment, all you spare us from feeling is a few days of worry. We find out in the end, and feel the worry delayed, and anger, and the helplessness that I, at least, experience, when I know that your own distrust of me prevents me from helping you.”

“That’s not it at all!” Harry said, squirming upright on the couch. “I don’t distrust you. I just want to defend you from the helplessness you seem to experience at finding that I’ve nearly died again.”

“Truly?” Snape considered Harry’s fervent nod, and prevented himself from reacting to the statement that Harry trusted him with anything other than a sharply indrawn breath. “Well, it feels like the other.”

“With me, too,” said Draco, with perhaps a bit too much sadness in his voice, his eyes cast down on the floor. But if Harry thought the pouting was false, he obviously chose not to take it that way, reaching out and resting his hand and his wrist on Draco’s shoulders.

“I didn’t know,” Harry whispered. “I did think I was defending you from knowing. And the Ministry was handling Diggle, and, well, it happened so suddenly, and I didn’t even get a scratch—” He cut himself off abruptly. “But that doesn’t matter, I suppose,” he said. “You still want to know.”

“Yes, Harry,” said Snape.

Draco’s answer was wordless, an intense stare, but it still made Harry bow his head and nod.

The boys left for the Slytherin common room then, and left Snape to summon a house elf, request a glass of wine, and stare into the fire.

It is growing, that trust between us. Slowly, it's coming back, like a phoenix burned in its own fire.

Snape had not permitted himself to react the way he most wanted to to Harry's declaration just now, the way he had held himself back from doing anything last month when Harry spoke of admiring him. With some children, he knew, it would have been the right course, to show how much he valued those seemingly casual words, the evidence that their love for him was not totally destroyed.

But Harry had heard Snape say that it was love for him that had made Snape accuse his parents and Dumbledore. He knew how Snape felt. It was the consequences of his actions that he had become angry at and hated.

Snape would need to let Harry find his way back to him on his own, burn away his hatred like a coating of ash and burst into new flames, a rising of love and hope and trust that would renew their bond as no forced words—which Harry would probably think of as manipulation anyway—could.

That Harry had not been chased away utterly by Snape's actions on his behalf, that he did not hate him forever, was good fortune such as he had not conceived of when he sent the owl to the Ministry bearing the Pensieve Potion and the written records of Dumbledore's memories. He did have a future, a chance, with his ward. And he would not ruin it by moving too quickly.

That which burns shall rise again, he thought. It had been one of Albus's favorite sayings, but it was older than he was, and therefore no one could prevent Snape from valuing it.

We shall rise again.

He shuddered then, and stood to do some experimental brewing. His own mind was taking a far too soppy turn for his taste.

Interlude: The Serpent Coils

December 12th, 1995

Dear Lord Voldemort:

I hope you will forgive the familiarity, but as my last letter to you began the same way, I thought I should stay consistent. I write now with confidence in your ability to decipher the charm I have used to disguise my handwriting, and your ability to understand what you will find when you do. No one has ever said that Lord Voldemort is an ignoramus.

I bring information that you may know already, along with the evidence of my own eyes. I was in the crowd at Harry Potter's press conference yesterday, and he never noticed me. Of course, he has the habit of overlooking me. Even if he had noticed I was there, it is likely he would not have paid the slightest bit of attention.

Potter, as you may know, declared that he would be fighting the wild Dark and the storm it will bring down on Midwinter night. I am well-aware that Lord Voldemort, of course, will know the motives of the wild Dark magic and how best to harness that power. Potter, however, was supremely confident. The tone of his voice, the shine in his eyes, the movement of his arms, and the phoenix that landed on his shoulder, all proclaimed that he knew how to handle this. I suspect that part of this was showmanship for the crowd, but not all of it can have been; Potter is not that good a liar. Thus comes my warning. Potter has reason to be confident.

I have, unfortunately, not been able to learn the details of his plan. He has told his Dark allies that his Light ones are handling it. So he will use Light magic—but that covers large areas of spells. I am sorry not to be able to offer you more information.

One interesting tidbit that your own spies might or might not have seen: Scrimgeour spoke with Potter after the press conference was done, and gave him a large packet of papers. I was not very near the stage, but I know some spells that ride the wind and turn it inside out, and I did overhear the names “Little Hangleton,” “Tom Riddle,” and “Morfing Gaunt.” I hope that these will mean something to my Lord.

Please let me know, my lord, if I can be of more use to you, or if you have instructions for me. I understand I am not initiated, and that what you will find when the charm to disguise my handwriting dissipates may lessen your trust in me. But, I assure you, I am ready and willing to serve you. Potter will never give me what I want. You can, and if it suits your Lordship’s pleasure, you will.

I wish you luck on Midwinter night, my lord.

The Serpent.

Chapter Fifty-Three: Tonight There Shall Be No Moon

The night before Midwinter, Pansy climbed the North Tower to its highest point and stood there watching the storm.

It barely rained now. It had become a thing of fire and air, lighting and wind flickering and dancing as if in answer to a question the giants had asked. One flash spoke from a corner of the sky, and was answered by a gust that tore Pansy's hood off and sent her hair streaming behind her. Then the wind coiled around her legs, with a howl like a burning cat, and the lighting answered, arcing from the north to the west.

Pansy wondered who else was watching the storm, if they saw the same things and what they thought if they did. She wondered how Muggles were explaining all this strange weather. Of course, even if one of them thought of the provoked Dark magic as an explanation, they wouldn't be able to feel it.

Lightning and wind talked to each other for hours, until midnight came. Pansy then felt the deep silence of the dead all around her. She had already learned to read those silences, though as yet she heard their voices in little more than whispers. They were in dread of something.

Pansy lifted her head. She could see no light. The moon had gone, of course, and the clouds covered the stars.

From one horizon to the next, from life towards death, from darkness unto darkness, the voice of the thunder spoke, menacing and all-encompassing. Pansy gripped the sides of the North Tower as it shook, the boom resounding in its bones. Somewhere to the left of her, the wind seized a bit of stone from Hogwarts's walls and sent it whirling furiously to the west. Pansy suspected it would hit a wizard or witch in the head and cause him or her to die before the night was out.

In the wake of that thunder, the night went suddenly and ominously still. Pansy could hear the silence of the dead returning to the cool, dry thing it usually was, the empty, expectant quietude of the grave. She looked up, and saw the clouds parting like water troubled by the fall of a stone, slipping down the sides of the sky. The stars shone out overhead again. Pansy wished they hadn't. They were weak, pale things, making the darkness seem all the stronger and the smuggier for it.

She closed her eyes, and leaned her head on her clasped hands. She knew the Dark hadn't gone. It was withdrawing its strength, melting to the south and the north, gathering and then whirling around above the sea. It would come back and strike at its chosen location with all the more speed and power for not storming for a day. Pansy suspected it would arrive at midnight tomorrow, or perhaps sunset, the moment when the light yielded the sky.

She shuddered. She was glad that she wasn't going with Harry tomorrow to face the wrath of the wild Dark. She could not imagine how he would counter it.

No, you just have a full day of classes and trying to get used to seeing death, Pansy, she thought, straightening and shaking her hair back. Time to go to bed.

It should be safe to enter the common room now, she thought. The sight that had driven her forth from it, the death she could not bear to see written on the air in letters of fire, should have faded. Its bearer would also have gone to bed.

Harry had a hard time keeping himself from going mad in his classes that day.

He could feel the wild Dark now, waiting. It had been growing clearer and clearer with every day since the first attack by the storm, and now that it was the twenty-first, the first day of winter, the day of longest darkness, he felt it everywhere. When he turned his eyes on the walls of the Slytherin common room, he could see shadows whipping just out of sight, like the trailing edge of a robe. When he briefly stepped outside to see if what the Gryffindor Quidditch team was saying was true and the storms had stopped, he felt it smiling down at him from beyond the steel-clear sky. When he tried to pay attention in Defense Against the Dark Arts, he felt it weighting Acies's words, distorting them and twisting them out of true, every now and then showing him a vision of a blackness as complete as a cave underground.

The wild Dark had come, and Harry did not know if he was ready.

Fawkes, who rode on his shoulder to every class that day, and regularly shifted between scarlet and gold and blue in his feathers, crooned when he thought that. A clear vision formed in Harry's mind, of the sun rising after a long night that no one thought would ever end. Harry managed a smile as he stroked the phoenix's neck.

He would have to be ready. He had made what preparations he could. He would be going to the graveyard when sunset came, with Snape, Draco, and those of his allies who could not fight tonight but still wanted to protect him as advance guards. Augustus, who was serving as focal point for the Light wizard ritual, would follow him in some time later, when preparations for the ritual were complete.

Harry wanted to be there at sunset just in case the Dark chose the yielding of the light for its strike, but he didn't think it would. As the day wore on and the light declined, he sensed it retreating still. To get to Little Hangleton at sunset, it would have had to gallop and tear cross-country, summoning its power from every corner of the sky, and Harry knew that wouldn't happen. The Dark would favor a slow, dramatic, majestic approach.

Still, it made the sky shake with the tread of its strength, and he knew the melodrama it favored wasn't humorous, as it would have been with an opponent of lesser power, as it was occasionally even with Voldemort. This was the Dark's cruel way of drawing out the anticipation, taunting him without words that he could not stop it, that no one could. A storm that could lay waste to the British Isles was coming. What effort of a mortal wizard could stop that?

The efforts of many mortal wizards, Harry thought, as he stroked Fawkes's feathers. That's the answer. It has to be.

And perhaps more than just mortal wizards, given that Acies came to find him after lunch. "Harry," she said, her head bowed so that her hood shaded her eyes, her voice low. "I may be able to bring one of the Singers to your defense. I promise nothing, because they are free and it is not my place to constrain them into an answer. I dare not even persuade. I can only mention the idea, and hope that one of them approves.”

“A dragon might come to the graveyard?” Harry breathed.

“Perhaps,” Acies said, stressing the word. “And I do not know what kind of Singer it would be, and if she would even arrive in time. I mention the possibility only so that you will not be surprised if it does happen, rather than as something to depend on.” She bobbed her head and then stepped back; Harry could sense the curious gazes of those students who wanted to know what Professor Merryweather was talking so intensely to him about. “Tell your allies not to harm her if she does come.”

“I promise,” said Harry, feeling a bit breathless as Acies strode away. He wondered for a moment why she’d seemed so certain that it would be a female dragon who came, and then remembered that female dragons were usually larger, stronger, and fiercer than the males. She’d probably spread the idea before those Singers she thought would do the most good in battle.

If even a dragon can help in the battle against the wild Dark.

But, Harry could not deny, he felt a bit more cheerful after that.

“Ready?”

Harry, his breath pluming before his face, nodded, and then cast a warming charm on himself. He, Snape, and Draco had waited on the Hogsmeade road for the Dark allies who could accompany them—which meant most of them save Charles and Thomas—to arrive. Now Belville, grumbling about the cold and the damage that warming charms did to his fine cloak, had finally joined them. It was Lucius who asked the question, his eyes slit and his face as proud and cruel as a hawk’s.

“I am,” Harry said, just to reassure those of his allies who hadn’t seen him nod, and then looked quickly around at them. “You all have a clear picture of the Apparition point in your heads?" He'd discussed it with them by the means of Charles's communication spell, as well as owed them copies of the maps that Scrimgeour had procured for him, and Henrietta and Hawthorn, among others, had Apparated there already. But the last thing Harry wanted was any of them getting splinched, so he thought it best to ask.

Nods and murmurs answered. Honoria actually laughed at him. "Honestly, Harry, we know how much this matters," she said, though she didn't look as though she knew how much it mattered at all. Letters of red and gold marched on her cloak, flashing insults to the wild Dark back at the dying sun. "We deserve to die by now if we don't."

Harry ignored her as much as possible—he was still irritated that she hadn't taken the payment of the life debt seriously—and then moved the extra step beyond Hogwarts's wards. The picture of the Apparition point was clear in his mind. He could feel the reassuring presence of Regulus and Peter at his back, Snape and Draco at his sides. Fawkes crooned above his head, and then all of that vanished into the blackness of Apparition.

They reappeared on a hillside, the Apparition point concealed in a thick grove of trees that almost blazed to Harry's sight with Muggle-repelling charms. He stepped hastily out of the way as the others Apparated in, and glanced around a few times.

The countryside seemed utterly unspectacular. Long shadows stretched from the grove across the steep ground, which canted more sharply below them than it did above. The grass here was matted and half-frozen with the frost they'd received this morning, the first proper one of the season, and too long to indicate that Muggles cared for it. Harry made out a path winding lazily past the grove. It didn't look well-used, either, since spreading ground plants obscured half of it.

"How far is the graveyard from here?" Burke grumbled.

"Less than a quarter mile, according to the Ministry maps," Harry said, and lifted his head to check the time. The sun was still safely above the horizon. "This way," he added, and led them down the hill.

They walked in silence, for the most part, except for Honoria apparently attempting to tell a joke to a distinctly unamused Ignifer. Harry shaded his eyes as he stared ahead. The village of Little Hangleton started towards the bottom of the hill, Scrimgeour's information said, though so far Harry didn't see a sign of it. Well, it was supposed to be a small village, as Muggle places went.

He actually almost stumbled into the shack before he saw it. His hand touched the weathered boards, and he started back in surprise. Snape caught him, and murmured in his ear, "Harry, what is it?"

"That's not a woodpile," Harry breathed, staring at the tumble of wood he had assumed some Muggle must have cut and then dumped here carelessly.

Looking at it closely now, he could see that it was a house, if one stretched the definition of "house" until it snapped. The door had fallen off the hinges and listed badly to one side, propped up by a broken piece of wood extending from the shack's right side. A tiny gap indicated the grave of a window. Harry could see raw-toothed holes in the shack's roof, and twigs that were probably the remnants of a bird's nest.

None of that would have attracted much of his attention, though, if not for the aura of powerful magic that stormed from the place. Harry could feel it like a spreading maelstrom under the much greater influence of the Dark storm. It eddied, a sullen black whirlpool. Harry imagined what might happen to a Muggle who tried to step into the old house, and shuddered.

"I feel it, too." Snape's voice was low and hard. "What is it?"

Harry took a deep breath, and then coughed. A stench that wasn't physical choked him when he tried to inhale it. This wasn't just Dark magic, he thought. He knew the feel of that, and it was very far from being the pure evil that Light wizards thought it was, even in its wild form. This was magic worked with deliberately malevolent intent, and he didn't recognize it. He knew that he would be cursed if he tried to get into the shack, but not what form the curse would take.

"I don't know," Harry said.

Snape's hand tightened, drawing him away from the pile of wood. "Then don't fool around with it," he ordered. "When and if we have time after our business is done at the graveyard, then we'll come back."

Harry wondered for a moment what kind of wizard would have left this here without any Muggle repelling charms around it, like an open pit trap, and then snorted. Tom Riddle, of course. Voldemort. The bastard.

"Can we get a move on?" Belville's voice was arrogant, but that didn't hide the rushing undercurrent of fear. "I thought we had to be at the graveyard at sunset, in case the storm struck there."

Harry shook himself free of his fascination with the shack. Like Snape said, it was a minor mystery in the face of attack from the wild Dark, and they would investigate it only if and when they had time. Untying curses that Voldemort had set himself was no easy task, and perhaps there would turn out to be nothing worth the effort behind them. It didn't look like the kind of place that Voldemort would hide anything valuable. "I don't think it will fall there now," he said absently, and turned his face up to the winter sunlight. "It's probably coming at midnight."

Belville said something uncomplimentary to that, regarding the hurry they'd taken to get here, but Harry ignored it. He could see the houses of Little Hangleton once they got beyond the shack, as if it were the gateway to the village, and so he concentrated on casting charms that would cause any Muggles abroad to forget to see them. They saw no one as they worked their way north and west around the houses, though. Muggles couldn't feel the wild Dark, Harry thought, but they could sense enough unnaturalness in the weather to be uneasy about it. They'd stay indoors.

At least, so Harry hoped. The storm would hit Little Hangleton first if he couldn't stop it. He shuddered to think of how the wild Dark would play with helpless Muggles, unable even to comprehend the force that faced them, much less to withstand it.

I'm doing this for them, too, then. I have to think of defending everyone, not just myself.

The weight of extra lives steadied him, rather than crushing him. It had always been that way, for Harry. If the wild Dark had just wanted him and Voldemort, he would have fought with less strength than he would now that he knew it would kill anyone who got in its way.

Kill, or torture, or play with...

He saw the stone wall of the graveyard when they left the last house behind. It sat below a much larger building that Harry suspected, from the information Scrimgeour had passed to him, was the Riddle house. The Riddles, mother and father and son, had been found dead there in the 1940's, their bodies unmarked, looks of terror on their faces. They had obviously died from the Killing Curse, and Morfin Gaunt had confessed to the murders.

Harry shook his head. I'd wager my right hand that it was Voldemort who killed them. Merlin knows how many victims have taken the blame for his crimes.

The thought ran away from his head like water through a hole in the bottom of a basin, and Harry realized he was panting. Draco noticed. He paused, then slung an arm around Harry's shoulders and squeezed firmly. They had to keep walking, or one of Harry's other allies would notice his growing discomfort, and that could be disastrous. Harry had not forgotten that a traitor was somewhere among them.

Harry leaned towards Draco, and fought to still memories of the last time he had come to this graveyard at sunset, exactly six months ago now, on the first day of summer. His left hand throbbed. He shuddered as he reimagined bonds gripping his wrists and ankles, and a flare of pain from his chest reminded him of the bite Voldemort had taken out of him when he still looked like a deformed child.

"It will be all right," Draco whispered in his ear. "Things will be different this time. You'll see."

Harry nodded into his shoulder, and kept walking. The stone wall around the graveyard drew nearer and nearer. Harry could see the headstones and angels he remembered looming above the half-tumbled rocks. He could see no sign of movement, though. He supposed that wasn't unusual. It was Thursday, not Sunday, and unless there was a funeral in the graveyard, there might be one or two Muggles visiting, no more.

Closer and closer they came, and the graveyard lay there. Harry could glimpse the grass inside it now, smooth and flat. It looked well-cared for, he thought. It had probably been the same when he was there at midsummer, but then he'd been too—busy—to notice such things.

He paused when they neared the gates. For a long moment, he couldn't force his legs to move. His heartbeat thundered in his ears, so loud that the murmurs of his allies faded behind it. He watched the sun linger in the western corner of the graveyard, and saw lights glimmering up from Little Hangleton below, and he shuddered.

"It's all right, Harry," Draco whispered. "It will be. I promise." He squeezed Harry's shoulder again. "But this time, you've got to lead."

Harry gave him a smile he hoped didn't look as pallid as it felt. Then he stepped forward and gently shifted the gates aside.

He stepped in, and then the world snapped.

Glamours fell like rags. Harry could feel the magic surrounding the graveyard now: thick charms to repel Muggles, wards to alert someone when a stranger entered, and curses running over the ground like a mat, all of it sheltering under a thick outer shell that had kept him from noticing any spells when he was outside the gates. He could see something dark writhing over the graves, and he spun back around, thinking Voldemort might have Apparated in behind him.

He hadn't, but wards had sifted down behind Harry, piling up like snow. He could barely see Draco, Snape, and the rest of his allies through the thick white lines. They were casting spells at the barrier, their lips moving in incantations that he couldn't hear. Harry swore, and swore again, and felt sweat build up beneath his cloak like a second skin.

"Potter."

Harry turned sharply. The dark thing writhing over the graves had form and definition in his eyes now, the way it hadn't when he'd been more concerned in identifying what kind of trap he'd sprung. But now...

Now...

His mind stuttered and stopped for a moment, then gagged.

The dark thing was a thicket of thorns, a mass of black branches, wide as pillars, all of them plunging into the center of the thicket, towards a root he couldn't see. The thorns themselves wound around the graves, and projected into wicked-looking tips that Harry could swear were barbed.

Impaled on three of them was a figure Harry recognized as Evan Rosier. Vines wreathed his feet and crowned his head and hair and pinned his arms to the sides, outspread. Harry could see thorns piercing the flesh of his limbs, stained red with the blood they drew. The thorns that corkscrewed into his back appeared to become one with his flesh, and Harry could see shadows running just under Rosier's ribs that were probably their ends. Rosier was crucified there, alive, and his face was twisted with a pain so profound that Harry held his breath for a long moment.

When he started breathing again with a whoosh, Rosier smiled at him. It looked as if he could barely manage the expression; it pulled on the barbs buried along his hairline, the briars that halted an inch from his eyes.

“Do you...like them?” Rosier whispered, wheezing in between each few words. Harry wondered for a moment how he could hear them, then realized he’d drawn nearer, staring up in shock and horror and an odd, dream-like fascination. “They’re...eating me alive. Drawing the...flesh out of me...through my back. They’ll...liquefy my heart in the...end. So she...told me.”

“Who?” Harry whispered. He could think of no other question, and certainly not an answer, in the face of such suffering.

Rosier blinked, and the edges embedded in his face bobbed near to him with the movement and kissed his eyelids. “The...Thorn Bitch, of course,” the Death Eater said. “Indigena...Yaxley. I thought you had...heard of her.”

“Heard of her,” said Harry, and licked his lips. Think of the storm. Voldemort’s tricks and traps are nothing next to that. But he could not look away from Rosier, could not comprehend leaving even an enemy to hurt like this. “I didn’t know she could do things like this.”

“You are...about to learn, I think,” Rosier said.

Harry opened his mouth to ask what that meant, and the grass beneath his feet whipped into motion, twining up his legs. Before Harry could think to fight, it had locked his body into place, and grown into the pocket of his robes, where it found and made off with his wand. Harry snarled, and prepared to draw his wandless magic in and wither the grass. He had no compunctions about killing other living things when they were doing the bidding of someone who could enact that sort of punishment on Rosier.

Vines lifted from the grass with a hissing sound and lashed around his arms, drawing them wide.

And Harry’s wandless magic hit the barrier of them and fell back into his body, just as it had on midsummer when opposing the wall of Voldemort’s will.

Harry screamed. He could not help it. The memories had overtaken him too suddenly and too completely. He lay on that stone again, the one where he'd been tied and had to struggle helplessly while Cynthia Whitecheek and Fenrir Greyback killed a little boy in front of him, the one where he'd watched Voldemort come back to life, the one where Bellatrix had taken his hand.

He screamed again when he saw a figure walking towards him, obviously a witch, in the same long dark robes that Bellatrix had worn. But Rosier's voice, shouting for him to stop screaming, and the sight of two arms, whole and undamaged, projecting from the witch's robes, shoved him back into his right mind. Harry closed his eyes and took a deep breath, feeling it rasp through his lungs. His throat already hurt. His right hand danced on the end of his arm, as though it wanted to detach itself from his body rather than chance being cut off.

The witch halted beneath him and looked up. Only then did Harry realize that the grass and the vines had both risen on long runners, elevating him a good ten feet above the ground. He felt his feet swaying helplessly in midair, and his wrists began to ache.

The witch studied him. Harry stared back at her. He had no doubt that this was Indigena Yaxley.

She looked ordinary enough, really, her brown hair touched with blonde and her eyes dark. What made her unusual were the shadows beneath her skin, which came into clearer view as she rotated one hand and the vines circled, moving Harry into a different position over her head. He could see leaves under her cheeks, petals cradling her eyes, the edges of vines curling around her ears and then dropping towards the collar of her robes. Harry tried to imagine the magic, along with the genius at Herbology, that it would take to put plants in that position and survive. He could not.

"There, that's better," said the witch, in a clear, crisp voice. "I prefer my guests when they aren't screaming. Dear Evan has obliged me in that, most of the time, although sometimes the pain grows too great even for him. And I haven't hurt you very much, Harry, really. Do you like them?" She nodded to the vines that gripped his arms. "My Lord has been having me experiment. These vines bind wandless magic as long as they are touching the victim's body. I went to some trouble to breed them. They won't hurt you, but they will hold you."

Speechless with hatred, Harry could only stare back at her. He had thought for a moment that this woman must be as mad as Bellatrix or Rosier, with the way she was talking, but her eyes were clear, and her smile faded as she waited and he said nothing in praise of her vines.

“It would be hard for you to appreciate them when they’re making you prisoner, I suppose,” said the woman, regret in her voice. “Pity.” Abruptly, she turned towards the house above the graveyard, head cocked as if she’d heard a summons.

Voldemort Apparated in.

Harry felt his coming as a darkening of the faint sunlight that still remained. His magic roared around him, fully recovered—and augmented, it seemed, by whatever power he’d managed to drain in the months since Harry saw him last. He walked forward with a long, sinuous dark shape gliding at his side. A newly-bred basilisk, Harry saw, without plumes—a female.

Voldemort halted beneath the vines and looked up at him. Harry’s scar split his head open like the lightning had split the sky while the storms still raged. Through the haze of pain, he saw Voldemort’s lipless mouth part in a smile.

“Bring him down, Indigena,” the Dark Lord said, somewhere far away.

The vines retracted smoothly into the earth, bearing Harry closer and closer to his enemy. The agony increased as he neared, and by the time his back touched the grass—more smoothly than he would have thought possible for a Death Eater—he was writhing in agony, though he refused to scream as yet. Yes, screaming would relieve his feelings and perhaps keep him from going mad, but he refused to let Voldemort think he had won.

Voldemort leaned towards him. When his pale face was an inch above his, the pain turned Harry’s vision white.

He still didn't think he'd screamed, but then Voldemort was drawing back and Harry heard his own breaths ripping through his nostrils and throat, hoarse, pleading sounds like the gasps of a wounded animal. "Your vines work wonderfully well, Indigena," Voldemort was saying, with laughter in his voice. "Hold him still while I summon my own pet."

"Yes, my lord," said Indigena promptly. She sounded a bit resigned, as though this wasn't her idea of fun, but Harry had no doubt she would obey. The vines holding his arms pressed a bit closer, as if to reassure him of that.

Voldemort turned away from Indigena, easing the pain in Harry's head a bit more, and hissed. Harry forced himself to listen. Voldemort was speaking Parseltongue, there was no doubt of that, but it sounded like he was doing so through a mouth full of dirt. "Come, White One, Child of the Darkest Night, Digger of Tunnels, arise!"

The grass beneath Harry churned and mounded, bearing him briefly upwards. The vines didn't loosen their hold, though, and he fell back into their cradle as the ripple of movement traveled under him and then curled around Voldemort. The Dark Lord didn't seem concerned that he was within a rapidly rising circle of earth. He simply stretched his hands out and repeated his summons. Harry realized abruptly that he was surrounded by a pale green glow, like a sickly Lumos, that stood out starkly against the night. The sun had set.

The earth erupted. Harry saw a long white coil, as sickly a color as the light surrounding Voldemort in its own way. Voldemort shifted his position easily, and then he was standing on that coil, borne aloft on it, laughing and repeating the invocation one more time.

Other white coils shifted, long mounds of rubbery flesh stretching upwards towards the hidden stars, the rushing clouds. Harry shuddered in revulsion when one brushed past him, and he smelled the scent of decay, rotting flesh, a humid smell that he would never have associated with a snake.

The basilisk swayed and hissed, and Harry turned to see her confronting a blunt head risen out of the earth, opening a maw fringed with fangs like long strings of saliva. If the head had eyes, Harry couldn't see it.

He understood the smell, then, and the odd Parseltongue Voldemort spoke. He had summoned not a snake, but an enormous worm.

The great creature carried on rising, bursting out of corner after corner of the graveyard, until the only earth untouched was that supporting Indigena, the thorn patch embracing Rosier, and the vines that held Harry up. The witch never moved, except when she craned her neck to check on the vines. Harry saw a tender smile cross her face when she did that, as if she admired children or favored pets.

Harry managed to painfully turn his head a time or two, and made out the thick white glow of the wards at the gates. None of his allies could get through them, he knew, or they would have been here already, fighting furiously to free him from the vines.

That meant he was on his own.

Think, he ordered himself, and closed his eyes.

Voldemort spoke before he could delve into thought, though, his voice soft and thick and mocking and eager. "Do you like my plan, Harry? When the wild Dark comes, I will lure it with the promise of a feast—you and Rosier, my faithless Rosier, both in exquisite pain and radiating Dark magic. Let it come close enough, however, and this child of the earth I have called will begin to swallow it. When it is engaged in fighting for its freedom, I will harness it as I should have been able to at Walpurgis. That you interrupted. This, you shall help me with."

"You're mad, Tom," Harry said, opening his eyes. Voldemort stood a little higher than he did, outlined against the sky—darkness above him, diseased light around him, white flesh beneath his feet. Harry could feel his power, and, beyond him, the growing pressure of the wild Dark. It was gathering its might now, sweeping towards the graveyard. "You can't hold the Dark. It will tear you apart. That's what it's come for, to punish you."

Voldemort laughed, a sound that Harry thought he should not have heard across the distance that separated them, but heard nonetheless. He could see the crimson eyes fastened on him now, radiating a light of their own, one that made the shadows deeper. "Harry, Harry, Harry. You know nothing of the deep, old magic that I have studied, the years I spent in pursuit of the Arts before I returned to Britain and Declared myself the Dark Lord. There are natural oppositions, natural patterns, in magic, and in other countries, they have preserved the knowledge of them better than wizards have here, with their mouths dumbly open and their gazes fixed on the sky. The earth opposes the air, even as fire opposes water, and it may hold the greatest of winds. I will harness the Dark. I only need sacrifices to draw its attention, and those I have."

Harry let out a huffing breath. He was not sure which he feared more: that Voldemort was fooling himself, and the wild Dark would break him and go on to wreak havoc and destruction across the British Isles and half Europe—or that Voldemort was telling the truth, and he might be able to tame the power of the wild Dark and use it.

Either way, it's up to me to stop this, he thought, and felt a helpless rage rising in him. If Voldemort weren't so mad, this would be a lot easier.

Thunder abruptly spoke from beyond the graveyard, and Voldemort laughed aloud and spread his arms. "The Dark is coming," he cried, "and who in all Britain stands to stop me? No Dark Arts can penetrate the wards I have woven, the preparations I have made, the spells I have raised—"

"Not the Dark," said a voice Harry knew, "but the Light. For even in the deepest Dark, the Light doth shine. Aurora ades dum!"

And it was as if dawn had come to the graveyard.

Chapter Fifty-Four: Even In The Deepest Dark, The Light Doth Shine

Harry swung his head so hard that he felt one of the vines actually tear in its grip on him. Indigena Yaxley shouted something. Voldemort erupted into a wordless snarl, and the basilisk, if not the worm, ripped into insults in Parseltongue. Rosier started laughing.

Harry could make no sound. His whole attention was imprisoned in the vision that had landed before him.

A mass of glaring white light filled the eastern end of the graveyard, spreading from the gates, and it dissipated Voldemort's wards and Dark magic as Harry had never seen anything do—unless it was the sun rising and dissipating morning mists. The darkness flowed back before it, and Harry thought he felt a twinge of discomfort from the wild Dark magic itself, though it grew confident again in the next moment. Sharp, piercing, stabbing like swords, the Light magic stalked a little further into the graveyard.

As Harry's eyes grew used to it, he could make out its shape. It radiated as sunbeams from a central core, and the core was focused around Augustus and the white wood staff he held. It was his voice that had called out the spell, then, Harry thought. Hardly surprising, since Augustus had said he would be the focal point for the cooperative ritual between the Light wizards.

Harry just hadn't expected them to get here this soon.

"Hello, Harry," said Augustus. Harry took a moment to realize what was different about his voice. It lacked the sneering, condescending undertone it had contained every other time Harry saw him. He now sounded purely happy. "I assume that you're in a spot of trouble and could use our help?" He raised his head and studied Harry, as if the presence of the vines and the worm hadn't already told him that.

Harry just nodded wordlessly, and then Voldemort broke the silence that had fallen between them. It was in that dirt-filled Parseltongue, and he commanded the worm to attack, kill, eat.

The white coils began shifting forward, turning towards the mass of churned earth and grass in front of the gates. Harry saw the rubbery flesh writhing, and cried out a warning in the moment before Yaxley's leaves wrapped around his mouth and made speech impossible.

Augustus laughed and called out a spell in a voice so high and ringing that Harry couldn't make out the invocation. The bands of gold on his staff shone as he turned it in the direction of the worm, and the white light focused and beamed sharply down.

The white flesh began to smoke where the light touched it, like a mass of ants with the sun focused on them through a glass. Harry heard a thin voice screaming, high enough to make blood run from his ears, and the creature shifted back from Augustus and the wizards that Harry could make out standing behind him, dim dark shapes in the fierce glow.

"No!" screamed Voldemort. "Attack them, hold them, swallow them! You must not allow yourself to be defeated!"

The great head dived, and then the graveyard seemed to spin as a mound of the worm's body traveled directly under Harry, aiming for his allies. He instinctively reached out, thinking he might be able to cripple the vines if the worm had disturbed their roots, but his wandless magic reached the limit of his skin and slammed back again. Harry hissed and tugged on his bonds, to no avail.

He did try another warning, though he wasn't sure how much good it did, given the gag on his mouth and all the other sounds flying around the graveyard.

The ground in front of Augustus trembled and collapsed inward, and then the worm's mouth was rising, a black hole filled with dirt, its fangs moving like deadly hairs. Augustus only laughed again and pointed his staff downward into the maw.

"Aurora ades dum!" he repeated. Harry realized what was going to happen, and hid his eyes just in time.

A second sunrise blossomed inside the worm's mouth. Its scream of pain made Harry scream in return. He had never heard any agony so primal, so bestial. The vines trembled again as the worm danced beneath them, and Harry tensed. But, when the creature had flowed past, they were still rooted. He braced his feet as best as he could with nothing to brace them on and resolved to wait for the moment when he could break free.

Voldemort shouted at the worm again, but it was busy hurting. Harry felt the moment when he changed his mind and decided to use his own magic on the interfering Light wizards instead. The intense dawn shining on his closed eyelids dimmed, and night answered it out of the Dark Lord.

Harry opened his eyes in time to see darkness extend like a flow of ink from Voldemort, eating the sunbeams it found. The worm stopped screaming as comforting blackness covered it. Harry supposed the blackness must resemble that of the underground tunnels Voldemort had bred the worm in.

Augustus stood unafraid in front of that looming wave. Harry, again twisting around as far as he could, made out Laura Gloryflower at his side, and Tybalt, and John, and Paton Opalline, and others that Harry suspected were Opalline relatives. None of them looked afraid, though he was distant enough from them to be mistaking some of their expressions.

Harry shivered. He wondered why they were so calm. They had created this ritual to defeat the wild Dark, not to defeat Voldemort. The Dark Lord could, presumably, still hurt them.

Then Augustus stabbed his staff down, and planted it in the earth. His voice had gone back to its usual scornful self, but this time, the contempt and condescension weren't buried. They rang in his voice, like the scream of an eagle that scorns the ground. "We have come in answer to impulses that you will never understand, Dark Lord." He turned his gaze to Harry, and aimed his staff at him. "Admisceamus dicionem nostram et accumulamus donis Harry Potter!"

Harry didn't know what that spell meant, and he didn't like the sound of it, especially when he felt the earth shaking with the power of it as it spilled out around Augustus. He couldn't exactly do anything about it, though, not when he was trapped by vines and Voldemort was bearing down on his allies. He gave another yank, hoping the vines might have loosened their hold while Yaxley was distracted by the antics of her Lord. The bonds tightened instead.

Then he discovered exactly what that spell did.

Augustus smiled as he felt the spell's power growing in him, whipping his blood to frenzy, filling his mind with light. The oil he'd smeared on his forehead earlier burst into flame, a star-like coruscation that called on the real stars and bade them answer. They still shone, beyond the clouds, and just because the Dark storm had covered them did not mean it could extinguish them.

The magic raced down his limbs, inexorable and majestic as the tide, spreading them out to the left and the right. Augustus lifted his hands, so that his staff could stay exactly where it was, hovering and beaming a straight cone of light into the center of the graveyard. He realized, distantly, that the worm might come back, and that the Dark Lord's power was heading for them, but those seemed petty concerns in the wake of this radiance growing inside and out. He closed his eyes.

He felt a warm hand rest on his arm, and a voice he hadn't heard in fourteen years murmured into his ear, "Shall we show them what Light is made of, Augustus?"

He did not open his eyes, knowing that he would not see Alba; he could only hear her. But he nodded and murmured back, "We shall."

Other stars burst into flame on other heads around him, as the Light wizards who had come with him—even his proud, impatient nephew—yielded to the flow of the spell and the ritual they had prepared, blending their magic into one pool. Augustus grew light-headed with the feeling that they stood on a shore of power. The waves leaped and surged to their heartbeats, bent and blended and broke apart again, and still magic continued to pour in, drawn through the tattoos on Paton's skin that bound him to his relatives.

Then Augustus turned, and lifted his arm, still feeling Alba's clutching hands, and sent the whip of the ritual hunting across England, seeking out those Light wizards who might feel a loyalty to Potter and asking them two very important questions.

Rufus signed the request from Amelia Bones to use Veritaserum on Hestia Jones, and sighed, sitting back in his chair. He'd only managed to concentrate on paperwork for a few minutes at a time tonight, a shameful record for him. He kept turning his mind to the east and thinking about Little Hangleton, the graveyard, and the young Lord-level wizard who would be facing the wild Dark there in—a few hours? An hour? Now? It was impossible to tell. Since Rufus himself was devoted to the Light, he could feel the wild Dark only as a deep, shifting presence, a negation. He couldn't tell what it was doing. The first thing he would know of Harry's loss would be when the storm descended on London.

The Ministry did have evacuation plans in effect, and it had opened its doors to those homeless wizards in London who had nowhere else to shelter. Rufus had allowed those of his people who wanted to go home. Few had. They knew the wards on the Ministry were sturdier than those on their own houses. Some of them had not only stayed, but brought their families with them. Rufus could hear the laughter of children too young to understand what this night meant, running up and down the halls outside his office and playing tag.

He glanced over at Percy Weasley, who was flipping through a book of laws, trying to familiarize himself with all the edicts the Ministry had passed in the last ten years. Rufus permitted a small smile to cross his face. Weasley was still a trainee, but he was flying through the training. He'd be an Auror sooner than the normal three years it took, if that was possible.

Rufus turned back to the next piece of paperwork to be dealt with, and started. Staring at him out of the piece of parchment was a gryphon's face. In fact, the surface of his desk had turned into a deep well of light, and the gryphon gazed up out of that, its beak parted and its feathers blending into the sides of the well.

“What are you?” Rufus whispered, but he hadn’t finished his question before he heard a cry from Percy Weasley, and then a voice speaking in his head, too deep, too resonant, to be denied.

Are you loyal to the Light?

Rufus nodded. There was no question about that, and no reason to give any other answer than the truth. He’d been Declared for the Light since he was twelve years old, and in the more than fifty years since, he hadn’t once regretted his decision.

Are you loyal to Harry Potter?

Rufus nodded again, and then extended one arm, knowing without speech what he had to do; an almost magnetic force seemed to grab his arm and pull it there. The gryphon reared out of his paperwork, a shining form that didn’t belong in the rather dingy surroundings of the Ministry, and clenched its claws around his wrist. Then his magic ran out of him like blood, and Rufus slumped over his desk, dizzy.

“Minister?” Percy Weasley’s voice was thin and trembling.

Rufus looked up to see that the young man’s face was as white as parchment. Of course, he had one arm extended, too, and magic pounded out of him in a golden-white flood. It swirled into their desks and away. Rufus, if he concentrated, could feel it streaming east—

Towards Little Hangleton.

Harry had said that his Light allies were preparing a ritual they hoped would defend him. Rufus just hadn’t expected it to be so spectacular.

“It’s all right, Weasley,” he said, and then grabbed the edge of his desk with his left hand and held on. He was loyal to the Light. He was, come to that, loyal to Harry, so long as it didn’t mean abandoning the ideals of his Ministry. And this was a contribution to a conflict much greater than that between a Ministry and a Lord-level wizard.

He closed his eyes and opened the gates of his soul wider, giving all that he had to give.

Fiona Mallory sat shivering on the couch in her flat. She wasn't cold, not really—she still had her wand to cast warming charms, after all—but she still shook in shock, given what had happened to her a few hours before. Amelia Bones had returned her wand and told her, quietly, that she was sacked from the Department of Magical Law Enforcement. She shouldn't bother applying for another position in the Ministry, either; they would all know where she'd come from.

Fiona wished she could say it was worth it. She remembered little about her days under Dumbledore's compulsion spell, but she had had the sense of absolute righteousness. The decisions she made were not open to question. She did what she was required to do, always, and it had worked out. She had willingly sacrificed herself so that Lucius Malfoy could get away with his torture of the Potters, and certainly she had cursed them herself with the greatest pleasure.

Now, with the spell gone, she had to wonder if that righteousness had been an illusion, and if the ghost of it could support her against a lonely Christmas and the necessity of finding a new job.

When the wall tore apart and a gryphon's head projected towards her, Fiona accepted it as just one more illusion, one more dream. It was no stranger than the rest of her life lately.

But then the mighty voice spoke in her head, and shook her to her bones, and she answered that yes of course she was loyal to the Light, and of course she wished to help Harry Potter—he was like her, he had been abused and the last thing she had done to help him hadn't resulted in that much good—and she held up an arm, and magic rushed forth from her, and she felt her joy rising along with it, uncontrollable, exulting, so that she almost hoped she would die before she returned.

Minerva actually dropped her teacup when she felt the flood of magic traveling towards her. Godric, who stood on the other side of the room, floated through the floor in his surprise, then recovered himself and looked hastily at her, as though trying to reassure her that that didn't happen every day.

Minerva barely noticed. She stood up, her mind tingling inside her skull. It reminded her of the way Hogwarts's wards responded to her, but this was much greater than any of the wards. Hogwarts was a tame lake, and the wards surged in it like ripples, tiny waves, always dying when they reached the shore. This was a flood galloping down an ancient watercourse. Minerva knew what the watercourse must be, though she had never thought to see it invoked in her lifetime. The Light only interfered when called. Most Light wizards were content to know it was there and they had sworn their lives to it, and didn't bother calling it.

"Godric," she said. "Would you be willing to contribute some of your magic to help Harry? I suspect that the Light is about to ask you in a moment."

"The Light?" The Founder sounded bewildered. "I—"

The stones around them became transparent. Minerva heard cries of awe and terror, but she didn't know if it was her students, or if she heard the sounds she expected to hear, somewhere in her head. She stretched out her hands, her heart singing. This was the force she had once thought embodied in Albus, the one whose loss she had mourned, along with the loss of an old and true friend, when she found out how corrupt he was. At least feeling the Light around her gave her a glimpse of the certainty that she'd felt in the First War, the belief that there was something greater than any one mortal wizard, a set of ideals worth fighting for and which truly separated their side from the side of the Dark Lord. The more she discovered about what Albus had done, the further she traveled from that feeling, but now it was with her again.

She laughed, and when the questions echoed in her head, she held out her arm gladly. Still the laughter spilled from her lips, giddy and joyous, the laughter she remembered giving when she'd finally achieved the Animagus transformation.

When she saw Godric also standing with his arm extended to feed the flood, she smiled at him, and she could have sworn he blushed.

The Light thundered on. They stood on only one stretch of its banks, Minerva knew, and it had far to go.

Zacharias Smith was not surprised when the gryphon appeared before him, though the rest of his Housemates fled in terror, or at least drew back and shrieked; the Hufflepuff common room wasn't really suited for fleeing in terror. How could he be? He was the heir of his family, the latest in a long line of descendants from Helga Hufflepuff, and newly come into adulthood this year. He rose to his feet, and tugged Hermione with him when she might have sat on the couch staring at the enormous eagle's head and lashing lion's body that blended into a torrent of golden-white radiance. This was something that one should face on one's feet, unless one was a commoner—and while Hermione was Muggleborn, she wasn't common, and Zacharias didn't intend to permit her to act like it.

The gryphon dipped its head. Zacharias bowed back. The beak shone like diamond as it almost cut the floor. Zacharias allowed himself to be gravely impressed. The gryphon was as beautiful as some of the treasures in the Smith vaults. He saw no harm in admitting that, as long as he did not think it was more beautiful, which would be a betrayal of his family.

"Loyal to the Light?" he said in response to the first question. "I daresay I am."

"His name isn't actually Potter any more," he added, when the gryphon voiced the second question. "It's Harry. He renounced his last name. I just thought you should know that."

The eagle's eyes stared at him, and Zacharias coughed and conceded that such things were less important than others right now. He stretched out his arm, and let the Light take what it had come for. He glanced to the left and saw Hermione doing the same, and gave her a nod and a smile. She was a good student.

"I didn't do it for you," said Hermione.

Zacharias blinked. "Who did you do it for?" he asked, having to clutch at her as he swayed. The Light was drawing forth his magic ferociously now. Of course it would. He was pureblood, and his family had been devoted to the Light for more than a thousand years. It would want to feast on that pure power, rooted in the strength of the earth and displayed forth in a beautiful body, if he did say so himself.

Hermione snarled at him—she was always doing that, and it was an endearing habit—and turned her fascinated gaze back to the white fountain that sprang from her arm and joined the rest of the Light as a rushing river.

Luna looked up when the Light asked her its questions. She thought about it, and then nodded. Of course she was loyal to Harry, at least if one phrased “loyalty” in a vague and convenient way. She was more loyal to the sylphs who danced during the solar eclipses, of course, but then, they’d made her promise and swear twice by her blood. And that was wild magic, anyway, neither Dark nor Light. This was the Light asking, and within those strict definitions, Luna had a greater devotion to Harry than anyone else.

A few of the other Ravenclaws in the Tower were contributing magic, too, she saw when she glanced around. Cho was practically glowing, as if she would make a fuss about it any moment. Luna didn’t see why. She propped her arm out of the way and returned to her book. It explained about hippogriff teeth that had an association with the dark of the moon rather than the full, and she had to learn about them while the moon was still dark, so she could go gathering them tomorrow night.

George sensed it first, but even as he lifted his head, he knew that his brother wasn’t far behind. They didn’t quite share a mind—that was just a trick they played at to fool the people who wanted to be fooled—but they had a closer bond than mere siblings, and the rush of the Light wasn’t exactly being subtle, was it?

When the Light asked them its questions, that was a little more complicated. George looked at Fred and asked, “Well, what do you think, Fred? Are we—”

“Loyal?” Fred chewed his lip. “I suppose so, but—”

“The least we could ask for is brand loyalty from Harry when we set up our shop,” George finished, nodding. “No more—”

“Buying from Zonko’s for him, exactly.” Fred grinned at him and held out his arm. George extended his, and identical streams of radiance burst from them, gushing into the Light that raced past. George had a brief vision of the two of them standing on the bank of a river filled with leaping flames. He grinned as he watched fiery foam leap into the air.

I bet we could make some fireworks that looked like that.

Ron swore and lowered his book. It was no good trying to read for bloody Defense Against the Dark Arts when they might not even be alive this time tomorrow night, was it? He was amazed that the professors had assigned homework, anyway. You’d think the Headmistress would have warned them off for once. If you don’t get a free night for facing imminent death from the wild Dark, what do you get it for?

He glanced around the Gryffindor common room. Other people had given up on trying to read at all, especially since Hermione wasn’t there to scold them into it. They whispered to each other, or glanced at the fireplace as if that would tell them the secrets of the future, or played Exploding Snap with shaking hands. Ron had to stifle the impulse to go interfere in a game of wizard’s chess that was going incredibly badly. He would have done better than that, even as nervous as he was. Ron had never understood why other people found chess so complicated. It was easy, and the patterns that predicted what would happen if a certain piece moved weren’t any harder than Quidditch strategies, which plenty of people understood.

“What do you think’s going to happen?”

Ron gratefully gave up pretending to study, and turned to Neville, who had taken the chair beside him and was anxiously rubbing his wrist. “I don’t know,” Ron told him. “I suppose Harry might be able to stop it, but—”

And then he gasped as he felt a warm feeling growing in his chest, a clasp of talons on his shoulders, a head bending and stroking hot feathers on his cheek. It felt like what he had always imagined Fawkes would feel like, if he actually decided to land on Ron's shoulder, but closer and larger.

Are you loyal to the Light? a voice asked, and Ron had the impression that the answer to that question would be the most important he ever gave. He nodded, dazedly, and the talons locked down on him as he got asked another important question. Are you loyal to Harry Potter?

For this, I can be, Ron thought, as he remembered how Harry had helped him break through the block on his magic last year, and held out his arm as the magic instructed him to. Then he caught a glimpse of a fiery river, and a gryphon flying in lazy circles above it, now and then stirring the flames with a kick of its legs or a flip of its wings. The vision was overwhelming, choking, and he jerked his head back.

He turned to Neville, wondering if he had seen that, too, and found Neville with his right arm extended and a beatific smile on his face, white magic pouring from his hand to join the stream.

"The Light asked me to help!" Neville whispered. "It actually asked me! It doesn't think I'm a coward!"

Ron managed to smile, and then he, too, lost himself in the wonder of actually doing something to battle the Dark.

Ginny jerked awake with a gasp as the Light came for her. She'd lain down on her bed to try and get a nap, never imagining she would succeed. How could she, when she was so worried about what might happen tonight, and if Hogwarts would still be standing, come morning?

But she'd fallen asleep, and for a moment she imagined the vision of white radiance was part of a dream. Then she realized it wasn't. No light she had ever dreamed was this harsh, this punishing, this—high. Ginny had the impression of incredible compassion, but not for any one person. It was directed towards so many that individual sorrows made very little impact on it.

But now it was trying to save a great many people, and it was asking for her help, so her agreement mattered to it.

Ginny nodded in response to the questions. Connor had told her about how Harry had snatched Tom Riddle's diary out of her cauldron in Flourish and Blotts the summer before her first year at Hogwarts—the diary Lucius Malfoy had tried to put there, the diary that might have possessed her and forced her to open the Chamber of Secrets. Ginny couldn't know just what Harry had gone through with that diary possessing him instead, but she had some idea what he'd spared her from. She'd heard Connor talking to Ron about having Riddle in his head.

She owed him a debt, even if it was only for what might have happened. She stretched out her arm, and her magic joined the tide. Connor saw the Light not as a gryphon, not as a river the way he later heard people discussing it, but as a star. Perhaps that was because he was on the Astronomy Tower, gazing to the south, when it came for him.

It was the only connection he could have with his brother, looking up at the sky where the storm would descend from. Harry had absolutely refused to take him along, and while Connor had resented that, he could understand the logic. Full-grown adult wizards couldn't help Harry tonight, not unless their allegiance was to the Light and they agreed to take part in a certain cooperative ritual. How could another fifteen-year-old help?

Except that I'm Declared for Light now, Connor thought, well-aware that he was being mulish, and not caring. That should make a difference.

So he stood, and stared to the south, and tried to imagine himself in Little Hangleton and the graveyard, getting ready to fight the Dark Lord. Voldemort would make some stupid crack about using Connor for revenge on Harry the way he had at the end of third year, and Connor would respond that he could actually fight now, and Voldemort would lift a hand and send a beam of dark fire at him, and Connor would dodge it, and then he would say...

A star on the horizon caught his attention. Connor blinked and leaned forward. He had thought there was no star there a moment before. No storm had come in as yet, but clouds blotted out all the light, even as they had during the day.

Nevertheless, a star stood there, bright as the spark in his twin's eyes when Harry went forth to confront some enemy to freedom. It spun and swirled and shone, and Connor heard the questions in his head.

"Yes," he breathed. "And yes." He lifted his arm, both so that the Light could touch him and in salute to his brother.

The magic roared around him, forth from him, a lightning bolt striking from the star and then leaping back again. Connor stood watching it as the gleam grew brighter and brighter, and then the Light shot away from it and towards the south.

A saying rose to his lips. He knew he'd heard it before, but he couldn't remember if it came from Sirius or his parents or Remus or the Headmistress, or maybe even Dumbledore.

"Even in the deepest Dark, the Light doth shine," he whispered, and then leaned forward, pouring all his heart and soul into the beam, hoping that Harry would feel that as well as the magic he was lending. Draco had almost given up on beating on the wards by the time the Light wizards appeared. Panic—for Harry—and hatred—for Voldemort—raked him with iron claws, but the wards held firm, no matter what he did. Snape, beside him, uttered curses in a low, steady voice, but they sparked and died against the snow that separated them from Harry.

Then that pompous Starrise showed up and ate through the wards with his Light, and Draco could get into the graveyard—but not very far in. Mounds of broken earth blocked his path, and the coils of some creature that stank and which Draco did not want to see face to face, and the Light wizards themselves. He heard the spell Starrise chanted, and saw a beam race away cross-country, but his gaze was fastened on Harry. He'd finally located him past the brilliance of the sunrise, a small dark figure borne far too far above the ground, wrapped in vines.

He tried to run forward. Snape's arms wrapped around him like vines themselves, and his father's hand gripped his shoulder and squeezed. It was his father who spoke, voice thick and harsh. "No one can do anything for him yet, Draco. Just wait. The Light wizards are helping him."

"I have to," said Draco intently, struggling. He understood how Harry felt now, those times when he should have given up and lain back and let someone take care of him, but he just couldn't. He had to move, had to get up there, had to use Diffindo to cut the vines and Wingardium Leviosa to catch Harry as he fell. It wasn't a want, it was a need. His father and Snape meant well, but they couldn't understand. "It won't take long. Just a moment."

"You can't, Draco," his mother whispered, and her arms joined Snape's in wrapping him round. "We'll have to wait, and hope that the ritual the Light wizards performed actually worked."

The doubt in her voice inspired Draco to new heights of kicking and squirming. He didn't understand why he couldn't get free. When he was a child, he'd delighted in wrestling free of the house elves who tried to grab him and bring him back under control. That had been before his father began his pureblood training, of course, but surely he hadn't lost all his skills in the intervening years?

After a few more moments, he understood that it wasn't his skills that had decayed; it was his parents'—and his Head of House's—that had improved. They were keeping him here because they were terrified for him, terrified that he would die if he ran forward and tried to help Harry now.

It's very simple, Draco thought. I have to do this. It's not a choice. I love him, and I have to be at his side.

He finally thought to reach for his wand, but a hand clamped down on his arm and stopped him. He looked up to see his father staring at him with a white face. Lucius shook his head, once.

“You don’t understand,” Draco said, suddenly sure that they would if he could just explain it rationally. He would show how good his pureblood training was, how calm and composed he remained even under intense pressure. “I have to. That’s just the way it is. That’s just the kind of commitment that Harry and I have made to each other. He’d come get me. I have to go get him. Excuse me.”

He twisted to the side, then dropped to his knees, forcing Snape and his father to loosen their holds. Then he rolled, and Narcissa, already bent at an awkward angle to clutch his arms, lost him. Draco bounced back to his feet, ignored the mud clinging to his trousers, and ran straight for the vines and for Harry.

His mind churned in his skull as he ran, and he knew that he had to reach a patch of ground free of ditches and gaps so that he could safely use his possession gift. His body collapsed like a limp rag when he was gone from it. He and Harry hadn’t been able to figure out a way to stop that from happening, so he had to make sure that he couldn’t tumble down and crack his head when he leaped.

He reached a patch of grass that seemed as good as any, and knelt. Then he looked up and into the face of the witch who stood under the vines holding Harry. Now and then she shook her head, and appeared quietly amazed.

Draco flung his mind like a spear straight at her. He felt the familiar whirling tumble of being inside another mind, the sudden weight of strange skin, the pull of muscles unlike his own—Harry was a fifteen-year-old boy and fairly close to his own height and weight, but this was a woman in her forties—the shift and lift of limbs that all wanted to fly in different directions. To make it worse, this witch recovered from her surprise fairly quickly and started to fight back.

Draco ignored her, though. He and Harry had concentrated on general principles of possession, rather than on commands too specific to any one body, and he knew how to move a right hand. He rotated it sharply, and the vines turned and bore Harry towards the ground.

The witch in his head pushed at him. Draco could ignore that, too, for now. He waited until the vines landed and their leaves opened from Harry's arms. Harry scrambled to his feet at once, his gaze fastened on the witch.

Draco rejoiced on looking into his boyfriend's eyes, until he realized that Harry was gathering his strength, and part of that wandless magic would certainly blast straight at him. He leaped out, just as the witch made another bid to retain control of herself, and traveled back to his own body. He rolled over, blinking and rubbing his brow; he had a ferocious headache, though part of that might have come from the way his mother was yelling into his face, loud enough to break an eardrum.

He looked back in time to see the tidal wave of Light gallop through the graveyard and slam straight into Harry.

Harry knew when Indigena Yaxley's vines suddenly released him that Draco must have possessed her. He couldn't see her turning from Voldemort on her own. He surged to his feet, grateful to have control of his own magic back, and then looked to the east. He knew what was coming.

A tracery of light would extend across the British Isles, and maybe across half Europe, too, if one counted Opalline relatives into the equation. Argutus's vision had been correct, Harry thought.

He saw the gleam of the wave's foam, and then the wave itself, tearing through the middle of the Light wizards. It hit the tip of Argutus's staff, and then focused. Harry braced himself as best he could. Had he had any idea what this ritual entailed, he would have suggested a different one, but it was too late now.

Voldemort's darkness covered him, swayed, and then struck downwards.

The Light hit Harry.

He felt the magic of more than a hundred witches and wizards flood him, freely given up, freely donated. Harry's body became no more than a suggestion of outline. His eyes tingled, and he could see everything: the bones of the earth, the veins inside the vines, the thoughts swarming beneath the surface of Indigena Yaxley's mind and Voldemort's and Rosier's.

He lifted a hand, and feathers of power sprouted from his fingers, stroking apart Voldemort's attack as though it didn't matter. Dizzy, floating, Harry made a leap in the air and felt himself come down slowly, the way that Muggles were supposed to on the moon. He turned to face Voldemort.

He could do anything at the moment, but he was also filled with the Light's compassion and tenderness of temper, and he found that he rather pitied the man who stood before him, all his genius turned to pathetic ends, all his estimation of himself gone false. He imagined that he could harness the wild Dark, and that was not true. No mortal could do that.

"Tom," he said. In his voice, bells rang. Beneath him, the earth rang where he trod. Power rippled beneath his skin, but Harry remembered, always, that it was not his, and that he had it for a purpose. Defeating the Dark was that purpose, but the Dark storm was only building now, and he had a Dark Lord to deal with first. "Will you give up and go quietly?"

Tom, Voldemort, Dark Lord, laughed at him, and in the laugh were the hundred hisses of a snake. "Why should I?" he cried. "You are nothing but a child, and I will see you destroyed. Abi!"

Harry felt the corkscrew of magic that struck at him then. It was meant not only to rend him apart, but make it as if he had never existed. This was not a traditional spell, but a deep desire of Tom's, given form by his will and insulation by the Latin invocation.

Harry raised his hand, carefully. The corkscrew broke apart in the face of his own desire, and Tom stared at him. Harry felt a more intense pity well up in him. Really, Tom's form spoke to the damage

Dark magic had done to him. It had blurred his features, melted them and sent them sliding down his face. And it had done the same thing to his mind, only with more violence. Harry had to feel for him. He had caused pain, but he had suffered it, as well.

And he could not stand against what Harry was about to do to him.

“Tom,” Harry said softly. “You are gone from here. You cannot snare the wild Dark. Your worm is dead, collapsed back into the pieces of dead flesh it was created from. Your servants are with you, and unable to cause any more harm to Muggles tonight. You cannot do anything for tonight but brood.” It was not the harsh punishment Tom deserved, the Light knew, but too far, and Harry would find himself using compulsion. He did not want to do that. He would not give up all that he was for the sake of stopping Voldemort. One night’s peace, enforced as much to protect Voldemort from the wild Dark as to protect them all from him, was the limit of what he could do.

As he spoke each thing, it became true. The Light spread around him and fused the night into glass and diamond. Tom vanished. Indigena Yaxley vanished, sent to the same place he was. The worm broke apart, stitches showing clearly where the segments had been threaded together, greasy gray fire consuming it as it sprawled in death. Harry raised his hand higher, and the white force, song and fire and goodness and loyalty, flared around him. Harry had never seen a sight so beautiful as this dawn in the middle of the longest night.

For one moment, all was peaceful. Voldemort’s trap was dissipated, and the ritual had worked to grant him the power needed to defeat the Dark Lord. Harry breathed clear air.

Then the night shook.

Harry lifted his head.

And he knew it had done no good, no good at all, as streams of thunder raced from all four corners of the sky and coiled above him, splitting and dancing and weaving back together again into reaching tendrils of power. The Dark had come, and it was mightier by far than the Light magic of mortal wizards. And this was the Dark's night, the time when the sun was furthest away from the northern hemisphere, a time of the dark of the moon, a night of clouds blocking out the light of the stars and preventing it from reaching the earth. There was nothing the Light could do to stop it.

The Dark was amused that he had tried; Harry could feel its amusement like a hand pressing against his body. And it would stay and play with him for a bit before it broke past his feeble defense and attacked the rest of Britain. He had made a good showing. It was too bad that good showing could not be permitted to stop the storm.

Harry stood there, the gathering wind sending his hair behind him, and felt the cold of acceptance curdle in his belly. This was a contest he was doomed to lose. The Dark was simply too strong for him to fight, and this time, unlike in Henrietta's story, it would not lose interest and wander away. It would cause thousands of deaths before the dawn came to stop it. The Dark rejoiced and crooned in the thoughts of those deaths, and more so because Harry himself wanted so very badly for them not to happen.

Harry knew they would happen. But he had to try to stop them. He drew in his own magic, and his borrowed Light power, determined to send a strike into the sky and catch the Dark's attention. Perhaps he could wound it.

Then wings beat above him, two sets of them. Harry heard a song like thunder and a song like strength, and he lifted his head again, focusing his eyes this time on something other than the Dark's display of power.

One of the shapes was very much larger and blacker than the other. It stooped at him, and Harry made out wide leathery wings, dark scales, eyes golden as madness. The Hungarian Horntail landed beside him with a sweep of her spiked tail, her claws delicately straddling the broken earth, and extended a wing towards him. Harry knew he was supposed to mount.

The other shape circled his head like a comet, singing all the while. Harry saw Fawkes, and Fawkes's dark eyes gazing at him, and Fawkes's crimson feathers bobbing; he had turned deep red all over, like spilled blood or the heart of summer.

Harry took a deep breath, and a step forward, and a moment to pause and hope. Then he was running up the leathery wing. It was stiff as a ramp, and bounced only slightly where he stepped. He settled into a dip on the dragon's back, and fastened his hand on the spikes in front of him. It hurt to grip them, but he was used to riding his Firebolt using only his knees now. He thought he could manage with the Horntail.

Fawkes sang again, and the dragon opened her mouth and sang, and then they rose, hurtling upwards into the heart of the storm.

Chapter Fifty-Five: Till Earth-Life Grow Elysian There

Harry felt the winds close around him as they rose, curling under his robes, playing with the hem of his jumper, skimming his skin like teeth bared just enough to hurt. He shivered, and then resolutely opened his eyes and peered upwards. The wild Dark had chosen to take the form of rain, not of snow, so the air could not be as cold as it normally would be in winter. He would not allow the wild Dark to reverse its orientation now, and pretend to be something it was not.

Not that it seemed to be pretending as he rose to meet it. It spread its claws wide, and shrieked at him, and he saw the same ill-defined body he had seen when it attacked him that night outside Hogwarts.

The Hungarian Horntail stopped rising and spread her wings, hovering. Harry wondered why for a time, then realized that she saw little reason to close with an enemy in air of his choosing. She would wait here for the strike, where the winds were less violent and the wild Dark would have to come at them nearer to the bottom of its own cloud.

The wild Dark laughed, as if it could sense every thought in the dragon's head and disdained them all, and then it came for them.

Harry felt a shuddering power slam through him, as though he were back in the dream—of the graveyard, he knew now—where this creature had hit him with its neck. Pain followed pain like bruise following bruise, but he knew he didn't just bear bruises now. He had broken ribs. He coughed, and the Light fluttering in the heart of him answered with its best flare.

The wild Dark coiled around him, black scale next to black scale, pale belly arching for yards above his head. Then its claws reached out, and plucked the Light magic Harry's allies had sent him.

Harry sagged as the power left him. He turned his head to see the wild Dark ball it up into a tiny white bundle and toss it contemptuously down through the storm. Clouds parted for it, and then it was gone.

A voice spoke into his mind as if it would smash his skull to pulp. Here is only the Light you bring with you—your gifts, not your borrowings.

The claws closed around Harry's waist and snatched him from the dragon. Then the Dark was flying, heading straight up so fast that Harry felt his lashes freeze and his ears pop several times. The roar of the dragon was so far behind them that it quickly became indistinguishable from the roar of the winds. Harry could not hear Fawkes at all.

Here we are.

"Here" was evidently the top of the cloud, the top of the storm. Harry looked around, blinking dazed eyes—somehow, his glasses had not fallen off—and saw the lights of Little Hangleton off to one side. Directly below, bits of stone danced like leaves in an eddy. The storm must have uprooted the graves, he thought.

"What do you want of me?" he asked. The wind blew away his words the moment he formed them, but Harry had no doubt that the Dark heard him. Those golden eyes and serpentine neck cocked to look at him.

Your attention. Your admiration. It is wrong that you are always thinking of other things, and not of me. The Dark's tone had a wild petulance to it that reminded Harry of Connor when he didn't get a favorite sweet. When you have paid enough attention to me, then I will suck out your magic, and you will become a wind. I will show you all the dark spaces between the stars. They contain mysteries that no mortal has ever seen. You will like them.

"I can't leave my friends, the magical creatures, my home," Harry said quietly. He didn't know if reason was the best course to try on the wild Dark, but fighting had got him absolutely nowhere. "Those are all my duties, as well. I can try to give you more attention than I have, but if you insist on all of it, then you're depriving others of the same gift that you want."

The wild Dark laughed at him. Harry felt another rib break, but he couldn't tell if that came from the laughter or the tightening grip of the claws on him. He held still and tried to breathe as shallowly as he could. Broken ribs hurt so badly.

I do not care about the others. You are a Lord-level wizard, and you can pay attention to me and give gifts to me. We will go shake the stars when we are done here, and make the stars fall down. We will dance with the winds, and freeze the winds and turn them into ice crystals and leave them for future Muggles to discover. We will coat the world with night for three nights and allow no sun to rise. We will be free, and you cannot blame me for that, because you are freedom's servant.

Harry could see why there were Declared Dark Lords in that moment. Most of them probably hadn't Declared with the intention of conquering the world like Voldemort and Grindelwald had, even though that was what ended up happening. Many of them had probably wanted the secrets the Dark was promising, the questions parting to become answers, the endless freedom of venturing into corners of the universe that no one else would dare to probe.

But the road of the wild Dark was no more human than the road of the highest Light. Go with it, Harry knew, and he would lose what he most valued: his own sense of limitations on himself, the knowledge of when to use his power and when to cage it, his own tendency to hesitate instead of simply imposing his will on the world. He would become all "I can, and I want to, and therefore I should," and judgment would be alien to him.

"I don't want to do this," he said.

I know you don't. Your unwillingness tastes sweet. An enormous tongue flapped above him, like a black version of Voldemort's worn. But I will consume it, and it will become willingness, and then you will see what I see. For now, look down.

Harry looked down. He could have refused and kept looking straight, he knew, but then the wild Dark would have interfered with his vision and made him see what it wanted him to see anyway. If he got out of this alive—and a small part of him said that he might—Harry wanted his normal vision.

The land beneath him throbbed and changed like lightning in the midst of the storm, like wind or water. Harry saw houses dancing on their foundations, the hill outside Little Hangleton rippling up and down as though an army of worms moved beneath it, lights going out one by one as the enormous hand of the Dark stroked them into silence and darkness. He noticed a shape flying parallel to them, too, a grand shape, and tried to turn his eyes away and not notice it. The dragon was following them, waiting for a chance to strike. He didn't want the wild Dark to see her.

That thing? Oh.

And there came a violent snapping sound, and when Harry looked at the dragon, she was dead, her head lolling on her neck, her wings spread and shredding as particles of ice tore through them, her talons fluttering as though she played a tune. The wild Dark heard Harry's little pathetic cry of anguish, and laughed. Harry spun around twice in its glee.

You care, don't you? You still care. You look down at the land and you think more of them than you do of me. For a moment, the enormous voice was displeased, but it recovered its cheerfulness soon enough. I'll keep you caring, for a little while. You're fun when you're in pain.

Harry closed his eyes. There had to be some way he could defeat the storm. This wasn't like the situation with Durmstrang and the children trapped there, where he would handle it best by leaving it up to other people. There was no one but him who stood a chance of stopping the wild Dark. Voldemort was out of the way, and his allies could not send power to him from beyond the winds.

Here is only the Light you bring with you, the Dark had said.

Was that a clue?

Harry reached into the center of himself, trying to think of all the Light he knew. He turned his thoughts away from things like the green fire of the Killing Curse. There was the white radiance that had saved Connor's life at the end of first year, and the light of fire in the hearth at Godric's Hollow as the family sat around it telling stories, and the brilliant fireworks exploding behind his eyes when he and Draco kissed, and the sunrise when he swam with the unicorns on the sea—

The wild Dark shook him, and he lost the thread of his thoughts. When he opened his eyes, the wild Dark said, I thought you would like to see this. You did dream of protecting them from me, after all.

Harry had to look again, and he saw a Muggle woman being decapitated, wind sharp as a steel sword sweeping her head from her body. Harry made an inarticulate noise, especially when the wind blew knowledge of him up to her. She had lived in Little Hangleton, and her name was Marie, and she had a daughter named Sarah, and she was concerned about money, scraping it together, just barely making a living selling her paintings.

She would make no paintings ever again. She would never smile at Sarah again, or look out the window at a sunrise she'd seen after hours of being up to create, or do anything but drift as pieces in the Dark's grip, frozen meat, a victim of forces that Harry should have been able to keep away from her and had not.

"Stop!"

The wild Dark laughed in delight at the force of Harry's cry. It turned its gaze from the other floating Muggles, awaiting death with terror on their faces, to him. The dark tongue came into being again, and curled, as if tasting and savoring Harry's anguish.

Yes?

"What can I offer you to make you stop doing this?" Harry whispered. He felt the strength piling up behind him, and knew there was more where that came from. This was only the beginning, the Muggles it was killing and the houses it had pulled down so far. The wild Dark had not used the smallest part of its magic. The dawn would stop it, but it was the longest night of the year, and dawn was hours away. "What do you want of me that would make it worth your while to spare these Muggles and their homes?"

The wild Dark cocked its head reflectively. There are many things you might give me, it said. So many things that I will have to think of them—no, no, I need not. The first thing you can give me is a Declaration to the Dark. Become a Dark Lord.

Harry shivered, and saw his hopes for his future as vates collapse. "You know what I am," he said.

I do. The Dark bounced like an overexcited child. That is what makes this so much fun!

Harry swallowed, and swallowed, and swallowed again. His eyes locked on the drifting Muggles in the Dark's care. He saw Sarah, the dead woman's daughter; he knew her as well as Marie would have, with Marie's memory in his head now. Her eyes were wide, and she choked on tears. In her own life, she laughed and cried and was frustrated and grew angry, but here, all emotions save horror had been wiped out of her. No one should have to live like that.

But no one should have to live like the magical creatures, either, imprisoned under webs that stripped all sense of possibility from their futures. And if he Declared now, then he would be taking their best chance at freedom from them. He knew neither Dumbledore nor Voldemort would become vates, and he had no chance of knowing when another Lord-level wizard might emerge.

I grow bored, the Dark announced, and snapped Sarah's neck. She joined her mother as a dangling bit of trash in its currents, all the life and possibility fled her in an instant.

"All right!" Harry shouted, the words torn from him by the vision of more Muggles, and wizards, and witches, and magical creatures, dangling like that. "Damn you, all right!"

The Dark purred at him and coiled around him. We will do this correctly, it said. A full Declaration to the Dark is a ritual, you know, and not just a matter of announcing your new allegiance. I will show you all the steps, and you will dance them. A stage, flat and white, appeared beneath Harry's feet, then sprouted decorations of mottled gray. Around him, the wind stopped blowing, and Harry staggered as he landed, wincing as his ribs jostled and poked him. First, you must stand, and turn to the west. That is the proper ritual direction, since the sun sets there.

Harry rose and turned shakily to where he thought the west was. The storm approved in a deep rumble, and said, Now raise your right arm.

Harry lifted his right arm. He felt hatred dance in his veins like boiling water, and forced himself to breathe. The Dark would win a victory indeed if it made him hate it. He would not hate it. The wild Dark alone was making him hate it. The other parts of the Dark, the parts that wizards like Snape had seen and chosen to serve, were just as worthy of love and devotion as the Light.

But it's Light I need now.

The storm said, Raise your left—

The Dark didn't get to complete its instruction, because its words melted in a flood of song. Harry turned his head. He saw a flake of gold blowing towards him up the rogue winds beyond the stage, bright wings spread, song traveling before and behind it and seeming to smooth the air.

The wild Dark laughed. Your phoenix has come to say farewell to you. Of course, a phoenix will not serve a Dark wizard. How sweet. I am inclined to permit this, just so that you will have no distractions when you are completing the ritual. Listen to his pretty little song, then, Harry.

Harry fastened his gaze on Fawkes. The phoenix had tears in his eyes, and Harry wondered why. Had he tried to heal the dying Muggles? Had he tried to heal others Harry didn't know about, those people he should have managed to protect and had not?

He winced, and Fawkes answered him with a croon, as much to say that that had not been his fault and he was silly for thinking otherwise. Harry nodded. He kept his right arm up, since moving it might make the Dark rethink its permission for Fawkes to sing. He stood there, and awaited the last sound he suspected he would ever hear as a free wizard.

Fawkes spread his wings wide, looking more like an eagle than a phoenix in that moment, and started with a low warble. It rose from deep in his belly, traveled up his throat, and left his beak as shining notes. Harry saw them form and fall, drops of rain like honey. He could not see what happened to them. They seemed to part and become golden steam moments after they were born.

In the middle of them, Fawkes sang, and Harry saw endless golden pastures, shifting with flames. No, they were flowers, bowing and dancing in time to a wind he could not feel, their gauzy petals clasping each other, their stems entwining, their red centers opening to the sun. When the sun rose fully, then they burst into flame, but Harry knew that, even as they burned, they would resurrect themselves during the night, ready to complete a daily cycle.

Like the phoenixes.

There were phoenixes flying above those pastures, their tails outstretched behind them, their plumes bobbing, their talons tucked close to their breasts. Harry heard their voices answering each other, one song prompting a hundred others, warble answering warble, croon answering croon, and he had tears in his eyes as he watched one rise out of all of them and look towards the east.

That one was Fawkes.

The vision superimposed the imaginary bird over the real thing, and then Harry was looking at Fawkes again as he was here, as he hung suspended in the middle of this monstrous darkness and sang his heart out.

The music altered, leaping faster and faster, swirling like a tame waterfall down a series of steps. Harry could see a vision of that, now, as Fawkes sat beside such a cataract and drank from it by the light of the full moon, the moon itself reflected in the water but continually broken and disrupted by the coming of a new rivulet.

A free unicorn came to the cataract, shining like wonder. She had never known imprisonment. Beside her stood a foal who had never known it either, and who tossed his head and snorted in excitement at the song of the waterfall. It was music he had never heard before. He began an awkward dance to it, flecks of foam on his coat giving back the moonlight. Fawkes voiced notes he could dance more easily to, and phoenix and river, fire and water, sang together under the moon while the foal danced and the unicorn mare bowed her head and drank, her horn cleaving the waterfall into wilder and wilder reflections.

A blink, and the vision dissipated again. Harry looked up at Fawkes hanging above him, and wondered why the phoenix had chosen to share that with him. Was it a dear memory that he wanted Harry to retain when he was gone? A particularly beautiful shard of Light to clutch when he was all Dark?

Fawkes gazed back at him, eyes wild and black and wise, and then did a half-turn to the left and began another part of the song.

This time, Harry saw the stars. They shone like gems in a mine, but they were the stars, though shaken and rung as Harry had never imagined could happen. He could see immense silver strings running from them, and giant fingers flashing between them, and he realized he heard the harp of the stars being played. Was it real? At least as real as the way that wizards and witches saw the stars, he thought, for this was the way that a phoenix saw them.

Fawkes flew under the stars, and beside him was a creature Harry had never seen before, a winged horse made of silver wire and filled in with silver light. His wings rose and fell with a noise like flutes, just barely audible beneath the sound of the harp of the stars. His tail looped and curled, a shining river of diamonds, down into the night, and his mane brushed Fawkes like the scent of flowers. He flew, and whatever turn Fawkes made, whatever loop he curled, whatever straight-up ascent he executed at an impossible angle, the winged horse was right there beside him. Harry knew, as he watched, that this was a fragile creature, though incredibly strong while he existed, a child of the stars destroyed by the music's ending or a cloud passing over the light that bore him. Even for a phoenix, this was a rare night, a wild night.

That vision, too, ended, and Harry blinked at Fawkes and wondered again why the phoenix had shared that. Fawkes's visions were usually not only shorter, but clearer in their import. What message did he mean Harry to carry into darkness? Was it really just a way of saying farewell?

It couldn't be, Harry thought. The visions were too regular, too detailed. And they all contained creatures that he had never seen before, except for the one with the unicorns—and that contained unicorns who had never known the touch of a wizard's hand or a wizard's web. Fawkes would not be so cruel as to remind him of all he was giving up by making the Declaration for Dark. So it must be something else. What?

And then he knew, and felt like a fool for not seeing it earlier. One vision of the sun, one of the moon, one of the stars. Fawkes was showing him all the different kinds of Light.

But why?

Harry frowned, and Fawkes crooned. Then he spread his wings wide and began to dance.

Harry watched him. His heart ached as Fawkes continued, for with every shake of scarlet plumes, golden crest, coruscating blue tail, he knew another moment passed, and he traveled closer and closer to giving up everything he was so that others would not be hurt. Sacrifice had never seemed so bitter.

Fawkes tilted his neck and let fall another stream of honey-colored notes, as if to scold Harry for being so negative. Harry swallowed and tried to stand straighter. Fawkes was right. He had made his choice, even if it was under duress. He couldn't blame the phoenix, even if he had chosen the visions to show Harry what he would never have. The phoenix had done an enormous amount of work to help advance his cause as vates. He had the right to be disappointed that Harry had chosen continued life for some over freedom for all the magical creatures.

The phoenix grew brighter and brighter, deeper and deeper. Harry could hear his song rising in crescendo, and knew the moment was coming when it would finish, and he would have to say farewell. He swallowed again, and tried to brace himself, determined that no tears would cloud his voice in the final moment.

Fawkes spread his wings wide, and turned entirely gold. Harry tried to hide his eyes, and could not. Light flared, dazzling in the midst of the darkness, a second sunrise, like the one Augustus had brought to the graveyard far below.

Abruptly, the Dark screamed. No! You cannot! This is not allowed! This cannot be done!

Fawkes, in the midst of a spin, spread his wings wider, and wider still. By now, Harry knew they were longer than they actually were, and suspected they had begun to blend into the light the phoenix shed. He still could not hide his eyes, and still, somehow, he could see, rather than his vision going dark the way he thought it should have. Wider, and wider, and Fawkes seemed all wing and scarcely any body, dancing, a shadow against the gold.

The light soared. The song soared. Harry thought they were twinned, and when one died, so would the other. He knew his right arm was shaking from being held aloft for so long, but it did not seem important.

Fawkes sang. Fawkes danced. Harry could hear the tenor of his music now—or perhaps he had merely become better at reading the phoenix's mind, after the visions that had let him see more of his past life. The song had passed a lament and escalated into a celebration. Perhaps for the things Harry had done when he was still free?

No! the Dark screamed again.

The sunrise grew. Harry thought of the meadows far away covered with immortal blossoms, and all the phoenixes flying. He wondered if Fawkes would ever return there.

The song turned.

Harry felt it come for him like an arrow.

Fawkes sang. Fawkes danced. The song was more than a celebration now; it was a triumph, a symphony of joy. Harry heard notes in the music he would not have thought it possible to achieve, springing up the scale of delight, soaring and finding their place in a dazzling array of exaltation.

Light welled all around him, deep and tender, a spreading hand of gold in the midst of the darkness.

Harry felt it surround him, slam into him, fill him. Fire swelled beneath his chest. Wings lifted from his shoulders. Golden-white force of being fledged him and made him begin to burn.

Fawkes sang. Fawkes danced. Harry could feel him intimately now, as if the bond in his mind that connected him to the phoenix had spread to encompass the whole of his body, as if Fawkes were becoming only song and only dance and only light, as if they vibrated in harmony.

Fawkes sang. Fawkes danced. Harry felt him climb, spiraling, looking to the stars that shone beyond the clouds, which the Dark storm could dim but not extinguish.

And then Fawkes gave his life away.

Harry felt him die, assumed into the light, ascending into the dawn, a joyous and a willing sacrifice, a gift permanently passed to Harry, rather than borrowed, as the magic from his allies had been.

The Dark screamed in anger, in terror, in fear.

Harry lifted his hand, and it spread feathers of light, the way it had earlier, when he faced Tom. Wings beat from his shoulders, and he felt his face mold and bend into a beak as hard as diamond. His eyes sharpened, his sight turning almost painfully clear. His fingers curled and hardened, and his body slid into a long, sleek shape—lion, he knew, without being told. He felt feathers and fur nip together in the middle of his back, joining. He spread his wings and screamed.

He was a gryphon, the gryphon of the Light—the Light, called and given passage into the middle of the Dark storm by the death of Fawkes, a creature of ultimate Light, the gift of his fire acting as a gateway, doubled or tripled in power by the willing sacrifice of it. For a phoenix, a creature that might live forever, dying and being reborn, to give up his life and interrupt the cycle, was something that snared the Light's attention. And that death was powerful enough to call it forth on this longest night of the year, this night without a moon, into the heart of the Dark storm.

The Dark had said, Here is only the Light you bring with you—your gifts, not your borrowings.

And the Light had been given, and the Light had come.

Harry swam somewhere in the middle of it, his mind ablaze with grief and rage and joy, strands of diamond intermingled with the gold. He felt himself lift, gryphon and human and Light all at once, mortal and immortal and force, and fly forward. The storm was breaking around him. The clouds were no longer thunderheads, but the clouds of sunrise, clinging to the beams but always dissipated by them, melting away before the birth of day and the death of night.

The Dark was revealed now, a looping, ungainly body clumsier than any dragon, retreating hastily before the flying gryphon. Harry wondered why for a moment, and then had his answer, handed to him before he could wonder. So long as it hid, the Dark could draw substance from the night and the storm around it, and appear as graceful as it wished. With the radiance eating into and destroying it, it had to make do with what clumps of black flesh it could gather.

The gryphon slammed into the Dark, and tore through it. Aurora ades dum, Harry thought, as he felt his enemy shred before talons that were and were not his own. Dawn come hither.

Dawn had come, at least in this place, and as the Dark lashed and hissed and tried to fight back, it kept returning. It shone from every flash of the gryphon's feathers; it pulsed in every return of Harry's grief for Fawkes; it leaped from cloud to cloud like the lightning. The sky they fought in was golden and black, and Harry could feel the Dark's influence retreating, falling away like torn rags, no sturdier than the petals of the phoenix flowers in their faraway meadows.

It retreated only so far and no farther, but that was all right. The Dark could not be stronger than the Light, only as strong. It had broken the laws and disobeyed the rules by gathering up so much power and storming across Britain like this. The Light, which did obey the laws and the rules, had had to have the invitation of mortal and immortal creatures to counter it, but now that it was here, it pinned the Dark to the air and forced it to acknowledge that dawn would come again, that Midsummer would come again, that even as the sun danced far away in the longest night, it was already making the turn that would see light come back once more. Tomorrow's night would be a little shorter than this one, and on, and on, and on, the summer and the season rising, in the endless dance of dances.

The wild Dark wailed, at last, scolded like a naughty child before the gryphon's claws. There were parts of it that were majestic, and strong, and even lovable, Harry thought, deep in the Light, but not this one. It wailed, and sobbed, and agreed to the Light's terms, and the storm broke.

For a moment, the gryphon hung in the midst of the vanishing clouds, gold tearing the black apart, a second sunrise in a night that would not see a sunrise for a very long time yet. And then the Light began gently to separate itself from Harry, brushing his face with its feathers and rubbing his neck with its beak, healing his ribs as it transformed them. Now that the Dark was defeated and the laws of the world set in balance once more, it had no right to stay.

Harry closed his eyes as grief came back to him, as he lost the perspective that one had by existing forever. The Light boiled all around him, a stream of steam and white in mourning for Fawkes, Sarah, Marie, the dragon. It could have been so much worse, and those were the terms in which the Light thought, but it understood that they did not comfort Harry.

The wind bore him gently to the ground, and Harry landed in the middle of the graveyard, catching himself with his knees and his hand. He kept his head bowed. He was certain that his allies stood around him, but he could not bear to meet their eyes as yet.

“Harry?”

That was Draco’s voice, and he only spoke when a moment had passed, meaning Harry was more ready to look. He blinked at him, and then realized the night was brighter than it should have been. He glanced down.

Pale fire shone through his skin, reflections of red and gold and white and blue that seemed to come from far away. Harry drew a deep breath. He knew it was Fawkes’s gift. He wondered how long it would last. Not long, he thought. He was no phoenix, to die and be reborn. Perhaps it would last only the night, or one burning cycle, and then be gone.

While he was like that, he probably had some phoenix gifts. He could do nothing to heal the dead, but there was one here who needed healing. The pain spoke from behind him, a wrongness in the world.

Harry turned and looked up. Yaxley’s thorns still writhed around the graves, and in the middle of them still hung Evan Rosier. Harry lifted his hand, and the fire spread around his fingers and then emerged into a misty, five-pronged shape, part human and part phoenix claw and part gryphon talon. It drifted forward and began to puff the thorns that twined into Rosier’s face and back and sides gently into ash.

Harry stood there, watching. No one said anything. Draco gripped his shoulder, once, but didn’t speak. Harry was grateful for it. He watched Rosier’s dazed face as the pain ceased, little by little, and then the five-pronged shape expanded, gripped him, and hauled him towards the ground, laying him on his stomach.

Harry knelt over him and blinked. For the first and only time, he cried phoenix tears. It was like crying hot flowers. They welled past his lids and fell onto the immense wound in Rosier's back, and it turned gold instead of red, little by little. The gold hardened into a scab so beautiful that Harry had to resist the urge to touch it. Then Rosier moved, and it peeled and tumbled away from him, leaving unmarred skin in its place.

Rosier rolled over and stared up at him. Harry stared back. He could not make out anything in those dark eyes. He found that he didn't want to.

"Sometimes," Rosier breathed, "I hate you, Harry."

He stood up, and clutched something in his pocket Harry thought must have been his wand—it would have amused Voldemort to leave it with him while he hung helpless from the thorns, unable to access it—and then Apparated. Harry knelt in the grass, and blinked.

A cold feeling infested his eyelid. He rubbed at it, wondering what it could be. Normal tears? Draco's arms were around him now, light and hesitant, as if afraid to touch. Harry leaned back into him.

Another cold kiss brushed his cheek. Harry blinked, and looked up, and realized then what it was.

Snow.

Snow snow snow, tumbling from the sky as if the stars were shedding it between the tattered shreds of clouds, shaking out like salt from a cellar, coming to coat Britain, as the natural balance of the seasons was restored and winter came at last.

Intermission: Ten Leagues Beyond the Wide World's End

Snape did not know what he felt as he stood in the graveyard outside Little Hangleton, beneath the falling snow, and watched Harry lean back into Draco's arms and Evan Rosier Apparate away. He did not know what he felt even when the thorns trembled and then coiled around the graves like snakes all binding up into a nest against the winter cold. He did not know what he felt when the wind stirred and sent flakes of snow skittering up into his face, proving beyond doubt that it was real and not just another manifestation of the Dark, or wind and rain frozen into pellets.

He felt—empty, he thought, fitting the words carefully around the thoughts. Yes, that was the best description. He had surged with so many emotions, awe and terror and horror and rage, as he watched the flashes of lightning tilt through the clouds and occasionally caught a glimpse of beautiful, impossible things, that it was as if he were bled dry. He reached out a hand, and it trembled as it brushed Harry's shoulder above Draco's arm. Then it steadied.

Harry turned and looked at him.

And then Snape felt a surge of fear again, because that was the first time he really understood how close they had come to losing Harry.

Harry's eyes were blasted, like forests scarred by fire, like green lands newly turned into deserts, like villages fallen into pestilence from a nundu's breath. He was empty, too, numb and in shock. It made a jarring contrast to the fire that still fluttered beneath his skin like a little live thing, beating wings like the phoenix Snape was slowly accepting would never come fluttering out of the clouds again.

They had nearly lost him to greatness, to Dark winds and Light dawns, to sights that Snape couldn't imagine and didn't want to. He had known, on some abstract level, all his life, that Lords and Ladies wizards faced and saw things that other wizards and witches didn't. He had sometimes caught a glimpse of that in Dumbledore's eyes, but Dumbledore had compensated with his slightly mad persona, and Voldemort had, of course, paid the price with his sanity. Snape had never really known either of them as mortal, had never seen the cost of their magic burning away what had made them, once, human and like others.

A large swathe of what Harry had been was gone now.

And Snape knew exactly what he felt—the desire to heal what he could, and to preserve what was left.

He gathered Harry roughly into his arms, drawing him away even from Draco. Draco tried to say something, but Snape shut him down with a glare that would have made Neville Longbottom faint dead away. He held Harry close to him. Harry leaned in a little, but made no attempt to embrace him back, and that chilled Snape's mind with worse fear.

"We are leaving," he said, not caring who heard him, not caring who followed, and he left the graveyard with his arms closed around Harry like steel bands. His goal was to reach the Apparition point and then return to Hogwarts, where Harry might learn something of what it was to be human again.

Harry, of course, being Harry, stirred as they passed the graveyard wall, and whispered, "But the Muggles—the ones the storm snatched—"

Snape paused with a frown and looked towards Little Hangleton. The houses stood there exactly as they had done, the lights showing through their windows. Snape shook his head. "The storm didn't disturb the Muggles, Harry. What is wrong?"

Harry struggled upright enough to look on his own, then shrank back within Snape's hold as if the sight of the houses standing untroubled had upset him more than what he'd faced in the clouds. "Perhaps the Light put them back," he whispered. "But I saw the Dark kill two Muggles, and the dragon who came to help me. And Fawkes gave up his life for me. I don't think any of them are alive again."

"No," said Snape quietly, thinking of the great shape he had seen come hurtling out of the sky to land with a thump that jarred the hills miles away. "We'll alert the Ministry, Harry, and let them investigate. I think you're right, and the Light made it as if it were a bad dream for the Muggles, but it couldn't have brought the dead back to life. No magic can do that."

"I should go look—"

"No," said Snape. That was the voice he'd once used to silence Rosier, and Harry fell quiet, too, before it. "Not you. Not tonight. The Ministry can do it, Harry. I'll send an owl to Scrimgeour the moment I see you safely settled."

He kept walking, ignoring all the silent offers to take Harry from him, ignoring Draco trotting beside him, looking anxiously upwards. He should have grown tired long before they reached the Apparition point, but he did not. He kept on walking, and around him the snow shone as if every flake were a window with a candle beyond it.

And then they came out on the Hogsmeade road, and the true Hogwarts was before them, with its hundred lighted windows with candles behind them, and it was a welcome sight indeed. Lucius thought he had had the best view of all of them.

He had cast a spell to make his eyesight clear the moment Harry had risen into the clouds. He knew there was very little—likely nothing—he could do to interfere, but if a chance for his help did come, he wanted to be ready.

No chance had come. He had seen the Dark snatch Harry from the back of the dragon and rise, and then he had seen little more until the dawn had arrived in the middle of the storm. Those moments had been spent in grim silence, cold white silence polluted, just a little, by his shadow of curiosity over the way Draco had charged forward. He would be talking with his son later, learning what the reason behind his strange behavior might be.

He had seen the gryphon of Light appear, and take over Harry, and he had felt a mingling of both apprehension that the Light would take their ally away completely and the worshipful hatred he felt before a respectable enemy much more powerful than he was.

The gryphon had fought, Harry had fought, and the clouds had slid past them and around the dancing Dark beast. Lucius thought it looked like a chimera, neither one thing nor the other, an ugly, lumpish beast that every sane creature in the world disdained. They danced on a dark stage, with a golden backdrop splattered with black clouds that shone as flat as the most inexpensive scenery, and above them the stage closed into a funnel that Lucius's eyes, even helped by magic, could not penetrate.

He had not known what gave the light to Harry until he returned to the ground and pulsed gently, with a phoenix's heart, in the snow, and then he had been, for one of the few times that he could ever remember—the last had been when he heard that a one-year-old baby had defeated the Dark Lord—at a loss for words. Phoenixes did not die. They rarely bonded with wizards, and when they did, it was a condescension and an honor. Lucius was willing to admit that, even though phoenixes were creatures of Light and he was a creature of Dark. The idea of a phoenix loving a wizard enough to die permanently for him was foreign, utterly outside Lucius's element.

And he might even have been able to assimilate that, if not for the light beneath Harry's skin. Fawkes had apparently given part of himself to Harry, passed into his body. That was stunning. That was too sharp to grasp. That was new.

For the first time, Lucius had the feeling that he wasn't participating in just another political struggle, but that he had come close to something higher and mightier than his world.

It made him—quiet for a while.
Hawthorn had smelled the battle.

The air had been sharp with the smell of a storm when they appeared in the Apparition point near Little Hangleton, and the only thing that had displaced it until the arrival of the Dark Lord himself was the shuck they had passed on the way in. The reek there made Hawthorn growl and want to raise her hackles, even though she didn't have hackles as a human. It smelled like camel dung in the desert sun. Hawthorn had never smelled camel dung in any kind of weather; that knowledge came from the wolf inside her. The chant of blood and hatred and killing in the back of her mind had gone silent, and the wolf had sniffed warily, knowing it was in the presence of evil and not just darkness, before it dived into a corner of her soul and refused to come out.

But Hawthorn could still smell with its nose—they were too thoroughly united now for it to be otherwise—and she had smelled the storm brewing, and then foul flesh as the Dark Lord appeared. Apparently, the wards he'd cast on the graveyard were not enough to keep out odors. Of course, Hawthorn was rapidly finding that non-werewolves didn't care that much about smells. She did, and she had to pinch her nostrils shut to keep her mind concentrated on rescuing Harry. The smell of the worm and the vines would drive her mad otherwise.

The wards had broken, and the Light had come with a scent like bluebells, so thick and overwhelming that the wolf had risen out of the back of her mind to complain about not smelling anything else. For a moment, as she watched the white flood slam into Harry and fill him with power, Hawthorn had felt ridiculously cheerful, even though she didn't serve Light.

The storm had arrived, and put an end to that, and an end to the bluebells. There was only sharp tin, then, the fragrance of brewing rain. Hawthorn had watched as Harry rose with his phoenix and his dragon, and she did not expect him to return again. Whatever her human heart might say, her nose announced that the Dark was just too strong.

And then...

And then...

And then she might have pinched her nostrils shut again, except that the scents lapped her like magic itself, and she didn't have that much presence of mind.

She breathed terror, hope, despair, clarity, things she had never known had a smell until just then. She smelled justice, and it was like white fire, but not very like it; that was simply the best analogy her thoughts could come up with. She smelled the moment when the phoenix sang and died, and she saw the golden flowers like drifts of sweetness around her knees, and she trembled and wanted to do nothing but bathe in unicorn spoor until the end of her days, and she compared the winged horse of the stars to snow and lost her heart in longing to see one. She smelled the moment when the light passed into Harry, and saw him come nearer and nearer, like a tumbling comet that would grace and not hurt the earth when it landed, but she could have closed her eyes and seen him just as well; his scent was that sharp.

She sniffed as he landed, and found that his scent had changed. It had a garnish of fire that had never been there before.

She needed no one to tell her that a phoenix had died and yielded part of his light to Harry. It was there for anyone who wished to smell it.

Ignifer saw little of their journey back to the Apparition point, because she was lost in the memory of an old tale that her father had told her.

That had been in the days before she knew she would ever Declare for Dark, when her father could set her on his shoulders and wander in the Apollonis autumn garden and she had not the least shadow of a suspicion that it would ever be different. He'd walked under the red trees with her one day, when she was nine years old, and told her one of the history chants that made up their family's most precious legacy. Other families sang history songs. The Apollonis family chanted, in Latin, the language Ignifer had learned at her mother's knee.

Calypso McGonagall, he'd told her, had been the last Light Lady truly worthy of the name. She had defeated the Dark, in the form of the Eagle Lord, when she had to, but then she had lived in peace, and used her power in the service of those who came to her requesting help. Nothing had changed in years on years except to grow better, as the British Isles flourished in the reign of the Light and all the snakes lost their fangs.

All had gone on this way until Lady McGonagall was one hundred and fifty years old. At that time, there had been one of their ancestors working in her home, a young woman by the name of Praeferox Apollonis. She had been a gardener, and she had taken well to the humble work, since she was a naturally humble person. But she was very curious, and she would follow any sound or investigate any strange happening if she was done with her duties for the day.

She had heard a strange sound one day just as she finished planting a new stand of phoenix flowers, and she had followed it down the garden's winding paths, until she reached the decorated window of her employer's house that looked out on the gardens, a place where she almost never dared venture. Praeferox turned and would have gone away again, but the sound repeated itself. It was a clear song, one perfect note held and sustained. Curiosity made Praeferox step up to Calypso McGonagall's window and press her face against the silver of it, spun to a lightness clearer than glass.

She saw a golden stone on the floor, alight with a shimmering, vibrating flame. It sounded the note one more time as she watched, and then collapsed into stillness. It had words written on it. Praeferox hesitated a long time, thinking of Lady McGonagall's unpredictable experiments, but at last she opened the window and climbed through it, so that she could read the fire-bright letters incised into the rock.

Do not mourn for me, they said. I have gone where you cannot follow.

The letters faded as she watched, and Praeferox blinked as one of the servants burst into the room, saying anxiously that they couldn't find the Lady anywhere, had she seen her?

They searched everywhere, but they never did find Calypso McGonagall. They theorized at last that she must have Transfigured herself into the golden stone, and been unable to undo it. They tried, they brought in experts to try, and they performed rituals on the rock, but of course no other wizard or witch was nearly as powerful as the Lady of Light, and none of them could unwind her invocation.

Praeferox told no one of the letters she had seen, for she was only the gardener, and no one would believe her. But she preserved the story, and passed it on to her daughter and her sons, and since then the Apollonis line had clung to it. It was Praeferox's theory that Calypso McGonagall had indeed gone where no one could follow, assumed herself into the Light as she had sometimes spoken of doing, walked the strange roads that wizards and witches of lesser power could not comprehend, much less see or walk.

Ignifer remembered her younger self going silent in awe, and her father stroking her hair, walking with her along the scalloped paths, the red and golden leaves tumbling down onto their shoulders.

Ignifer was sure the same thing had nearly happened to Harry tonight. It would explain the shattered look in his eyes, the way he kept his face buried in his guardian's shoulder other than that one glance at the Muggle village, the flicker and blaze of radiance beneath his skin.

She did not know if he would have gone to Light or Dark, and she knew it was none of her business. She only felt honored to have witnessed something so near to a fading, and if her father ever lifted the sterility curse on her and she had children of her own, she would tell them the story, as Praeferox had told her children hers.
"Harry?"

Draco wouldn't have voiced the question if he hadn't been startled. He'd noticed that Harry turned his head when someone spoke to him since they'd arrived back at Hogwarts, but did nothing else. And the sight of those shattered eyes, so terribly attentive, made Draco prefer to just hold him and lean his forehead on Harry's shoulder and not meet his gaze.

Yes, that wasn't terribly brave. But bravery was for Gryffindors.

He'd fallen asleep in one of the hospital beds, with Harry in his arms; Madam Pomfrey knew better than to scold them for that, after one look at Harry. He hadn't even felt Harry wake and slip free of him, walking towards one of the open windows in the hospital wing. Then he'd opened his eyes, and seen the small figure standing in front of the windowsill, and spoken without thinking.

But Harry didn't turn towards him. He continued staring out the window. Draco wondered what he was seeing. It couldn't be anything very clear. Even though the clouds had parted, the stars were the only light available tonight, and Harry had left his glasses on the bedside table, beside the faint glow of his own wand, which Draco had retrieved from the graveyard as they left. He hadn't wanted to leave Harry entirely alone in the dark.

Draco wondered what he saw, but not for very long, because then he heard Harry singing.

The song was soft at first, a trembling whisper that probably wouldn't have awakened Draco if he'd managed to stay asleep. Then it built, and acquired the sound of a sob. Draco stirred, thinking he should move from the bed and go to cradle Harry, but his arms wouldn't move more than one inch. They froze as Harry's voice climbed higher and higher, swirling around the towers and walls of Hogwarts like spreading wings, as if he were embracing it from above.

Draco lay there and listened to phoenix song blended with a human voice, and thought he might die of it. The purity of the grief in it touched him to the quick. A wizard would have been choked with tears, a phoenix would have mourned in such a high and unearthly fashion that Draco might have escaped tears of his own, but this dirge was both, humanity mingled with clarity, and it hurt.

The song flurried, beating back at the darkness with small sharp flashes of light; Harry had a fire burning in his palm, casting his face into edged shadows. Draco watched the shadows dancing around him, and saw them grow human forms, robes and arms, swaying and bowing. What they bowed to wasn't visible.

Harry's voice soared, and Draco heard other people crying, or calling out in confused tones, but they fell silent as the song continued. It didn't have words. It didn't need them. It fed the proper visions into students' minds, showing them, the way Harry had said Fawkes showed him, scenes from a life of mountains and meadows and moons. It showed them immortality cut short, and Draco didn't feel ashamed of the tears that soaked his cheeks; he knew that his parents, sleeping elsewhere in the castle, would be crying the same way.

Harry's song turned one more time, and then came diving down, becoming softer, pursuing the path it had climbed. Draco heard no more than a golden corkscrew, at last, and then that faded and went out at the same moment as the fire in Harry's palm did.

He waited a moment more, and found he could move. He climbed slowly out of bed and went over to Harry, tucking his arms around his waist and his chin onto his shoulder.

"Is that the gift Fawkes gave you?" he whispered. "His voice?"

Harry glanced up at him. The green eyes weren't human, for a long moment, reflecting shining, shifting shadows from a moon that wasn't there. Draco saw him somewhere in darkness, in light, lost ten leagues beyond the wide world's end, and shivered. The wild Dark, he thought, had been the greatest threat to Harry tonight, but not in the way they all believed. What if it had tempted Harry to come with it?

Then Harry trembled, and he was human again.

"Yes," he whispered. "His voice, and some of his fire, and—maybe other things that I don't know about yet." He shook his head. "I can't tell you what it was like, Draco, up there, seeing the way the Dark and Light saw, for just a moment, knowing—"

"You don't have to," Draco said, ducking his head and whispering into Harry's hair. "I don't want to know. Honest, Harry, I don't."

After a moment, he felt Harry nod against his neck. "All right, then," he said. "I know it's not over. I know I'm going to have to learn better, so that none of my enemies can ever force me to make a sacrifice like that again." His voice was horribly weary, and made Draco want to cry once more. "But for tonight, I just want to sleep."

Draco nodded, and cast a powerful Dark Arts locking charm on the doors of the hospital wing, though in truth he didn't think they needed it. The students and the professors and their guests for the night might wonder, but they wouldn't intrude on someone who sang like that. He climbed back into the hospital bed, and held out his arms, and Harry climbed into them and leaned against his chest.

Long after his breathing had evened out, Draco remained awake, watching the dancing shadows on the wall from the fire glowing beneath Harry's skin.

Chapter Fifty-Six: Rejoicing

Harry woke with a start. For a moment, he thought he was back in the hospital wing, and that it was the morning after the battle with the Dark, and he flinched, because people had come to see him that morning before he was ready.

Then he remembered that two days had passed. He let his head fall back and breathed deeply. When he closed his eyes, no frightening visions danced on the inside of his eyelids, but only memories of what had really happened.

He'd been excused from classes on Friday, of course; no one was going to force him to go. He'd wandered around the school in strange, fragmentary circles after that morning adventure in the hospital wing—which had resulted in Slytherin losing ninety points because Draco couldn't stop hexing people—and talked to whom he found. There had been a surreal conversation with Acies in a room near the North Tower where she asked him if he believed that things which were lost might come back again. He'd spoken to Vera in a rush of words he could no longer really remember, and didn't want to, since they made him blush in embarrassment. He'd met Remus on the grounds, and they walked in silence, so deep and profound that Harry could have believed he was alone with the snow-covered Forbidden Forest. He'd seen Cho Chang watching him solemnly from a distance; she'd inclined her head and then left him to stand on the shore of the lake, obviously sensing without words that he didn't want to talk just then.

He'd ended up down in the dungeons. He no longer remembered if he'd been trying to find the common room. Perhaps he intended to stand outside the door and listen, since he didn't think he could face large groups of people just then.

But he'd wound up outside Snape's private rooms. Snape had taken one look at him, and opened the door, and let him in. Harry had fallen asleep on the couch and not stirred for hours, which was unusual. He more often woke up at least a few times in a night.

Then, today, Saturday, he'd helped Snape brew potions, speaking and being spoken to only about instructions or what ingredients to substitute when he found out that Snape didn't have any more dried Still-Beetle shells. It had made Harry feel like a pool of deep water slowly closing around a dropped stone. They'd brewed until noon, and then he'd gone to sleep on the couch again.

Judging from the candles around the room and the pit in his stomach, he'd slept until evening, and he was hungry for the first time in two days. He sat up and reached for his glasses, which Snape had taken and put on the table next to the couch.

"Harry?"

He glanced warily to the side, blinking as the world came back into focus. Snape sat in his chair, sipping from a cup of tea and holding open a place in his book. He looked mildly curious, which made the tray in front of him, holding bread thick with butter, pumpkin pasties, some kind of light and fluffy fish, and a cheese sandwich, seem almost a coincidence.

Except not quite, Harry thought, and smiled at him. "I'll be better," he said, and then used a Levitation Charm to move the tray over to him. "I assume you've had dinner already?" He glanced at Snape, who inclined his head.

"Eat your fill."

Harry was more than happy to. The bread and the fish never seemed to end—just when he thought he'd eaten everything, there was one more crumb—but they broke apart so gently that he never felt overwhelmed by the amount. The cheese was of a kind that he couldn't remember having before, so sharp it seemed to score patterns on the roof of his mouth. He ate three of the pumpkin pasties without stopping, aware of Snape's gaze on him, now amused, now evaluative, but demanding nothing.

He was drinking the last of the glass of milk that had come along with the tray when he realized that the pasties were in the shape of Christmas trees. He blinked and glanced up. "It's two days until Christmas," he said.

Snape arched his eyebrows. "One, actually. Today is the twenty-third."

Harry felt the first bubble of worry break through the calm surface of his being. "I don't have gifts for anyone," he said, so quietly that he almost thought Snape wouldn't hear him. But if Snape didn't hear something that passed in his private quarters, Harry had not yet found out what it was.

"I would not worry about that, Harry," he said dryly. "I think saving Britain from the wild Dark is enough of a gift."

Harry shook his head. "That's not what I meant. I don't think myself bound to get gifts for everyone. But I'd like to have them for you, and Draco, and Connor, and the Malfoys." He plucked at the side of the tray, nearly upsetting it.

"Finish your food," said Snape mildly. "Then you can worry about it. But it's not the kind of thing to contemplate on less than a full stomach." He went back to his book.

Harry stared at him for a while. Snape gave no sign that he noticed. Harry warily returned to eating from his tray, though he couldn't help sidelong glances. Why is he being so gentle? Does he really think that I took that many wounds in the clouds?

Well, maybe he had, Harry admitted grudgingly, as he licked pumpkin pasty crumbs from his fingers. The loss of Fawkes was still an ache that he didn't really want to touch; the numbness had worn off now, and it had begun to hurt properly. And he felt as if the Light, cautious though it had tried to be with him, had flayed his mind. He still shrugged his shoulder blades sometimes expecting the weight of wings, and moved his hand in patterns that would have seemed more natural to a gryphon's talon. Even those few moments in another body had molded him to it, rather than the other way around.

And the deaths...

Harry closed his eyes, and shivered, and sat still for a moment. That was the worst part of it. That was the weapon he had to allow never to be wielded against him again. For the sake of sparing lives, he had been willing to give up everything that he was. It had been an untenable choice, between life and freedom. He thought Fawkes had intervened not only to stop the wild Dark, but to prevent Harry from Declaring and the magical creatures from losing their vates. That meant he had to find some way to make sure that that sacrifice was not meaningless.

So what would he do, if it happened again?

Harry swallowed, and stirred pumpkin pasty crumbs around on the tray with a finger. The trouble was, he couldn't say his answer would be any different. If Voldemort lined his allies up in front of him and began killing them one by one, only stopping when he agreed to stay out of the War, wouldn't he have to do it? He owed his allies too much for it to be otherwise.

But it was wrong, too, to say that he would give up fighting for the sake of a few people, when Voldemort would go on to torture and enslave many more people than that. Wasn't it?

For the first time, Harry thought, he was really hanging between the horns of Dumbledore's dilemma, the awful choice he'd made so many times and which Lily had so admired him for. She'd whispered tales of those decisions to Harry as she put him to bed each night. Confront him with a few allies and the whole population of Britain, and Dumbledore would choose the whole population of Britain. He had done it so many times that Voldemort, disgusted, had at last given up using that tactic against him.

The problem was, Harry couldn't see that it was as simple as that. He could foresee having to make a different choice each time, because sometimes, the sacrifice really wouldn't be worth the cost.

So, he thought, as he realized that there were no more pumpkin pasties and there wouldn't be more just because he wanted there to be, the best thing would be to make sure that you can't be forced into making that choice. It's not the decision you fear so much as being forced into making it. You might choose to save the people in front of you not because it's the right thing to do, but because you can't stand seeing them tortured, and others are far away. And that's wrong. Dumbledore could afford not to think about Peter because he was in Azkaban. But he was still doing the wrong thing.

Harry gave a sharp nod of his head. That would be it, then. Rather than try to make one decision now that would guide all his choices in the future, he would do his best to change the circumstances in the future, so that neither Voldemort nor anyone else could force him along a certain path.

"Harry?"

Harry blinked and glanced up. He'd been lost enough in his thoughts that Snape could have addressed him once or twice, and he wouldn't have noticed. His guardian's face reflected no impatience, however. He merely nodded, as if it were good enough that Harry were looking at him now.

"Regulus has decided that he would like to have a small gathering on Christmas Day at Copley-by-the-Sea," he said. "He and Pettigrew will be there, of course, but otherwise only you, Draco, your brother, the elder Malfoys, and I are invited. Will that be acceptable?"

Harry sighed. "That will be more than acceptable," he replied. "I don't think I could join in the Christmas celebrations of the whole school right now."

"Assuredly not," said Snape. "You may stay here tomorrow, or, if you feel up to braving the Great Hall, you can do that." There was the faintest undertone of hope in his voice, like an aftertaste of sorrow. He hopes that I'll stay here, Harry thought.

And he did want to. For the moment, his anger at Snape, though not gone away, was at low tide. Harry had been at peace enough to fall asleep here, something that would happen nowhere else he could think of. Even the Slytherin common room, though people might shut their mouths with Draco around to hex them, would be full of questioning eyes and questions in minds. Harry needed the sensation that no one cared if he talked, that he could do it or not do it, and either would be acceptable.

"I want to stay here," he said quietly.

Snape nodded. "Do you feel up to seeing Draco tomorrow?"

Harry blinked. "You kept him away today?"

"I did," said Snape. "Try as he might, Mr. Malfoy would interrupt your work. He is a brilliant hand at Potions, but he is at the point in his education when he wants to brew complicated ones only. I knew he would not settle for doing the patient, undemanding work you wanted to do today. Nor would he have left you to sleep for so long without trying to squirm onto the couch and sending you both to the floor."

Harry couldn't make out the emotions in Snape's voice—whether Snape was exasperated with Draco, or amused, or just stating that that was the way it was. He tried to reason them out for a moment, and then realized that he didn't need to, and didn't want to. He deserved a few days to relax and not tease out emotions and implications if he wanted. The thinking he'd done about his choices in the future was as much vates work as he wanted to do today.

"I feel up to seeing him tomorrow," he said. "But he's not to spy on me while I make his Christmas gift."

"There's a potion he won't figure out, and won't make the cauldron explode with," Snape replied in the same tone. "I'll set him to working with that."

"Why won't he figure it out?" Harry had to ask. Draco's talent with Potions was natural, rather than learned with long practice, as his had been. It seemed odd that there were any he wouldn't learn to brew with a few hours of trial and error.

"Because," said Snape, "the instructions in the book are wrong."

Harry snickered, and then paused. He was fairly sure that was the first time he'd laughed since he lost Fawkes. He blinked and lay back on the couch, a bit overwhelmed.

"Feel free to rest," said Snape.

As short a time as a month ago, Harry would have been certain that he should be up by now, that the rest he'd taken so far was more than he needed. But either the change in the Room of Requirement, or the losses he'd suffered since then, made him know, now, that he couldn't go out and be the cheerful savior that people would expect him to be yet.

"All right," he said, and closed his eyes. His breathing evened out. He had the easiest slide into darkness he'd ever experienced, and was vaguely surprised about it. He supposed the loss was still too near and too great to make a temporary escape from the world difficult for him.

When he was sure Harry was asleep, Snape put down his book and leaned forward, staring intently into his ward's face.

It did look better, he had to admit, even since this morning. Harry had brewed with single-minded concentration, as if the Boil Cure Potion they were making for Madam Pomfrey were in reality the elixir boiled from the Philosopher's Stone. His face had been tight and hard. Snape would have expected that look from another Potions Master, but no one else.

Then he'd slept, and twitched and muttered in dreams, and woken up looking like someone who'd been through torture, but more human. Snape was beginning to accept that Harry would come back to them, slowly—not exactly the same person he'd been before, but not as lost as he'd feared.

Slow and steady and gentle was the way to work. Merlin knew Harry was quick to pick up on the slightest hint of an expectation, and think he had to work to fulfill it. Give him nothing, let him do what he wanted, and he would relax.

A ward rang silently in Snape's head. He rose, laying down his book on his chair with a little more noise than he would have dared earlier. Harry slept on. Snape could feel himself trying to smile, but he squashed it as he went to his door. That ward had rung twice in the morning and three times in the afternoon. Harry had never noticed when he went to answer it, but then, Harry deserved the luxury of not noticing things right now.

He opened the door to find Draco staring anxiously up to him. "I want to see Harry," Draco said, hardly unexpected words. He'd started out with a tirade that morning, and Snape had shut the door in his face. Each attempt had gradually stripped the pomposity from him. Snape approved of the simplicity, if not the wish.

"You would wake him up," he said.

"I wouldn't," Draco said. "I only want to talk to him."

"Talking to him would involve waking him up." Snape stared directly into Draco's eyes, brushing his thoughts with a bit of Legilimency, and uncovered visions of chattering to Harry, who didn't have to respond, but whom he wanted to listen. Snape nodded. "Leave him alone for now, Mr. Malfoy. He has said that he will see you tomorrow. That is soon enough."

Draco sulked. Snape wondered where he'd picked that up from; Lucius would never have dreamed of doing it, and Narcissa got her way with other expressions. Of course, Lucius's father had never been as indulgent with him as Lucius and Narcissa were with Draco, and Narcissa had grown up knowing she had a mad sister, so perhaps it wasn't surprising that Draco would act more like a spoiled child.

"I just want to talk to him," Draco said, pulling Snape away from thoughts of the past. He found himself grateful to Draco for it. He rarely had luck with thoughts like that. He tended to brood on the cruelty of the Marauders, the reasons he'd joined the Death Eaters, the reason he'd left, and other things it was not good to think.

"I know you do," he said. "And tomorrow is soon enough."

Draco opened his mouth as if he would throw a tantrum, and Snape said, "If you speak much louder, you will certainly wake him up."

Draco shut his mouth, looking chagrined, and nodded. "Tomorrow, then," he said, between lips pursed so tightly that his voice was just a whisper.

Snape nodded back. "You might tell Potter about the Christmas gathering Regulus is planning," he added, as he moved to shut the door. "I am not yet certain he knows."

With Draco on his way to do something useful, and Harry soundly asleep, Snape felt prepared to take up his book again. He was reading about Potions Masters, for once, and the history of the art. Thoughts about his own past were not productive, but thoughts about the past might be. If nothing else, the book could give him ideas on what kind of defensive potions he might teach Harry to brew.

"So how do we get there?" Connor asked, bouncing up and down and rubbing his hands on his trousers.

Harry shifted the bag he carried, making sure the presents he'd prepared didn't click together. "Regulus sent us a Portkey," he said, and then glanced at Snape to make sure that was right. Snape nodded and held up a bit of what looked like tinsel, glancing around at all three boys to make sure they stood close enough to him to grab it.

"What did you get me for Christmas?" Connor asked, reaching out and grasping the tinsel. Harry felt a bit sorry for him. He hadn't seen Harry until this morning, and he seemed to be under the impression that bright chatter was the best way to get past the inevitable awkwardness of the aftermath of the Dark storm. Harry had tried to tell him it was all right, but Connor hadn't understood. Now, Harry decided to play along.

"I'm not telling you," he said, and chanted a non-verbal spell that gave Connor the sensation of being rapped on the wrist, a spell more often used by mothers to stop children from reaching for biscuits. Connor pulled his hand back from the tinsel and gave him a wounded look.

“Please stop being utterly ridiculous, Mr. Potter, and grab the Portkey,” Snape said, with ice in his voice.

“But—“

“Now, Mr. Potter.”

Connor did so, sneaking Harry suspicious glances all the while. Draco took hold of the tinsel from the other side and was unexpectedly diplomatic, at least for Christmas morning, Harry thought. Of course, the other Christmases he’d spent with Draco tended to be atypical in some way. “It’s all right, Connor. He won’t tell me what he got me for Christmas, either.”

“It’s a secret,” said Harry, and then the Portkey grabbed them and whirled them all away, knocking Connor and Draco’s conversation into oblivion.

They landed in a large room Harry hadn’t seen before; the one other time he’d been in Copley-by-the-Sea, Regulus had been far more intent on showing him the hippocampi. It was aboveground, and had a window drilled through the stone, looking out over the sea far below. It must be right on the edge of the cliff, Harry thought, since they stood fairly far back from the window, and he could see the wrinkled gray waters of the ocean even from here.

“Welcome! Happy Christmas!”

Regulus’s hug bore Harry off his feet. He hugged back, and looked over Regulus’s shoulder to see the room decorated with so much tinsel that it entirely erased its cavernous qualities. Artificial Black spiders charmed to glow silver and gold and green and crimson marched up and down the walls between the garlands, now and then mingling with them as if the tinsel were burning. A tree stood in one corner, overflowing with gifts hanging from its branches, as if Regulus had been determined that none of the presents should touch the floor. Harry eyed it with resignation.

"Are you all right?" Regulus asked, setting Harry back on his feet and making him have to shift his grip on the bag of gifts.

"Better," said Harry. "Recovering." Regulus gave him a long glance, as if he really didn't believe him, which made Harry sigh. "I am," he said, catching and holding Regulus's eye. "I promise."

"You don't just recover from something like that," Regulus muttered at him. "But, if you say so." He brightened abruptly and turned to sweep Draco, who was looking smugly at Harry, off his feet. Draco's expression changed at once, but his struggles didn't do him much good as far as winning free went. "And welcome, little cousin!" Regulus exclaimed. "Happy Christmas to you, too!"

Draco looked extremely ruffled when Regulus put him down. Harry linked his left arm with his and pulled him towards the tree. Draco forgot his indignation in exclaiming over its size. "Do you think there are an equal number of gifts for each of us?" he asked, squinting at the upper branches. "I mean, there should be, but you never know if Regulus is going to be that fair. I think he likes you best," he added to Harry, managing to keep a straight face for approximately four seconds.

"Draco. Harry."

Harry turned sharply. He hadn't seen Lucius and Narcissa standing in the corner diagonally opposite from the tree, next to the room's entrance. It was Narcissa who spoke, coming forward to give her hands to her son. She kissed his forehead, then looked at Harry. Harry didn't think he was comfortable enough yet to step forward and let her hug him, though. He simply nodded to her.

Narcissa uttered a little sigh, then turned and faced Connor, who was just escaping his own welcoming embrace by Regulus. "I cannot believe Draco has been Harry's friend for four years, and yet I have never had a formal introduction to you, Connor," she said, stretching out her hand. "I should have arranged one after your parents' trial. It was remiss of me. I am Narcissa Malfoy."

Connor looked abashed as he clasped her hand and kissed the back of it. Harry could see why. Narcissa wore a pale blue gown that floated around her like spiderwebs and made her look more fairy-like than human. Connor mumbled his way through an introduction that seemed to satisfy her. Narcissa smiled at him, and then turned and took Lucius's arm, guiding him over to a divan beside the tree. Harry wasn't surprised to see Lucius watching his brother like a cat.

"Where's Peter?" he asked, since another glance didn't reveal Peter lurking in any of the corners.

"On his way up," said Regulus. "He made a present that was too big to wrap, so he had to leave it downstairs until we were all ready to gather here." He stepped toward the entrance and listened anxiously for a moment, then relaxed. "He's on the way up with it," he announced. "Of course, he's worried about his wandwork, and I don't blame him, so he's carrying it in his arms instead of using a Levitation Charm."

"Shut it, Black," Peter's voice said from below. "I wanted to carry it. I wasn't afraid it would bang into corners if I used a Levitation Charm." He came into view, going backwards and dragging the gift with him so that Harry couldn't see what it was at first. When he finally turned around and shoved it forward, Harry knew it was for him.

It was a carving, made out of some wood—oak, perhaps—that glowed as if it were still part of the tree. Bodies of various magical creatures coiled and writhed as if from the center of a fountain: dragons lying piled on each other, house elves peering warily from corners, great cats prowling with their mouths open in snarls, unicorns balancing Runespoors on the tips of their horns. Harry let his eyes wander over it for a longer period of time than was strictly polite, and still it seemed that there was no end to it. He could look at it for hours and never see all its secrets.

"It's beautiful, Peter," he whispered. "I never knew you carved wood."

"It was an old hobby of mine," said Peter, his voice lacking the pain when he spoke of the past that it'd had in Harry's third year. Harry glanced up to see Peter smiling at him over the dip in a unicorn's shoulder. "I took it up again when I went to the Sanctuary. And since Regulus had plenty of wood lying around, and I have nothing else to do yet..." He shrugged. "I made this. Merry Christmas, Harry."

Harry nodded to him and floated the carving gently over to the side of the chair he already planned on taking. Then his plan was spoiled, because Draco insisted on sitting on a couch together, and Harry had to move the carving again. Peter was already passing out small packages that Harry knew must contain carvings to the others. He heard Connor laughing, and saw him holding up what looked like a lion in the middle of a somersault, chasing its tail. Draco got a complicated sculpture that meshed the old Black and Malfoy crests, with a dragon curled on top of it, fast asleep and scowling. Draco scowled, too, until Harry nudged him, when he roused himself and thanked Peter in a somewhat stiff voice.

Harry already knew that Snape had got everyone books of one kind or another, plucked from his own library; he'd tried not to peek, but working on his own gifts in close quarters with Snape made it hard. He smiled at Snape over his own book on the history of medical magic, and then angled himself to one side. He already knew which Potions book Draco would have.

Draco unwrapped it eagerly, then frowned at the slip of parchment fastened with a Sticking Charm to the front of the book: Look at page 65. Slowly, Draco opened the book, and studied the recipe. A moment later, he was looking up in outrage. Harry knew page 65 contained the proper instructions for the potion Draco had tried and spectacularly failed to brew yesterday.

"Professor Snape," Draco said.

"Yes, Mr. Malfoy?" Snape, who had taken the chair Harry had originally intended to sit on, scowled at him.

Draco took a deep breath, then obviously realized that, to scold Snape for what he'd done, he would have to reveal his own mistake to his parents, his cousin, his cousin's friend, and Harry's brother. He sat back with a little mutter instead, which Harry translated as, "Thank you for the book."

Harry took pity on Draco—and distracted himself from his own snickering—by fetching Draco’s gift from his bag. He’d chosen a box that Snape had said once contained Still-Beetle shells to wrap it in. Draco gave him a wary look and opened it slowly.

A moment later, he gasped and held up the bracelet inside. “Harry, it’s beautiful,” he murmured. “What is it?”

“I don’t know for certain,” Harry admitted. He’d concentrated on what he wanted and spun magic out of himself, an effort that left him exhausted for an hour afterwards. What had resulted was a band of, seemingly, metal that looped back on itself like a unicorn’s horn, and was not so much golden as the color of candlelight. “Call it magic.”

Draco slipped the bracelet around his wrist, and looked startled when it shook and tightened itself to a perfect fit. “What does it do?” he breathed.

“Who said it did anything?” Harry leaned back, grinning, the first genuine smile he’d been able to give since Fawkes.

“Harry.”

Harry relented. “All right. If you touch it with your left hand and speak my name—and you have to be touching it, mind, or it would be working every time you spoke to me—then it’ll tell you my current state of health, if I’m wounded or sick or whole.” Draco’s eyes widened as if they were going to fall out of his head. “If you curve back your right hand and touch it, and wish greatly for it, you’ll get pulled to my side, wherever I am. It’s like a Portkey focused on me. Powerful wards will be able to keep you out, but not much else.”

Draco shook his head in wonder. “I— isn’t that a bit intrusive, Harry?”

“Not if I want it,” said Harry, and locked his eyes on Draco. “And I want you to be able to do this. I do.”

Draco leaned forward, staring into his eyes. Harry flushed, wondering if Draco was about to kiss him here, but Draco only stared as if he were memorizing every inch of Harry's face, and then nodded. He didn't need to say thank you. It was written in every line of his cheeks and jaw.

Harry turned quietly away to present the rest of his gifts: a cauldron enchanted with automatic self-cleaning charms and spells to prevent ingredients from sticking to the sides for Connor; a stirring rod bent into abstract shapes and figure-eight designs for Peter; a box filled with trick sweets for Regulus, which he'd arranged with the Weasley twins by owl to send him; and another stirring rod bent into a case to hold his wand for Lucius. Lucius eyed him for a moment, then bowed. Harry nodded back and looked away. He wasn't in the mood to try to figure out Lucius's games right now, and if his entirely blank face was a good thing or not.

His gifts for Narcissa and Snape were more personal, and Narcissa's was formed of pure magic the way Draco's bracelet had been. Her face softened as she held up a mirror that showed shifting visions of light—moonlight, starlight, sunlight—like the mirror she had given Harry last year that showed different visions of fire. "Thank you, Harry," she said quietly. "I have always delighted in watching changing patterns."

Harry smiled back at her, but looked away when the smile threatened to become too inquisitive, towards Snape.

Snape was unfolding a small scroll of parchment with a puzzled expression. Harry stifled a laugh; Snape had actually seen him working on that yesterday, but assumed it was an essay for Defense Against the Dark Arts, because Harry had told him it was. He really should have noticed my hand shaking when I wrote, Harry thought.

Then those thoughts melted away in nervousness as Snape actually began to read the damn thing. His face sharpened and grew paler. He looked at Harry once, then rose and strode out of the room.

Harry stood and went after him. Draco was the only one close enough to try to stop him, and whether because he had seen Snape's expression, or because he was occupied in exclaiming over his mother's present for him, a coin that was one of the Black treasures, he didn't hold Harry back.

"Sir?" Harry asked as he moved through the door, unwilling to startle Snape, just in case he was too deep in thought to notice him coming.

Snape turned and stared at him. His face was still pale, but Harry thought he understood why the man had left the other room now. He was afraid that he would express too much emotion in front of Regulus or Peter—probably Peter, Harry thought, and the Malfoys. He thought Snape considered Regulus a close enough friend that he wouldn't mind him witnessing this.

Then Snape said, "You—you mean this," and Harry realized that he was shaking.

Perhaps he wouldn't want Regulus to see this, after all. Harry moved forward and stood staring at his guardian. "Yes," he said. "I did."

"You didn't need to," said Snape quietly. "There was no need to force yourself into discomfort just to make me a Christmas gift, Harry."

"I wanted to," Harry repeated. "Just what I told Draco. It might have made me a little uncomfortable, but I wanted to."

Snape looked aside from him.

"I needed reminders that I was alive, after—after Midwinter," said Harry. "And that I had commitments to people who were still here. I think I've done enough thinking about the past and the dead in these last two months."

Snape nodded shortly. The scroll dangled limply from his hand. Harry glanced at it once, then away. He knew what it said as well as Snape probably did. The words had burned into his memory as if they were etched with acid even as he wrote them.

I am trying my best to forgive you. It's hard, and it will take a longer time than this, but I do want to forgive you. I don't want anyone else for a guardian. I understand why you did what you did, so that I could have a future. We'll probably always disagree as to the method, but I know now that something like this was necessary. Merry Christmas, sir. Love, Harry.

Harry hesitantly moved forward and embraced Snape. Snape didn't seem to notice for a moment, and then he hugged Harry back, with an abrupt, desperate fierceness. Even then, Harry noticed, he was careful not to let the scroll crumple between them.

"Merry Christmas, sir," Harry repeated aloud.

Snape said nothing. Harry didn't think he needed to. By the time they returned to the Slytherin common room—encouragingly empty, as almost all the students had gone home, and those who hadn't were currently attending the Christmas Feast in the Great Hall—Harry was almost in an agony of impatience. Draco had claimed that he'd forgotten his Christmas gift for Harry at Hogwarts. He'd also refused to even hint at what it was. Harry didn't believe for one second that he'd really forgotten it. More likely, he didn't want to give it to Harry in front of other people.

But now Snape had brought them back—with all the gifts that Regulus and everyone else had insisted on giving Harry safely shrunk and placed in his robe pockets—and Connor had pounded up to Gryffindor Tower to share his story with the four younger Weasley siblings, who'd all stayed at Hogwarts for Christmas. They were away from Lucius's gaze, which had frosted over several times during the day, always locked on Draco when it did. They were away from Narcissa's too-knowing smiles, and Regulus's supposedly sly sneaking out of the room, which always resulted in him coming back with one more "forgotten" gift for Harry. They were away from Peter's incredibly quick carving of a scowling Draco, which he'd made when Draco accused him of not being able to carve and actually stealing his gifts from somewhere.

Now Draco could show whatever it was that he'd been afraid to show when they were in public.

Draco had gone to his bed, and stood there fussing with the sheets, his back to Harry. Harry studied him for a moment, then went to his trunk and began putting his shrunken gifts away with more than usual fanfare. That should tell Draco he was willing to wait.

He was trying to figure out the proper place for the dagger Narcissa had given him when Draco tapped his shoulder. Harry turned and looked up at him, to find Draco actually biting his lip. It wasn't something he did often, probably because he had the twin disapproving gazes of his parents fastened on him for far smaller offenses.

"Here," he said awkwardly, and pushed a silver frame at him. Harry dropped the dagger on top of the rest of the items in the trunk and caught the frame with his hand, cradling it before it could fall.

The frame was tastefully plain, except for the Malfoy crest discreetly tucked in one corner. Harry skimmed his fingers along it, not yet looking at the center. The frame held a piece of parchment scribed with words, and he could tell that looking at them would make things close. "Someone planned for Christmas," he said lightly. The frame must have come by owl.

"Some of us didn't have to worry about the fate of the world for the last month," said Draco softly, lightly and yet not lightly at all.

He isn't going to let me joke about this, Harry realized. He swallowed, and sat on his bed, aware of Draco's gaze as he hadn't been aware of any of the looks they got at Copley-by-the-Sea. He started reading the words written on the piece of parchment inside the frame.

I love you, Harry, because you have the deepest soul I've ever known.

I love you, Harry, because you make me want to be closer to you in every way possible.

I love you, Harry, because of the fact that you survive everything the Light and the Dark and Voldemort and Dumbledore throw at you, and you don't just survive after it, you live.

I love you, Harry, because you were able to overcome prejudices you were raised with to consider me a friend and then as a lover, and yourself a Slytherin when you resisted it at first.

I love you, Harry, because of the fact that you honestly can't see why people wouldn't care about the fates of unicorns and centaurs and Runespoors and Augurey chicks.

I love you, Harry, because of the fact that you argue with your snake at the breakfast table about whether he can have more sausages.

I love you, Harry, because you're fierce.

I love you, Harry, because of the fact that you could so easily leave me behind, and the way that you try not to.

I love you, Harry, because you value healing and forgiveness more than killing and revenge.

I love you, Harry, because of the way you kiss.

I love you, Harry, because I don't think I know the slightest shadow of the splendor we'll be in five or ten years' time.

I love you, Harry.

Harry looked up. He knew that he was crying, but his sight seemed utterly clear. Perhaps he was seeing Draco in between the tears. "How did you know how much I needed to hear this?" he whispered.

Draco blinked. "It's perfectly obvious that you don't really get it, Harry, and I really wanted to do it. I—"

Harry lunged at him—that was the only word he could use to describe it afterward—dropping the frame on the bed and wrapping his arms around him. Draco gave an undignified noise like whumph, but that only lasted until Harry lifted his head and kissed him.

This was deeper than the kiss they'd shared in the hallway after the trial. Harry poured gratitude into it, and gladness, and sorrow, and as much as he could of the love that reading that list had made him feel. He'd always tried to use words and magic to express his feelings, but that didn't mean he couldn't use gestures, too.

Draco regained his balance with a jolt, and kissed him eagerly back. Harry sighed as pleasure struck him, but it wasn't cloudy this time; it was sharp and as brilliant as if he were flying straight into the sun. He pressed himself closer, and moved his hand, which was gripping Draco's back, up until he had hold of Draco's hair, and was tugging at it, not gently.

Draco fell. Luckily, he landed on his bed, and Harry was able to shift his face so that his glasses didn't dig into Draco's cheek and hurt him. Draco blinked a moment, then resumed the kiss. Harry rolled off to the side and stretched out, feeling like a cat must feel when it sunbathed.

Draco drew away at last, and stared at Harry. Harry lifted his head and looked straight back.

"Merlin, you look good," said Draco. "I've messed your hair all up—yes, you can tell—and your mouth looks like you've been chewing a peach without caring where the juice goes." He looked smugly pleased with himself.

"I can see why you didn't want to do this in front of your parents," Harry murmured. It was the only thing he could say. He shifted restlessly, wanting to kiss Draco again.

Draco's expression altered into one of horror. "Harry, I don't want my mother knowing we snog."

"I'm fairly sure she's guessed," Harry pointed out, and wriggled closer. He felt absurdly happy. He wanted to run around the room and shoot balloons out of his wand. He wanted to jump up and down in place until people came back from the Christmas Feast and wondered what all the banging was. He wanted to laugh until he was sick. He wanted to touch Draco.

That last want, at least, he could gratify, and he reached out and put his hand firmly on Draco's chest, feeling his heartbeat. Draco sucked in a breath, and it was Harry's turn to grin smugly.

He kissed Draco one more time, lightly, then lay down beside him and started telling Draco all the reasons he loved him, laughter and tears and survival and brattiness and all. Draco closed his eyes, hummed contentedly in the right places, and suggested new reasons, mostly involving the words "perfect" and "wonderful," whenever Harry paused to think about his wording.

Harry didn't know when he fell asleep. He only knew that, for the first time in four days, he was looking forward to waking up more than he was to spending time unconscious.

Chapter Fifty-Seven: Resolutions

“Harry? Harry, are you all right?”

I can already see, Harry thought, as he sat up in bed and wiped at his forehead, where his scar ached from a dream for the first time in a month, that that’s a question I’ll get asked a lot in the life we share together.

“I’m all right, Draco,” he said, blinking as Draco yanked the curtains of his bed back and the light of a Lumos charm burned into his unprepared eyes. “Come on, crawl in before we wake Blaise up.”

“Blaise is already up,” said a cranky voice from the other end of the room. Blaise had stayed over the Christmas holiday, since his mother thought the wards of Hogwarts would protect him better than the wards on her own home, Wyvern’s Nest, which had already been broken into once. “You might as well talk loudly about whatever melodramatic plan you have going this time. I’m going to go to the library and sweet-talk Madam Pince into letting me in.” He climbed out of bed and padded towards the loo.

“Madam Pince won’t be in the library!” Draco yelled after him. “It’s New Year’s Eve!” The door of the loo shut without Blaise giving a response. Draco shrugged and looked at Harry. “Do you think she’ll be in the library?” he asked, as he climbed into bed and pulled Harry’s curtains shut.

“Yes, she will.” Harry sat up. “Now, how did you know I was having a dream?”

“That connection we share from you letting me practice possession on you, I think,” Draco said, leaning forward. His face assumed a pensive expression. “I didn’t actually experience it, the way I did that time you leaped into V-Voldemort’s mind.” He gave Harry a stern look. Harry stuck his tongue out at him. Draco frowned and went on. “But I knew you were dreaming—and that’s a strange feeling to have in the middle of my own dreams, let me tell you. And then I woke up, and I could hear you making those little sounds you make when your scar hurts.”

Harry decided not to ask, just in case the answer embarrassed him further. "I did have a dream," he whispered. "But it wasn't like either the visions I have of Voldemort when I'm spying on him, or those misty dreams he sent me when he was trying to make me do something. This was more like I was sharing his head while he dreamed. And the image makes no sense. I mean, it doesn't seem like it's anything particularly powerful or threatening."

Draco nodded. "What was it, then?"

"Just a hallway," said Harry. "A hallway that ended in a dark door. I wanted to open the door, but when I touched it, nothing happened. I could feel frustration and rage, but I don't think they were mine. I think Voldemort dreams about opening that door, and knows he can't." He looped his arms around his knees. "Why would that image, of all of them, cross over the barrier between us?"

"Are you sure you didn't let the barrier down, Harry? Or have a hole tear in it somehow?"

Closing his eyes, Harry felt for the grass that barricaded the Occlumency link, and had to shake his head at last. "I can't feel any holes. Of course, if Voldemort opened a tunnel, would I know?"

"Go talk to Snape tomorrow," Draco urged him, one hand finding his elbow. "Or—well, in a few hours, really. He has to know about this."

Harry nodded. Then he yawned. "I am still tired," he said. "If I'm going to the Isle of Man to visit with the Opallines for their New Year's celebration, then I should probably rest some more."

"Of course," Draco agreed. Then his face changed. "What?"

Harry, about to lie down again, found himself yanked up to face a scowling Draco. "You never told me that," Draco insisted.

"I did, too," said Harry. "I must have. I wouldn't forget to mention it, and I've known for a month. You just weren't paying attention." He pulled away from Draco and burrowed under the sheets.

Draco spluttered above him for a moment, then said, "Yes, I was. I always pay attention to you. Nothing you say escapes me."

Harry snorted.

"It doesn't," Draco protested. "And anyway, that's not the point. The point is that you're not going to the Isle of Man, not by yourself. I'm sure that Snape is going to want to come along, and I certainly do!"

Damn. Trying to get him involved in a different argument didn't work. Harry pulled his sheets off his head and scowled at Draco. "Paton didn't invite you, though," he said, knowing he was being childish. It had taken more than a week, but he was finally feeling that shying sensation inside himself whenever Draco or Snape came near, that indication that he'd spent too much time with them now and they would start seeing too much. He knew he couldn't ask to be perfectly alone, but being among the Opallines would at least provide him with strangers for a night who didn't know him as well, and would miss any subtle signals he gave.

"I'm sure he would say it was all right," said Draco firmly. "He doesn't strike me as an impolite man, or an ally who would think it was proper for you to go anywhere without guards."

"Draaaco," said Harry, and now he knew he was being childish, and that meant he'd lost.

Draco patted his back. "Go to sleep. I think you need rest." He snickered. "Then talk to Snape in the morning, and talk to Paton with that communication spell. He'll make room for two more guests, and he'll do it a lot more graciously than you think he will. The Old Blood was famous for its courtesy, Harry, at least in days where there were more of those families."

Harry sighed and closed his eyes. Draco bent down and brushed a light kiss over his cheek, then went back to his own bed. Harry heard him shut his curtains, and his breathing resumed a soft, regular rhythm in moments. Draco could always fall asleep easily, unless he was worrying about something; Narcissa had confessed to Harry already that Draco had slept through the night when he was three months old.

Only then did Harry stretch out and frown reluctantly at the ceiling of his four-poster.

He knew that he would have to find some way to sever the mental connection he and Draco had. For one thing, if Voldemort did launch an attack that could get through the grass barrier—and since he was the best Legilimens Harry had ever met, that was possible—then Draco could get caught up in it. Harry was sick of having other people suffer for his sake. That connection had to go.

For another, Harry knew he would have to reopen the Occlumency link. Without it, he was blind to what Voldemort was doing. He was sure that he would have been able to figure out part of the plans for the graveyard ambush if he'd been listening to Voldemort's thoughts. He was given to gloating. And Harry might have seen a demonstration of Yaxley's plans, too, and come up with some idea how to counter them.

How are you going to counter them?

Well, there were a few people he could speak to about that. In the meantime, he needed that dream connection. Even figuring out why Voldemort had the dream about the corridor might help him in the end. He'd keep their connection shut until he learned some way to separate Draco from it permanently, and then he'd part the grass and go in as quietly as he could, to see what could be seen.

"Neville? Can I talk to you?"

Neville turned around, a look of plain surprise on his face. Harry wondered if he was surprised at being talked to or surprised that Harry had wanted to talk to him. But, after a moment, he nodded. "Sure, Harry," he said, and then cast around vaguely until he apparently decided that sitting in the corridor was the best they could do. He sat down, and Harry sank down the wall to sit beside him.

Harry decided to come straight to the point. "Neville," he said, "I have an enemy who fights with plants—vines that can bind wandless magic, and grass that can twine around people and hold them prisoner, and thorns that were holding a man by being embedded in his skin, and slowly eating him alive." Neville's face had rearranged itself into an expression of fascinated horror. Harry nodded to him. "I know. Do you know what those things are? Do you know how to counter them?"

Neville frowned and rubbed his wrist. "They all sound bred, Harry," he said at last. "Crossed from other plants. I don't know anything like that that occurs in the wild."

Harry sighed. "That's what I thought. Would you be able to figure out counters to them?"

"M-me?" Neville dropped his Defense Against the Dark Arts book in surprise. "You want m-me to help you, Harry?"

"Of course. You're the best at Herbology in the whole school, except maybe Professor Sprout herself, and I don't know her that well." Harry leaned forward. "And Ron told me about you contributing your Light magic to the stream to help me, Neville. I'm not going to be fooled again, you know."

"Fooled?" Neville blinked at him.

"I'm never going to think that you're clumsy and bumbling and a coward again," said Harry softly. Neville blinked some more. "Too many people dismiss you as just that. But I know that you have courage, or you wouldn't have gone into Gryffindor. And now you've demonstrated courage. I'm afraid I'm going to insist on seeing you as brave now. Sorry, but the spell's broken."

Neville lowered his head, a flush of pleasure on his cheeks. "That's all right, Harry," he said. "And I think I might be able to help. Can you describe exactly what the vines and the grass and the thorns look like? If I can figure out what species they were bred from, then I can see about breeding crosses of those species' predators or competitors."

Harry had to admit that wouldn't have occurred to him. He began to describe the plants in as much detail as he could remember them, deliberately crowding back the emotions that threatened to overwhelm him. They could shove off. He didn't want to brood on them, so he wouldn't. And if what he had experienced could be useful to the war effort in any way, then he had no excuse for ignoring it.

Neville asked several questions that Harry didn't know the answers to, like what kind of soil the graveyard had, but overall seemed satisfied with what he told him. He smiled at Harry and then stood and wandered down the hallway, muttering about where he was going to find trumpet-heart seeds at this time of year.

Harry grinned, watching him, and then stood and went to cast the communication spell and speak with Hawthorn. Her estate was called the Garden, and she had created the hawthorn plant that he could use to call out to her. She had some skill with plants, though he didn't think it matched Yaxley's.

Harry waited in patient silence as Snape stepped delicately around inside his head, examining the grass barrier that shut off the Occlumency link from several angles. At last, his guardian's presence slipped out of his mind, and he opened his eyes to find Snape shaking his head.

"There appears to be no hole whatsoever," he said. "Describe the dream again."

Harry did, but it had been misty and fragmented even when he first dreamed it, not holding the unnatural clarity of one of the visions, and he couldn't add any useful details. No, he hadn't noticed any unusual patterns in the stone, but that didn't mean there hadn't been; he might just not have observed them. No, there didn't seem to be curses or wards on the door, but Voldemort hadn't cared about that. No, he still couldn't open the door, but how did Snape know that was the result of a curse or ward, and not something inherent in the place itself?

At last, Snape pinched the bridge of his nose and exhaled in frustration. "I can only tell you to keep the barrier up, Harry, and detach the connection with Draco if you can. That is dangerous."

Harry nodded. "That's what I thought. I'll do what I can, sir, but Draco won't like it."

Snape snorted. "Mr. Malfoy does not like many things, and the majority of them are good for him." He paused and studied Harry critically. "Sometimes he is right, however. He came down here this morning to tell me that you had received a New Year's invitation you didn't see fit to warn us about. Why?"

Harry lowered his head, flushing uncomfortably. "I—sir, please don't take this the wrong way, but I'm starting to be too conscious of what you see when you look at me," he said quietly. "I've spent days in your company, longer than I usually go, and when I'm not with you, I'm with Draco. I want some time alone, or with people who don't know me as well."

Snape was silent for a long moment. "And have you told Draco this?" he asked finally.

Harry shook his head. "I tried to convince him at first that I'd told him about the invitation, and he just hadn't paid attention. He didn't buy that, of course. And now he's set on going with me, and I don't know what to do." He felt a rush of relief that he could talk with Snape about this, even as Snape studied him and his discomfort increased. He wondered if he'd ever be able to spend endless amounts of time in the presence of other people and never long for solitude. Connor seemed to manage it just fine.

"I will talk with him."

Harry could feel his mouth drop open. "You would?"

Snape nodded. "You must not ever be afraid to ask me for something like that, Harry," he said, catching Harry's eye. "I would brave far worse than a Malfoy temper tantrum for you."

His ears heating, Harry nodded. He knew that, he did, but he couldn't seem to hold it in his head all the time. He still preferred to do things by himself. Unless it was a problem he knew he absolutely couldn't handle, like Yaxley's plants, then seeking out help was always a distant, second option.

"Thank you, sir," he murmured.

"You are welcome." Snape stood and gently ushered him towards the door. "Now, you said that you had other things to do today?"

"Other things I should do today." Harry cast several warming charms on himself, and then touched his neck. Yes, the Many snake was there, curled closely into his warm skin. "It's New Year's Eve, the last day of the year, and that's a time for making vows."

"Make sure you can keep them," said Snape, his hand straying to his left arm for a moment.

Harry smiled at him. "I'll make sure I can."

The trees of the Forbidden Forest seemed to have seriously embraced the idea that it was winter, now. Harry saw some of them encased entirely in ice, their twigs puffing into fairy flowers of white and gold. Others rose bare and high against the diamond-bright, diamond-colored air, arms lifted as if to catch and hold the clouds. The ground beneath his feet squeaked as he stepped on frozen leaves and mud, and shattered in splashes as he broke small patches of ice.

He was aware of the centaurs tracking him the moment he entered the Forest, of course. No longer inclined to attack intruders the moment they saw them, they were still proud and wary. Hooves splashed and broke the ice in larger noises and patches than his feet could, and when Harry turned his head, he could sometimes see a black or palomino tail weaving in and out between the branches. Soon the centaurs showed themselves, trotting easily beside him: a bay Harry didn't know, and Firenze. He inclined his head to the latter, who nodded back.

"Have you come to visit us, Harry Potter?" he asked.

Harry didn't bother correcting Firenze on his last name. It wasn't something that would matter to the centaurs. "Yes," he said. "You, and the Many if they're awake at this season, and anyone else who will meet me. I want to renew my vows to them, to reassure them that I'm still vates and will be unless something kills me or I fall from the path."

"Even if you die, you are still vates," said Firenze. "We would hold the memory of you sacred." He nodded to the bay, who began to gallop ahead, his footing light on the treacherous ground and not all that cautious. Firenze went on, forcing Harry to turn and look at him instead of waiting for the other centaur to break his neck. "We have heard that you tried to convince the half-giant to travel and speak to his kin, and that you were unsuccessful."

Harry grimaced. "Yes." Hagrid had, after long thought, told Harry that he really couldn't do it. There had been tears in his eyes as he explained that he couldn't use his connection with his mother that way, to serve some political purpose. Harry had been disappointed, but had understood.

"I will offer to go," said Firenze.

Harry blinked. "I wasn't aware that centaurs and giants shared any kind of connection," he said.

"Not centaurs in general," said Firenze patiently. "My mentor went once to giant country, and preserved the maps, and showed me the way. He was more curious than the majority of us, more willing to venture into strange paths with only the stars to light him on his journey. I once meant to take the trip, but of course the web prevented me. The web told the wizards that he had left the Forest, and they caught him a few years later and killed him for being 'a danger to wizardkind.'"

Harry winced. "I'm sorry. You have little reason to love us."

“You are not most wizards,” said Firenze. “And the stars have told me it is time. The Lady is rising, and the Leaf is in bloom.” Harry tried to nod as if he understood what the centaur was talking about. Astronomy had always been one of his worse subjects, since he devoted so much of his time to understanding other things. “I will pursue this path. You have only to tell me what you offer the giants, and I will explain it to them. It will take a long time, but my mentor taught me some of their language.”

“The same thing I offer any species,” said Harry. “Freedom from their web, as soon as it can be negotiated.”

Firenze bowed solemnly from the waist. “It shall be done, vates.”

Harry looked away, uneasy with the courtesy—it would have been all right if it just weren’t a bow, implying that he was higher than others—and then realized they were coming up on the clearing where he had met with several species before. A small gathering of centaurs stood there now, shifting their haunches and shivering to keep warm, and a writhing tangle of the Many coiled on several of their backs, to keep their scales out of the snow.

What really caught Harry’s attention, though, was the creature standing on the other side of the clearing. He stopped and stared. He thought it was a dryad at first, though he hadn’t been aware that any of them lived in the Forbidden Forest. It was slender, pale green of skin like new leaves, and it had many arms, most of which started out as skin, corkscrewed into bark, and ended up in delicate bunches of twigs and brilliant leaves. Harry thought it had two legs, but he couldn’t be sure; perhaps those were more of its branches. It moved forward lightly enough, and then the branches swayed enough to let him see the face.

Harry stared again. The face was like the memory of his fragmented dream that morning; it had been real at some point long ago and far away. It slanted from right to left, a diagonal face, with ears so sharp they looked like knife-blades and enormous green eyes that dominated it. Harry looked hastily away from those eyes. He had seen sparks of silver begin in them, as if they were deep pools, and he knew instinctively that he could fall into them and never come out.

“Who are you?” he whispered. “The spirit of the Forest?”

A gentle voice, filled with the music of roots, answered him. “You knew me once, Harry vates.”

Harry turned back, careful to keep his gaze not directly on those green eyes. He had a suspicion now, but this was so—strange.

“Dobby?” he said at last.

The figure inclined itself, like a tree bowing before the wind, and said, “Yes. I have changed, Harry, have I not?” He—Harry supposed he was still a he, and not an it—stroked his skin with two twig-like fingers.

“The last time I saw you, you were an elf,” said Harry. “You looked more like one of the Sidhe than a house elf, but still...I don’t know. Is this more like the form your people once had?” He nodded at the curling branches and the roots that snaked shyly across the frozen ground. He found it hard to think of it as human, or elven, or anything but strange.

“No,” said Dobby. “We had no fixed form, Harry. I am remembering now. We changed from century to century, or we changed as we pleased. We would inhabit one form and learn it completely, then become another. This is the form I have chosen at the moment.” His smile, when Harry glanced cautiously back at his face, was delirious with pleasure. “The other was pleasant, but not what I wanted to learn.”

Harry nodded slowly, swallowing back his anger; the wizards who enslaved house elves had compounded their sin, then, not just tying up their magic and making them glad to serve, but binding them to one form. “And you have come to meet me now?”

Dobby looked up abruptly, and those green eyes nearly drowned Harry. “Yes,” he said, as if recalled from his delight to his purpose. “Yes, I did. I would like your word that you still do mean to free house elves, Harry. Forgive me, but you have freed none of them since me, and you have made many allies who hold house elves. It will not be easy to persuade them to give up their possessions.” A noise like wind blowing through leaves twisted those last words. “Can you do this? Or is your commitment to human political alliances greater than your commitment to us?”

Harry felt a solid weight settle into the middle of his stomach. He had been right to come out here, after all. The last day of the year was a good one for renewing vows, or taking them.

“I am vates first and foremost,” he said quietly. “It is the only path I have truly chosen to walk. My parents, and Voldemort through their machinations, inflicted me with my scar and my magic, and my training made me into my brother’s guardian. I would have been an ordinary wizard without that, and happier for it. But I have the magic now, and that makes the vates path possible. I will walk it.”

He opened his hand, wanting some way to mark the occasion, but not wanting to use blood. He started when fire abruptly burned in the center of his palm. He recognized the brightness of it, and the sweet, mind-stirring scent that poured from it. It was phoenix fire, one of the gifts Fawkes seemed to have granted him with his sacrificial death. Harry hadn’t chosen that, either, but phoenix fire was the perfect way to mark this occasion.

He looked up at Dobby, or the creature that had once been Dobby, while the flame in the center of his palm hissed and spat and cast sparks into the snow like fireworks. “I swear to you,” he said, “by this fire, that I am vates first and foremost, and for however long it takes, I will free the house elves of their web, along with all those other species who wish to be free.”

The fire shot up into the air, abruptly, spreading bright red wings. For a moment, Harry caught a glimpse of Fawkes hovering there, and blinked back tears. Then the fire dived down into the snow, melting it and creating a burned patch on the Forest floor. Harry felt part of his magic flowing into the scar, linking him firmly to his promise.

“That will do,” said Dobby, his voice soft. “I see now why Fawkes died for you. Live well and peaceably and powerfully, vates.” He uncoiled, and his branches lifted, and his eyes grew greener until he was nothing but a patch of green and silver, and then he was gone.

Harry, breathing deeply, turned to the centaurs and the Many. "My commitment to you is renewed, as well," he said, first in English and then repeating himself in Parseltongue. "It always will be. I know that you are free of your webs, now, but that all communities of your kind are not. They will be, someday."

"We are willing to wait," said Firenze, mildly. "We owe you a debt we cannot repay, Harry Potter vates, and we are more patient than humans understand. And we remind you, as well, of our side of the bargain. We will come forth to war when you need us."

Harry nodded. "A storm of Light will be coming to Hogwarts on Midsummer day, or a prophecy lies," he said quietly. "I will probably ask for your help then."

"And you shall have it."

"And you shall have our help," hissed the Many, their voices ebbing and blending in his ears as they always did. "We can help you as no others may. Our daughter is small enough to be carried about you, in your clothing, in your pockets, and no one will notice. And what she sees, we will see, and what she does, we will note. You need not wear her about your neck. Keep her secret, and safe."

Harry nodded. "And is there nothing else I can do for you?"

"Nothing yet. Another hive will not be hatched until next year. Then, we will need you to break the web that will try to reestablish itself."

Harry bowed a bit, grateful that the magical creatures were so much more straightforward than his human allies. Half of them would try to bargain with him in more complicated terms, and half wouldn't reveal what they wanted at all. It didn't occur to the Many to lie, though, much less arrange some dance where Harry didn't know the steps. "Thank you."

He spoke with the centaurs and the Many for a short time more, arranging the details of Firenze's visit to the giants and when exactly the Many's children would hatch, and then headed back towards the castle. He did pause on the edge of the Forbidden Forest to tuck the Many snake into his pocket. He felt quietly pleased with how his visit had gone. Snape had trusted him to go into the Forest without guards, probably knowing that nothing lived there that would hurt him, and he had managed just fine.

When he looked up, he saw a unicorn running across the grounds.

Harry caught his breath. The unicorn was little more than a streak of white, marked out by deep, dusky purple lights on his horn and hooves. Otherwise, he looked like a spirit of the snow given intelligence and substance, and he ran as if it were the morning of the world and he had never known imprisonment.

A moment, and he was gone, fading as he neared the lake, but Harry was left shivering with an awe deeper than the contentment had been. He supposed it wasn't his fate to be at peace for long.

Ah, well. This is more interesting.

"Ready, Harry?" Paton's face grinned at him through the fire. "Then come through!"

Harry tossed a handful of Floo powder into the flames, calling out, "The Welcoming Room!" He spun around several times, then got spat out into a shadowy place he'd only seen behind Paton's head as they spoke a few minutes earlier. He felt his arm clasped and tugged, as Paton both balanced him and shook his hand. He turned and looked at his ally, and wound up catching his breath.

Paton wore his tattoos without a glamour here, making his face into a mask of lines at once beautiful and strange. His dark blue robes revealed more tattoos, links that marked members of the Opalline family, soaring and spiraling around his body. Harry wondered who drew the tattoos. Was it a common pattern copied from an earlier artist? Did the magic just know instinctively how to make them? What happened when a new Opalline child was born?

“Welcome, Harry,” said Paton, and bowed to him. His white-blond hair, still cropped from Fergus’s death, was growing out again, and coiled neatly into a braid that he’d attached to a silver ring of the chain collar around his throat. “I cannot wait for you to meet the rest of my family. This is only the Welcoming Room,” he added, waving one hand at the stone room they stood in. The decorations on the walls mimicked the spreading whorls of his tattoos. “We have some space to walk before we come to the rest of Gollrish Y Thie.” He smiled at Harry, and opened the door on the other side of the small, box-like room.

No, Harry corrected himself, the small, box-like house. The Welcoming Room really was completely detached from the rest of the home the Opallines lived in. He took a few careful steps out the door, and froze.

“Beautiful, isn’t it?” said Paton at his shoulder, with a self-satisfaction that Harry had to grant was justified. “Welcome to Snaefell.”

They stood on the upper edge of a long stone staircase, carved so neatly into the rock that it would be invisible from below, Harry thought. Of course, there was probably magic helping it along. All the steps bore a dip in the middle—worn by generations of feet walking up them.

Beyond and around and below the staircase extended Snaefell, which was quite obviously a mountain, and not a hill. Harry shivered as he took in the sight through the clear air; the unparalleled view over rising and soaring snowfields made him feel colder. Snaefell canted high enough, or they stood in just the right place, to see an incredible distance across both the Isle of Man and the Irish Sea. Harry saw shades of blue and gray in the water he’d never seen before, and the distant blur of land.

“The Muggles used to say that you could see six kingdoms from the top of Snaefell on a clear day,” Paton murmured to him. “England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, the Isle of Man, and the Kingdom of Heaven. We say that we have a seventh, though, properly speaking, our home was never a kingdom. We’ve just lived here a long, long time.” Gently, he gripped Harry’s shoulder and turned him around, unresisting, so that Harry could look to the left of where they stood.

That’s Gollrish Y Thie, Harry thought. Another span of stone steps extended from the Welcoming Room across a shoulder of the mountain, faithfully following its lines, though they rose out of the snow enough that Harry knew they must be huge. And on top of the next ridge curled a home as splendid as a rearing dragon.

Harry would have said it was a castle, but its spare, clean lines made even Hogwarts look unwarrantedly bulky and bumpy. Various wings, patterned with what looked like scales, wavered in several directions, bending and curving where another structure would have stood square or straight. Harry could make out windows sparkling with something that might have been glass or wards. The noise of voices chattering came across the distance to him, and he saw numerous small shapes, children, darting about furiously on the icy flat rock right next to the drop.

“How do you hide this from the Muggles?” he asked Paton.

Paton laughed. “We have a pretty solid illusion that makes the whole place feel like part of the mountain—something the one Light Lady ever born to our line did for us. So far as the Muggles are concerned, all of this is just part of Snaefell. They have a railroad that runs right over our roof.” He nodded towards the steps. “Shall we? It’s safe, I assure you. We have wards to either side that prevent anyone from falling off the ridge, though they won’t keep you from getting a faceful of snow.”

Harry nodded, and they began to hop from one large stone to the other, heading towards the house.

It was harder than it looked, Harry quickly found. The rocks had warming charms that melted some of the ice, but what the Opallines considered “some ice” was obviously different from what he did. He had to hop across the gaps and windmill his arms each time to stay upright. Paton, unsurprisingly, strode along as sure-footed as a mule. He smiled at each gap in between the stones, too, as if they told him tales that Harry couldn’t hear. For all Harry knew, they did.

They reached the other side with no more than one really serious slip on Harry's part, though, and then the ground was flat with flagstones all the way up to the main staircase of Gollrish Y Thie, where Harry could see a figure with long, blowing hair waiting for them. The children, who were throwing snowballs at each other and practicing spells to dump ice down the back of each other's necks, turned around and stared at him with unabashed curiosity. More than one, though, abandoned the staring to run up to Paton and clasp their arms around him with small cries of, "Jishag mooar!"

Paton scooped them up with the ease of long practice, swung each one around, and said a quick phrase in what Harry knew must be Manx. The older children, once he'd spoken to them, turned to Harry and introduced themselves with perfect politeness, hands held palm-up in front of their bodies and their heads bowing over them. Harry heard a dizzying blur of names which he didn't try to retain, though he nodded and smiled to each one. The younger tended to cluster behind the older ones, or behind Paton, chewing their braids—mostly white-blonde, but with some dark and Weasley-red mixed in for variety—and watching him shyly.

Harry tried to count all the children, but since some of them raced back to the snowball games the moment introductions were finished, it was difficult. There were more than fifty, though. Harry shook his head in wonder, and gave a sidelong glance at Paton as they finally worked their way out the other side of the crowd and towards the great steps. "You weren't kidding when you said that you're rich in blood," he said.

Paton smiled. "No. Of course, most of the time, not all of the children live at Gollrish Y Thie. We're scattered all around, as I've told you. But the New Year's celebration is a big deal, thanks to the Cooinaght. My children come from all over the world to attend it." He glanced around him with another self-satisfied look. Harry knew the expression of a man on his home ground now; Paton seemed more thoroughly at home here than even Lucius did in Malfoy Manor.

They had reached the staircase that curled up towards the main entrance of the house, and the standing figure had come down to meet them. Harry faced her, and blinked as he saw a young woman, probably Honoria's age, with smooth brown skin and dark eyes. Her white-blond hair stood out against her coloring, and unlike most of the people around her, she didn't have it coiling in a braid, but blowing free.

"Fastyr mie," she murmured, dipping her head and holding her hands out to Harry in a version of the gesture the older children had used with him. "Good afternoon, Harry vates. My name is Calibrid."

"May I present, as she's already taken up some of the work of doing—" Paton's voice was warm and rich with affection "—my daughter and heir, Calibrid Opalline."

Harry spread his own hand in a mimicry of her gesture. Calibrid smiled, but never stopped studying him. Harry could see already why Paton had chosen her as his heir. If he wanted an observer and someone who intimately knew the strengths and weaknesses of others, he could do much, much worse.

Something was off about Calibrid, though, Harry thought as he studied her back. It was as if a song that played around most people were silent with her. He thought for a moment that she must be better at hiding her magic than many witches, but abruptly he realized what it was, and he blurted his realization out before he could stop it.

"You're a Squib!"

Calibrid's eyebrows rose, and her smile sharpened. "Ah, yes. I did wonder when you would notice. I hope you won't be unpleasant about it." Her new smile said that she could make life more unpleasant for him than he'd ever dream of making it for her.

Harry shook his head, his cheeks already burning. His training and his etiquette conscience, which had a voice like Narcissa's, were both scolding him soundly for his slip-up. "I'm sorry, my lady," he murmured. "I didn't think. I'm used to being around Dark pureblood families who value magical power when choosing an heir before all else. I didn't realize it would be different for the Old Blood, but of course I should have."

Calibrid relaxed, and dropped her hands back to her sides. "Of course it is," she echoed, and brushed her fingers along her cheeks, dissipating her glamour and calling Harry's attention to her tattoos. "I can call on the combined magical power of my family any time I should need it. Why do I need to be magical in my own right?"

Harry grinned a bit. He could think of several people in pureblood society who would be horrified to hear that, Augustus Starrise first among them. He thought they could stand to hear it.

A cutting buzz sounded from overhead, and Harry started a step back as a wasp circled around Calibrid's shoulder. Calibrid showed no alarm, but moved forward a bit as the wasp dived down behind her. A moment later, a tall young man with white-blond hair was standing where the insect had been, staring at Harry in absolute silence. Opalline tattoos curved and writhed on his fine pale skin, and his hand clutched a wand hard enough that his knuckles had lost all color.

"Doncan," said Calibrid. "He was just startled when he called me a Squib, that's all. He intended no insult to me." She reached back and laid a hand on the stranger's shoulder. Harry saw some of the tension alter in him, rather than melt, shifting to other places and positions. Doncan now leaned forward as if he were studying Harry like an insect under glass in his own right. Harry conquered the temptation to shift his own weight and stared back.

"May I present my son Doncan," said Paton, his voice dry, "a wasp Animagus and the guardian of my daughter Calibrid."

Harry turned at the use of the term "guardian." "He protects her because she has no magic?" he asked.

"That was the original justification for it, yes," said Paton. "But he also chose to do the work. And he underwent the original training that Dumbledore and your mother warped when it came to you, Harry. That training normally begins at ten years old, and the child must consent to it. Doncan consented. You did not." His eyes were dark, and his mouth tightened the slightest bit. Harry decided that he didn't want to see Paton truly angry, ever.

Harry had a few more questions now, though. "I didn't realize that Lily had the idea from anywhere," he said. He met Doncan's eyes, and realized they did look familiar, all his own emotions subdued beneath a sternness that watched for any danger to his charge. "I thought she just trained me in accordance with Dumbledore's ethics of sacrifice."

"She did," said Doncan, speaking for the first time. His voice was deep and hoarse, as if he spent a lot of his time shouting. "But she used our methods, and applied them to a flawed ideal. I am sorry for what happened to you, little brother. No one should have to suffer it. My service is joyful to me. Yours has not been."

Harry studied him some more. It was true that Doncan didn't have the lines of tension that Harry remembered as being almost constantly a part of himself when he guarded Connor. He seemed confident that most of the people around Calibrid didn't want to hurt her. Harry had never been allowed to relax to that extent; Lily had trained him to think there were Death Eaters around every corner, and in places where no Death Eaters could have been, she tested him. Harry supposed he could see how that decision, freely made, would turn out a fine warrior, and not one who resented his lot.

It made his skin prickle a bit, all the same.

"Come," Calibrid said then, extending her arm. Harry placed his hand hesitantly on it, folding his thumb back in the proper manner for a pureblood wizard being escorted by an older witch, and she nodded approval. "You have not seen the inside of Gollrish Y Thie, and you should. Everyone who comes to the Isle should." She shot a sly glance at her father. "I have even contended that we should invite Muggles here. My father says very tiresome things about the International Statute of Secrecy, but all my travels through other countries did not make me change my mind. Wizards and Muggles should know each other, I think."

"My little Calibrid is a self-styled revolutionary," said Paton, with the tone of someone pursuing an old argument.

“Because you raised me to think for myself, Father, even when that disagreed with your own thoughts,” Calibrid replied sweetly, and then they were through the great arched entrance and into the main hall of Gollrish Y Thie, and Harry was too busy staring to pay attention to the course of the argument.

The inside of the hall was patterned with more scales, but this time, Harry could see that they weren’t merely indentations or fancy carvings in the stone. They were actual scales. The great hall was made of a pair of widespread jaws that answered the question, once and for all, as to whether Gollrish Y Thie was molded after a living creature or had once been a living creature. They stepped into a lower jaw, and above them slanted another, extending on a constant angle back to the still-enormous throat. Harry swallowed as he looked up at the fangs hanging overhead like enormous stalactites. The fangs on the lower jaw had probably been broken away long ago for the safety of walkers. Rope ladders dangled from the ceiling, leading to faint darkensses of tunnel entrances among the teeth. Harry imagined they ran back into the skull proper, probably up to the muzzle and eyesockets.

“I deliberately didn’t warn you,” said Paton, standing at his side, and, Harry realized, enjoying his reaction. “I like watching the way it takes visitors. Our home was a dragon once, a dragon’s skeleton—we like to say the dragon that St. George battled, though Merlin knows if she was really that. We know her kind doesn’t exist in the British Isles any more, though.” Paton brushed a hand fondly along a wall that Harry supposed was partly bone and partly stone. “Too big, too destructive, and their fire was too hot; it vaporized instead of just burning. Wizards hunted them to extinction long ago. In fact, there’s speculation that the Killing Curse was developed to kill these dragons without close battle, since the wizards inevitably lost in a close battle.” He sighed. “Can you imagine the glory she must have been when she was alive?”

Harry could. He imagined the jaws closing on all of them, the great head lifting, the mouth tilting to spill them all down the throat...

He shivered, partly with fear and partly with a pang of loss at the thought of anything so grand and beautiful dying. Then he shook his head resolutely. He couldn't be too angry at those ancient wizards, unless they were also the ones who had bound the house elves and the other species with webs. He had enough to worry about with the living magical creatures to protect and free.

"Now, Harry," said Paton, drawing his attention back. "The Cooing is coming."

"You mentioned that," Harry murmured. "A ritual of some kind?"

"It is a ritual." Paton's face was solemn, with no hint of teasing now. "A ritual of memory. It helps keep our family together, by showing us what we have been through and lost and won in the past year. However, I am not sure that it would be the best thing for you to experience, given all the losses that haunt your memory." He was studying Harry intently. "You are perfectly welcome to abstain from it. No one will think it an insult." Harry couldn't help glancing at Doncan, but he shook his head, eyes merciless as a hawk's. "I merely wanted to warn you, so that you don't get caught up in it, and can leave the room when it begins."

Harry thought for a moment. Did he really want to relive the graveyard twice over, and the trial, and Merlin knew what else?

But he remembered the promise he had made to himself earlier, and fulfilled in the Forbidden Forest. This was New Year's Day, a day of renewing vows and commitments. He didn't want to retreat in fear, even if it was a wise idea.

"I'll stay for it."

Paton blinked. "You are sure?" he asked, canting his head to study Harry as if he were a new tattoo unexpectedly appeared on his skin. "It is intense."

"I want to," Harry said.

Paton smiled at him. "It is wonderful to hear you say that," he said simply. "Very well, then. Calibrid will show you around Gollrish Y Thie for a time, and let me know when she must attend other duties.” He glanced at his daughter, who nodded.

“I don’t want to keep her away from her duties,” Harry protested, a little alarmed at the thought of that much trouble being taken for him. “I mean, she’s your heir—“

“And you are a member of the family as important as any other,” Calibrid said firmly. “You were that from the moment my big brother shed his blood for you. Come along, Harry. You haven’t enjoyed a game until you’ve watched children playing tag in a dragon’s eye.” She pulled him towards one of the rope ladders, with Doncan pacing along behind them, silent as a great cat.

Harry sighed once, then gave himself over to being treated like a guest, or the little brother that both Doncan and Calibrid called him. By the time the Cooïnaght came, Harry thought he was more than ready.

He had stood in the Great Hall of Gollrish Y Thie, the dragon’s belly, and watched a display of magic meant to mimic the Northern Lights storm around him. Shining threads of purple and blue and gold and green reared up and then ran down the walls. Harry thought for a moment of dripping blood, then shook the image away and deliberately replaced it with the thought of the memory that had shone when he freed the unicorns. Then he could laugh and applaud with the rest, and admire the skill of the two girls, twins, whose magic had produced the light—two of Paton’s younger daughters, just sixteen. The twins had grinned, bowed to the crowd, and slipped away hand-in-hand.

He’d met Angelica Griffinsnest, Paton’s first wife, the mother of Fergus and Doncan and a few of his other children, who had wound up parting with him over “differences that made us good friends and not good spouses,” as she’d described it to Harry. She seemed to enjoy the company of the Opallines, though, and associated freely with all the children. Harry watched her Levitate a squeaking grandchild around the room, and had to look away, a burning in his throat.

He'd seen Calibrid carefully retrieve a Pensieve that two enormous owls had arrived carrying. She'd noticed his look, and explained, stroking the sides of the Pensieve as if it were the most precious thing in the world, that it had come from her mother, a Pakistani witch who had loved Paton and planned to marry him. Her family had required her to marry elsewhere, though, and her mother had not wished to disobey their will. She had loved Paton for a year, given birth to Calibrid, then given her to her father when she was three months old and her mother had to leave the Isle of Man. She sent a Pensieve at the end of every month containing memories of what she'd been doing in the recent past, since her husband forbade her contact with Paton. Harry swallowed down envy, and courteously—he hoped—declined the invitation that Calibrid gave him to look into the Pensieve and get to know her mother. He was just a little too jealous of her for having a mother who loved her that deeply, even years after she'd embarked on a different life.

He felt a little out of place, in fact, though everyone made some effort to include him—and for the younger children it wasn't even an effort; they showed off new spells to him and told him tales of their exploits and insisted that he play tag as naturally as they did with everyone else. A few asked about his missing hand, but accepted the story Harry invented about an evil snake biting it off. But they were so obviously a family, and Harry couldn't help feeling his lacks in the middle of them, from his parents to his missing last name.

“Gather.”

Paton spoke just the one word, and all the shouting and laughter in the hall ceased. Harry knew it was deep night from the torches that flared from cavities in the dragon's ribs, and thought it was about an hour before midnight and the turning of the year. Hundreds of solemn faces turned up now, and parents put their hands on the shoulders of children. Harry felt Calibrid draw up beside him.

She began softly translating the speech that Paton made, in rippling Manx that Harry suspected everyone in the hall but him understood.

“Now is the time of the Cooïnaght, the Remembering, the ritual in which we recall the intense passages of our past year.” As Calibrid finished translating that sentence, the torches sparked higher and higher. Not all of them, though, Harry realized with a glance. Only the twelve largest were leaping and acquiring a white tinge to the flames, twelve spaced at equal distances around the hall and from each other. “We recall this to challenge ourselves, for in remembering our mistakes, we learn not to make them in the future. We recall this to brace ourselves, for the next year may contain challenges greater than any we have faced so far. We recall this to cheer ourselves, for our victories in a year of life are never minor. We recall this to give ourselves life, for we are alive in the past as in the future, and the present is the moving shuttle that connects the tapestries of both.”

At the end of the speech, the torches extended their flames until they touched overhead. Harry couldn't help staring, trying to judge the shape of the arch. But it remained no more specific than an arch, and when sparks began to fall from it like shooting stars or fiery snow, he could do no more than watch.

The sparks grew larger, impossibly larger, as they waltzed downwards, until Harry saw the first one to come towards him like a draping blanket. He raised his arms, uncertain of what he was about to do, and then found another place, another time, tumbling around him as the spark expanded to take him in.

He stood in the Slytherin bedroom, watching himself in a tight embrace with Draco near the foot of Draco's bed. He recognized the scene after a moment's blink: the hug they'd shared after his vision of Voldemort last January, when Draco had somehow ridden along with him and ended up killing Nagini. Harry felt a shiver of several emotions, all of them too intense to be separated, ride up and down his spine. It was strange to see himself from the outside, strange to see himself with two hands, strange to really notice the content expression as he snuggled into Draco's shoulder.

The walls of the memory fell straight down around him, and another took its place. Harry smelled blood and magic, saw himself with hands extended towards a figure lying motionless in a bed, and knew he was witnessing Marian Bulstrode's birth again, at the end of February. He'd saved Elfrida's magic, after she'd drained her own because Marian was her heir. Harry smiled. He was allowed to be proud of that, wasn't he? Yes, he thought he was. It had been the first time he'd reversed his magic-swallowing ability, and seen that he could use that swallowed strength to give life and hope back to others—the first time he'd really felt like a wizard doing what he could to help and serve other wizards, not just magical creatures.

A roar, and he was in a memory so vibrant with life that he flushed even before he saw what it was. The first kiss he and Draco had shared, which came on the spring equinox, the brightest day of his March. Harry was torn between surprised that he'd looked that terrified, and pleased that Draco looked more satisfied and deliriously happy than he'd remembered. He'd been rather too occupied with his own feelings, and expectations, and fears, to realize that it had been exactly what Draco wanted.

Darkness attacked next, erasing the bright memory like ink spilled on an overdue Potions essay. Harry looked up, and above him danced the monstrous storm that had come on Walpurgis, the wild Dark stung to fury by Voldemort's attempt to capture and manipulate it. The rage seemed almost innocent, now that Harry had seen the fury of Midwinter. He watched himself flying, hurtling through darkness with a vengeance that made him wince and suspect that Draco and Snape might have a point about how reckless he was with his life. He looked like a bit of rubble just then, a piece of trash the wild Dark might fling however it chose. April had been an intense month for him altogether, with the Maze as well as this, but this was by far the wilder memory.

Sunshine and color and light broke the darkness like dawn, and he stood in the cavern beneath Gringotts, in May, gathering and taming the magic of twelve different wizards in an effort to free the southern goblins. Power rushed into him and made him able to do so many things for those brief moments—more even than he could have done if he had swallowed their magic, since it had been willingly given over. But he had chosen to turn it back, tuck it gently into their bodies once more and refuse the temptation. Harry was less proud of that than he was of freeing the goblins, but only just.

He was prepared when sunshine became dusk, color became gray, light became darkness. It was inevitable that this would be his memory of June, burning the twenty days before it and the nine days after it to ash. He stood in the graveyard, and watched himself writhe on the stone, and heard the screams, not mindless but full of terror and pain, and watched Bellatrix sever his left hand. It did not really take as long as he had thought it did. It was less painful to watch than it was to experience. He had survived it. He told himself that, and still had to look away when the hand came free and Bellatrix laughed aloud.

July unspooled in Godric's Hollow, with him lying flat on his back next to the old isolation wards, gritting his teeth and wrinkling his forehead as he rebuilt his own mind. Harry would have preferred to watch the memory of his birthday, the day when Argutus had joined him, but he found this an unexpectedly quiet scene. He didn't stay long enough to see his own magic explode in negation, attacking the power the place had held over him, and without that, there was almost no sense of what rushed and churned in his brain.

August, and he rode the Light gryphon's back, vaulting and turning as it claimed the magic Voldemort had torn from it. Harry forced himself not to think of what would surely come with December, to try and see this memory as it had been when he experienced it. There were some advantages to the outside perspective, though: the Light gryphon flicked its tail in disdain at Voldemort as it flew away, something Harry definitely hadn't noticed at the time. He grinned, and when the next memory strewn sand beneath his feet, he was braced.

He watched himself confront Voldemort in the circle of wooden disks he'd used to destroy the sirens, and shook his head in wonder. He looked so small, so fragile. It was a wonder that his allies trusted and would follow him. Then he saw the expression on his own face when he lunged up to take the curse for Connor, and revised his estimate. He supposed it was only a mystery some of the time, and that battle on the autumn equinox had given them a chance to see both sides of him.

He was hovering in the air, a change so sudden that Harry squeaked and reached for the ground before he caught himself, shaking his head in embarrassment. He watched himself jerk at Henrietta's sharp reminder that he was their leader, and shout warnings as he pushed his broom into a dive towards Woodhouse. Henrietta went off to play with Evan Rosier, something Harry hadn't known at the time, and he and Draco saved each other's lives so quickly that Harry barely had time to breathe, watching it, between one death and the next. He felt a stir of satisfaction in his belly as he watched them running towards Woodhouse under the full moon. Obviously, their relationship couldn't be like that all the time, but it was good to know that it could be when it needed to be.

He kept his head half-bowed during the memory of November, because sound and not sight was the important thing here. He heard his voice reciting the speech for his parents, impassioned and yet strangely dry, as if he were a cracked bone pouring all his marrow and strength into the words, keeping nothing for himself. He heard the mutters and creaks of the Wizengamot quiet, and he breathed in the absolute silence, knowing that the memory of himself would be climbing back to Draco.

Darkness and wind bore him up. Once again, he hovered, and watched as Fawkes danced and sang his death, winding down his life into a tight bolt of fire that he flung directly at Harry. This time, Harry could make out the fire fluttering beneath his chest like a heartbeat—at least, when he separated again from the Light gryphon and the tears left him in peace. He frowned and touched his own chest uncertainly. What exactly did Fawkes leave me?

The memory broke, and Harry found himself on a vision of a high mountaintop. Dark, undefined country lay below, and above him shone innumerable stars, so bright and so far away that Harry shivered. Behind him lay green, well-traveled country, he knew, but he could not turn and look at it. This was a representation of the future, and at the moment, the Cooinaght insisted he look forward.

This is still yours to choose, said a voice in his ears that might have been the Light's, if the Light knew personal compassion.

The dark land smoothed and flattened, and he stood in the Opallines' Great Hall once more, his cheeks wet with tears. A hand touched his shoulder, and he was turned to face, not Calibrid, as he'd assumed, but Duncan.

Doncan stared into his eyes, so keenly that Harry had to control the impulse to turn away. He stared back instead, at this man who was, in an odd kind of way, his brother—trained in the way that Harry should have been trained, if Lily and Dumbledore had sought his consent in protecting Connor; part of the Opalline family, as Harry could be considered with Fergus's sacrifice of blood; a guardian in a way that Harry knew he never would be, but sharing some traits with him.

Doncan nodded. What he had seen in his face, Harry didn't know. He laid a hand on Harry's forehead, light and cool as the touch of a spiderweb, and spoke in his hoarse voice. "Welcome to the rest of your life, little brother."

Harry blinked, and realized the Great Hall was alive with fireworks, with more dazzling bursts of light, wilder than the controlled performance from earlier, and with torch flames that had abandoned their holders to dance in waltzes. Midnight had passed, and the new year had stalked in.

Harry didn't know the proper, ritual response, but he managed to incline his head, his heart beating with the weight of the past year and the excitement over what was yet to come, and say, "Thank you...brother."

Chapter Fifty-Eight: Capto Horrifer

On the tenth day of January, 1996, Albus Dumbledore broke free of his Still-Beetle confinement.

Rufus grinned. To most people who knew him, it would have been a frightening expression, but Percy Weasley knew him just that little bit better than the rest. Rufus wasn't surprised when Percy grinned back at him.

"Who is it today, sir?" he asked, with fierce eagerness.

Rufus glanced back at the list of names in front of him. "His name's Hector Dawlish," he said. "Brother of our own Auror Dawlish. We investigated him casually when his brother's name came up, but we didn't find any incriminating evidence on him. With Hestia Jones singing so sweetly, of course, we know that he's a member of the Order of the Phoenix, however much he doesn't look like it. He'll have to come when the summons arrives." Rufus clamped his teeth together, well-aware of the glow in his own eyes. This was the reason that he found paperwork so exciting. The other Aurors had always thought only a chase through the field could be this grand, but Rufus had long ago become accustomed to letting his mind do the chasing, since he had a bad leg. "And if he doesn't have anything to hide, if he's innocent, why wouldn't he show up to help the Ministry with its inquiries?"

Percy laughed, his teeth flashing. "Brilliant, sir."

Rufus grinned again. The young man was turning out excellently—a prime Auror candidate. He still spent most of his time acting as an assistant to Rufus, despite the training he was undergoing. Amelia had to admit that she could think of few better trainers in procedure, paperwork, and the rule of law than Rufus, since he'd been Head of the Office. And it helped that Percy was intelligent and didn't need much conviction on whether it was right to treat criminals just like other people. Those were the Gryffindor sensibilities shining through. What Rufus had to work on was getting him to accept that, sometimes, it was all right to bend the rules. Percy currently admired the way Rufus did it, but didn't seem able to do it himself.

Ah, well. We'll use that wand when its core is formed, as Grandmother Leonora liked to say. Rufus looked across his office at the portrait of his Muggleborn grandmother, who was looking at Percy. She tipped him a wink when she noticed him staring. Rufus nodded in satisfaction. They'd train him yet.

A knock on the door announced the arrival of Hector Dawlish. Rufus sat up. "Send him in, Tonks!" he called.

The door opened, but it wasn't Hector Dawlish who came in. A flood of darkness traveled inward, rippling, a cloud of ink that might have escaped from the Department of Mysteries and the Unspeakables' bloody experiments. Rufus opened his mouth to shout, and then it engulfed him.

He found himself kneeling in mud, blinking away rain as it fell into his eyes. He glanced down, and realized his hands were younger—about sixteen years younger. Fear clawed up his throat in metallic bitterness.

"No," he whispered, just as he had the first time this day happened, but nothing and no one heard him.

He had to stand, had to scramble up, had to turn. And then he could see. He was back on the mud-churned battlefield of the wizarding village of Valerian, in northern Scotland.

Correction. What had been the wizarding village of Valerian. Voldemort had utterly destroyed it, in the single most devastating strike of the war so far, killing not only the several hundred villagers but the twenty Aurors sent to protect them. Rufus had been among the second detachment, and he had arrived to find people who Apparated a few moments before him already dying.

And Valerian was hell.

Voldemort had turned the very rain into a weapon, with a spell that Rufus didn't know and sincerely hoped he would never see again. When the water struck his fellow Aurors, it turned into silvery knives, and began flaying off their skins. Next to him was Georgina Catawampus, already a mindless thing screaming in so much pain that Rufus wanted to cut his ears off. The skin was gone from her chest and cheeks, revealing muscle slick and gleaming, threaded through bone, and breasts that dangled like sacks of rotten meat, and a skin slowly peeling down her sides like the wrapping of a Christmas present. Georgina was begging for death with those words that Rufus could still understand.

He'd Apparated in just the right place to avoid the spell, or else it was faltering thanks to the extra-strong waterproofing spells on his clothes, which Grandmother Leonora had made him. Either way, he had to venture further on foot into that place of mud and blood and rain and knives, and figure out some way to stop the Death Eaters, whom he could hear laughing like rats from a short distance away.

But he was afraid.

He forced himself a step forward.

Then a Death Eater appeared before him. Logically, Rufus knew he must have Apparated, and he just hadn't heard the crack amid the screaming, but he shuddered all over anyway. It really did look as if the Death Eater had sprouted out of the chaos around them, with robes of flayed flesh and a mask of bone.

"You will die," said the Death Eater in a confident, smooth voice, the voice that Rufus knew he would hear again a year later, when Lucius Malfoy widened his eyes and denied being in control of his own will for as long as he'd been a Death Eater. It was one reason Rufus was never going to trust the bastard. Imperius Curse or not, he'd stood on a battlefield with that screaming going on around him, and still been able to concentrate on fighting an enemy.

Rufus managed a shaky version of the correct head-bow that began a duel. Malfoy laughed, and then moved forward with his cloak boiling behind him. No fool, he tried a Killing Curse first, and Rufus barely managed to dodge it, limping thanks to his bad leg; he still wasn't completely used to the wound then, and how it slowed him in battle.

He still saw it in his dreams, sometimes, how close that green fire had swooped to him.

And then their duel began, the most fearsome hour of Rufus's life. Even knowing he had survived it once, that he must be caught in a memory, did not keep him from shaking in fear.

And then his leg went out from beneath him, and he looked down the end of Lucius Malfoy's wand, and he realized there was no guarantee that this memory would end like the real thing, not at all.

Lily lifted her head slowly when the darkness came hunting down the corridors of Tullianum. She thought it might be Harry, come to free her, but cloaked in night. Perhaps this was his last act before he completely became a feral Dark Lord, she thought: freeing the mother who had tried to keep him from becoming one, letting her walk in the sunlight one more time. And then she would help to lead the force opposing him.

So strong was the fantasy that she at first didn't realize her surroundings had changed. When she did, she sat up and looked around, hopeful. Had Harry simply Apparated her out of her cell and into freedom? That would be best. Then she wouldn't have to face him until the end, when she could look into his eyes and hear him say his last words before Albus cut him down.

Then she recognized her surroundings, and long dread and slow terror clutched at her gut like tapeworms. She was in the kitchen of Godric's Hollow, and behind her was the glow of Christmas lights. There was soft music playing. She'd been levitating the dishes to clean them, just a moment ago. This was the Christmas when she had lost her magic. But what had brought her back here? How could she have come back here, when she knew that that time was more than two year ago?

"Mother."

And the voice behind her was the one she feared so much that she still woke shaking from dreams of it. It was Harry's voice, but stripped of all the compassion she had taught him. It was a simple, blank thing full of childish glee. That she had never heard it like that didn't matter to Lily. What mattered was that someday, she could hear it like that.

And now she was.

She tried to back a step away from him, but she knew even as she moved that her magic was gone, that aching hollow feeling that she'd only got used to with a year's passage. She could do nothing to oppose her son. She was utterly helpless.

And Harry stepped forward with his magic visible around him as a darkening of the air, full of crows and gibbering faces and impossible things, his mouth twisted in a sneer.

"I've already drunk Connor's magic," he whispered. "And James's, and Sirius's, and Remus's. Why do you think I was hiding from your notice all these months? To prepare myself, Mother. To learn things that you would never have let me learn. Dark Arts are the least of what I can do." He smiled, and the smile made Lily sink to the ground, arms over her head, screaming.

"Let me show you what I can do," Harry continued, and he moved one arm down and to the side.

Lily jerked as he yanked her spine free of her body. She had never imagined pain like that. It spread through her, touching every nerve, making her shriek and shriek and shriek as the middle of her back went missing and the spine danced in front of her eyes, a long strip of bone ornamented with gore.

"You might be wondering why you're still alive." Harry's eyes were merciless. "Because we're just getting started, you see. And I've enacted spells that will make you survive much worse tortures than this. Connor, too. Would you like to see him raped by a werewolf? I think I can manage that, since Remus's going to be turning soon."

Lily knew this wasn't how the memory had gone, but it didn't seem to matter. If someone could find a way of altering the past, then Harry would. The fear ate her alive, and as Harry called for his brother, she let it. It seemed so much better than remaining sane through what was to come.

James woke to light of a kind he hadn't seen in months. He blinked, and shook his head, and stumbled to his feet. He'd been dreaming a moment ago. He didn't know what had awakened him. But if it made him stand in a street like this, with sunlight pouring over him—even if the street did seem to be in a pretty shabby part of London—he wasn't about to object. Perhaps the Aurors had been transporting him and lost control of the Apparition in such a way that he landed alive and out of their custody. James had heard that that sometimes happened with Muggles and Squibs.

He looked around hopefully, and then caught sight of a house in front of him. It was familiar: Sirius's home, Number Twelve Grimmauld Place. He supposed it was Regulus Black's house now, since there was news that he'd come back from the dead, but either way, the wards were down. He could hide there. James stumbled forward, then shook himself and tried to walk confidently. He was free. He should act like it, or someone would notice and get him arrested by the Muggle authorities, even if the Ministry had lost track of him.

Heavy robes swished around his feet. James looked down, curious. He wore an Auror's uniform. And then he realized there was a wand in his pocket, and magic burning in his body.

And he knew where he was. When he was.

His eyes rose back to the house, and he whispered, "No. I—I can't."

But he knew what he would find if he opened the door: Bellatrix and Rodolphus Lestrage hiding there. This was just after the attacks on his boys and the Longbottoms, the night that Voldemort fell. James, in blind rage, had chased the Lestranges through one safe place and finally worked out where they must be hiding. He'd gone in, and dueled Bellatrix, and done something, literally, Unforgivable to her.

Held her under Crucio, his brain whispered gleefully. Did you forget? And did you forget how good it felt?

James shuddered and buried his head in his arms. He'd had to face the Dark in himself, and he'd hated it. He'd quit the Aurors the next day and gone home to live in peace and quiet with his family—until he realized that one of his sons might carry the same Dark seed that lived within him, that same love of pain.

He could just refuse to go into the house, though. If he had this memory to live a second time, then he didn't need to do things exactly the same. He'd refuse.

And perhaps that would change everything, James thought suddenly, his heart rising like a phoenix. Perhaps he could go home to Godric's Hollow and pay attention to both Harry and Connor, and insure that they were raised the way they should be. He'd spoil Harry just as much as Connor, and then Harry would love him and never turn against him. He would never be a failure. He would never be arrested. He could remain in the Aurors and have the life he should have had.

But the moment he decided that, an outside force seemed to grip and move his body. James found himself walking steadily towards the house, his wand in his hand, his lips twisted in a sneer.

"No!" he screamed, his mouth twisting weirdly; it wouldn't move out of the sneer even while he yelled the word.

The force made him march up the steps. The force made him kick the door in. The force made him duel Rodolphus, and take him out easily, and then it puppeted him through an intense fight with Bellatrix Lestrange, in which he had to leap and dodge hexes and fire them like a much younger man. But James felt old, old, filled with dread and terror that should have weighted his limbs down, and did not.

Then Bellatrix said what she did about wanting to put Harry and Connor under Crucio.

And James snapped, and struck her with the Cruciatus Curse. This time, though, when sanity had eventually returned to him in the original memory and he had let her go—though with her mind already broken, of course—he didn't let her go. The force made him open his mouth in a laugh as he watched her writhe, and he realized that, in this new version of the past, he would torture Bellatrix Lestrange until she was dead. But that would not be for a long, long time.

This was not a dream. It was a nightmare.

And within himself, since the force that gripped him would permit no new tears to run down his cheeks, James wept.

Albus stretched his arms and stepped out of the wreckage of his cell. It had taken him nearly two months to work up the rage necessary to break free of his confinement, and to overcome his commitment to the Light so that he could reconcile himself to using Dark Arts. But now it had been done. Albus felt a great peace welling up from the center of himself. He had accepted that he was a sacrifice, that it was not his destiny to face Harry and Tom and rid the world of them. His life was given over, instead, to using this spell, a Dark Arts one so powerful that his mentor would be unable to ignore it. It would blaze across Britain like a great fire, and draw Tom's attention, certainly, but also that of his mentor. Tom would be cautious, unwilling to approach a sudden, unknown rival. The man Albus loved and revered would come, though he would hang about on the edges first and observe matters before diving in. It was his way.

He'd used Capto Horrifer.

He passed men and women writhing on the ground, or standing still with desperate faces, or screaming, as they relived their most fearsome memories. Each memory was twisted in a new way, so that they couldn't have the comfort of knowing they would live through it again. In some cases, the memory would simply form new mental scars. In others, if the spell lasted long enough and the memory was intense enough, the victim would die.

Albus knew some people would probably perish in the Ministry before the day was through—the old witches and wizards whose hearts had labored long, those whose most fearsome experiences had taken them close to death, those who lost control of their sanity in the midst of the memory and committed suicide rather than continue to face the endless creative horrors of the spell. That was all right. He accepted it. Better some sacrifices than all of them dead before Harry or Tom's will. And he regretted those of his own followers caught in the maelstrom, because they happened to be located in the Ministry, but there was no way to spare them. Capto Horrifer was limited by the walls of a building. It had to be cast on everyone in the Ministry or no one at all.

He paused, though, when he'd worked his way out of Tullianum and was standing in a hall filled with writhing and crying Ministry employees. It wasn't true that he could do nothing but wait for his mentor to arrive. After all, he'd accounted for him and for Tom, but there was one more person who would sense an explosion of Dark magic this intense and probably try to interfere. Harry.

If Albus gave him time, he'd arrive with Severus at his back, or possibly Severus and Minerva, and Albus had no doubt he'd arrive prepared. Capto Horrifer had a distinct feel to it, especially across distances and with as much power as he'd put behind it. The moment Harry described it, Severus would know what spell it was, and he could give Harry a potion that would guard his mind against it. There was a possibility that Harry might stop him before the spell could penetrate the deep walls guarding his mentor's mind and bring him back.

For that matter, Minerva, bound as she was to the wards of Hogwarts and the Founders' spirits now, might sense him.

That could not be allowed to happen.

Closing his eyes, Albus reached for bonds in the center of himself that he'd let lie for a long time. Once he'd worked the initial spell to establish that web, the best thing was to leave it alone. He'd wanted it intact, of course, and then he'd had some notion of using it as a bargaining chip when they arrested him. But the Still-Beetle confinement, and the fact that only Hestia Jones came to talk to him when he was free, didn't allow him to tell anyone.

Inside him lay a web connected with the wards of Hogwarts. He'd tied some of them to a statue deep in Hogwarts's tunnels, but Minerva could have found and destroyed that. He'd also, unknown even to Godric, looped some threads around his own magical core. If worst came to worst, he would destroy Hogwarts and the secrets and treasures inside her before he allowed Tom to take her.

Now, he didn't see the need to do that. And he couldn't use the Light portion of the spell that would have made him kill himself for the good of others anyway.

But he could and did send Dark Arts flowing down the web, poisoning it, making it collapse, and causing Hogwarts's wards to start to unravel.

There. That should give Minerva something to think about.

And as for Harry...

Albus didn't have his wand. He didn't need it. He was as competent with wandless magic as Tom or Harry, but he'd seen fit to hide that. He thought even Severus, more observant than most of them, believed that he mostly used his wand and his compulsion gift, and forgot the immense reserves of his power sleeping below. But Albus was a Lord, as strong as a Lord, stronger than Harry was. He'd never figured out quite how he matched up against Tom, but then, they'd never fought directly long enough for him to do so.

Now, he reached out, and when he spoke, his voice was strong and firm and carried all his will. "Accio Harry Potter!"

It was...strange, coming back to the world. He'd gone wandering in his own mind five decades before, rejoicing in the secrets of Light and Dark without fading into either one of them. So long as he stayed wrapped in his own preservation spells, and made both Light and Dark think they might be able to claim him as a Lord, he'd stayed alive. He was nearly six hundred years old now, and had pretended to die multiple times. Strange, that.

Everything was strange in the first moments he was back in his body, though. He stretched stiff limbs, and massaged his left arm. Then he stilled and turned his head to the south.

There was an explosion of Dark magic swarming there, and it had Albus's distinctive touch. He felt himself catch his breath. What could have happened to make Albus choose Dark Arts? His commitment to the Light had been complete—a good thing, given the compulsion gift he carried. And it had been satisfying, too, to know that a Light Lord was emerging into a world shortly to have two Dark Lords in a row. Life was about balance. So he had always claimed, and so he had deliberately retained the ability to pass between poles, never quite Declaring. He had to be able to dance in order to balance the wizarding world, in order to give it stability and the unchanging equilibrium it so badly needed after the centuries of chaos it had endured. He'd been glad to hand that task on to Albus and retreat into his own mind and the Strange Paths, but he'd known it couldn't be forever.

It had to be a sacrifice. Albus had encountered something he couldn't handle, and called on his old mentor to handle it instead.

Falco Parkinson nodded, and slipped into his sea eagle form, and rose, wings cutting the air strongly as he remembered how to fly, speeding south. It seemed that it was his duty to save magic from itself, again.

Harry frowned and bent over the book. Now that he had some leisure to study the Durmstrang problem again, he thought he was on to something. This book, which was about life debts, argued that any kind of powerful bond between strong wizards, even one of hatred, could let someone pass through a lightning ward. Harry hated Bellatrix Lestrange enough that he had to wonder if this would work after all.

Now if the book would only give him some details on how to do it, instead of just claiming it was possible!

The world around him blurred and began to swing. Harry lifted his head, startled. Then he found himself looking at the far wall of the library, as if a string were extended from it that controlled his movements.

Merlin.

Somewhere far to the south, Dark magic was burning. A greasy film slid along his skin. Harry shivered in fear and disgust. This wasn't quite like the Unforgivable Curses, but nearly as bad. He shoved his chair back, ignoring Madam Pince's squawk, and began to run. He had to find someone who could tell him what that spell was. Acies or Snape would be the best choice.

It had to be Voldemort who was using that much Dark magic, and that meant he'd made a major strike. Harry felt his mouth thin. He still hadn't managed to sever his mental connection with Draco completely, but he'd come close in their last practice session; just as Draco could feel the boundaries of his mind and Harry's body, Harry could feel the boundaries of their separate selves. If he collected only the bits of himself that were himself on the next jump into Voldemort's mind, he should go alone. And then he could learn when the fuck Tom was planning things like this.

He came out of the library and paused, for a moment, his mind glittering like the crystal it had become on his way to the battle on the beach. Where would Acies be? No telling, since she didn't have a class right now. Where would Snape be? Teaching one of the fourth-year Potions classes. Harry nodded and turned. The dungeons were fairly far away, but it was better to seek someone whose location he knew than waste time in fruitless hunting. Time was already wasting.

He got exactly three strides down the hall, and then Hogwarts's wards gave a little sigh and melted.

Harry froze, his heart hammering. He's here.

Voldemort must have coordinated simultaneous strikes on whatever target in the south he'd chosen—the Ministry, most likely—and the school. Somehow, he'd undone the wards, and now he could come into Hogwarts and hurt defenseless children, if he chose to. And of course he would choose to.

Harry's mind became extraordinarily clear. He was ready to die, if that was what it took. He turned to find a window, so he could see how many Death Eaters Voldemort had come with, or if it was only the Dark Lord himself, hoping to get inside the school before anyone could notice him. Harry had noticed him, though.

He began to call up his magic as he had only called it up once before, the night that he battled the Tom Riddle of the diary, possessing him in his head.

And a great, Portkey-like pulling hooked into his navel and jerked him away. Harry had the feeling of trees and countryside and villages skimming past, and then he landed in a corridor thick with the greasy feeling of the Dark spell. He barely caught himself with his hand before he went spinning into a wall.

Good plan, Tom, you bastard, Harry thought in cold admiration as he balanced. Don't know how you did it, but moving me to the site where you've already got followers and away from Hogwarts itself was a wonderful idea. Too bad it won't work, since I'm just going to Apparate back, and to hell with all the Ministry wards I'll tear along the way.

He was tensing to do so when darkness ate him alive.

Harry blinked and tried to stand up. Then he realized he couldn't. He was flat on his back on a reddish-black block of stone, and Voldemort stood before him, laughing, and Bellatrix Lestrange was approaching with a knife, and overhead hung the looming dusk and living warmth of Midsummer.

And he had two hands.

Some kind of memory spell, Harry thought, forcing his brain to think, to move, wielding Lily's training like thorns to sting himself into flight. That's all it is. What happens to me here isn't real. And I know what's going to happen, don't I? I relived this on New Year's night, though not, I have to admit, in this position. I survived it once, so I can survive it again.

His first indication that something was wrong came when Bellatrix knelt and roughly grabbed his right hand instead of his left. She gave him a grotesque smile, and whispered, "Wonder, baby, what you'll look like with both your hands and both your feet gone? So cute. So cute.”

Harry heard himself scream, a cry that seemed to empty his brain and his lungs both at once. Voldemort moved in front of him and cast the Crucio, and then his scar began to burn, and Bellatrix’s knife was descending on his right wrist, and Harry was panting and thrashing and screaming hoarsely, and he wanted to die or disappear or run or lose his mind or—

Albus shook his head sadly as he watched Harry writhe. He knew exactly what memory the boy would be reliving, and he was sorry for it. But Harry would survive this. He was too young and too strong to commit suicide or have his heart give out under the fear. Albus would do his part in weakening him, though, so that Falco could have an easier task of it when he returned.

Harry’s magic, bucking fiercely, nearly shook off the Capto Horrifer. Albus clucked his tongue and pressed down with his stronger power. That wouldn’t do, if the boy woke up before Albus was ready or Falco was here. Then he would probably strike back at the author of his torments without pausing to see who it was. That wasn’t part of the plan.

Albus paused when he’d contained Harry in the memory again. Someone else could still come after Harry, couldn’t they? They might not know he was missing yet, but they could find out, and possibly cast spells that would tell them where he’d gone. He had to prevent that, too.

He wove wards around the Ministry, his own, Dark defensive spell piled on Dark defensive spell. Many of them were wards the Death Eaters had once used to protect their own homes from Auror raids. Albus was sure they could appreciate the irony, if they ever noticed it.

Then he sat back and watched Harry scream, and was content. Draco slipped into the library. Harry thought he didn’t know that he’d been studying ways to get rid of the lightning ward again. Harry was wrong, and, sometimes, dense. Draco knew, and he planned to surprise him in the library and haul Harry outside to get some fresh air. The Slytherin-Ravenclaw Quidditch match wasn't that far away. Draco wanted to see Harry flying and laughing and practicing his Seeker skills.

All right, maybe I just want to see him laughing. Besides, it's a nice distraction from Father's latest letter.

He found Madam Pince screeching over a book at the table Harry usually studied at, and frowned. Normally, he would have beat a hasty retreat so the librarian wouldn't accost him, but she was near Harry's table. "Madam Pince?" he ventured.

Madam Pince spun around, and apparently found him a convenient audience to rant at. "You tell your friend Harry that he's not allowed in here again, never! Not if he's going to fling books down and dash out of the room! Not if he won't treat my babies with the care they deserve!" She wrapped her arms around the book as if it really were a baby and rocked it. Draco couldn't see much of the title, but he did make out Bonds.

He swallowed. That didn't sound good. If Harry had found something useful in the book and dashed away, he might be on his way to Durmstrang right now to see if he could break through the lightning ward.

"I'll tell him, Madam Pince," he said, and then ran out of the library, touching the golden bracelet that had been Harry's Christmas present to him with his left hand. "How is he?" he whispered.

Into his head spoke a cool voice that sounded disconcertingly like Hermione Granger's. Suffering. Tortured. In intense mental and physical pain.

"Fuck!" Draco didn't realize he'd said that aloud until a Hufflepuff prefect, passing him in the hall, gave him a scandalized look. Draco sneered at her and curved his right hand back to touch the bracelet. "Take me to him."

He felt a deep surge of magic that seemed to rise from beneath his feet, as if a fountain would spring up and carry him there. For a moment, the world turned into blurs of color and motion, and then stopped. Draco blinked at nothing. He wondered why the bracelet could possibly have failed.

Then Harry's words came back to him: the bracelet couldn't take him to Harry's side through powerful wards. And, of course, if he'd gone to Durmstrang and made a mistake that got him Crucio'd under Bellatrix Lestrange's wand, the lightning ward was probably still up.

Draco's mind galloped in circles for a moment. Then he headed for the Slytherin dungeons, so fast that he knew several professors would yell at him for running in the halls. He didn't give a damn. There was one more thing that might work, and even that was chancy.

And if it didn't work—

He just wasn't going to think about that, was all. He was more frantic than he'd been in the graveyard when he had to possess Yaxley. Then, he'd been able to see Harry right in front of him, and know what had to be done. This time, he had no idea what was happening, and no idea what he should do when he got where he was going. He only knew he had to go.

He flung himself through the door of the Slytherin common room, lunged up the stairs, sent the door of their bedroom banging off the wall and into himself with the push he gave it, and suppressed a furious howl as he fell to his knees beside his trunk and began to dig through it. Ceremonial dagger, dragon carving, Potions book, no no—

There it was. Draco's hands shook as he uncovered the coin that his mother had given to him for Christmas. It looked like a Sickle, if a Sickle had the Black crest on one side and Cousin Arcturus's head on the other. His mother had pressed it into his hand when he gave her a questioning look, and explained the use of it—that it would grant him one wish and one wish only, if it came down on the side he'd called while it was in flight. Draco had been awed, and promised to keep it safe and only use it when he had true need.

Now, he did.

Trying not to think of what would happen if the coin didn't come down on the side he called, he tossed it into the air. For a moment, his mind blanked on what side he should call, but then he remembered what Narcissa said had come up when his mother had taken Aunt Bella's hand, and he shouted, "Heads!"

The coin came down. Roll, roll, roll—and it collapsed, showing his cousin's head uppermost. Draco wanted to shut his eyes in relief, but he kept them open long enough to see the black sparkle that told him the coin was ready.

Draco nodded. "Send me to Harry's side," he commanded, "and let me be prepared to help him when I get there."

Black forks of lightning struck from the coin, grabbed him, and shot towards the opposite wall. Draco felt his substance sucked and pulled out of him as if he were a spider and the lightning a wasp, and then he was sent.

Chapter Fifty-Nine: First Time, First Choice

Draco landed on stone, which told him this was probably Durmstrang, and rolled over, springing back to his feet, where a single glance told him that, no, this was not Durmstrang.

He stood in the middle of a corridor filled with wizards and witches clad in robes with plebian designs on them, their eyes fixed on nothing and their voices moaning or crying for help. And in front of him lay Harry, his voice uttering screams that made Draco twitch, and his eyes shut hard enough that almost no tears leaked out from beneath the lids, and in front of him stood Dumbledore, lifting his head to regard Draco with slow surprise.

Draco felt a surge of terror try to take him. In another life, he might have knelt shivering on the floor, unable to do anything.

But rage ate the terror. As long as he was acting Gryffindorish, Draco supposed, then he might as well be hideously angry at the powerful wizard hurting the boy he loved.

“What spell did you use on him?” he demanded.

Dumbledore smiled. It was the kind of smile Draco had seen the Headmaster give in the morning across the staff table, when he was benevolently observing his contained little world of Hogwarts and seeing nothing wrong with it. “You’re about to find out,” he said, and nodded over Draco’s shoulder.

Draco turned to look. Darkness came at him, whirling like the central funnel cloud of a great storm.

But, when it touched him, it shredded into black ribbons and fell to the floor. Draco blinked and turned back to Dumbledore.

I did say that I wanted to arrive prepared to help Harry, he thought. The coin probably protected me from the effects of this spell, whatever it is—no, wait, I know what it is. Reading the books on Dark Arts that his father had suggested he study over the past few summers had come in handy after all. This would be Capto Horrifer.

And that would explain why Harry was on his back, too. The spell caused the victims to relive their most fearsome memories, but twisted them into a new abundance of horrors, so that the victims couldn't simply count on surviving the way they had the first time. Harry must be dreaming of that moment in the graveyard when Bellatrix had taken his hand.

Draco's rage blasted away his surprise and his rationality again. He could sense Dumbledore getting past his own surprise, probably preparing another spell to attack Draco and hold him there, or perhaps torture him, or perhaps kill him.

He didn't hesitate to think whether this was a good idea. It was the only one which might work, so he did it. He fixed his eyes on Dumbledore's and jumped, out of his mind and into the former Headmaster's, wondering dimly as he flew why it felt as if the air had turned heavy and surging, filled with thunder as well as the greasy film of this particular spell.

Albus had been surprised by the arrival of the Malfoy boy, but there were Dark artifacts that could have permitted the boy to pass his wards. At least there seemed to be no rescuers coming after him, and once the Capto Horrifer spell failed, he knew something stronger would be needed. He started to prepare a binding curse that would make Draco see what Harry was seeing and suffer, helpless as a ghost in his memory-world, even if Albus could not bind him into his own thoughts.

Then his head rocked on his neck, and someone struck his mind a powerful blow. Albus slid down a long, dark tunnel, scrabbling frantically for control. It didn't come to him. He was falling faster and faster, into some quiet corner of his thoughts where he would be able to watch but do nothing to control his body.

No. Somehow, the boy had acquired the power to possess other wizards, which Albus wished he had known before now, but he had faced this before. Tom had tried to possess him more than once. Albus was a master Legilimens, and he knew his own mind too well to permit someone to intrude for long.

And there was no way that Draco Malfoy could be more powerful and experienced than Tom Riddle.

Albus imagined a tunnel opening in his mind, taking him to the side instead of down as the boy envisioned, while at the same time using a whisper of Legilimency to make it look as if he had been sufficiently startled to fall all the way. Draco was satisfied, and turned his body, making it step forward and kneel beside Harry. One hand reached out and stroked Harry's forehead. Draco said soothing words in Albus's voice which Albus didn't let himself listen to. They would only distract him at this juncture.

He had thrown Tom off with an attack from behind and below, clad in Legilimency that continued to make it look as if he cowered in the background and didn't know what to do. He employed the same technique with this boy, swimming undetectably as he gathered his magic, focusing on the incantation that he wanted to use. It would be best if he killed Draco Malfoy the moment he threw him out of his mind, so that he would not continue to be a nuisance.

He thought he could do it. Draco Malfoy was not Harry Potter, any more than he was Tom Riddle. Albus had been cautious about pushing Harry too much; threaten to kill him, and his magic might rally and defend him, to the point of slaying Albus before he could be sure that his mentor had seen his signal. Trapping him in his mind was the best way to both weaken him and make sure the Capto Horrifer burned until Falco arrived. The spell would end when Albus died—and he fully expected his mentor to kill him, but by then, the magic would have served its purpose.

Draco Malfoy, though, was not a Lord-level wizard, nor a Legilimens. Albus sharpened all his thoughts, bearing down on a certain spell, a Dark Arts one he had studied but never cast. That was not going to matter, though, not with his will and not with the strength of his magic.

Diduco mentem. It would divide and scatter Malfoy's thoughts to the point where he could never draw them back together; fragments and sparks of himself would wander into corners of the Ministry and the wizarding world. It had to be cast when the victim's mind was out of his body, tumbling helplessly through the air, and thus it wasn't often used. Albus thought it would be perfect for the moment before Malfoy managed to recover from the shock of the attack.

He waited a moment more, to be sure that Malfoy was engaged in fumbling for his magic, trying to figure out how to use it to perform a wandless Finite Incantatem on Harry.

Then he struck.

Draco felt a shock wave travel up to him and try to bear him out of Dumbledore's body. It had edges, and it had strength, and he knew it could cut him up or crush him if he stayed. The overwhelming impulse was to flee the foreign mind and go back to his own body.

But if he did that, then Dumbledore might kill him, or Harry.

Draco didn't want that to happen.

He instead turned and leaped as the shock wave of magic came at him, possessing it as, a moment ago, he had possessed the whole of Dumbledore's mind. He felt wrenched out of all proportions. Of course, he had no body now, and it had always been the body that he and Harry practiced with, and which he'd learned to wield like a weapon. Draco felt strange sensations crowding in on him, the reports of strange senses, and knew that trying to interpret them all would drive him mad.

And then he'd either die, or fade away, or return to his body and be helpless.

He forced himself to ignore all the oddities that being a piece of magic was giving him. He concentrated on only two things: the image of Harry screaming in pain at Dumbledore's hand, and one of the training exercises that his father had taught him long ago, when he was learning to control his accidental magic and move to a practice wand.

Can you envision the wand core? It will be dragon heartstring, or phoenix feather, or unicorn hair, because those are the cores from which Ollivander makes all his wands, and a Malfoy buys only from an Ollivander. Now, ignore the dissimilarities between the cores. What matters is that they are all long and thin. Your magic runs up them, constrained, narrow, and then spreads out of the end of the wand like a blade of sunshine. That is the image you must learn to master, Draco. Your accidental magic is too wide at the moment. It must be focused.

Draco had learned to focus; he'd managed his first spells with a practice wand while he was still very young. He fell easily into the old visualizations now. The piece of Dumbledore's magic he'd snatched wasn't a wand core, but the same principle applied. Draco compressed it firmly, and let his own magic pass through it like a narrow beam of sunshine, which widened when it had the room to spread.

He didn't know exactly what he'd done, but he knew, as if he had ears attuned only for this, that Dumbledore was in pain. He turned and sent the narrow beam of his own magic through the magic he'd possessed again, and this time felt whatever spell or trap Dumbledore had prepared tremble and shatter like ice.

Now he had to move quickly, because Dumbledore might try something back in the world of bodies. The quickest, the cleverest, the most imaginative wizard was the one who most often won on a battlefield, both his parents and Professor Snape had taught him, rather than the most powerful, because power didn't mean anything if you didn't know where to send it or what to do with it. Lashing out with accidental magic and hoping to hit something was so much less elegant than aiming a wand, chanting a spell, and having it do exactly what you wanted it to do.

Draco aimed himself. He forced and focused all his will onto one target: Harry free from the spell Dumbledore had cast and back in possession of his sanity. He remembered what he knew about inventing spells. Will was important, and need, but if he could give it an incantation to focus it, that was wonderful; raw, new magic responded best to incantations, following the example of countless other spells as they came into existence.

“Exsuscita!” he cried—if not aloud, then somewhere in his mind. He certainly seemed to hear the word, blowing past his ears on wings of fire. “Exsuscita iterum! Exsuscita iterum atque iterum!”

Awaken! he thought, flinging the words through the narrow core of his will, towards the vision at the end of his wand. Awaken a second time! Awaken again and again!

The words coiled through him like a tearing fire, or like a filament spun from his very being, pulling so much material from him that Draco wondered irrelevantly if this was what it felt like when a woman gave birth: the pulling and parting of her own flesh, the sudden separation of what had been a smaller piece of her. Then he lost all considerations of such things as his thoughts fell away from him, and he blended into pure white fire. There was a moment when he knew nothing but what he was doing. Awaken, act, rise, be awake--

The next moment, Dumbledore threw him out of his head.

Draco came back to himself in mid-tumble. He slammed into his body at the next moment, and if Dumbledore had flung a spell at him to try and kill him, it missed altogether. He bent over, his breath rasping in his throat, burning as if he had been breathing air thick with ice. He noticed the odd, thundering feeling around him again, but he still didn't know what it was, and he barely cared. Creating that spell on the fly had taken nearly everything out of him. He started to sag forward.

A hand caught him. Draco looked up. His heart bounded, and he found a new strength and cared again, as he realized that he had landed near Harry's head, and Harry was sitting up, his hand on Draco's arm to prevent him from falling. His eyes were fixed on Draco's face, solemn and wide-awake again.

Then dark snakes lashed into being around him, and the walls of the corridor turned to ice.

Harry turned to face Dumbledore. Draco stepped up, grinning, ready to help any way he could, and to enjoy the fun.

Harry heard the voice as a distant cry on the horizon at first. Bellatrix had removed his right hand and right foot, and was moving to start on his left foot. Her hoarse laughter never varied. Neither did the burning scarlet gaze fixed on him, and of course Harry had no way into unconsciousness to escape the pain.

Nevertheless, the voice was there, repeating, in Latin, "Awaken a second time!"

Harry blinked as the poison-colored sky of his hell began to burn. White flame was consuming it, bit by bit. Neither Voldemort nor Bellatrix appeared to notice, but Harry didn't care if they noticed or not. He wanted to escape, and he was beginning to think, for the first time since the horror had taken him, that perhaps this was not real, after all.

The voice soared again, triumphant as a diving falcon. "Exsuscita iterum atque iterum!"

The sky tore apart as if it were sliced by the dive of a falcon itself. Light poured in from every corner, and Harry remembered that this had happened once, and no matter what the pain, he had lived through it the once and had no reason to live through it again. He was not guilty of a crime that horrible. He was not ashamed of what he was, to think he had to return to the last days before his parents and Dumbledore were arrested and make things right again. And he was not that weak-minded, to think that he somehow deserved this.

The mental chains holding the horror in place slipped. Harry sprang upward as if he had wings, and then he was back in his body, and he knew the voice that had called him for Draco's.

He turned just in time to keep Draco from falling to the floor, and hoped that his eyes said all the things he didn't have the breath or the time to speak right now. Draco smiled as if he had heard them, and then moved to stand behind him as Harry felt his anger ride the air. Cold and snakes, he thought, the ways he always got angry.

And he was angry, but there was something more to it, this time. He recognized the thunderous feeling in the air, the shifting and stirring of power, though he didn't know what it meant. It said a prophecy was in motion, and from the spell Dumbledore had used and the way that Draco was standing at his right shoulder, Harry suspected he knew which one it was.

But that's impossible, his mind tried to chatter at him, distracting him. That would mean that the prophecy talked about Dumbledore and not Voldemort, and that's simply fucking impossible—

Harry shut the voice away. He had a Dark Lord to deal with, and the spell he could see the people in the corridor under, the same one that had enslaved him, had stripped away his every impulse to mercy. He meant to kill Dumbledore, now.

He moved a single step forward, noticing that Dumbledore had come back to his feet and was watching him calmly. At least, most people would have thought he was calm. His eyes had none of their usual twinkle, and they moved in more than one direction, instead of staying focused solely on Harry's face. He was frightened, Harry knew. Good. He should be.

He eased another step forward, Draco right behind him, a hand resting on his right shoulder now, and Dumbledore broke the silence.

"There is no need to settle this with violence, Harry," said Dumbledore, in a soft, pleasant voice that Harry just barely remembered from his childhood, when he'd used it to reinforce the lessons that Lily taught him. "We are both powerful wizards. We are both doing what we do for the good of the world. Why should we not form an alliance? I will speak for the rights of witches and wizards, and you can speak for the rights of magical creatures."

"I don't trust you," said Harry. He had never felt like this before. The whole world was crystalline, and forgiveness had no place in it. He saw a road leading him straight to Dumbledore, and at the end of that road was death. "Never again." He reached down into his magic, gathering it the way he had when he thought Voldemort had come to Hogwarts. The snakes and the ice vanished; Harry didn't have the strength to waste in frivolous displays of his anger. His magic began churning around him, not wild, but cold and calm and deep, a spreading maelstrom. Harry fixed his gaze on Dumbledore and waited to see how he would respond to that. Did he recognize the feeling of prophecy in the air?

"I can feel the thoughts of your parents, Harry," said Dumbledore. "Did you know that you are the central figure in your mother's nightmares?"

"I'm not surprised." Harry was pulling up strength that he didn't know he had, until the heavy feeling of his magic was barely distinguishable from the feeling of prophecy in the air.

"But don't you care about it?" Dumbledore twinkled at him now, but it was as false as the shine off leprechaun gold. "You could still change her mind, Harry. Go to her and show her how great and noble you truly are. We could heal her mind, together."

"I don't care about my parents anymore," Harry told him, and heard his voice come out as calm and flat as a glacier. He'd taken his magic away from the semi-permanent Levitation Charm around him; he wasn't likely to need it right now. Spread and spread and spread, and his magic had overwhelmed the feeling of prophecy. Harry nodded. He was nearly there. He'd nearly gathered enough strength to do what he wanted to do.

Dumbledore sighed. "I hoped I would not have to do this, Harry. I hoped even now you would see that the good of the wizarding world is little served by making me into your enemy. There is still Tom to fight."

"Both of you are my enemies," said Harry, and envisioned a smooth, icy, bottomless pit.

Dumbledore attacked.

Harry had expected it. The attack overwhelmed him, throwing him back into Draco, and he'd also expected that. Dumbledore was stronger than he was, after all. Where Harry's power could feel like boulders falling from a ceiling, Dumbledore's could feel like the whole Ministry coming down on their heads.

That didn't matter, not when Harry's magic seized it and funneled it straight past Harry, swallowing it harmlessly. This was not the snake Harry had used to constrain his gift at other points in the past. Instead, he was opening the pit he'd envisioned wider than the snake's mouth could ever go, and he wanted to drain all of Dumbledore's magic, not just the small amount he'd spend in attacking an enemy.

It was working. His power absorbed his enemy's power into itself, and it didn't touch him or Draco. Harry held Dumbledore's eyes, totally without pity, and waited for him to catch on.

Dumbledore's eyes widened, and then he launched such an avalanche of magic that Harry staggered, falling to one knee. But still he went on draining, his goal clear in his mind: Dumbledore a Muggle or a Squib, the way that Harry had never willingly made anyone but Lily.

The avalanche tumbled past him and into the icy pit, too.

Dumbledore's eyes narrowed. Harry felt him gather himself, reaching for old and familiar weapons, calling them, readying them, pointing them straight at his enemy. Harry raised his head and waited. He'd had a dim idea of what would happen from the moment he felt the prophecy in motion, and if he was right, then he could resist the attack.

If he was right.

But then, if he wasn't, no one else had a chance of facing Dumbledore, either, so he would succumb knowing he'd done the best he could.

The compulsion sank home into his mind like a knife, and it was simpler than Harry had thought it would be.

"Be what we trained you to be," Dumbledore whispered to him. "Be what you were for the ten years before you came to Hogwarts."

Harry felt his own mind surrounding the compulsion, aiding it in its persuasion. After all, wasn't that what he wanted? To be the obedient trained little puppet that Lily would have made him, safe to lurk in the background and lead no wars? In the shadows, he was responsible for no one but his brother. He didn't have to make hard decisions. It was not part of a war effort against him when Voldemort and Bellatrix took Durmstrang, but of the effort against his brother and the side of the Light. He hadn't needed to question; other people told him what to do and he did it. And other people didn't bother with trying to know or love him. It had been a shadowy paradise, the one he'd instinctively sought when Voldemort's curse had trapped him in his own mind on the day of the autumn equinox, the one his Complete Vanishing spell had mimicked when he'd known he might destroy Margaret in his anger.

Harry swayed. The compulsion could overbear him, not because Dumbledore was still that strong magically, but because it had assistance from his training and his own desires. Why not surrender? The compulsion made it sound so tempting, and once he was under it, Harry wouldn't know the difference between being forced to choose it and choosing it, anyway. He could have everything he wanted with just a bit of effort.

Everything would be so simple.

And Harry lowered his head and pushed back. Because nothing was simple, nothing was easy, and he knew that.

The knowledge had been bred in his bones and blood from the time he'd learned about the phoenix web—no, maybe from the time he'd begun to accept himself as part of Slytherin House—no, maybe from the time he realized that, no matter what he did, Draco was his friend. The moment the training had come in contact with the real world outside the isolation wards of Godric's Hollow, it had shattered. He was not that fragile, and he had grown around it and survived and lived and thrived, and he had made hard decisions, and no matter what he tried to think, these obligations would never release him, because those who wanted the power to change the world had to be prepared to bear the costs of changing the world.

He pushed and he pushed and he pushed, and he willed the compulsion to break, and it did, shattering into small flying shards.

Harry shook his head and stood. Yes, the prophecy had been right. He did have a kind of power the Dark Lord knew not. Dumbledore had never understood free will. He understood webs, and compulsion, and manipulation, but he did not understand the free choice to do something. He still thought, even now, that he could press a single button, tug a single string, and Harry would go back under control.

Harry felt his first coloring of pity for the man since this had begun, staining the clear dome of his anger, but he kept right on pulling Dumbledore's magic down into his pit. He did it with his eyes fastened on Dumbledore's, though that meant he had to see what happened to his face as he made him into a Squib, because Dumbledore deserved a witness to his agony, and Harry had chosen to be that witness. He felt the hand on his right shoulder clasp tight, and suspected that Draco was watching, as well, though perhaps more with vindictive glee than pity or anger or love.

Yes, love. I see now that I can't just love everyone without distinction and expect it to work out. Snape told me, but I didn't listen to him. Loving people so much that I hesitate to punish them can mean they escape to wreak harm on others that I love. How many people in the Ministry are suffering under Dumbledore's spell right now? How many wouldn't have had to suffer if I'd agreed to punishment for him long ago, when whatever happened to change his mind about Dark Arts hadn't happened?

It was a regret, but Harry didn't think he felt guilt. He saw, now. He saw what needed to happen, and he was prepared to do it.

At the same time, he saw what he was doing, what kind of step he was choosing, sacrificing one life for the good of others. His mouth tightened. It was no wonder that Vera, and Snape, and others, had said that he needed to see himself clearly. It wasn't just so that he could be vates. It was so that he didn't end up like Dumbledore. He had reacted violently against his own impulse to compel Connor at the trial, but that had been a conscious and aberrant thought. What would happen if he slipped into making other people do things unconsciously? He might never notice. And the people who loved and followed him might never notice, either. And if an enemy rose against him, would he treat him like Dumbledore had treated both Voldemort and Harry?

Not that Voldemort is right. But it's not as simple as right and wrong. It never was. I told Lily once that neither Dumbledore nor Voldemort had learned that lesson, and Dumbledore really hasn't. He must have thought that inflicting mental torture on the people around him was right, because he was the one doing it. He would never have done it just to rejoice in their pain.

So more compassion crept into his mind, but that didn't mean that it crept into his method of dealing with Dumbledore. Harry kept draining him. He knew what it meant, where it was going, and he accepted it.

Draco's hand tightened on his shoulder, and Harry leaned his head back towards him without glancing away from Dumbledore. "What is it, Draco?"

"I—aren't you finished yet?" Draco whispered. "Surely you must have taken all his magic by now. He just looks like an old man."

Harry nodded. He did. Dumbledore's robes didn't shine the way they had when he was Headmaster of Hogwarts, but hung limply on him. He no longer looked intimidating. His eyes wandered, and his breath came slow, and his hands were palsied. If Harry could have believed that Dumbledore would give up now that he had no more active magic, he would have stopped there.

But Dumbledore managed to look up and focus his eyes. Harry saw that steely spark of determination, that conviction of his own righteousness, and shook his head.

"Which is it?" Draco asked, sounding confused. "Yes or no?"

"He still has passive magic," Harry murmured, "the kind of thing that lets wizards live longer than most Muggles. He'll find a way to use that, Draco, if I leave it to him. I can't."

“But if you take it—” said Draco, and fell silent.

“Yes,” agreed Harry.

Draco looped his arms around his waist then, and Harry reached out. Albus could feel himself shaking. It both came and did not come from the fact that most of his magic was gone now. It came mostly from the doom that clanged in his mind like a knell.

He had felt the prophecy in the air, but dismissed it. Sybill could have made another prophecy while he was in prison, and of course he wouldn't have heard of it. That was probably the prophecy that was coming true now. None of the other prophecies fit this particular situation.

And then he'd realized that Malfoy was standing at Harry's right shoulder, and that Malfoy was older than Harry.

No.

That was the first tone of the bell in his mind, the first toll that indicated he might have been wrong. Albus wanted to step away, but his eyes were on Harry's as the boy drained his magic, and he found that he couldn't move unless Harry did. Wide and green and utterly merciless, those eyes looked at him, and they pinned him more effectively than any compulsion.

The prophecy surged and sang like foam on a shore as his magic drained away. The great force that guided the future was happy, as if Albus's loss of his magic, his defeat, could actually help a Seer's vision come true.

It does.

The second tone of doom, and Albus shuddered. He could hardly bear to think what this meant. He was not a Dark Lord. He could not be a Dark Lord. He had always served the Light, even when it took his magic. He'd never Declared for the Dark. How could he be what Tom was, enough that he'd taken his place in the prophecy?

But even more, how could the prophecy be wrong? Albus had based and built his actions for the last fifteen years around that version of the future. He'd known that they'd have to sacrifice Lily's boys from the time they were born at the end of July. He'd accepted that it meant the sacrifice of Peter, and the suppression of Harry's magic, and the absolute firm grip they'd gained—thought they'd gained—over the boy's mind. Someone born as the seventh month died, the younger of two, having the power the Dark Lord knew not—

Then Albus felt his heart swell. No, this couldn't be the prophecy coming true, could it? It couldn't! He hadn't given Connor his heart-shaped scar, and he hadn't inflicted a curse scar on Harry like Tom had. Besides, he was stronger than Harry, not equal to him in power. There was no way the prophecy could be talking about him.

Yes, it could.

The third sound of the bell rang through him, and Albus shuddered, as he remembered that Tom was also stronger than Harry, and perhaps "marking him as his equal" didn't mean what they'd all thought, and neither did "marking his heart." There was the phoenix web Albus had cast. That had marked Harry's mind, and he had certainly done it out of fear of Harry's magic, out of fear of what Harry would do and become when he grew up, just the way that Tom had ended up marking Harry's forehead out of fear of what the boy might do to oppose him when he grew up—

See how right this is? the bell of doom asked him.

Albus screamed. There seemed to be no air left in his lungs to make the sound, but he made it inside his head, and that was more than enough. The sound of his mistake was everywhere around him, ringing through his bones, making them crumble, making them tear and part and shred, his skin crumple and fall in on him, his heart labor and stop, as he realized that he'd been wrong, wrong—wrong! sang the bell—and created a waste and a mess in trying to fulfill a prophecy that had always been meant to claim him, that had descended on the one who had tried to save it like some great beast, that had recoiled on the hand that meant to wield it like an ungrateful whip, that was shredding the world into smaller and smaller pieces as he saw how unnecessary all the sacrifices had been.

It was almost a mercy when his heart stopped beating. It stopped the endless flight of the arrows of pain through him, the endless clanging of the bell in his mind.

Harry closed his eyes. It was done, and he didn't need to witness any more. He had swallowed every bit of passive magic that Dumbledore had, including the magic that had kept his heart beating for a hundred and fifty years, when it would have stopped much earlier if he was a Muggle.

He had anticipated what would happen when he did—or, he thought he had. It had still been horrible to watch magically delayed time snap back and take its vengeance, finding a Muggle body that should have aged and been dead and buried long since. Dumbledore's skin had fallen off, his organs had withered to dust, his eyesockets had turned empty, and his robes had become an elaborate shroud around a set of bones. Harry swallowed. Dumbledore was dead now, and it was done.

Well, almost done. Harry didn't really know what to do with the trapped magic, part of him and yet not part of him, churning at the bottom of the icy pit. Dumbledore's magic didn't taste quite as vicious and tainted as the magic the Death Eaters and Voldemort used, but it was slimy and greasy, like the film of the spell that had covered Harry's skin even in Hogwarts. He didn't want to swallow the magic. He didn't want it mixing with his own power, because it was mightier, and could overwhelm him like a greater quantity of poison overwhelming pure water.

Images flashed behind his eyes as he thought of a way to deal with it: the sea or the earth, which could swallow it, and the graveyard where Voldemort had told him about that particular power of earth, and the white light that had funneled from Augustus's staff as he broke through Voldemort's wards—

That's it.

He opened his eyes and turned to Draco. "Can I borrow your tie?" he asked. "I didn't put mine on before I went to the library."

Draco blinked, as if he had forgotten that there was such a thing as Slytherin school ties, and then undid his and handed it to him. Harry took it up and turned it around. A simple thing, green and silver, and made of cloth that was ridiculously fragile. He murmured a few preservation spells and sent the magic funneling through his gripping fingers, to make it strong enough.

Then he took up Dumbledore's captured magic and poured it into the tie.

The magic didn't want to go. It fought and twisted and rebounded back on itself, warping and coming up with cunning ways to slip away from him. Harry had the advantage, though, since he had trapped the power already, and the visualization of ice he'd used to contain it didn't have any holes or handholds to let it get out. In the end, it went where he told it to and poured into the tie.

When he opened his eyes, Draco's tie was glowing like the sun. After a moment, though, the magic settled into its new home and lost the sentience that it had grown under pressure. Harry let out a soft breath and stuffed the tie into a pocket of his robe.

"What are you going to do with that?" Draco asked in a high voice.

"I'd like to wrap it around a rock and throw it into the Atlantic, but somehow I don't think that would be safe enough," Harry muttered, and then blinked as he realized it wasn't Draco who'd spoken. He turned around, and found that the corridor was crowded with those people who'd been under Dumbledore's spell, silently staring at them. Harry flushed. Merlin knows how long they've been awake, or how much they saw, or what they think about it all.

He lifted his chin and tried to get back some semblance of dignity. "I'll have to talk to Minister Scrimgeour, of course," he said as coolly as he could. “Is there someone who can direct me to his office from here?”

Several people volunteered at once to be guides, from a woman clad in the robes of an Auror trainee to a man with multiple quills behind his ear who appeared to work in the Department of Magical Games and Sports. Harry caught mostly sidelong glances from them all, their eyes round and wide to the point of looking as if they hurt. They might have been awed, or frightened, or dreaming of getting free drinks from this story for a month.

Harry shook his head. I’ll be charged with murder, for all I know. I don’t think there are precedents for things like this.

He was more occupied, though, with trying to figure out why the prophecy had happened now as their merry little band trudged towards the lifts. Did that mean it didn’t apply to the defeat of Voldemort after all? Then why in the world had so many other things relating to Voldemort fit—the curse scar that he bore, for instance, and the fact that he and Connor had been born twins, appearing to fit the prophecy neatly?

Except that that wasn’t the only prophecy I’ve heard lately. Was it.

Harry had to half-close his eyes, but Acies’s whispering recital came back to him.

“Three on three the old one coils,
Three in its times, three in its choices,
It bears his rivals to silence and stillness,
And the wild Darkness laughs, and the Light rejoices.”

Harry hadn’t wondered what “the old one” was, so caught up had he been in the implications of the second quatrain and its storms. Now, he wondered if this prophecy was referring to an older prophecy—such as the one Trelawney had made sixteen, maybe even seventeen, years ago.

Can prophecies come true more than once? I don’t know. It’s something to ask Acies.

A more urgent concern tackled him as their little group at last reached the level of Scrimgeour's office.

If I'm right, that means it'll come true twice more. Who, besides Voldemort, do we have to face?

Chapter Sixty: Wake and Find It So

Rufus came back to himself suddenly. One moment he was learning a dozen new variations of Crucio under Lucius Malfoy's wand—he hadn't known the pain could be lifted and lowered like a flame, nor concentrated in one part of his body until he almost screamed for mercy—and the next he sprawled on the floor of his office, taking short, desperate breaths, the memory of phantom pain lifting like a miasma from his limbs. For long moments, he could only blink and touch his chest. His heart was laboring intensely, but it had not yet given up. Rufus would have hoped so. He would hate to think that a simple heart attack could kill him at any time in his life, especially now, when he was just hitting his stride as Minister.

Then he realized that it had been a spell, and it had ended, and that there were few wizards in the Ministry powerful enough to cast Capto Horrifer. On the other hand, that the spell had ended indicated that there might not be as much urgency in dealing with this as he had thought.

He sat up, deliberately not rushing, and headed over to Percy Weasley. The young man lay on his back, cheeks white as icing, and breathed frantically. Rufus yelled in his ear. That produced no results. Rufus nodded, and then slapped him hard across the face.

Percy started up with a gasp and a cry, narrowing missing hitting the Minister in the nose with his head. Then he leaned back and took deep gasps of air, and murmured, "What happened, sir?"

"Capto Horrifer." At Percy's blank look, Rufus rolled his eyes and elaborated. "A Dark spell that makes us relive the memories that terrified us most, but keeps on twisting and elaborating them until we don't know what's going to happen next. Some wizards go mad and commit suicide from the terror alone. It takes a lot of strength. Unless the wizard who cast this is right outside our door, the only ones who could have done this are You-Know-Who or Albus Dumbledore." He stood up, slowly, and grimaced as he felt how his bad leg ached. That wasn't a phantom pain. "I suggest, Weasley, that you brush up on your Dark spells as well as the laws and edicts."

Percy blushed, restoring some of the living color to his face, and Rufus heard him mutter something that sounded like, "The rules are important."

He'll never be an Auror until he loses that attitude. Rufus concealed a sigh. "So is surviving the curse coming at you," he snapped, and then stumped over and opened the office door.

Tonks leaned against the wall, her breath shallow but her eyes sane. She nodded at him. "Minister," she said. That was when Rufus noted the other signs. She was white around the lips, and her hair was pure white, like a unicorn. He knew the truth before she spoke it. "I—Dawlish is dead, sir. I've been up and down the hallway a little, to see if I could help anyone or find out who did this, and he was sprawled on the floor with his wand to his own temple."

Rufus grimaced. He wondered what memory a strong and self-assured Auror like Dawlish could have had to entice him to commit suicide, and then was glad he would never find out. "Thank you, Auror Tonks. Be on your guard, and pass the message to the others. I think, though, since the spell has stopped burning, that the crisis is past. Perhaps we'll find that there's been a successful Death Eater raid, or that the wizard who cast this is dead. That's the most likely reason for a Capto Horripher to end." He entertained a pleasant fantasy, for a moment, of what would happen if You-Know-Who was dead, but then dismissed it. That was fantasy, and he had to live in reality.

Tonks nodded at him, and Rufus retreated to his office. He could trust Tonks to tell who needed to be told about the ending of the spell. In the meantime, the last thing the wizarding world needed its Minister to do was wander around the Ministry poking into every corner. If Rufus could be absolutely assured that the spell was at an end and his people were ready to see him, he'd do it, but he couldn't, and there had been cases of those newly released from a Capto Horripher spell casting curses at whoever moved. He'd wait until he knew the extent of the danger.

In the meantime, he used this period to pause and recover. He sat down behind his desk and began sternly asking himself the Five Questions that Aurors come back after a battle in which they'd encountered a mind-twisting spell were always asked. He could hear Weasley droning them to himself, too, and was mildly impressed that he'd reached that phase in his training.

How do you know that this world is real?

By the feel of solid objects under his hands. That had always been Rufus's answer. He rapped his desk, and it gave back both a satisfying sound under his knuckles and a pressing bruise.

How do you know that what you saw was only a dream?

Rufus snorted wryly. Because I'm damn sure that Lucius Malfoy is working with Harry now. If he wasn't, if he were still running around in a Death Eater cloak and mask, Rufus would be on the hunt already.

How do you know that you are ready to return to the field?

Stupid question, that one, really, since Rufus did spend most of his time behind a desk now, but it could be adapted. He was ready to continue the work of the Ministry because he'd come out of the spell prepared, having recognized its nature, and sane, which was more than could be said for some people. Needs must, and he could.

How will you learn to recover from this spell?

The same way he always did, of course: distracting himself with paperwork, and talking to Grandmother Leonora's portrait about it. If there was a more sensible and rock-solid woman on the earth, Rufus didn't know about it.

Are you sure that you do not need a healer from St. Mungo's to aid you in your recovery?

After one disastrous experience that involved a powerful illusionist, two cats, and green goo, Rufus and the healers from St. Mungo's had made an agreement: they would only treat him for purely physical wounds, and he wouldn't hex them. The Five Questions had become Four Questions for him most of the time he was a field Auror. Rufus sighed and opened his eyes.

And then came the anger. Someone had cast the Capto Horrifer in the Ministry itself. If it was You-Know-Who, then Rufus was mostly angry at the ward-keepers who somehow hadn't managed to stop him from Apparating in and doing that. One expected that kind of mind-twisting spell from him, after all.

If it was Albus Dumbledore...

Rufus wasn't sure whom he was more angry at in that case, Dumbledore or himself. He had had indications that Hestia Jones had visited the man. He'd arranged for extra security on his cell in Tullianum, but obviously, he should have done more. Some other Order of the Phoenix member had probably found and freed him.

Of course, would Dumbledore cast a spell like this? Rufus found himself doubting that. Yes, the man was a child abuser, but it wasn't his kind of method. Even when he had his freedom and the means to choose any spell he liked, he'd still chosen a subtle compulsion spell that wouldn't automatically implicate him, that would have, if things had worked out in his favor, not even been noticeable as a spell. Capto Horrifer seemed too crude for him, and too direct.

He could only wait for news from below, he supposed.

Then Tonks flung open the door, took one excited step forward, somehow tripped on her robe, spun around twice, and slammed into his desk. Rufus leaped forward, first to catch her, and then, since he couldn't, to catch his inkwell before it could spill all over his paperwork. He shook his head when Tonks popped up immediately, not seeming fazed over her mishap.

"Sir! Sir, they said it was Dumbledore, and that he's dead, and that Harry Pot—I mean, Harry is on his way up!" Tonks was beaming, her hands working together. "They're saying that Harry killed him, sir!"

Rufus blinked, once, twice. Strong as Harry was, he'd known that Dumbledore was stronger, and he found himself wondering how Harry had managed this. Obviously, certain things had happened that he didn't know about yet.

“Send him in when he comes,” he said, and then sat behind his desk and tried to look composed.

Draco noticed, even if Harry didn't. Harry was prone to ignoring things like that, and right now his green eyes looked shuttered, gazing inward. He was probably dealing with matters of life and death and morality and how this had happened and whether he had done the right thing in killing the former Headmaster, Draco knew.

Whereas Draco spent their journey to Scrimgeour's office noticing the things that were truly important. The deference in the glances that their escorts gave Harry, for example. The idiot would probably think it was fear, if he bothered to look at them at all, but these people had been in the hallway where Harry—and Draco, too—destroyed Dumbledore. They had seen what he was doing, seen the expression on his face, seen that he wasn't some Dark Lord exulting in the task but an executioner mourning the necessity while never letting the necessity turn him away. Harry hadn't turned these people, at least, into creeping, cringing toads the way he might have thought he had. He had inspired them. They knew what their freedom and sanity had cost, and they were grateful for it. Harry had the core of more allies here, or friends, or sycophants, depending on how he played his cards.

Of course, the git wouldn't play his cards. He'd assume they were afraid, or he would refuse to acknowledge thanks as something he deserved. Draco decided that he couldn't let that happen, not when Harry had put down such beautiful and fertile soil.

He dropped behind Harry a little, until he walked next to the young woman in the robes of an Auror trainee. She studied him thoughtfully. Draco realized that she'd probably recognized his features—if not as those of a Malfoy, certainly a pureblood—and he inclined his head in a suitably regal nod.

“You know what he did?” he whispered, nodding forward to Harry.

The woman nodded back, her bright eyes implying that she enjoyed the game, and knew why he was whispering.

“He had some help, of course,” said Draco, anxious to establish that. “I came and rescued him. But once I freed him from the spell, he did what he did on his own. He defeated the man who’d imprisoned and mentally tortured everyone in the Ministry. And he won’t see it that way. He’ll see it as a killing. Could you help insure that that doesn’t become the general cast of thought in the Ministry?”

The young woman nodded. “I could. It would fulfill the debt I owe him. I was about to kill myself when the spell split. And then I watched everything that happened. I know what he did. It’s best not to confront him with it if he’d balk, perhaps, but just to have people ready and waiting if he does need them, hmmm?”

Draco nodded at her, impressed. “You’re quick. I like that.”

The woman smiled. “I was at his parents’ trial. I’ve admired him since then. And now this, to owe him a debt personally, and to do something besides the endless drills they put us through in Auror training—it’s heartening. I’ll move slowly at first, because I mostly have connections and not outright power right now, but I’ll do what I can to build him some allies here.”

Draco beamed at her, and then drew in a few other people who had noticed they were talking. The rest continued staring worshipfully at Harry. That was all right, Draco thought. Those would be the dancers who did anything Harry wanted. There had to be some. He was setting the music to a dance that would benefit Harry, but with its participants knowing that sometimes their leader was self-deluded, and other times didn’t even expect other people to acknowledge what he’d done.

It’s not going behind his back, Draco defended himself against the slight sting of his conscience. It’s being practical about the politics. That’s what Harry has to learn: that you actually have to ask people to do things, not just assume they’ll see what you believe in and fall into line. I’ll teach him whenever he asks, and to do that, I need to have some examples ready.

And if he had the beginnings of his own dance, it wouldn't hurt, Draco had to admit. He was growing increasingly frustrated with the tone of his father's letters, and increasingly wary of the confrontation he knew was coming with Lucius. Having people who looked at him with admiration could help him practically, and help him with his self-confidence when he at last had no choice but to face the old dragon in his den.

Harry let out a grunt he hadn't known he was capable of when he stepped into the Minister's office and saw both Scrimgeour and Percy alive and well. Certainly, if Scrimgeour had died under Dumbledore's spell, then they would have heard the message before they got this far, but there was nothing like seeing it with his own eyes.

"Sir," he said, nodding to the Minister.

"Harry," said Scrimgeour. "Malfoy." His voice on Draco's last name had a distinctly cool tone, but he nodded to him, and pointed his wand, murmuring a modified Summoning Charm. Two chairs skidded out from the wall and into the center of the office. "Have a seat." He eyed the crowd of people who had followed them like ducklings and added, "The rest of you will have to wait outside."

Amid much grumbling, and pokes from Tonks's wand, they did so. Harry was glad when the office door shut and he was alone with only two people who stared at him avidly. The gazes on their way upstairs had been bad enough. Harry had met a few of them, and didn't know what they wanted. He was puzzled by the lack of horror behind their eyes, too. Dumbledore had died in a stomach-turning way. Didn't that matter to them? To any of them?

"Tell me what happened," said Scrimgeour.

Harry took a deep breath and began describing the incident from the time he'd first noticed the burning of Dark magic to the south. When he reached the falling of Hogwarts's wards, he interrupted himself to exclaim, "Sir! Shouldn't we reach the Headmistress, and ask her—"

"She contacted me, actually, a few minutes ago," said Scrimgeour with a faint smile, nodding to the fireplace in a corner of his office.

“She said that she’d stabilized the wards for now. It rather looks as if they’ll have to be renewed each morning—there’s a structural weakness in them that she and the Deputy Headmaster can’t pinpoint yet—but she can manage that.”

Harry nodded, not reassured. Renewed each morning? Does that mean they’ll weaken during the night? That is not good news.

“I told them about you,” Scrimgeour added. “I’d received word from Tonks by then about what you’d done, though I want to hear the full story from you, of course. I think Professor Snape might have come through the flames to find you, but the Headmistress said she needed his help with the wards yet.”

Harry sighed with relief. That’s one confrontation postponed.

“You were about to tell me the rest of it?” Scrimgeour prompted.

Harry nodded, and took up his recitation again, scrimping on detail from the graveyard memory. He had to hand the narration over to Draco at that point, though, since he had no idea what had happened outside his head between the time he’d been caught and the time he’d awakened.

Draco lifted his head, all sleek pride and Slytherin cunning. “I have a bracelet that lets me know when Harry’s in danger, sir,” he said, displaying it. “I also have a family heirloom that let me make a wish to be transported to Harry’s side. When I arrived, I found that, thanks to the heirloom’s effects, I was immune to the Capto Horrifer spell.” Scrimgeour looked as if he would have very much liked to interrupt, but Draco went on, irresistible as the sweep of Professor Snape’s robes. “I entered Dumbledore’s mind and possessed his body.”

Harry blinked. He hadn’t expected Draco to reveal that gift, not when they’d worked so hard to keep it secret, and Draco had refused, in the wake of Midwinter, to tell even his parents.

“You can do that?” Scrimgeour’s voice was flat.

Draco inclined his head.

“And you did not let anyone know?”

“It’s an important advantage in battle, sir.” Draco raised his eyebrows. Harry had never heard his voice so perfectly composed. “I would not want word of it reaching Harry’s enemies too soon. And since I intend to be at his side for each and every one of his battles, I’ll be wielding it against those enemies. I trust you will understand the importance of that, and keep mum on the subject when we have left your office.” Harry choked; Draco had just managed to compliment the Minister’s discretion and insult his intelligence in the same sentence. “Should I have come to you the moment I learned about it and proclaimed it to the wizarding world? No, I think not. Harry has been training me. He trusts me to control his body.” Draco gave Harry a look that Harry was rather embarrassed to let Scrimgeour see. “And if he trusts me, to do that and to stand at his back, I rather think you should.”

Scrimgeour was silent for a long moment. Harry could see warring impulses in his face. One might have gone by the name of admiration for a good verbal duelist, and one looked as if it would prompt Scrimgeour to say damn Malfoys.

Instead, Scrimgeour just nodded, and then said, “I will not tell anyone now. If I find that it has been used to commit crimes, Mr. Malfoy, or interfere in the Ministry, you will find Aurors arresting you so fast your head will spin. Continue with your story.”

Draco nodded. “I possessed Dumbledore, but he is—was—a Legilimens, and he knew how to fight back and defend his own mind. He struck at me, but I felt the attack coming. I possessed the magic that he was using to attack me.”

“Is that even possible?” Harry asked in wonder. All their experiments so far had been with embodied possession. Harry had thought that Draco was strictly confined to the use of limbs, and, once freed from them, as he was in the passage between his mind and another person’s, he would be disoriented.

“It is,” said Draco. “Because I did it.”

Harry looked at him, sitting polished and proud on the chair beside him, and had to sit on his own sudden impulse. One did not snog one's boyfriend in front of the Minister, no matter how tempting he was.

"All right," he said. "Go on."

"I imagined that Dumbledore's magic was a wand, and I was the magic passing through the core," Draco said casually. "A visualization that my father taught me." Scrimgeour frowned, and Harry realized that Draco had been watching for that, and had mentioned his father on purpose. Draco seemed satisfied with whatever he'd got out of the Minister, and went on. "Then I did the same thing to myself, and created a spell that would wake Harry up."

Harry had to interrupt again. "On the fly."

Draco looked at him, a faint half-smile playing around the corners of his mouth. "Yes."

"With nothing but will and need and magic."

"I rather thought I just said that," Draco retorted haughtily. Then he paused. "Perhaps I didn't, at that," he admitted. "But, yes. That's what I did."

Harry shook his head, half-helpless with admiration. Draco bowed and extended his hand, his way of giving the story back to Harry. Harry finished with what he'd done to Dumbledore, still sneaking glances at Draco every now and then. But he turned sober again when he had to face Scrimgeour and ask, "Does that mean I'm charged with murder, sir?"

Scrimgeour snorted. "Of course not."

Harry blinked. "But, sir—"

"You destroyed a wizard who was mentally torturing my people," Scrimgeour interrupted, "including, no doubt, members of the Wizengamot who were in the building. He killed some of them. I don't know the full casualty list yet, but it includes at least one distinguished Auror.” Pain darted across Scrimgeour’s face like a flash of lightning. “On top of this, he’d already been arrested for child abuse charges, and he would have had the charges added for the compulsion spell he used when he was tried, and he’d wronged your friend Peter Pettigrew, and from the way you describe the battle, he was doing his best to kill you then. We could convene the Wizengamot, I suppose, Harry, but you can tell me what verdict they would reach, and they would most likely regard it as a waste of their time.”

“But I killed someone else,” Harry said. “There has to be some recompense for that, doesn’t there?”

“If you want to think of it that way,” said Scrimgeour, “then Dumbledore’s death was the recompense for the people he killed and sacrificed.”

Harry nodded slowly. He could adapt to the idea, he supposed. It still felt odd, unnatural, a tight constriction on his skin, and he no more liked what he’d done to Dumbledore than he liked what he’d done to Greyback. But maybe, as long as he could do what was necessary and still keep his humanity, he wouldn’t walk down the path Dumbledore had trod, justifying each death and pain as for the good of others.

I hope.

“Now,” Scrimgeour said, drawing his attention again, “I’ll pass the relevant aspects of the story onto my people.” He gave Draco a glance. “I’ll do it in such a way, Mr. Malfoy, that you are a hero and yet your possession abilities are not touched on. I’m sure that’s the way you wanted it.”

Sarcasm choked Scrimgeour’s voice like ivy, but Draco merely bowed his head. “Thank you, sir,” he said. “You’ve phrased it wonderfully.”

Scrimgeour shook his head. “I’ll also take care of arranging for the mental healing of my people,” he said, turning back to Harry. “I’ve handled Capto Horrifer victims before, and been through the spell myself. It’ll take some of them a while to heal, and some never will, and others, like Tonks, are already back to normal. I don't need your help here, Harry."

Harry blinked. "I—this feels rather as if you're shoving me away, sir," he said.

Scrimgeour laughed. "That's because I am, Harry. I want you to go home. You don't have to worry about murder charges. You've done your part in ending Dumbledore's magic, and the spell with it. You don't have to worry about the mental healing of all the people in the Ministry. You wouldn't be good at it, anyway, because you'd have to devote a lot of hours to just one person, and you'd also worry and fret over all the other people who were going unhealed in the meantime. It isn't your responsibility to get them back to normal. Go home."

Harry nodded, slowly, and stood up. Draco came to his side at once, and took his arm. "Tired?" he asked.

"A bit," Harry muttered, and then sighed. "Can we use your fireplace, sir?"

"Be my guests." Scrimgeour sat back in interest and watched as they cast the Floo powder into the flames and called for the Headmistress's office. Just before they stepped through the green fire, however, Scrimgeour called, "And Harry?"

Harry glanced over his shoulder. He was startled to see Scrimgeour completing a sweeping bow, the kind of gesture that pureblood wizards used to offer to the graves of fallen friends.

"Well fought," said Scrimgeour softly. "Thank you."

Harry nodded, throat tight in a new way, and stepped into the flames. He whirled through the Floo Network faster than he could remember going before—or maybe that was just his mingled anticipation and dread of their return—and barely stepped out of the way in time as Draco came surging through behind him. Draco snatched him around the waist again, not seeming to mind at all.

McGonagall rose from behind her desk to welcome them. Harry stared when he realized that two shadowy figures stood at her side, one a wizard and one a witch. The wizard smiled at them. The witch frowned, and fingered the silver clasp that held her long dark hair in place as if she were considering whether or not they still belonged in Hogwarts.

“Harry, Draco Malfoy,” said McGonagall, stumbling just a little on Harry’s lack of a last name, “may I introduce Godric Gryffindor and Rowena Ravenclaw? Or the specters of them, at least. They are bound to anchor-stones in Hogwarts, assisting the current Headmistress or Headmaster with her or his decisions. Currently, that’s maintaining the wards.” She grimaced. “I assume that Albus had something to do with them falling? It is like him.”

Harry nodded, caught between bowing to the two Founders and answering the Headmistress’s questions. He wound up making the gesture first, and then saying, “Yes, Madam. Dumbledore dropped the wards to keep you here and distract you, I think. He was attacking the Ministry with Capto Horrifer.” McGonagall’s face turned pale. “And—I’m sorry, Madam, but he’s dead. Dumbledore, I mean. I drained his magic completely and killed him.”

“Ah,” said the shade of Rowena Ravenclaw. She had a voice as sharp as the beak of her House’s eagle, and Harry winced, imagining what it must have been like for her students. Her dark eyes pierced him. “You are an absorbere, then. Interesting. I have not met a magic-swallower for some time.”

“I am,” said Harry. “I didn’t know there was a name for it, though.”

“There is a name for everything—” Rowena began, in the tones of someone who’d had to explain this before.

“Leave the boy be, Rowena.” Godric laid a restraining hand on her arm, his eyes bright as he gazed at Harry. “He’s been through a lot. Is what you said true, Harry? Is Albus really dead?”

“Yes. I’m sorry.”

"Don't be." Godric sighed. "He should have died a long time ago, really, when he first started going bad. It's better to perish while one is still noble, because then the death means more." He sounded as if he were quoting. "And he wound the wards around himself," he added, in a completely different tone, one of disgust. "I can't believe he would do that. No Headmaster has ever been so careless with the school's safety."

"No Headmaster has ever believed he was right as implacably as that one," Rowena snapped back, wrapping her waterfall of dark hair around her hands. "I told you that when we first met him."

"And then you trusted him, Rowena. All three of us did." Godric grinned. "Besides, I think one Headmistress did think she was as right as he did." He shot Rowena a sly glance and waited.

The Ravenclaw Founder began to splutter. McGonagall interrupted to say, "I'll thank you for the full tale later, Harry, but for now the wards are secure and you look like you're about to collapse. Take care of him, Mr. Malfoy."

"I will, Headmistress."

Harry wondered in outrage when he'd acquired so many caretakers, but it was true that all his expended effort was rushing on him at last, and he wobbled as they stood on the moving staircase. Draco wrapped an arm around him. Harry yawned. "I think I'll be all right with a bit of sleep," he said.

Snape was waiting for them at the bottom of the stairs. Harry stared hard into his eyes, and encountered nothing there of the anger he'd expected.

"I believe that you would not have left under your own power, Harry," he said. "We've had discussions about that."

Harry swallowed. "That's true," he said.

Snape turned, glittering-eyed, on Draco. "Mr. Malfoy, on the other hand, has no excuse for not informing me of his whereabouts."

Draco gulped. Harry leaned on the wall, and grinned, and prepared to enjoy someone else getting scolded for adventures for once.

Odd. Very odd.

Falco perched on the roof of the Owlery, still in his sea eagle form, to contemplate all he'd learned. He preened his feathers, always a good mindless activity, while his mind made its lists.

He'd arrived at the Ministry quickly, of course, and felt the pressure of both Albus's magic and another's. That would be the Harry Potter Albus had told him about, Falco guessed; he was dimly aware that the shard of himself he'd left floating on the surface of his mind, a sentry against disasters, had received and answered letters from Albus a few times in the last few years. Most recently, it had given him advice on spreading his compulsion like a mist and ensnaring this Harry he was so worried about.

But Albus hadn't said the boy was anything like this.

Falco had watched, his eyes grown sharp enough to pierce stone when he wanted them to, as Harry fought Albus. He'd drained his magic with control and precision, something that made Falco think well of him. He hadn't hesitated when he went for the kill, which was also a good trait, in moderation. He appeared to ponder on the morality of his actions, if the pensive expression on his face was any indication. Also good, at least when one was young and not enough above the false moralities of the world to see them all for what they were.

Falco was not yet sure what to do about him. This Harry seemed to be a Lord-level wizard he and magic could live with, on the surface. He hadn't Declared for Dark or Light, and he seemed to have no intention of doing so.

But.

But.

Now that the sentry shard of his mind was reunited with the rest, Falco recalled what Albus had said about this Harry being vates. That was simply impossible. Falco himself had tried and failed to walk the vates path when he was younger, multiple times. And if he could not do it, not even when he was four hundred years old and had the necessary wisdom and experience if anyone did, then how could a child do so? No, he was probably breaking webs and freeing magical creatures without a thought of the consequences more than one or two decades in the future. He had to think longer than that, though. Many magical creatures lived for centuries, and some were immortal, and wizards themselves lived longer than Muggles.

Besides, Falco understood something about being vates that no other wizard or witch who had tried to walk that thorny path did. The vates must achieve what he did without violating even his own will. That was impossible, for when the vates grew impatient and wanted to achieve his goals at the expense of others, and held himself back from doing so, he would frustrate his will. The moment Falco had understood that, he had turned away from that impossible task and never looked back. It was enough work, Merlin knew, trying to balance magic and insure that it was safe from its own inherent self-destructive tendencies.

So. This Harry was a careless child, who just happened to be an absorbere, and sometimes capable of balance, and sometimes swinging wildly like an errant compass needle. Falco would continue to watch him, and judge him, and judge the efforts of the man who called himself Voldemort, and see where and when his own efforts to preserve the balance should fall. At the moment, he rather thought he would have to work against both sides, frustrating Voldemort's efforts at world domination and Harry's careless snapping of bonds that existed for a reason.

No one else understands as much about balance as I do, Falco thought in resignation, spreading his wings so that he could detour to the north and look at Voldemort's camp. And sometimes it grows lonely.

Intermission: Ring the Changes

There should only be two blossoms on that branch.

Indigena paused to wipe sweat out of her eyes. She was in her largest greenhouse at Thornhall, her home for the past thirty years, which she hadn't seen in two months with the way her Lord kept her at his beck and call. The house elves had done well in tending the plants, but her absence had somehow made Indigena forget both the profusion of greenery and the heat inside the place.

She hadn't forgotten the way the plants should look, though, and Grandmother Tourmaline's bell-bush was a matter of special importance. Tourmaline Yaxley had invented the plant as a kind of early warning system. The center of the bush was a mass of hybrid branches, each of them carefully cultivated from a native tree or shrub of every place in the world that had a wizarding community; it had taken most of Tourmaline's life, and a lot of letter-writing, to get hold of them all. Bred together, they created a bundle of distinctive branches, one for each community. But the flowers were all the same, small and delicate bells with a clapper-shaped center that never stopped moving, even without the wind, and created delicate ringing sounds audible throughout most of the greenhouse.

The blossoms showed the presence of Lord-level wizards, and thus of Lords or Ladies, in each wizarding community. In Tourmaline's lifetime, the blossoms had been black for Dark Lords and white for Light Lords. Indigena had found that boring, so she'd changed it to deep green for Dark and gold for Light. Those were ancient and symbolic colors, too; Indigena still remembered reading about the Wars of Green and Gold, somewhere back in the dim mists of European wizarding history just after Merlin, when a Dark Lady and a Light Lady wearing those respective colors had contended against each other. And they made the bell-bush more pleasing to look at.

The bush was not thickly clustered; there were currently thirty-three Lord-level wizards in the whole of the world. Most of the blossoms were golden. Dark wizards might predominate in many other wizarding communities, but they weren't stupid. Light Lords were more likely to retreat into their dreams, while Dark Lords were more likely to blow up their houses. Thus they kept a rather stricter watch on Lord-level wizards than Britain tended to, and nipped the problems in the bud. The Australian branch was unusual in bearing two blossoms right now, one dark green and one golden, but those were two Lords so evenly matched in power and in hatred that they quarreled only with each other—no one else was a worthy competitor—and left the rest of the world alone.

The British branch had had a dark green blossom and a golden one for forty years. Then, fourteen years ago, another blossom had appeared and insisted, to Indigena's annoyance, on slowly becoming dark green stained with gold, like summer leaves in sunlight. She'd searched, to justify her curiosity, but had heard no rumors of another Lord-level wizard. Then the flower had withered into a blackened nub three years after it appeared, and Indigena had begun to suspect that Grandmother Tourmaline's breeding wasn't so flawless after that.

Well, of course she had been in the wrong, and the bush had been in the right, as she'd figured out when the green-gold bell had burst back into bloom overnight in the early summer nearly three years ago. Rumors had reached her, then, of a Lord-level child suddenly emerged into his power. Indigena had confirmed that Harry Potter's parents had been hiding him away—the reason she couldn't find him in the first place—and a bit more poking revealed the news about his bound magic, confirmed by the trial. His flower had died because he hadn't had the magic to act like a Lord, for a while. Mystery solved, Indigena had happily accepted her answers and gone about her gardening. She hadn't imagined then that it would ever be a matter of more than intellectual curiosity to her.

Now, it was rather more than a matter of intellectual curiosity to her, to note that the British branch had one dark green flower—Lord Voldemort's—Harry's green-gold one, and a new blossom, which was apparently attempting to be neither gold nor green and wound up looking rather sick, instead. The golden one had withered.

Indigena bit her lip thoughtfully and stepped forward. Her Lord would want to know about this. He knew about the loss of Dumbledore's magic, but a new Lord or Lady come into play would be entirely unexpected, and very much unwelcome. Indigena's hand hovered over the new flower.

There was a test she could perform to determine the new Lord's name and nature, but it would involve plucking his flower, and thus losing the ability to determine if his allegiance changed. Once picked, the blossom would never grow again. The bell-bush, and not just Harry's flower, was temperamental that way.

Indigena decided the loss of the future information was worth it. They needed information now. She plucked the blossom, and carried it back inside Thornhall, so that she could work with it.

Indigena sat beside the fire in her study and lifted a glass of mulled wine to herself. She thought she deserved it. She'd been clever and loyal, and, in being clever and loyal, secured a task that suited her very well.

Casting the flower into a bowl of pure water and speaking the incantation that Grandmother Tourmaline had recorded in her private journals over it had given her a name and a face. Falco Parkinson, the name was, and he had a long fall of silver hair and intense green eyes. Indigena had searched for information on him, and been surprised to find several books that recorded his deaths—his different deaths. The authors all claimed that the others were lying, of course, or hadn't done their research correctly, but Indigena was thinking now that this could be the work of a Lord-level illusionist, who'd withdrawn from the world for a while. He'd been able to fool Grandmother Tourmaline's bush, too.

He must have taken an active interest in the wizarding world again. That was the report Indigena had given her Dark Lord that night.

And Lord Voldemort had been alarmed, and assigned her at once to the task of obstructing Falco's purposes and making his life as difficult and dangerous as possible, without actually helping Harry.

Indigena had thought a moment, and proposed a way to do that. Her Lord took some convincing to agree. After all, while it fulfilled his conditions, it put Indigena's own spin on them, and Lord Voldemort had a hatred for others' creativity tainting his fine plans.

But, in the end, he had agreed.

Indigena knew it would take some time. But it would use the skills she considered most important, her cleverness and her ability to breed plants, and it kept her from having to participate in torture and killing, which frankly bored her. Well, there would be that one boring but necessary outing in the middle of February; Indigena had to agree that her Lord would need her on that one.

She'd wished, at first, that the Dark Lord had sent her to Durmstrang instead of Bellatrix. She would have enjoyed the challenge of keeping all the students as hostages and keeping anyone from getting into the school, as well as the rest from the blood and the gore. But now she was glad it hadn't happened.

She was already imagining the look on both Falco's face and Harry's when her schemes finally played out.

Indigena drank her wine and laughed out loud. I love it when I can show off my intelligence.

Chapter Sixty-One: Follow Me Into Night

Harry opened his eyes and sighed. Well, that was anticlimactic.

He had finally managed to separate the parts of his own mind from Draco's over the mental connection they shared, more than a week after the death of Dumbledore. He'd felt his own palms sweating as he lay down and swished through the grass of the Occlumency connection in the direction of Voldemort's mind. Then he'd waited to dream. When he'd gone hunting Voldemort earlier in the year, he'd leaped directly into the middle of the tunnel, and the Dark Lord had been able to control their battle. This time, Harry thought, if he just sat still, the vision would probably snatch him up as it had in the past when he was already sleeping.

And he'd fallen asleep, and dreamt of Voldemort and Indigena Yaxley in a large house, but they had discussed nothing interesting. The movement of supplies to Bellatrix in Durmstrang, the bribery of high-placed Ministry officials—conveniently omitting names—the last names of a few minor Dark pureblood families who might be swayed into becoming Voldemort's adherents. Nothing new, nothing exciting, nothing daring. Harry knew that was probably only coincidence, because Voldemort would have attacked him if he had known he was there, but still—

I hoped it would go better, my first night back.

Harry waited to go back to sleep, and waited, and waited. Every sound seemed to jostle and press him out of the slumber he drifted towards. Draco's snores, light though they were, made his eyes snap open. Blaise muttered and shifted in his bed, and it startled Harry as much as a knife suddenly pressed to his ribs. He curled closer to Argutus, who slept in a warm ball on his pillow, but the snake made a little hissing sound of complaint, and that went home like a curse.

Harry shook his head and sat up, then listened for some noise of Draco or Blaise stirring. Neither did. Harry relaxed and slipped carefully out of his bed and towards the door. Fawkes wasn't here—he had to catch his breath for a moment as sorrow swept over him—and so there was neither light nor song to alert the other boys. Harry padded out of the room and slipped the door shut behind him.

The Slytherin common room was empty except for one sixth-year boy who always seemed to fall asleep there and never woke unless someone shook his shoulder like wind shaking the Whomping Willow. Harry could sit on one of the couches and gaze into the fire and not be troubled.

He found that he couldn't, though. The sixth-year snored lustily. Harry felt his teeth set further and further on edge, and he sighed, shifting restlessly. Finally, after one snore that included a snort on the end, Harry stood and made his way to the door of the common room. Perhaps a touch of cold dungeon air was just what he needed to clear his head. It was too late for Snape to still be awake, almost midnight, or Harry would have gone to his private rooms and asked to sleep there.

He paused an inch from the door. Something is wrong.

He tried to dismiss it as the product of an overactive imagination; he couldn't sleep, and he was tired and cranky and ready to seek a magical explanation for it when he was just too much awake. But then the idea pressed insistently against his brain, and Harry realized that he could feel a large gathering of magic off to one side of the school. It felt like Cremo, or one of the other great fire spells. There were some that burned hot enough to melt stone, and if this one had come this far, then the wards weren't taking care of it.

The wards weaken at night, Harry remembered.

Harry flung the door to the common room open, thinking that he should find Headmistress McGonagall, assuming she didn't already know, and trying distractedly to feel where the spell was burning. The opposite side of the school, he thought, one of the Towers. He would go and help to quench the fire—

Then the darkness unfolded itself in front of him, and Evan Rosier dropped his Disillusionment Charm and stepped forward.

"If there were dreams to sell," he murmured, "what would you buy? Some cost a passing bell, some a light sigh." He aimed his wand at Harry's throat. "If there were dreams to sell, merry and sad to tell, and the crier rang the bell, what would you buy?"

"I don't have time for this right now," said Harry, moving forward a step so that the door to the Slytherin common room shut behind him. He was grateful that Snape had personally strengthened the wards on the dungeons. Unless Rosier had hung about long enough to hear the password, he was unlikely to be able to enter. "There's a fire."

Rosier smiled at him. "I know. I set it."

Harry narrowed his eyes. "Why?"

"I've come to sell you a dream, Harry," said Rosier. "But you were staying in that snug common room, and even the Insomnia Charm I used just for you wasn't working." He pouted at Harry. "So, the fire. It gets people busy so that they aren't looking for you, and I knew it would bring you out."

"I wouldn't trust you to sell me a treacle tart, Rosier." Harry fixed his eyes on the passageway beyond him. He could use a blast of magic that would spin Rosier into the wall, knock him out, and bind him. He started to build it. "And I'm going to help with the fire now, thank you."

"I thought you might be like that," said Rosier. "Some people are simply too ungrateful, even when all they've ever wanted is about to come true." He reached behind him, into the corner where he'd been standing, and tugged something else under a Disillusionment Charm to his side. "So I brought someone else to talk to you about buying your dream."

He dropped the Charm with a flourish. Hermione, pale and silent, stood in front of him, shivering when Rosier moved his hand to touch the silver collar around her neck. Harry froze, recognizing it.

"Isn't this a pretty thing for the naughty girl I caught sneaking down to visit her boyfriend?" Rosier crooned. He nodded seriously at Harry. "And of course you know what this pretty thing can do, since you used one of them to kill Mulciber last year. I've modified it a bit, you know. It'll explode on my command. A nonverbal spell, just a twitch of a thought. Or it'll explode in an hour from the time I first offered you your dream. And you've already used two minutes of that." He smiled at Harry. "Will you buy your dream now?"

Harry did his best not to remember Mulciber's death, the shards of silver that had sliced open his throat. If the same thing happened to Hermione, he could not live with his guilt. He kept his eyes fixed on Rosier's face. "You haven't said what this marvelous thing is that you're offering me."

Rosier applauded silently above Hermione's head. "You do pay attention when you want to," he said. "Excellent. 'Marvelous thing' is an excellent description for this dream, Harry. You should have been a poet yourself. You would have ended more happily than the poet selling dreams did, you know. Tried to cut off his own leg and then finally poisoned himself. Poor, miserable man. He really couldn't stand being a Squib."

"Tell me what it is, Rosier," Harry said, seeing the way Hermione's eyes widened, knowing another minute had passed, and now trying not to think about her in Rosier's hands for an hour or more.

"A way into Durmstrang," said Rosier.

Harry stared at him.

"You saved my life in the graveyard," said the older wizard, with a sigh, as if Harry were rather dim. "I don't like it, but there you are. And I still have some friends among the Death Eaters. I've told you that before. I've acquired a Portkey that will take us inside the school with disturbing the lightning ward. There, I rather think we should be able to kill Bella, and even have some fun with her before we do. Wouldn't you like to do that, Harry? I know that you're a saint sometimes, but you're human, too. You must want revenge on her for what she did to your hand. A dream come true, like I said."

Harry laughed in desperation. The sound bubbled out of his throat in a way that made Hermione's eyes widen, and he forced himself to stop. Four minutes wasted. At least.

He took a deep breath and shook his head. "Why in the world should I trust you, Rosier?" he asked. "For all I know, that Portkey might take me anywhere, and I've never thought you would be someone to honor a life debt. This isn't a dream."

"Thus my naughty little girl here." Rosier began stroking his fingers through Hermione's hair. He'd put his wand away in his pocket at some point, which Harry didn't remember passing. "To make sure that you do. If you don't follow me, then I kill her, Harry. Not to mention that all those children in Durmstrang keep suffering under Bella. I've heard that she's ordering them to fuck each other now. Do you really want to be responsible for that?"

Harry hesitated, shivering. Rosier swept all of Hermione's hair away from her neck and bent to place a kiss on the silver collar, crooning, "Sweet and sweet is their poisoned note, the little snakes of silver throat, in mossy skulls that nest and lie, ever singing, 'Die, oh! die.'"

It was the way Hermione stood very still as Rosier's lips passed near her skin that decided Harry. He burst out, "Fine! I'll come with you to Durmstrang. Just leave her alone."

Rosier smiled at him and let Hermione go with a shove at him, so that Harry had to catch her. He did, and spent a long moment looking into her eyes, trying to smile in reassurance. Hermione did her best to smile back, but her eyes shut, and she huddled against Harry as if trying to erase the memory of what Rosier had done to her.

"It'll be all right," Harry whispered to her. "I promise, it'll be all right."

"So long as we're back in fifty minutes," said Rosier brightly. Harry looked up to see him holding a smooth, flat white stone that was probably the Portkey. "And be a good girl, Hermione, and don't tell anyone what that collar around your neck does. I can feel it vibrating if you speak."

Hermione nodded, her eyes still tightly shut, her face as pale as parchment.

“Good girl,” said Rosier tenderly, and then motioned to Harry.

Harry took a few steps forward and reached out to grasp the stone, knowing as he did so that he was betraying other people. Snape had trusted him not to leave without permission, and now he was doing that. McGonagall could use his help to contain Rosier’s fire, and now he wouldn’t be here to help. Charles and Thomas and his other allies had assumed he would leave the Durmstrang problem up to those who had the time and leisure to do the research. Draco would be infuriated that Harry had left the common room at all when the wards were weak.

But he looked again at Hermione in the moment before his hand closed on the pebble, and he knew that he would do the same thing again—for any of his friends or allies caught in the same predicament, really. No one deserved what Hermione must have lived through in the past hour, what she was still suffering with the delicate touch of the silver collar around her throat.

His hand closed on the stone. Rosier cried out, “Portus!”

The world around Harry dissolved into patches of green and black and white as the Portkey sprang to life. He felt a moment’s wonder that it actually was a Portkey and not some magical weapon designed to kill him, and then he had to wonder, of course, if they would actually get where Rosier claimed they were going.

They did, or they appeared to. The Portkey deposited them into a small stone room that looked like a closet to Harry, from the brooms and mops in the corners. And it was cold. He shivered as the ice seemed to cut through him, and wind, though of course they were shut off from the open air. He looked at Rosier. “Is it all right to cast a Warming Charm?” he whispered.

Rosier, who was looking out the door of the closet, shrugged. “So long as you make it wandless. Bella would feel any magic cast with a wand right now.”

Harry cast the charm, and immediately felt better. "You don't look cold," he observed, as he came up beside Rosier, for the lack of something better to say.

He could only see half Rosier's profile, since the man was busy peering up and down the hall, but he made out the smile. "When you've hung on thorns intent on eating your heart for two months," said Rosier softly, "cold doesn't seem to really matter anymore, and neither does hunger, and neither does sorrow. Poetry does," he added, as if he thought he should clarify that for Harry. "But poetry always matters."

Harry shuddered. In other words, Yaxley's torture made him even more insane. Well, Harry would have been surprised if it hadn't been so.

"This direction," Rosier said abruptly, and wrenched the closet door open. Harry jumped at the sound, but walked briskly behind him as they headed towards a great space of light and warmth. How long did Hermione have? Forty-five minutes? If they were lucky, Harry thought.

They halted in the shadows just outside what Harry knew must be Durmstrang's Great Hall, and Rosier gripped his shoulder, holding him still. Harry fought not to just tear the hand off him; it would make too much noise. "There," Rosier whispered. "There she is. I don't know what object she'll have attached Ariadne's Web to, but it won't be too far away."

"Object?" Harry whispered, wondering, once again, if this had been wise. Perhaps Rosier really only had brought him here to fuck with his mind. But, once again, what could he have done?

Rosier nodded at him. "Ariadne's Web can't be broken from the inside," he murmured. "And she can cause death or pain to anyone in it with the twitch of a thought. From the inside, it really does look just like a single, smooth, seamless web, the way a spider's web appears to a fly trapped inside it. But from the outside, you can see that it's attached to some object in the caster's possession. We have to find out what that is and destroy it. Otherwise, you can shred the web, but she'll just reestablish it by linking the threads back to the object, like a spider using the same chair leg to weave its web as before."

"Would killing her work?" Harry asked quietly.

Rosier nodded. "It would, but we still have to identify the object. That's the weak point, the one where you begin shredding it."

Anyone else, Harry thought, would have told me that in reverse order to the way Rosier did. But given everything else he had to be irritated or frightened about, this was a very minor complaint. He took a deep breath, and turned his gaze fully into the Great Hall, which he hadn't dared do before.

It didn't resemble Hogwarts's Great Hall. The ceiling was lower, and not enchanted. The walls held carvings in the stone instead of banners, showing what Harry assumed was a series of battles; he couldn't tell that much about them from his angle, which was low on the wall, around a corner, and in the southwestern portion of the hall. A pile of cloth in the corner said that tapestries might once have hung here, but Bellatrix had removed them. A single large, round wooden table stood in the center of the room, with children sitting stiffly around it.

On a dais at the head of the hall was Bellatrix, sitting on a dark throne, wrapped in furs, and laughing. "Go on," she said to two people on the floor in front of the dais, gesturing with her right hand. "Go on."

Harry looked at the people she was talking to. They looked tall, sixth-year or seventh-year students probably, but from this distance Harry couldn't tell if they were boys or girls; the bundled furs they wore made it hard to be sure. They moved towards each other and tentatively kissed, shivering in a way that had nothing to do with cold, while Bellatrix laughed and laughed.

Harry closed his eyes tightly. He had thought that Rosier's words about Bellatrix making the students fuck was exaggeration on his part, but it seemed they weren't.

"Forty minutes until Hermione dies," said Rosier helpfully.

Harry nodded, and wasn't sure whom he was nodding to. "She won't sense wandless magic?" he whispered. "Are you absolutely sure of that?"

Rosier nodded. "She didn't sense your charm, did she?"

Harry smiled. It felt grim even to him, and whatever it looked like to Rosier, it appeared to delight him. "Then I'll get up on the dais and look for whatever object she's hooked the web to. Extabesco plene," he added, and the spell he'd invented for completely hiding from people arose and enwrapped him. It still felt a bit odd to stride into the middle of the hall with it, but no one glanced at him.

As he got closer, he could see better. The two students Bellatrix was forcing to kiss were a tall girl with an unhappy, pale face, and Charles's son Owen. Harry swallowed a breath of protest and moved forward again, staring intently at the dais. It could be the throne of black rock Bellatrix sat in, or one of the furs wound richly about her, but he didn't think so. Neither vibrated with magic. It was probably some object hidden under the thick white and sable furs, instead.

"Now," Bellatrix announced, "take your clothes off."

Harry felt his shoulders jerk as if someone had pulled on a string attached to them. Owen turned and looked up at Bellatrix, never making a sound. A moment later, though, he did, as he fell down. His right leg was obviously broken, with no more than the slightest twitch from Bellatrix.

"I promise," Bella said, when she had finished laughing at Owen's pain, "you won't feel the cold when you get going. Since it appears that you'll have to lie down on top of him, just do it now." She nodded briskly to the girl who'd been kissing Owen. The girl knelt at once, though Harry could see the tremors racing in her limbs and knew how badly she must want to defy the older witch.

Harry imagined days on days of this, trapped in the school with a madwoman, knowing she could cause you pain or death with the slightest whim, never knowing if rescue was coming, having hope die day by day—

He shook his head and stepped forward, mounting the last step of the dais. Bellatrix looked straight through him, of course. Harry looked hard at her, trying to see any faint strands of a web that might connect to her, trying desperately not to let the sounds from behind influence him.

Nothing, nothing, nothing. The furs wrapped close around Bellatrix's feet and legs, not leaving much room for an object to sit on the floor underneath them. Perhaps something rested in the chair next to her, but Harry couldn't see it, if so; both throne and furs lapped her to the point of making her look like one of the fat queens from centuries ago. Harry stepped up right behind her, reminding himself that no one could sense him, and stared down at Bellatrix's lap, wondering if the object rested there.

No. Not with her. On her.

Harry saw the faint blue lines racing to and away from her right hand, the hand that had once been his before Bellatrix transformed it, and nodded once. That was it, then. Bellatrix had insured that no one could steal the object from her easily, or Voldemort had insured it. Of course they had. They were quite clever, in their own mad, limited way.

He took a deep breath. He would need to drop his hiding spell before he could use the spell he intended to use, since all his magic was currently trapped under the shield with him. And that meant he would appear right next to Bellatrix for at least a moment, and Merlin knew what she might do.

He told himself to be quick, to get on with it. One, two, three—

“Why, hello, Bella.”

Harry froze as Rosier strolled into the hall and stood on the far side of the wooden table, smiling disarmingly up at the dais. Bellatrix looked up from Owen and the girl, and her eyes shone like marble. Then she cackled.

“Evan,” she purred. “Come home to the flock, did you? Or did you only come to watch my little games?”

“Only the latter, I’m afraid, Bella.” Rosier bowed to her, sounding sorrowful. “Because, as the poet says, dear and dear is the poisoned note—”

“Oh, don’t bore me with your poets, Evan,” Bellatrix snapped, and wriggled her thumb. Harry saw a girl at the table lurch upright, choking. “You know I don’t like them. And don’t get any closer to me, or you’ll be the cause of at least one girl’s death.” She nodded to the child she was choking.

Rosier laughed. “Do you think I care, Bella?” he asked, drawing his wand. “Who insured that the children were alive as they hung outside Ottery St. Catchpole, after all, and that it took so long to get them down?”

Harry shook his head. The information that Rosier had been responsible for the Children’s Massacre in the First War was indeed startling, but he couldn’t let Rosier control his actions. A girl was choking. Owen lay on the floor with a broken leg. Regardless of what Rosier had in mind, or didn’t, Harry knew he had to strike now.

He dropped his Complete Vanishing spell. Bellatrix sensed the rush of magic, or perhaps only the sudden presence of someone beside her where no one had been before, and turned her head to stare at him.

Harry didn’t wait. “Sectumsemptra!”

And as if it had been a year before, as if she didn’t know what she was doing, Bellatrix lurched backward from the curse with a scream, and lifted her right arm to defend her chest and face, and the spell neatly sliced her right hand off at the wrist. The hand soared across the dais, spinning and sending blood up and down in obscene pinwheels, but Harry had been waiting for that. “Accio hand!” he called, and the grotesque thing turned and flew straight back to him.

He held it close for a moment, looking at it. There was no sign that it had once been his hand, and sat on the end of his left wrist. Bellatrix had changed not only the direction of the fingers, but the complexion of the skin and its size, so that it fit on her own arm. Harry found that he didn’t feel much as he held it. Resentment, of course, but far more resentment of the way she had treated the children in Durmstrang. He shook his head and began to gather his magic.

“You’ll never destroy it, Potter!”

Harry looked up. Bellatrix, covered in blood, bits of bone sticking out of her right wrist, handless now—and, Harry could also clearly see now that the furs had fallen away, with her breasts gone—was laughing at him like a maddened werewolf. She shook her head, back and forth, back and forth.

“It was yours! You’ll want to retain it, keep it, charm it around and put it back on your wrist!” She leaned forward, as if conveying a great secret. “You could, you know,” she whispered. “It would be easier than finding out what curses I used on your arm and removing them all. There are curses under curses, Potter, traps under traps.”

It took Harry a moment to realize what she was saying, and then he stared. Had that really been why Voldemort and Bellatrix chose to link the Ariadne’s Web to her right hand? Because it had been his, and they thought he could never bring himself to destroy it?

“You don’t know me at all,” Harry whispered, and spoke the spell aloud, just because he could, not because he had to. “Concremo!”

The fire burst from his right hand, augmented by a blue tinge that Harry thought came from the phoenix fire he still hadn’t learned to control, spreading up and down his palm and fringing it in flames. They ate Bellatrix’s hand from the inside, turning the fingers to blacked bones and then to ashes, boiling the blood, withering the skin and then eating it entirely. The blue lines of Ariadne’s Web leading from it puffed into nonexistence. Harry stepped back, casting a Levitation Charm, and the hand hovered in midair, burning, so that everyone could see it. Bellatrix watched with a gaping mouth. Most of the children were either uncomprehending or taking large breaths as they seemed to realize the web that had held them was being destroyed. Rosier laughed aloud.

When the fire finished, then Bellatrix began to scream, hysterical, mindless cries that made Harry wrinkle his nose. The very last of her sanity was gone now, he knew. He thought about capturing her and taking her along. He could give her to the Ministry. Under Veritaserum, she could tell them much about Voldemort's plans. And with the object she'd linked the web to destroyed, she wasn't about to reestablish it.

Rosier cast the Severing Curse. Harry swung around, ready to deflect it if it was aimed at him or one of the children, but it struck past him and laid Bellatrix open from breastbone to ankles. The way she screamed then was something Harry knew he would hear in his nightmares for the rest of his life, and the furs lost their black and white color under the flood of gore from her body.

"Finish her, Harry!" Rosier called out, his voice high and tight with excitement.

Harry swallowed his revulsion. He had no choice; Rosier might strike at one of the Durmstrang children if he didn't, and Bellatrix was otherwise condemned to a slow death. He could use the Killing Curse, but he had no wish to use the Unforgivable in front of a castle of children who had already experienced enough.

He locked his eyes with Bellatrix's and willed her dead, pressing against the parts of her brain that kept her alive with Legilimency. Bellatrix wavered for a moment—using Legilimency on someone insane was incredibly hard, as Snape had taught him—but then her eyes closed, and she sighed, and the screaming stopped. Harry had to turn away. He was afraid he would be ill if he kept staring at her body.

"Well done, Harry!"

Harry glanced at the middle of the Great Hall to see Rosier leaping up and down excitedly and clapping his hands together. The children just stared from around him, their eyes tired and dead and unable to believe they were free.

Harry swallowed. "It's going to be all right," he said, and the same reassurance he had given Hermione rang hollow, even to him. "I—" He shook his head. None of the lies he could speak to them now were at all inspiring. He turned and glanced at Owen, who was fighting his way back to his feet. "Can you cast that communication spell and tell your father that Durmstrang is free now?" He reached out to the lightning ward that surrounded the school and pulled powerfully at it. It shredded easily; they were simple to take down from the inside, as many books had said unhelpfully, maddeningly, to him.

"I can," said Owen steadily. Another boy who looked almost exactly like him came up behind him and supported his head and shoulders; Harry knew it must be his twin brother Michael. A word over Owen's broken leg, and the pain in his face eased. Harry glanced along the table, and found the girl Bellatrix had choked being stroked and soothed by other students.

"Good," said Harry, and turned back to Rosier. "We have to go back to Hogwarts. I want to make sure that you free Hermione."

"Would I do something else?" Rosier asked, and then he laughed and bowed. "Forgive me, Harry. Of course I would. And since you killed Bellatrix so sweetly, doing what I asked of you like an aimed weapon, then of course I will free Hermione." He held up the white stone, and Harry strode forward and gripped it.

They started to whirl out just as other people Apparated into the hall. Harry caught a glimpse of Charles's startled face, and could only shrug before the Portkey took him. Charles, with other parents, must have been watching for the moment the lightning ward fell. At least they were here now, and could comfort their children.

He and Rosier landed roughly in the hall outside the Slytherin common room, and Harry found Hermione standing utterly still, the silver collar still in place around her neck. Rosier strode forward and stood stroking it for a moment.

“Take it off,” Harry said. “Now.”

Rosier clucked his tongue at him. “I hardly think that you’re in any position to be so impatient, Harry. I could still destroy her with a thought.” But he drew the silver collar slowly off Hermione’s neck, his fingers lingering on her skin. Hermione turned her face away and trembled, then swallowed several times. Rosier laughed.

“The next time I see you,” Harry said to his back, “I’m going to kill you.”

Rosier glanced at him over his shoulder, eyes tranquil. “I know,” he said. “But that’s all right. My life debt is fulfilled. I won’t ever come near you with as little protection again. Oh, and Harry?”

Harry stood still, wondering if it wouldn’t be the best course to kill Rosier now, and ready to do so if he made the least motion towards Hermione.

“Tell Henrietta Bulstrode to watch her back.” Rosier smiled at him, and Apparated out, proving once and for all to Harry how weak a state the Hogwarts wards were in. The moment he was gone, Hermione swayed as if she might collapse.

Harry moved forward to gather her in his arms, closing his eyes. He felt helpless. The mental scars Rosier had given Hermione tonight, and the ones that the Durmstrang children had suffered, were beyond his ability to heal or even soothe. Hermione held fast to him and cried frantically, and Harry could be her support, but he wanted to do so much more, and he didn’t think he could.

“Mr.—Harry.”

Harry looked up wearily. Professor McGonagall stood in front of him, her lips thinned to a precise line, and behind her was Snape, voice gone in his rage. Harry looked down. The fire must be under control, or they would never have left it to come looking for me.

He knew he would face more than scolding; he would face anger and bitter disappointment, especially once they knew whom he had gone with. But that would have to happen. Tonight had been poisonous, full of no easy decisions except in the moment that he had shredded Ariadne's Web. Now Harry had to set himself and face the purging of the poison, which promised to be no less painful.

"Yes, Madam?" he asked.

Chapter Sixty-Two: Everybody Yells At Harry

Harry followed obediently enough behind McGonagall and Snape until he realized that they were going to the Headmistress's office. Then he slowed until they looked at him, and nodded at Hermione, still wrapped in the circle of his arms.

"I don't think she should have to hear what you say to me," he said softly. "Can you find someone to escort her back to Gryffindor Tower?"

"I hardly think—" Snape began.

"But I did not, either, and I have to admit, Miss Granger needs attention," said McGonagall, in a much softer voice than she'd used on Harry. "Miss Granger, if you would like me to call Mr. Weasley and Mr. Potter? They are both awake, as the fire started burning on the outside of Gryffindor Tower."

Hermione said a word that might have been "please." McGonagall took it that way, at least, and turned away, red wards manifesting around her as she moved. She touched one of them, and a small creature that looked like a lion made of fire leaped away from her, vanishing but trailing a small comet-tail behind it. McGonagall caught Harry's gaze, and explained, "Since I set the wards in Gryffindor Tower when I was still Head of House, I can summon my students who live in that House."

Harry nodded. "Have you figured out the structural weakness in the wards yet, Madam?" he asked.

Whether because of the subject or for Hermione's sake, McGonagall was at least willing to discuss this without yelling at him. Snape looked as if he became more angry with each moment the scolding was delayed, but McGonagall ignored his tight noise of disapproval. "Not yet, Mr.—Harry." She sighed. "The Founders know that the weakness is somewhere in the tunnels of Hogwarts, but the Founders have access to all those tunnels. They know everything that is in them. It is much easier to survey them from an anchor-stone than it is walking through them on foot. And they have searched them all, and reported no holes to me. It is rather as if the wards are water we pour into soil, and they soak into the soil and vanish.” McGonagall gestured to the red wards glowing around her. “These are strong because I renewed them when I was up in the Tower, but they will start fading again in a few hours’ time. We don’t know what happened, and if Albus was still here, I think I would strangle him before I could get answers out of him.”

Harry smiled in spite of himself. A moment later, footsteps pounded down the corridor, and Connor and Ron appeared in front of them. Their hair was wild—Connor’s almost as wild as Harry’s own—and their faces were covered with soot in which tear tracks of sweat had appeared.

“Hermione!”

“Harry!”

They spoke so nearly in unison that Harry found it difficult to tell who had said what. McGonagall nodded as if both words made sense. “Miss Granger was captured by the wizard who set the fire,” she said. “Please take her back to Gryffindor Tower and make her as comfortable as possible.”

Ron reached out, and Hermione shook herself free of Harry and went to him, burying her face in his neck with a little sob. Harry could understand why. She’d been in Rosier’s company for however long it took the Insomnia Charm to wake Harry up and Rosier to decide to set the fire instead. She needed the soothing of close friends now, and he wasn’t one of them, no matter how he wished to be.

Connor, though he looked at Hermione with an anxious expression, turned back to watching Harry in a moment. “Are you all right?” he whispered.

Harry shrugged. “It’s a snakebite,” he said, which he knew confused Connor, but expressed his feelings on the matter as eloquently as possible. “I’ll recover.”

In a moment, he regretted the metaphor as he found Snape's fingers gripping his arm and turning it. "Where were you bitten?" Snape asked, in a voice that anyone else might have found emotionless. Harry could hear the pounded-down emotions within it, flat flakes of worry and concern and rage.

"I didn't mean it literally," said Harry softly, drawing his arm free. "Just that Rosier's poisoned the whole night with his presence."

"Rosier?" Connor exclaimed. Hermione gave a muffled moan at the sound of his name, and Ron began moving back towards the Tower.

Harry managed a fleeting smile at his brother. "Don't worry. The next time I see him, I'm going to kill him. I told him that."

"You should have done it this time!" Snape all but barked. When Harry looked at him, he could see his face darkening with the onrush of rage.

"Mr. Potter, Mr. Weasley, please escort Miss Granger to the Tower now," said McGonagall quickly. Connor looked disappointed, but he put his arm around Hermione's free shoulder and started moving with her towards the stairs. McGonagall turned fiercely on Snape in the next moment. "We are not doing this in the hallway, Severus. I agree that we need to talk to Harry, but we'll do it in the privacy of my office. Mr. Malfoy is already waiting there, in any case," she added, with a sidelong glance at Harry.

Harry bowed his head. He could imagine how frantic Draco would be, particularly if he woke from a random dream and found Harry gone.

But underneath the penitence was a growing seed of frustration. What else could he have done? Rosier would have killed Hermione with a thought before Harry could strike him, likely, especially given that Harry didn't have any magic ready or a spell on his lips when he met them. And Hermione's death would have distracted Harry further, perhaps even giving Rosier time to get away.

It was a situation that could only have ended badly for everyone. In another world, Harry supposed, he might have cared little enough about Hermione to risk her death, but in this one he hadn't. He had made a poisoned decision, but all decisions this night were poisoned. He had thought that the yelling he knew McGonagall and Snape and Draco would do would prove cathartic, at least for them. Now he wondered if anything could purge the venom gathering under his skin.

Snape kept silent, with an obviously supreme effort, until they were riding the moving staircase up to McGonagall's office. Then he said, "I trusted you to tell me before you considered leaving the school, Harry. It seems I was wrong to trust you, at least on that score."

Harry let his eyes unfocus as he tried to count stones in the wall. He had thought it would be easy to submit to this scolding; he'd had so many of them before. But now he found sarcasm burning on his tongue, sharp as the Many's poison. The little snake stirred in his pocket as he thought of her, and Harry knew she would spit in Snape's eyes and blind him if he merely asked. He shook his head. The vision wasn't tempting. He wanted to spit his own words instead.

Snape saw the headshake, and his voice sharpened. "Is this your way of telling me that I should not trust you at all, Harry? Perhaps my first instincts, the ones I had last year, were right, then, and I do need to cast monitoring spells on you. Or perhaps I should use the potions that let parents know the emotional state of their infants at once, as you seem prone to following yours rather than coming and getting an adult, or someone who stands outside the situation and can see rationally."

Harry swallowed, and swallowed again. They didn't know everything yet. They knew about the fire, and that he had gone, and that Hermione had been hurt. Perhaps when they heard every detail, they would understand that rational thought was less than useless in this particular venture.

"Will you tell us what happened, Harry?"

McGonagall was the one who said that, and Harry turned to her gratefully. "Yes," he said softly. "When we get into your office, Headmistress. I think Draco should hear this, too."

She nodded, and then they arrived at the top of the staircase and she opened the door. Harry saw several conjured chairs in the moment before Draco flung himself out of one and threw his arms around Harry.

"I didn't even know," he breathed. "I didn't know where you were. The bracelet said that you were alive and healthy, so Professor Snape convinced me not to use it to go after you."

"He was right," said Harry softly, stepping out of the embrace, glad that Draco was apparently more reasonable than Harry had thought he would be. "I went to Durmstrang."

Draco's face turned the color of ashes. "You what?" he said, and now Harry could see the anger building in him. "But you promised, Harry. You said that you would leave the research on Durmstrang to wizards and witches who could handle it because they were the parents of children there. You took the first chance to free the school that came along, didn't you?"

"I wouldn't call Evan Rosier much of a chance," Harry said. "Certainly not the one I would have chosen."

"Rosier was here?" Draco stared at him as if he were mad.

Harry nodded, and then, seeing a way to deflect anger from him for a while, glanced at McGonagall. "Is the school safe to stay open, Headmistress?" he asked. "If the wards are going to drain every night, I mean."

McGonagall sat down behind her desk, looking very tired. "Yes," she said quietly. "I've described the problem to several ward-builders at the Ministry, and they said it sounds familiar. They're coming tomorrow to strengthen the wards and prevent them from draining. If they couldn't have done anything, then I would have sincerely considered closing Hogwarts, or asking you to construct a lightning ward that included both the school and Hogsmeade."

Harry nodded. "That's how Rosier got in," he said. "Apparating, because the wards are so weak. He set the fire and seized Hermione when he found her in the halls. He put a collar on her like the one Mulciber wore last year, the one that I exploded when I killed him. He said that hers would trigger at a thought, to kill her.”

“And you believed him?”

Harry turned to stare at Snape as his guardian took one of the chairs. “What do you mean?”

“I investigated those collars last year after Mulciber’s death,” said Snape in a glacial voice. “They are clever, but an inherently inflexible design, one that can only be altered in a number of select ways. They can control thoughts, and block them from outside influences. They will also hurt the victim if removed by force. But only someone with as much magic as you could make one burst, Harry. At most, Rosier might have used that collar to compel Miss Granger to do what he wanted her to do, or encouraged you to free and thus hurt her. And that is all.”

Harry bit his lip. “I didn’t think he was bluffing,” he said. “This was Evan Rosier. He plays riddles and tricks and games, but he doesn’t bluff.” And running a bluff like that would add to the thrill of the game for him, added the darker part of his mind, the one that came closer to understanding Rosier than he would have liked.

“You don’t know that!” Snape roared, and leaned forward. “You didn’t even consider the possibility, though you know he is a liar! You believed him without question! That is what must stop, Harry! This senseless risking of your life on the word of your enemies, as if you trust your enemies more than your friends—“

“Enough, Severus,” McGonagall interrupted. Harry turned to see that she was sitting behind her desk. “I, for one, would like to hear the whole story without interruption. And I suspect that there will be time for scolding later.” She smiled at Harry, but with steel behind the sympathy. “Please sit down, Harry.”

Harry sat down, took a deep breath, and resumed the story. “Rosier said that he’d used an Insomnia Charm to get me out of the common room, but that didn’t work fast enough for his tastes, so he set the fire.

Sure enough, I came rushing out, and he had Hermione with her collar. He claimed that he wanted to pay a life debt he'd incurred when I set him free of Yaxley's thorns in the graveyard and healed him. If I refused, he'd make the collar explode and Hermione die." Harry shuddered convulsively as he remembered the look in Hermione's eyes when Rosier pulled her forward. "I don't know what he'd already done to her. You'll want to talk to her, Headmistress." McGonagall nodded, lips thin.

"He had a Portkey that he'd 'obtained' from loyal Death Eaters; he still has contacts among them. He said it would take us to Durmstrang, behind the lightning ward. And if we took too long, Hermione would also die, because the collar would explode an hour from the moment he offered me the Portkey."

"Even though it could not have," said Snape, contempt in every note of his voice. "Even though you were taking a foolish and suicidal risk in grasping the Portkey of a known madman."

"I agree," said Draco.

"Please, gentlemen," said McGonagall. "Let Harry finish his story."

Harry breathed deeply for a long moment, so that what came out would be the words of that story and not his rage. Then he said, "I thought I had no choice. I agreed, and we did indeed go to Durmstrang."

"Coincidence," Snape muttered. "Not a sign that you could trust him."

Harry found that his fingers hurt, and looked down. He was vaguely surprised to see them gripping the side of his chair so hard the knuckles had turned white. He swallowed and continued. "Bellatrix had an object that Ariadne's Web linked to. It turned out to be her right hand. I was going to cut it off, but Rosier revealed himself and taunted Bellatrix into injuring a girl before I could. So I had to reveal myself and cut it off then. Bellatrix thought I wouldn't destroy it because it had been my hand." He saw Draco pale from the corner of his eye. "I did burn it, though, and the web was gone. Then Rosier used a Severing Curse on Bellatrix, and I killed her; she was mad and in pain. I couldn't stay long to reassure the children at Durmstrang. I was afraid Hermione's collar would explode any moment and kill her. We came back here, and Rosier kept his word to remove the collar and leave." Harry stirred uneasily, remembering his last words. "He also made a threat against Henrietta Bulstrode."

"Mrs. Bulstrode should prove tougher prey than he thinks," McGonagall murmured. Harry nodded, remembering the way McGonagall had watched Henrietta at their meetings in the Room of Requirement.

"But I still want to warn her," he added.

"That can come later." Snape had got control of his voice now, and it was only furiously quiet instead of furiously loud. It sounded more like a whip that way, though, and Harry flinched as he listened. "First, Harry, I want you to explain what you thought you were doing."

"Saving Hermione's life," said Harry, as distinctly as he could amid the conflicting impulses to lower his eyes and just listen, and the one to defend himself.

"Even though the collar was fake," Snape said.

"Yes."

"And would you have given your life for any student like that?" Snape sneered. "I had thought that your circle of senseless sacrifices had grown smaller, so that we only had to worry about the safety of a certain number of people as connected to you. Or am I wrong? Would you sacrifice your life to save an Augurey chick hatched yesterday?"

Harry took a deep breath. "No one deserves to suffer at Evan Rosier's hands," he said. "And what he asked for wasn't a hostage exchange, or to kill me instead of her. He wanted something within my power. So, yes, I did it."

"You did not answer my question." Snape's face was now white to the lips. "Any student? The Augurey chick?"

“The Augurey chick, I don’t know,” said Harry softly. “Any student?” He considered his response. Snape wasn’t going to like it. On the other hand, Snape was also staring into his eyes and would know if he lied. “Yes.”

Snape leaned forward like a viper. Harry found himself shrinking back in his chair. He hadn’t known Snape could move so fast. “That is what we must heal,” Snape snarled. “That is what you must give up. You know what importance your life holds to those around you, Harry. And if you will not think of that—if you cannot think of that when your enemies are threatening other students with nonexistent magic—then think of your importance to the war effort and the prophecy. You told me that you believe the way you and Draco defeated Dumbledore was only the first iteration of the prophecy, that two more are to come. And who do you think will stand before those Dark Lords if you are dead?”

“He didn’t want to kill me, I said,” Harry forced out between his teeth, clamping down on the urge to say something unforgivable. “I had an excellent chance of surviving the evening.”

“You didn’t know that.” Snape’s voice only got lower and more intense. “He could have taken you to Voldemort with that Portkey, or dropped you down a bottomless pit. You had no way of knowing, and still you gripped that Portkey. You do seem to trust your enemies better than your friends.”

Harry closed his eyes, mostly to keep Snape from seeing his anger. “It has nothing to do with that, sir, and everything to do with making the best decision I could under impossible circumstances,” he said quietly.

“And why did you not simply kill Rosier?” Snape asked. “You could have done that, Harry, the moment you saw him. Then you would have spared Miss Granger’s life and secured your own safety.”

“And forfeited the chance to save the children at Durmstrang.”

“You can’t use that as an argument, Harry,” Draco said from his other side. “You admitted that you didn’t know what Rosier was going to do with that Portkey, and you had no way to be sure that he was telling the truth. So you can't say that the way it turned out was for the best. You didn't know how it would turn out then."

Harry had to admit that. "All right," he said. "But you know very well why I didn't kill him. I don't just—I don't just kill people."

"And that is an attitude you will need to lose around Rosier," said Snape.

"I did say that I would kill him the next time I met him," Harry protested.

"But you didn't kill him before he Apparated away," Draco said. "He's alive to make trouble for you in the future."

Harry ran his hand through his hair, and suppressed the impulse to spring up and pace, mostly because he was sure McGonagall wouldn't like it. He looked at the Headmistress, whose face was hard in that way that made it impossible to guess what kind of homework or detentions she would assign next. "What do you think of this, Madam?" he asked her.

McGonagall nodded a little, as if she'd been waiting for someone to ask her her opinion. "I think that you did the best you could under very hard circumstances, Harry," she said. "But you need to think of the future. And you need to take precautions that will satisfy your guardian and your—" She shook her head as if all the words she could use to describe Draco's relationship with him were too undignified for her to utter. "I'm not sure what those will be. But I encourage you to take them." She stood. "And if I'm not mistaken, more visitors are arriving now, perhaps to see that you are back, or perhaps because they know that Durmstrang is free."

She stepped forward and opened the door to her office before anyone could knock. Narcissa Malfoy looked startled for half a second, before she gave a stiff nod to McGonagall. McGonagall nodded back even more stiffly, as if the fate of the world depended on the way she bent her neck. Harry knew the two women didn't like each other, but he'd rarely seen it so clearly expressed.

Narcissa swept into the room, and focused on Harry. Harry was gratified to see an expression of relief cross her face for a moment, as if she hadn't been sure she would find Harry alive and well until she saw him. But then her features cooled, and she swept forward and held her left arm out to Harry.

"Do you know what this is, Harry?"

He looked down in dread, expecting to see some cousin to the Dark Mark, but found only three parallel lines. Two of them looked as if they were already healing. The third was still open and bleeding. Harry leaned back, staring at her face, and shook his head.

"They are the marks of my oath of vengeance," said Narcissa in a casual voice, "the one I took to make Bellatrix suffer three times over. I had inflicted two of those penalties on her, with the taking of her left hand and the cutting off of her breasts. Now I find that it is impossible for me to fulfill my oath, because someone else has killed her." She leaned forward until she was staring at Harry from an inch away. "I swore that knowing there was a chance that I would not fulfill it," she said quietly, "that someone else would slay Bella in battle before I had the chance to make her suffer again. But I never thought, Harry, that it would be you, someone who knew about my oath and has had first-hand experience with how vicious vows can be."

Harry winced. "What happens now?" he asked, because everyone, from Narcissa herself to Lucius, standing motionless in the door, seemed to expect it.

"I don't know," said Narcissa, drawing away. "It's been centuries since someone dared to swear and then violate that oath. But it will almost certainly wait in my future, fanged, trying to trap me into the greatest misfortune it can. It was Dark magic I invoked. And Dark magic is more unforgiving than the Light magic you favor, Harry, or the reckless magic of heroism." She shook her head and stepped away from him. "When Charles contacted us to tell us about Durmstrang, and that you'd killed Bellatrix, I felt as if I were falling."

Harry looked away, but in doing that, he caught Lucius's eyes, which said he should have done anything rather than kill Bellatrix and damn Narcissa. He looked at his hand, shame winning out over his anger again.

"So your reckless act has had consequences for people beyond yourself and Miss Granger, Harry," said Snape, his voice deep with some emotion Harry didn't want to examine too closely. "What have you to say now? Will you think twice about risking your life in the future, or will the desire to be a hero overcome you and make you dash off again?"

He paused, telling Harry it wasn't a rhetorical question. He swallowed. "It wasn't like that," he whispered. "I didn't do it out of desire to be a hero."

"But you were thinking less about your own life and more about the lives of others," Draco said. "Is that a fair summary, Harry?"

"Yes, but—"

"You are only making excuses, now," said Snape. "You know that what you did was reckless, and there is no reason but the greatest good luck for it to have turned out as well as it did. You are acting like a child, Harry, after some time of making progress. And if you will not agree to some restrictions of your own free will, you will drive us to measures you hate, simply to ease our fears."

"I didn't mean to do that," said Harry, thinking of Hermione's lack of expression, thinking of the way that the pain in Owen's face had eased when his brother healed him. It hadn't just been the pain of his broken leg. "I didn't—there were other concerns at stake—"

"Not as important as your life," said Draco, and settled a possessive arm around his waist. "Nothing is as important as your life."

"I just—there are times when—"

"You should have thought," said Snape, and his voice had a smugness that sank claws into Harry's temper. "You should have remembered that your enemy was a known liar and a Death Eater who would stop at nothing to hurt you. You were foolish to trust whatever honor he pretended to observe with the life debt. Foolishness, childishness, and perhaps lack of thought? Do those complete the list of your mistakes? No, they do not—“

“Stop it!”

Harry hadn't known he would shout before he lifted his voice to do it. It appeared to startle most of the other people in the room, too. Narcissa took a step away from him, and Snape shut up, and Draco's arm fell limply from his waist. The look in Lucius's eyes grew colder. McGonagall blinked.

“I did the best I could with what I thought I knew at the time and the circumstances I had,” said Harry. He realized he'd stood up, too. He didn't remember doing that. He stared at Snape's face, trying to make him see reason. “I didn't know that about the silver collars, sir, because you never told me. And I did believe he would kill Hermione. And once I was at Durmstrang, I did what I thought I had to do. If I hadn't killed her, Mrs. Malfoy, then Rosier would have. I'm sorry about the oath, but it was going to be broken no matter what happened tonight.” As he spoke, he grew calmer, but he could feel the leashed beast of his temper straining under the surface. If they just accepted this, as he hoped they would, then he wouldn't have to shout any more.

Snape, of course, didn't accept it.

“The main problem, Harry, is that you did not think,” he said. “You claim to have changed, but you still follow your instincts in such situations, and not your thoughts. If I were in your place, I would have—“

“Shut up,” said Harry, with such ugly force in his voice that Snape did. “If you were in my place, you would have done wonderfully. Of course you say that. But you weren't in it, were you? And it's very easy to judge from the outside, isn't it, the way you judge the failure of your students in Potions? And you judge, you snipe, you snap, instead of for just once trying something else—“ He struggled, and managed to restrain the words that wanted to burst forth. They were too personal to say in front of other people. He was not a pathetic child wanting something more than that judgment from Snape. He wasn't.

"If someone outside your situation could see what needed to be done so clearly—" Snape began.

"You weren't there!" Harry screamed at him. "None of you ever are! That's why I have to make decisions on my own, because I'm the only one who's bloody there, and my enemies aren't the kind to wait around politely while I debate morality in my head! And yes, sometimes, I think a missed night of sleep is more than enough recompense for my endangering my life, which happens all the time anyway! At least this time I got something out of it!"

"But that's what you say every time," Draco protested.

Harry turned on him. "No, most of the time I just accept your scolding as deserved, Draco," he snarled. "I might argue a little, but then I give in and promise that I won't do it again. And we both know those promises are false, because Voldemort—stop flinching, Merlin damn you!—won't stop using those techniques. Because they work. It's useless for me to promise that I won't go away without consulting you, because then I'll end up betraying something deeper."

"Like what?" Draco had risen to his feet in turn, and though his face was pale, he spoke challengingly.

"Everything I am, for a start," Harry said. "And the same thing will happen when I start killing in cold blood without asking questions, or when I start dithering and sacrificing lives in a situation that calls for direct action. Sometimes, all I can do is survive. Tell me something, show me a way, that lets me do something else, and I'll do that. But I'm not going to become the kind of hardened soldier you think I should be. I escaped from that. That's the way Lily trained me to be, a silent soldier who accepts sacrifices as sad but necessary. I won't go back to that. I've fought too hard. So, sorry, Draco, but I won't place myself above other people just because I'm important to you, or because I'm important to the war effort."

"You have to," Draco said, and his face had turned paler. "Sometimes, Harry, you have to. If Voldemort is going to kill a dozen children in front of you, and says that he'll spare their lives if you just come down to him, would you really give up your life?"

"I'd do what I could," said Harry. "And then, yes, Draco, I would suffer for it, and question whether I couldn't have made a better decision. I'll fight this war my own way. It'll always be my own way. I'm not Dumbledore, and I'm not Voldemort, and I'm not a Malfoy. And I'm not just in love with you, though it's an important part of who I am." He glanced sideways at Snape. "And I'm not just your ward, either, and you don't seem to understand that. I'm not going to submit to the kind of restrictions you want, because they're stupid restrictions, and they would interfere with my life more than Rosier wants to. I want more than other people want for me. Sometimes," he added, choking on the bitterness that bubbled up his throat, "I don't know whether you've really accepted that I've started healing, even though you encouraged me to do it. I'm healing into a person who wants more than just what the two of you think I should want. And sometimes I think that you don't know that any more than Lily did."

The silence in the wake of that was boulder-heavy. Snape's face had assumed an expression Harry had no name for. Draco had put out a hand towards Harry, but he retracted it towards his side now, snapping it into a fist. His face had turned the color of whey.

"I'm tired," Harry finished. "And I survived, and I did the best I thought I could under the circumstances." He nodded to Narcissa, who watched him as if he were someone she had never seen before. "And, Mrs. Malfoy, I'm sorry about your oath, but I won't be responsible for the breaking of it. You knew the risk when you made it. You're an adult. If I allow that to you, will you allow my mistakes to me?"

Narcissa shook her head, but Harry wasn't sure what part of his declaration she was answering. Harry moved towards the door.

Lucius stood in his way.

Harry met his eyes and waited. Lucius inclined his head an infinitesimal amount and stood aside.

Harry went down the moving staircase more rapidly than it wanted to go, springing from step to step, and made his way as quickly as he could to a window. He didn't want to go outside, not when the wards were this weak, though he wished he could spring on a broom and fly. He leaned out the window, though, and panted in the cool air, which made his throat burn with something other than the anger that had flayed it so far. Harry leaned his head on his hand and stared up at the sky, which showed only stars.

Light pierced the darkness near him. He blinked at the sky, and then the hall, and then his hand. Phoenix fire was surging in it again, responding, Harry supposed, to his emotions. He could sing, too, if he wanted.

Harry closed his eyes and swallowed the song, and willed the fire to lie down. He was something more than what Fawkes had given him, something more than Draco's boyfriend, something more than Snape's ward, something more than the war leader of the alliance and Voldemort's enemy. If he wasn't going to let the label "abused child" define him, then why should he let others close on him like chains? He wouldn't, and perhaps he'd been wrong and that wasn't what other people wanted to do to him, but it was what he felt they'd done to him, and he shivered with pain and anger and fear of being caged, and that was all right. No need to go crawling back to Snape and Draco and ask their forgiveness at once, not if what they'd taught him was true. No need to go talk to Vera, because these emotions weren't unnatural or the product of his training. He was feeling, thinking, as himself, and it was all right.

He opened his eyes slowly, and looked at the stars again. His breathing had slowed, and the emotions felt less bitter and poisonous than they had before, as if he didn't need to tear himself apart just because he'd felt them.

Perhaps this was a purging, after all.

And then, since he was tired, he stood and turned back towards the dungeons, so that he could get some sleep.

Chapter Sixty-Three: Cousin Arcturus Had a Sense of Humor

January 22nd, 1995

Dear Harry:

I am writing to thank you for freeing my children from Durmstrang and the control of that madwoman. Thank you seems inadequate to express my true gratitude, but unfortunately—or perhaps fortunately, considering the use to which they would sometimes be put—English does not contain other words that approach what I mean, either. I have had the tale from Owen and Michael both, how you appeared, how you severed Bellatrix's hand, and how you destroyed it. Owen was close enough to hear what she whispered to you, and I can only say that destroying your own flesh when the Dark Lord's minions had already cut it from your body may be accounted another sacrifice. They know you could not stay and why. Thank you for pulling down the lightning ward as well; it served as a signal to us that something had changed inside the school, and not something Bellatrix would have wanted. I was part of a shift of parents watching that night. We Apparated in immediately, of course.

I am writing this letter because I understand, from speaking with Mr. Malfoy, that some people view your actions very differently than I do. A spoken communication to you may not be believed. A written letter, you may show to whomever you like, and they will then see that one of your allies stands behind you whatever may come from now on, snow or lightning or high water.

Yours in all gratitude that the English language offers, and some that it does not,

Charles Rosier-Henlin.

Harry folded the letter carefully, and slid it into his pocket. The eagle-owl that carried it had found him at the top of the Owlery, where he'd come to visit Hedwig. Harry supposed it was meant to find him at the school table, where no one could miss that someone was pleased enough with Harry to send such a magnificent bird, but this was just as well. Harry had the choice now of concealing that he'd received post, if he wanted.

Hedwig made a jealous sound as Harry fed the eagle-owl a treat. The eagle-owl gave her a look of glacial contempt which Hedwig returned. Then she turned back to Harry and ran a strand of hair through her beak, nibbling at it.

"Yes, you're still my favorite," Harry reassured her, turning around so that he could pet her. Sometimes it was a pain having no hand on the opposite side.

Hedwig hooted proudly at the eagle-owl, but it had already lost interest in them and launched itself towards the Owlery window. Harry shook his head as he watched it fly away. The sky beyond the window was a clear pearly-gray, already shedding opportunistic flakes of snow. Harry knew it would only get more bitterly cold as the week wore on. He wasn't looking forward to playing against Ravenclaw this weekend, though Warming Charms and thick robes would protect them when they flew.

"Harry?"

Surprised, he turned his head, and then blinked. Connor stood in the Owlery entrance behind him, sticking his hands into his robe pockets as the chill penetrated his skin. Harry had spoken with him yesterday and told him the story of the fight with Draco and Snape—the first of whom had tried to talk about what had happened with him in such a way that showed he wasn't ready to admit the rightness of anything Harry said, and whom he'd walked away from—but he hadn't expected Connor to find him this morning.

"I thought you might like some company when you walk down to breakfast," said Connor quietly. "I know it's usually with Malfoy, and, well..." He shrugged as if he were embarrassed to be bringing it up now, and scratched the back of his neck.

"That's welcome, Connor, actually. Thank you." Harry let Hedwig go with one final scratch to her breast feathers, and then reached up and drew Argutus gently out of his sleeve. "You said to let you know when we were leaving the cold place” he told the snake, who refused to trust Warming Charms to actually keep him warm.

“Now we are? Good.” Argutus lifted his head out and tested the air with his tongue, seeming ready to hide again until Harry and Connor actually walked through the door and down the steps. “It is beyond me why you wish to come to the cold places. You should stay in the warm places and sleep when you feel bad. In fact, you should stay in the warm places and sleep even when you do not feel bad. It keeps you healthy.”

Harry smiled and shook his head. Argutus understood little of the terms of the argument that Harry, Draco, and Snape had had, so he conceived it to mean that Harry “felt bad,” and should therefore spend a lot of time in bed with his faithful snake coiled around him. He’d been disappointed when Harry got up yesterday and insisted on studying and eating and moving around.

“There’s one thing I still don’t understand.”

Harry glanced back at Connor to make sure that he would speak English. “What’s that?”

“I mean—you did the best you could,” said Connor. “Just like the trial, and lots of other situations they’ve seen you do the best you could in.”

Harry nodded, and then had to stop and pick Argutus up as he misjudged his ability to coil around the very edge of Harry’s severed left wrist and fell on the floor. Argutus slid back up his sleeve in embarrassment.

“So why is this so different?” Connor asked.

“I don’t know,” Harry mused. “Perhaps the timing of it. Lots of things have happened in a few months—” Connor smothered a laugh. Harry glared at him. “Well, they have. Maybe they got tired of it. Or maybe they’ve been so worried for so long that it erupted like this. Or maybe they really did think that I never answered back because I agreed with them, instead of just thinking they might be right, and not wanting to say things I'd regret."

"Well, either way, it's stupid," said Connor.

"I quite agree."

They ran into several Gryffindors coming from the Tower on their way down, including the Weasley twins, Hermione, and Edith Bulstrode, who had quickly become fast friends with at least one girl in her year. Harry divided his observation between them. Hermione wasn't nearly as pale as she had been the night Rosier kidnapped her, but she still gave every shadow they passed a nervous glance; Harry thought Rosier might have grabbed her in a shadowy corner. Edith never spoke very loudly, and blushed when someone looked at her too long, but she was healing slowly, Harry thought. Her mother had stepped hard on her, but she hadn't managed to pound or crush everything good out of her. Edith still had deep roots and even a bright blossom, if she could be persuaded to raise her head.

She saw him looking and flushed again, but she smiled. Harry smiled back at her, and then had his attention insistently caught by the twin he thought was George.

"Did you say that—"

"Professor Snape argued with you?" Fred finished. "That was the rumor yesterday, at any rate."

Harry snorted. "Yes, but it's not about anything to do with Potions," he said. "Thanks for asking, though."

The twins exchanged a sly glance, and Harry could feel his eyes narrow. "What are you doing?" he asked.

"Doing?" Fred asked, a wildly innocent expression on his face. "Why must we be—"

"Doing something all the time?" George asked. "We're pure, Harry! Clean as the driven snow!"

Harry thought of the snow that blew across his face during winter Quidditch practice, and the slush it usually collected and melted into when lots of people had been stepping on it. "I can believe that," he said.

The twins snickered in unison, and put their heads together. Harry sped up a little. If they actually planned on pranking Snape, then he didn't want to know about it.

They entered the Great Hall together, much more noisily than Harry usually entered it; Gryffindors would talk about anything, it seemed, and at the top of their lungs, and at a point in the day when most of the people at the other House tables were still half-asleep. Harry caught many drowsy glares directed their way, but as he broke from them and turned towards the Slytherin table, only two remained fixed on him specifically. One from the head table and one from Slytherin, of course, beside a seat what had remained empty.

Harry didn't take it; this early, there were plenty of other places on the bench. He sat down beside Millicent, who nodded as if she understood every nuance of their argument, though Harry doubted she did. He and Draco had argued in an empty corridor rather than the Slytherin common room yesterday. He reached for the plate of pancakes, responding absently to the questions a fourth-year was asking him about Divination. Conversation about that subject didn't need much attention at the worst of times.

"I just wanted to tell you something."

Harry looked up, again surprised; he hadn't noticed Connor following him to the Slytherin table. Connor stood in front of Draco, who turned his head slowly to give him the full force of a haughty Malfoy glare. Connor didn't seem intimidated. He'd seemed much less intimidated altogether since he'd become the Potter heir, Harry had noticed.

"What?" Draco asked at last, in a voice that could cut ice.

Connor leaned forward until he was nose to nose with Draco. "You're being stupid," he said, and then turned and strode towards the Gryffindor table, leaving Draco blinking at his back.

Harry looked down at his plate, pretending he hadn't been paying attention when Draco glanced at him, and hid his smile in his breakfast.

When he finished, of course, and stood to make his way to Double Potions, Draco's hand was insistent on his shoulder. Harry looked into his face and sighed. "I'll be along in a minute," he told Blaise, who'd lingered to wait for him.

"Why wait?" Draco said, his voice steady. "After all, we have the class together. We'll walk together."

Harry bit his tongue. If Draco wanted to fight in front of an audience, then that was what would happen. He turned and began walking towards the entrance of the Great Hall, fast enough to force Draco and Blaise to scramble after him. Draco was flushed from more than exertion when he came up beside Harry, and he grabbed his shoulder again. Harry shook himself free with a movement he'd learned in his training with Lily.

"Stop this," said Draco, as if that had been his breaking point, his voice sharp as frozen crystal.

"No," said Harry in the same tone.

"You know that we have a point, Harry—"

"About calling me a foolish child who'll never learn? About expecting that I should just submit to monitoring spells like a baby? About saying that I should have considered my life before anyone else's?" Harry snorted. "Forgive me if I think none of that's worthy of a serious response, Draco."

"But you have to—"

"No," said Harry. "I don't have to."

"But I've been reading history," Draco insisted. "I've read about war leaders, Harry. And Lords, even though I know you hate the term. They all had to harden their hearts to survive war. And when they did something foolish, like trying to go out and rescue a doomed group of soldiers, then their companions had to do the right thing, and sit on them."

"You're a bit too slow, then," Harry sniped at him. "You're always trying to sit on me when the doomed soldiers are already safely back in the camp."

"If you wouldn't get into these situations in the first place, then we wouldn't have the urge to do this!" Harry didn't look at Draco, but he knew his face would be turning pink.

"Oh, yes, Draco, I get into these situations on purpose," Harry snarled. "I walk around with food in my outstretched hand, calling to Voldemort—and I think you're a child for flinching at his name, by the way—to please come bite it off at the wrist! I lure Rosier to me with a trail of bread crumbs, and beg him to kidnap Hermione so that I'll have something heroic to do! And I just can't go a week without killing someone. I long for it. I pant for it. I yearn for it. That's why you're always having to sit on me when the danger's past, not because Voldemort hates me and Rosier's a bloody madman!"

"I didn't mean it like that," said Draco.

"You never do," Harry said, distantly, and strode ahead of him, Blaise at his side. Draco willingly dropped behind. Harry didn't know what he was thinking. He'd almost think that his words had to be making an impression on that thick skull, but, on the other hand, Draco seemed incapable of giving in; he wanted Harry to admit that he was absolutely right, rather than saying that sometimes he could be wrong. Harry could have compromised if it had been understood that he wouldn't be a good little boy and always tell Snape and Draco where he was going, because that was impossible. Both Draco and Snape seemed to think that he could be a good little boy with just a little more effort.

“Wow,” said Blaise at last.

Harry grinned sideways at him. “A bit more explosive than our usual arguments,” he agreed, proud of himself for his calm tone. He wasn’t flaying himself with guilt for arguing at all, because this time, he was right. He wasn’t trembling in anxiety for the day when he could reconcile with Draco and Snape, though Merlin knew he wanted it. It felt wonderful to have honest anger supporting him. “Now, did you read about the potion we’re doing today? It’s tricky. The potion will congeal if you don’t add a counterclockwise stir at the end of every nine clockwise stirs, even though most of the books don’t say that...” Snape noticed signs of trouble the moment he entered Double Potions that morning. Harry was sitting on the other side of the room from Draco, with Blaise. Draco sat by himself, sulking, though Padma Patil, the only one in the room who didn’t have a partner so far, had planted herself tentatively at his shoulder.

Snape concealed a snarl. Harry doing that simply to hurt Draco is unworthy of him.

The bitterness that had choked him for the past day rose up again. Harry had nearly died, and still he had the gall to act as if nothing had happened! He could not even make allowances for words that Snape would not have spoken if anger and guilt—at missing Harry’s descent into danger, again—and relief had not seized him in a maelstrom. He had to hold a grudge now, of all times, when at others, he had understood why Draco and Snape were worried. Snape wondered what was so different, this time of all times.

That he had to compare us to Lily Potter!

That had stung so violently that Snape hadn’t even attempted to speak to Harry yesterday. He had known he would shout about that remark, and Harry would defend himself, and everything would crash further down the pit than it had already fallen. He had stayed in his rooms, brooding and marking essays, and contented himself with the knowledge that Harry couldn’t really have meant it, that by the next day, things would be different.

It had been a nasty shock to come into breakfast that morning and see Draco sitting alone. And now this. Snape shook his head and drew his wand. It would be a day when he cast Potions instructions on the board and ignored the students for half the class, so that he could keep his temper when he walked among them later and tested the quality of their brewing.

He turned to the board and flicked his wand, envisioning the instructions for the Mind-Calming Potion.

A series of bright red bubbles rose out of his wand, followed by a confused kitten, who dropped to the floor and began to mew.

Snape stared. This was definitely his wand. What in Merlin's name—

He heard a helpless giggle from behind him, but when he whipped around, the students were all sitting with definitely shut mouths. Harry was looking at Blaise, as if he thought his face would turn red if he looked at Snape.

Snape turned back, this time whispering the incantation aloud under his breath. It wasn't common, but sometimes, when the caster of a nonverbal spell was sufficiently distracted, the effect would be something very different than what he'd intended without the words to shape and guide it.

This time, a second kitten joined the first, amid a series of pink bubbles. The kittens sniffed each other and began to crawl around the floor, toddling earnestly in the direction of the students. The giggles were louder now, and multiple.

Snape felt the muscles in his neck tighten. He was a few inches from snapping. That this had to happen now!

He spoke Lumos under his breath, and made the gesture with the wand perfectly; this was a spell he'd known long before he came to school, thanks to the patient instruction of his mother.

A blue pixie appeared on the tip of his wand, considered him for a moment, and flew away. Snape heard a snicker. It sounded like Harry's.

That was all it took to snap his calm, especially when it sounded as if the pixie had got into his ingredients stores.

"Out!" he screamed, whipping around. The students were already fleeing if they were Hufflepuff or Ravenclaw. Connor Potter lingered a moment, looking fascinated, and Harry was rising to his feet with an infuriating lack of concern. Snape stared directly at him. Harry looked back with no sign of guilt, but plenty of amusement. Snape snarled at him, and Harry rolled his eyes and turned his back, picking up his Potions book at a perfectly normal pace.

Snape was certain he could hear laughter out in the corridor.

He used wandless magic to slam and lock the door, and then settled down to examine his wand. It was, demonstrably, still his wand. His first thought had been that someone had switched it for one of the fake wands the Weasley twins had invented, but it was too familiar in his hand.

Then he cast Nox, and felt it. A tingle of magic ran through the wand just at the moment he voiced the spell, getting there barely ahead of his own incantation. It switched out his wand core and replaced it with a different one, one that caused a pink snake with hearts on its sides to land on his desk. The moment he stopped trying to cast, his old wand core reappeared.

Snape might have appreciated the sophistication of the trick at any other time; it took near-genius to devise a spell that would switch his core with something else without damaging the wand, and the person or persons who had done it had accomplished it without ever stealing his wand from his possession. But Snape didn't care, this day of all days. And he knew it had been the Weasley twins. He had no proof, but that had never stopped him from assigning detention.

He rose and turned towards the door, intending to find the twins, wherever they were now, and take points from them and assign detention in front of their professor and entire class. That ought to be enough for the beginning of his vengeance.

He fell, sprawling. When he looked down, he found that the pixie had tied his robes together.

The pixie, the kittens, and the pink snake all got caught up in a rush of violent wandless magic in the next few minutes.

Harry shook his head as he headed back to the Slytherin common room after dinner. Draco had tried another variation of the argument, this time saying that of course, since he loved Harry so much, he was entitled to be a little unreasonable. Harry had said, "Not that unreasonable," and it had all gone downhill from there. This time, Draco hadn't taken even the relative privacy of a corridor, instead screaming at him in the Great Hall. Harry wondered if he had thought that would encourage Harry to back down and admit he was right sooner. It hadn't. It just made Harry more and more stubborn. He could accept compromise; he could admit that the remark comparing Snape and Draco to Lily would have hurt, for example. But he wasn't just going to say that they were right, and that seemed to be what they wanted.

"Oy, Harry!"

Harry turned in startlement, then smiled. Regulus stood behind him, propped against a wall of the entrance hall in a deliberately devil-may-care position, his head cocked to one side and his arms folded. "What are you doing here?" Harry asked, even as he went to him and hugged him. He hadn't seen Regulus since Christmas, though he assumed he knew of what was happening. The papers had certainly trumpeted Dumbledore's death loudly enough, and now the Daily Prophet was having a field day tracking down known supporters of Dumbledore and asking them if their views had changed. They tended to stammer in their interviews, and most of the pureblood Light students in the school made a point of stating loudly that they didn't think anyone could support Dumbledore now that it was known he'd been a Dark Lord.

"I heard about your fight with Draco and Severus," Regulus said. "Severus ranted at me for several hours yesterday about what you'd done."

Harry sighed and stepped away from Regulus. "If you came to plead for him, then—"

"No," Regulus interrupted. "I thought about telling him he was being stupid, at first, but that just entrenches Severus further into his position, as if he thinks that he has a right to be stupid when someone else notices. So I came to cheer you up instead. How would you like to visit Wayhouse?"

Harry hesitated. The truth was that he didn't have very much homework, and he'd only seen the house once, when he and Narcissa were searching for Regulus's body, and then not for very long. "Have you spoken to the Headmistress about taking me off school grounds?"

Regulus grinned at him. "So proper, Harry," he teased.

"I really try not to get into trouble," Harry said, all his defensiveness returning in a rush. "I do, you know. But when I do, then I don't see why I should have to think of what other people would do before what I have to do—"

"Hush," said Regulus, and his hand fell to caress Harry's hair. He seemed to know the trick of ruffling it without messing it up further, which Harry had thought once that only Lily did. "I know. I don't think it was fair, either. Just because I kept silent under Severus's tirade yesterday doesn't mean I didn't pick a side." He winked at Harry. "And it's the side my heir's on."

"I'm not going to be the Black heir," said Harry, exasperation of one kind turning into exasperation of another. "Really, Regulus."

"Oh, I haven't been trying to bribe or trick you into accepting the inheritance," said Regulus, his face exactly as innocent as the Weasley twins' had been that morning. "I just think you might like to see beautiful things that won't endanger you, sometimes. And this time, you're right."

Harry wavered for a moment, but the only thing that really bothered him was a half-done Charms essay, and he didn't have Charms until after lunch tomorrow; he could easily get it done. "All right," he agreed, and followed Regulus towards the school entrance.

"I did speak to the Headmistress, as it happens," Regulus tossed back to him over his shoulder. "She seemed to think it was a good idea."

Harry nodded. It was becoming increasingly obvious that McGonagall had changed her mind about his needing to listen to Draco and Snape, perhaps because of how unreasonable they'd been. She'd taught their Transfiguration class today, and given Harry several smiles that she didn't have to.

Regulus pulled out a Portkey the moment they were out of the school, and Harry blinked. "Wouldn't it be better to just walk down the Hogsmeade road and Apparate?" he asked.

Regulus shook his head. "Wayhouse is temperamental," he said. "Currently, it's decided that no one should Apparate to it. I can't remove the wards that would let me do that, because Cousin Arcturus built that house and essentially gave it free will. So when it doesn't want me to do something, I can't. It obeys me in the big things, but the little things are all its own."

Harry smiled at that—the house sounded like the Many—and reached out, gripping the Portkey, which looked like a sweet wrapper, with his hand. Argutus watched in interest from his left wrist as they whirled around and the world changed positions. The little snake liked to travel by Portkey lately, though Harry didn't understand why.

They landed in a room that Harry only vaguely remembered, one of those he'd searched with Narcissa. He straightened up, glanced around, and nodded. Yes, this was Wayhouse. Its walls were built of silvery wood, and molded and dipped in odd shapes, as if he stood inside a hollow tree. And the magic sang around him. Not even Malfoy Manor or Lux Aeterna showed their power so obviously; Harry guessed both Dark and Light purebloods usually thought some modicum of decorum necessary. Not Wayhouse. Harry could feel the multiple spells humming on the staircases, and the room they stood in, which might once have been a nursery, had small spells fastened to the walls, apparently just because.

There was something odd about the place, though, beyond its general oddness. Harry shifted and glanced over his shoulder. He felt as though someone were watching him, even though no portrait hung in the room.

“Regulus?” he asked.

“Hmmm?” Regulus had worked his way over to the other side of the room, and a large mosaic made entirely of polished blue shells. “Watch this, Harry.” He stroked the shells, and they went into motion, bending and rising to mimic waves of the sea. Harry stepped closer, and smiled to see merfolk rising from the waves, mostly to stick their tongues out at the watchers and then dive back again.

“Do you feel like someone’s watching you? Is it normal?”

Regulus blinked at him, puzzled. “Well, no. I mean, Cousin Arcturus does sometimes leave his portrait and wander around the house, but I can feel him right now, and he’s asleep. Is something the matter?”

“Someone is watching me,” said Harry, as the instinct, sharpened through years of training, grew more and more insistent. “I don’t know why. It’s annoying,” he added, raising his voice, just in case the eyes belonged to something that could hear him and be persuaded to stop.

The thing watching did seem to hear him, but the sensation of eyes just sharpened instead. The next thing Harry knew, teeth closed on his ankle. He hopped backward, swearing, even as he remembered one room he had seen when he was here with Narcissa, where small creatures darted out from the bed to bite his ankles.

When he looked down, he suspected that he was in rather more trouble. A long tendril of silver-green extended from the wall, resembling a thin snake. It tugged him insistently nearer to the wall, and Harry had to hop with the pull. It felt as though the teeth were hooked under his skin.

Regulus, behind him, didn't sound alarmed. "It's all right, Harry. I didn't know this would happen, but it's normal." His voice had an undertone of excitement that didn't really reassure Harry. "Just go to the wall. The house wants to taste you."

"Taste me?" Harry shook his head, but kept hopping, giving in to the snake's impatient tugs, until he stood next to the silvery wood wall it sprouted out of. Immediately, an enormous blue tongue formed and licked his face, then moved down and licked a shoulder through his robes, then swiped each arm and leg.

Harry shuddered. The tongue was cold and wet. He could imagine that Arcturus Black had probably thought this a hugely funny joke to wake his guests in the night with, but he wished he could have heard about it instead of experienced it.

The tongue let him go. Harry realized the snake had, too, and backed away from the wall, watching it warily. The tongue slid over a pair of enormous lips, and then retracted into the wood with a satisfied purr.

Harry felt a new presence in his mind at the same moment. It bedded down behind his thoughts, and purred.

"What in Merlin's name—" he said, a feeble exclamation, because he thought his voice would start shaking if he tried anything else.

"I told you Wayhouse had its own free will," said Regulus, sounding so exultant that Harry turned to him rather warily. Regulus was grinning wildly. "It's decided that it would like to bond to you. Now it'll listen to you rather than me."

"That's ridiculous," said Harry flatly. "You're still the one who owns the house."

Regulus snorted. "That's true for Silver-Mirror and Copley-by-the-Sea and Number Twelve Grimmauld Place, Harry, but not Wayhouse, not anymore. Go on. Tell it to do something."

"And if it does nothing?" Harry retorted. "You said that it could do anything it wanted. I still think you're joking."

"Tell it to do something," Regulus repeated insistently. "It just chose you. I think it wants to show off for you."

Harry rolled his eyes, but murmured, "Would you move the mural from the left side of the room to the right one?"

The mural of blue shells vanished at once, melting into the wall like the water it resembled, and then reappeared just to the side of Regulus, who whooped and then collapsed into the chair behind him, laughing. The chair shuffled backwards, and Regulus sat down with a thump, but that didn't stop his laughter.

"Why do you think this is so funny?" Harry was staring at the mural, disconcerted. He couldn't really feel his bond to the house anymore, but he knew it must be there. And he had not the slightest idea in the world why it had chosen him. Maybe Wayhouse's motives really were unfathomable.

Regulus looked up, grinning. "This would have happened anyway, Harry, if you'd agreed to become my heir; Wayhouse would have transferred the bond to you on my death, unless it decided to be temperamental and find someone it liked better. Then you'd have to share the Black legacy with that person, whoever it was. That's a change that my grandfather worked into the legacy. The Black fortune and lands and houses are only supposed to have one heir, but he knew he couldn't control Wayhouse after Cousin Arcturus built it, so there's a single exception for it, just in case this ever happened. Now it's decided to transfer to you while I'm still alive. Don't you think it'd make more sense for you to become my heir now? I'd have to share the fortune with you anyway. Legal rules, you see, and Grandfather's." Regulus all but batted his eyes at him.

"You knew this would happen!" Harry accused him.

"I didn't," Regulus denied promptly. "Not at all. Wayhouse had plenty of chances with other heirs, you know. My cousins used to visit it all the time. And it's not like it had to choose you. I certainly couldn't force it. It does whatever it wants, Harry."

"You don't have to make me your heir," said Harry. "You could just ignore the rules. You do all the time anyway," he added. "No one else has to know this happened."

"Grandfather thought of that, too," said Regulus happily. "There's already been a change on the official records in the Ministry. And now you have access to the Black vaults, and all the treasures of Wayhouse are officially yours. Come on, Harry." Regulus reached into his robe pocket, pulled out a sheaf of parchments, and waved it coaxingly at Harry. "I have all the papers signed, finally, so that I can take an heir who's neither related to me by blood—well, you are, but so distantly that trying to take you as a blood heir wouldn't stand up against the claims of my cousins—nor in sympathy with my magic. You're practically half heir already. It would make me peaceful to know that I don't have to find someone else to leave the rest of the fortune and houses to."

"Draco would—"

"Draco is a Malfoy, not a Black, and has plenty of things to inherit," said Regulus firmly. "Besides, I don't like him all the time. And Narcissa the same. She ought to have known better than to swear that stupid oath. So. Harry. What do you say?"

Harry sighed and looked around Wayhouse. He tried to frame a question in his mind about the house taking another heir, not sure it would hear him.

Can't, came the immediate response. Won't. Shan't!

Harry sighed again and looked back at Regulus. "I have access to the vaults anyway, you said."

Regulus nodded. "Like I said, it would otherwise have been the heir's undivided, but now that Wayhouse is bonded to you, it would be shared—assuming the heir is anyone else."

Harry bit his lip. He could think of things he could accomplish with the Black money, and having Wayhouse as a sanctuary to retreat to would ease his life; that wasn't the problem. He was still unsure if he could accept it, though.

Is it too selfish, to accept the money? Is Regulus only not offering it to Draco and Narcissa because he's irritated at them right now?

"You're sure you won't change your mind?" he asked Regulus, testing.

Regulus's face softened. "I never will," he said. "I promise, Harry. Even if I met a child in sympathy with my magic, that doesn't mean I'd like him or her as a person. Lots of families adopt a child like that just because they're desperate. I never will be that desperate. And assuming I did marry and have children, I know that I could rely on you to help take care of them. You'd never refuse to give them a home if I died, or throw them out without a Knut to their names. So, yes. I can't imagine finding a better heir. I know you, and I know you're more than good enough to be my heir." He held Harry's gaze.

Harry took a deep breath. "I accept, then."

Regulus crowed softly, and shook the papers. "You have to sign in a few places," he said. "Well, more than a few," he amended as parchment tumbled to the floor in a merry rain. "But it's just signing. Your signature carries your magic, and binds you to the properties and fortune." He paused for a moment, then added, "You could take the name of Black, if you wanted to."

"No," said Harry sharply. "At least, not yet."

Regulus only grinned as if he'd expected nothing less, and held out the parchments to Harry again. Harry had to smile back as he looked around for a table to sign his name on, and found Wayhouse mushrooming one at him immediately. The way he signed was only half-reluctant.

It was silly arguing against a transfer of power that it seemed had already happened. And money, at least, and political power were tools Harry could imagine wielding without as much anxiety as he felt about his magic.

I already know the first two things I'm going to do, he thought, as he finished the final signature with a flourish. In his head, Wayhouse hummed in what felt like happy agreement.

Chapter Sixty-Four: Stalked

Harry opened his eyes slowly and rolled over. His mind leaped immediately into motion, making plans for today. He smiled. Regulus had told him that the papers in the Ministry had changed immediately when he finished signing the ones in Wayhouse, marking him as the Black heir, but it had been so late in the evening by the time he finished that Harry had decided to wait and start making the changes he wanted to make tomorrow.

Not even yet another odd, mist-shrouded dream of a corridor lined with locked doors, leading to one he was unable to open, and Voldemort's frustration that left a burning pain in his scar could dampen his good mood.

Seeing the strange bird with the teeth and clawed wings sitting in his bed and staring at him did. Harry sat up quickly, his magic coiling once around him and lashing at the bird.

It passed through it without any effect, except for starting a slight fire in his bed-curtains. Harry put it out, watching the bird all the while. It preened itself, cracking feathers in its jaws before it looked back at him, and that voice spoke in his head again, rather like dropping words into the past than speaking full-out in the present.

You have not learned. You will not learn until it is too late. Unlike the other times, the bird sounded almost cheerful about their mysterious binding this time, or at least smug. Then we shall have to live with each other. I suppose you are not so bad. Entertaining in your stupidity, at least, to still think you can hurt me. I can be wherever you are, Harry.

"Why can you hurt me, if I can't hurt you?" Harry whispered challengingly. Unlike the time he had seen the bird right before his parents' trial, he found himself more angry than worried. No laws of magic that he knew explained the bird. None explained its ability to pass in and out of Hogwarts' wards, either. He thought he had a right to be angry.

That is part of the bond. The bird stretched its wings and hopped a little nearer to him. Harry pulled his arms back. The bird laughed at him, a snorting, chuckling, vicious sound, and then hopped into the air and flew at him. Harry ducked, but it was too late. Those freezing claws passed across the lightning bolt scar on his forehead, the blood that it drew mingling with the blood from his nightmare.

To see you later, said the bird, and spread its wings, and rose, and vanished.

Harry sat where he was, panting for a moment and gingerly feeling the depth of the cuts. They felt like the last ones he'd got, and those had healed without leaving anything but scabs that fell off eventually. Still, it would be harder to hide them or explain them away as the result of stumbles than the last ones had been. Harry rose to go to the loo. It was practically time to get up for class anyway.

He drew his curtains back, and found Draco standing there, staring at him.

Harry stared back. His anger at the bird mingled with a rush of the older, harder anger he felt at Draco and Snape right now, and made it easy. Draco was the one who looked away first, though his voice showed no sign that he was no longer meeting Harry's eyes.

"What happened to your forehead?"

"A magical bird showed up and cut it," said Harry, which was nothing less than the truth, and made to push past Draco.

Draco caught his arm and turned him around. Harry went with it only because he didn't—yet—want to start a physical fight. He would if he had to. He stared into Draco's eyes again, and again it was Draco who looked away.

"I felt an odd sensation last night," he said. "I didn't understand what it was at first, but then Mother contacted me. She said you're Black heir, and what we felt was the magic of our bloodline readjusting to accept someone who isn't related directly by blood."

“That’s right,” said Harry. “Regulus told me certain truths last night that made me decide it was best to accept the legacy.”

“So is he your family now?”

Harry took in Draco’s tension, and remembered how upset Draco had been when Harry told him he didn’t really consider the Malfoys his family. “Not in the way you mean,” Harry said. “I haven’t taken his last name, and he’s only adopted me as an heir, the way that you could do with someone else in a normal will. I don’t consider him a father. More like a brother, if anything,” he added, with a slight frown. Come to think of it, perhaps it was better if Regulus waited for a while before he married and had children. Harry didn’t think he’d be a good father right now.

“But you still share something with him that you don’t share with me.”

Harry didn’t know why that declaration broke his will to stand here and have this strange sort of half-argument with Draco. He tugged his arm, and Draco, surprised, let go of it.

“I share lots of things with other people that I don’t share with you, Draco,” Harry snapped. “Honestly. I would have said, before we had this fight, that you understood that. I share danger with my enemies, and memories of childhood with my brother—”

“You were never a child,” Draco interrupted.

“So now you think that,” said Harry. “But I mean it, Draco. I shared plenty of games and adventures with him that children have and play. And I share bonds with my allies that you don’t understand in detail, and friendships with people like Hermione—” he was watching, and saw the way Draco wrinkled his nose, his prejudice towards Muggleborns apparently unconquered “—and life debts, and, Merlin, everything with someone else.”

Draco’s eyes widened. “So you could find someone to fill my place in your life?” he asked.

“Argh,” said Harry, knowing he was not being eloquent. “Don’t be an idiot, Draco. No. I love you. But it doesn’t mean I share everything with you. It doesn’t mean I never think you’re wrong. It doesn’t mean that we’re going to always avoid fighting.”

“But I thought we were,” said Draco quietly. “You asked me what I wanted from you, Harry. I told you. To be the most important person in your life, among other things.” His face was flushing. “I don’t think that’s too much to ask, with how much support I’ve given you and the gifts you hand everyone else every day.”

Harry stared hard at Draco, ignoring Argutus’s suggestion that everything would become clearer if they just curled back up into bed together and let a small snake sleep in the warmth of their cradled bodies. Draco showed no signs of backing down this time, or of looking away. Harry supposed they had arrived at the core and heart of the argument. Draco resented being left out of Harry’s dangerous escapades not just because Harry might get hurt, but because he wanted to share them with Harry. To share everything, really.

“I can’t share everything with you,” said Harry. “Not everything.”

“And I said—“

“It’s impossible, Draco.” Harry could hear his voice soaring and knew from Blaise’s sleepy grumble that they’d woken him up. He ignored that, too. “There will always be situations that I get into where I can’t go for you, or where you’re somewhere else entirely, and then I have to fight or rescue someone else or make plans or whatever and you’re not there to advise or consult. I can tell you about them later, but that’s not the same thing, is it?” he finished, thinking of the way that Draco had always resented being left out of the confrontation Harry and Connor had had with Sirius in the Shrieking Shack, even though Harry had told him all about it later and he’d seen the memories. “You always want to be there.”

“I don’t think it’s so unreasonable,” Draco said, voice like flashfire.

“Tell me,” said Harry, “would you let me watch a ceremony that’s special to the Malfoys? How your father confirms you as magical heir, for instance? I know that's private for most of the pureblood families. Oh, you announce it afterwards and have festivities to honor it, but the actual ceremony is private."

"Of course it is," said Draco, whose face was slowly flushing. "Our enemies could get too good an idea of how to hurt us if we held them in public, or even with anyone but those who are Malfoy by blood attending."

"So, you see," said Harry, folding his arms. "There's one example where you can't share something with me. So why should I be able to share the whole of my life with you?"

"But you don't—" Draco began, and then stopped. His flush altered.

"Oh, do finish that sentence," said Harry, taking a step forward. "I'd like to hear what you have to say about it."

"I—"

"Say it, Draco. Say exactly what you meant to say," Harry goaded him.

"I don't want—"

"Since we're supposed to be able to share everything, after all."

"All right!" Draco burst out, not seeming to hear the moan that came from Blaise. "You don't have a family, Harry! You don't have ceremonies like that, since you chose to renounce your surname! You're not pureblood! It's not comparable!"

The silence that followed that reminded Harry of the moment after he'd compared Draco and Snape to Lily, except that that previous meeting didn't have Blaise whimpering about lost sleep in the corner. Draco looked similarly horror-stricken. Harry had the same feeling of having jumped an obstacle they hadn't known was that high, and landing safely on the other side. He swallowed, and nodded, and met Draco's gaze.

“So, you see,” he said, proud of how steady his voice was, “there are some differences between us, Draco. I would never insist that you be lesser than I am. If you think something is deficient in my behavior towards you, I rely on you to tell me, not sulk around and hide what you really feel behind other things. I can’t fix my mistakes if I don’t know what they are. Similarly, I won’t accuse you of hurting me without explaining the accusations. And we are both going to make mistakes, and we are both going to have parts of our lives that we don’t share with each other, Draco. We are different people. Sometimes I think you know that, and sometimes I think you always envisioned that I would become just like you as I shed my training. That’s not true. You’re right. I’ll never be pureblood. I’ll never have the blood, and I’ll never have the prejudices.” He took a step closer to Draco, though his every instinct was screaming at him to retreat and, if nothing else, have the last bit of this argument in private. It was too late, though. If he moved, he would lose his momentum, and he might never gain back this kind of silence with which Draco was listening to him now, quiet, rapt. “We are both different people, Draco. I’m becoming who I am. I think you have to become who you are, too. And maybe it’s good that we’re fighting now, and can’t forgive each other these words just yet. Maybe that will give you time to figure out who you are, not just who you want me to be.”

He turned away and strode towards the loo, hoping his shaking muscles weren’t visible. Then he doubted it mattered. Draco would be entirely involved in his own thoughts right now, as he should be.

A part of Harry’s anger shifted and melted into compassion. Draco had ideas about who he was, but they tended to drift in a cloud long after they should have solidified. Maybe this would give him the push he needed to turn them into ice, or stone.

Draco lay on his back and stared up at the ceiling of his four-poster. Blaise had drawn back the curtains and asked if he was going down to breakfast, but after one look at his face, had quietly shut them again. Draco was glad. He knew he would get in trouble for skiving off Arithmancy, but he didn’t care.

In fact, the gladness and the indifference were both smaller ice floes drifting around in a larger, widening sea of cold shock. He shivered now and then, as if he could actually feel a wind on his skin, despite the thick pyjamas he wore.

He...

What did he want?

Oh, he knew what he wanted. That wasn't really the problem. The problem was that he'd always assumed he knew how to achieve what he wanted, too, and now Harry had asked him, and Draco found himself standing amid the wrecks of ideas and plans and dreams that were supposed to have given him wings, and found himself severely embarrassed.

What was he supposed to do?

He didn't know.

He had the ideas—be rich and famous and respected, keep Harry at his side and in his life, invent new spells, avoid actually working for a living. But he realized now that he didn't know how he would achieve any fame and respect on his own that didn't come reflected from Harry or his father, or hold a place in Harry's life if Harry grew this profoundly irritated with him all the time, or keep going with spells when he seemed to invent them and then not pay any more attention to them, or avoid just lounging around on the Malfoy fortune.

He kept asking himself the question, and he kept not having an answer.

Well, then, perhaps he should ask himself what answers would definitely not do.

He couldn't be what his father had been. Draco enjoyed playing politics, but he couldn't hold himself as distant from his machinations as his father had always done—he did things out of rage and hatred as well as for advantage—and he couldn't do them for the same ideals. Draco had to admit that he still thought Muggleborns weren't as powerful or magically talented or skilled as purebloods, but the thought of killing, say, Granger left him physically sick. If purebloods really wanted their children to grow up desiring to kill Muggleborns, he thought, then they shouldn't make them go to school with them. (Not for the first time, he wondered if a motive like that was behind his mother's insistence on sending him to Hogwarts and not Durmstrang). No, he wasn't a Death Eater, and he couldn't follow even the more limited versions of that path that might be left after Voldemort was gone.

He couldn't expect to gain fame from his spells if he just invented them and then never did anything with them. He would have to introduce them to the public if he wanted credit. Draco bit his lip, and wondered if insisting that people pay money to use or learn his spells was too much like working for a living.

He couldn't give up Harry. The mere thought of doing so caused a bottomless pit to open in his stomach. No, he had to have Harry in his life.

But it looked like he would have to have him differently. He wasn't an obedient little pet on a leash—and neither was Harry.

Did I do what he says I did? Did I really expect him to adopt the pureblood ideas about Muggleborns someday?

Draco could feel heat stinging his cheeks. Yes, he had. It was always unpleasant, and dangerous, to turn a corner in one's mind and come face to face with something he'd never known he believed. What would his father say?

Yes. I thought he'd be more like me. Why not? He's a Slytherin, and he'd been so badly abused by his family that I thought he wouldn't love what they did. I thought he'd become more ambitious, more willing to play politics, Darker, more willing to see that Muggleborns don't fit well into wizarding culture, more willing to—Merlin, did I really think that he'd come to agree that house elves needed to be servants, because we can't get along without them?

Merlin, he was right. I did really think he would betray everything he was.

Draco rolled over and buried his head in his pillow. The coolness of the cloth helped muffle the heat of embarrassment in his face. He lay there for a moment longer, until he took a great, gasping breath and sat up.

All right. I know a few things I can do, after all. I was putting off doing them, and I shouldn't have.

But the best of those plans, the most likely to succeed, would also put Draco directly in the path of an enemy as formidable as Harry when he was angry, so Draco determined to wait and see if it was necessary.

And how am I going to do that?

See what Harry was doing today, of course—have an idea of what he was like when Draco wasn't with him. After all, those actions might suggest a plan on their own, and if Draco learned that his other, risky plan wouldn't help after all, there was no need to pursue it.

Coward, his conscience accused him, in a voice that sounded much like Harry's.

Slytherin, Draco argued back as he cast a Disillusionment Charm on himself. Not Gryffindor. Survivor.

His conscience sneered at him, as if it didn't buy his excuses. Draco, still reeling from the revelation that he really had expected Harry to accept most wizards' need of house elves, didn't have much of a defense.

Draco watched as Harry determinedly approached the Weasley twins at lunch. So far, he hadn't done anything remarkable, just attended classes, but Draco had the feeling that he was about to do something now.

Watching Harry this way was both intrusive—Harry gave no sign of suspecting he was there, so Draco did feel a bit like a voyeur, or an enemy—and enlightening. Draco saw all sorts of little shards of expression on his face that he'd never noticed before. He'd realized that Harry and Pansy had somewhat made up their argument from earlier in the year, and even talked softly as they walked from one class to another. He'd seen the rapt expression on his face in Defense Against the Dark Arts, and realized with a start that Harry really did enjoy the theory behind the class that Professor Merryweather explained to them, while Draco would have preferred more spells. He'd noticed that Harry resolutely ignored the Ravenclaws he passed in the halls, except for Loony, Chang, Padma Patil, and Isabell Neelda. His greetings to them were incredibly warm.

He does have a life apart from me, even when we're together. And I never noticed.

So far, though, nothing he'd seen had made him sure that he had to pursue his risky plan. Draco gnawed his lip as he stepped between the Ravenclaw and Hufflepuff tables, far enough back from the benches that no one should bump him accidentally, but close enough to hear what Harry was saying to the Weasleys. Perhaps he should do something else, after all.

"Fred," Harry said, "and George."

The twin on the right, addressed as George, lifted his eyes and laughed. "Poor ickle Harry-kins," he said. "I'm—"

"Fred," said the other. "And I'm George. Or perhaps it's the other way around. You'd never—"

"Know, would you?" the other said, and both of them grinned, reminding Draco of just how much he loathed Weasleys. That was another thing he and Harry didn't have in common, by the way Harry grinned back.

"I wanted to ask you something," said Harry. "Bear in mind that this is purely hypothetical. I wouldn't want you to think it was real." He braced his hand on the Gryffindor table and leaned towards them. "Would you want to open up a shop to distribute your jokes someday?"

Two identical Weasley mouths fell open. Draco took another step closer, mouth full of his beating heart. He can't actually be doing what I think he's doing, right? Please let him not be doing what I think he's doing.

"Yes!" said the one who'd claimed to be Fred, at last. "It's only our—"

"Lifelong dream, Harry," the other finished. "We tried to distribute order forms last summer, but Mum—"

"Got in the way and made us get rid of them," said maybe-Fred, gloomily. "The main problem is that we just don't have enough money, mate. We'd need enough to establish the shop, to distribute the order forms, to advertise in the Prophet, to buy ingredients for the test products."

Harry was nodding along in sympathy. People watched him witlessly all along the Gryffindor table, except for his brother, who was grinning maniacally. "I know," he said. "It's hard, it really is, for young entrepreneurs to make their way in the world today. How much do you think you'd need? You know, tops?"

"A thousand Galleons," said maybe-George.

"That'd make us comfortable," said his twin. "And cover the expenses for the first year and a half, at least." He shook off his gloom with an obvious physical effort and straightened, clasping his hand to his heart. "But tell me, O Great and Glorious Defeater of Dumbledore, where we can get a thousand Galleons, and I promise that we'll be your slaves for life."

Harry grinned, and looked over his shoulder. Three enormous birds came through the Hall windows in the next moment; Draco thought they were gyrfalcons. They labored along under the weight of a trunk with the Gringotts seal on it. Draco recognized that kind of dark wooden trunk; his father had had one during a year when he'd done a lot of intense bribery in the Ministry. It would open a hole to the appropriate vault in Gringotts, and money would flow from the vault into the trunk, until its owner had the required amount and said to stop.

How can he do this? It's not like he has the Potter vault any more—

And then it hit Draco. The Black vaults, of course. Harry would have access to them now.

And Regulus Black was such a joker that he'd probably approved this.

Draco fumed under his breath as he watched the gyrfalcons land in front of the astonished twins. Harry laughed as he threw open the lid, and Galleons shimmered in the light of the Great Hall. It was obvious that he'd planned this to happen at lunch so he'd have the largest audience possible. Draco studied the unfeigned pleasure gleaming in Harry's eyes, the sly smile on his face as he watched people watching him, and shook his head. Harry—this is the kind of thing Harry uses money for. To make other people happy.

Doesn't he know that there are better things to do with it!

"A thousand Galleons," Harry told the trunk, and it shuddered a little and appeared to grow. Some of the coins spilled over the rim. Harry nodded to the still-astonished Fred and George. "Finite Incantatem. There you are. The hole in the bottom's closed now, so it's just an ordinary trunk." And, indeed, Draco could see the Gringotts seal on the trunk's tilted-back lid fading. "And all yours, to establish a joke shop with. We'll skip the part about your being my slaves for life, since, after all, I think it's much more entertaining to watch you sit here with your mouths hanging open. Now I can tell you apart by how many teeth you each have."

The twins slammed their mouths shut. One of them hovered over the trunk as if to guard it from reaching Gryffindor hands—their brother and sister would probably try to take the money to buy new dress robes, Draco thought spitefully—while the other leaped across the table and prostrated himself at Harry's feet.

"A thousand, thousand thanks is not enough for your generosity, grand sir!" he declaimed. Harry laughed. Draco regretted that he was facing away at the moment, so that Draco couldn't see the way his eyes shone, the way they always shone, when he laughed. "The first of the Weasley's Wizard Wheezes shall be named after our patron Harry, yea, indeed they shall, and verily, he shall receive free jokes and gifts whenever he wishes them, and the right to inspect our shop at any hour of the day or night, forsooth, and the first of our children shall bear his name, but this is not enough to do him honor!"

Harry was by now laughing so hard he almost couldn't stand. Then he straightened, and announced to the people who were gaping at him, "Oh, by the way, I became Black heir last night." Then he turned to face the head table, where all the teachers were staring at him in absolute astonishment—but apparently, except for Snape, enjoying the performance too much to put a stop to it.

That meant he wasn't watching the faces of the other students. But Draco was, and he saw the effect Harry's casual bit of information had on them. Their faces rippled like water in a pond, and so did their emotions. But then they settled, and except for envy, the most prominent emotion was—

Desire. Longing.

Draco didn't understand it, until he realized that not only had the other students just heard Harry announce that he was fabulously wealthy and the heir to an ancient pureblood name, but they'd seen him laughing, and seen how beautiful he was when he laughed. Pureblood students from all the Houses whom Draco knew had only looked at Harry when he had his name in the Prophet for something were staring at him with steady looks of appreciation now. The little Weasley tart had her eyebrows raised. Draco heard a seventh-year Hufflepuff girl breathe, "Well. Not much I couldn't get used to with that, even the missing hand," and saw her companion nod fervent agreement.

They could talk to Harry until their faces turned blue, Draco thought spitefully, and he'd probably never notice. He was oblivious to things like that.

Yes, oblivious. And oblivious to most of the pureblood marriage and courtship rituals, too. Someone could court him under the guise of helping him politically, and the git would never know, never realize, the true motive. There had been a few cases in the past of prominent leaders being tricked into marriage or joining that way, especially if they'd been raised in isolation from the rest of the wizarding world and were told that completing a certain ritual was the only way to achieve their goals.

And as Harry got more involved in politics, now that he was Black heir and had the money and extra political clout to do so, it wasn't just the other students at Hogwarts who would have the chance to see him laughing.

A vision rose in Draco's mind, of a future in which Harry swore an oath or completed a ritual he didn't understand and found himself joined or married to another family. Harry might even accept it, especially since for so long, he'd thought of his future life only in terms of duty and war. And if by that time he and Draco had parted ways over this argument or some other stupid fight—

It was a horrible vision. It made Draco physically sick. He rejected it, and watched intently as Harry nodded to, of all people, Remus Lupin. The werewolf looked surprised, but nodded back.

"There should be a bird coming for you," said Harry. "Right about—ah, now."

An owl, this time, circled through the window, and bore straight for Lupin. Lupin gave Harry a quizzical look, but opened the letter the owl carried. The next moment, his face paled, and he looked up and shook his head at Harry.

"I can't accept this," he said.

"Yes, you can," Harry said calmly.

"It's against the law," Lupin said, frowning. "Werewolves aren't supposed to have accounts with Gringotts."

Harry tilted his head and winked. "And there aren't supposed to be loopholes in the laws that will let the heir to a sufficiently ancient pureblood line establish one for anyone he likes, but there you are,"

he said. "And do you know, not one goblin at Gringotts ever raised any objections? I'm not sure why that is." He was radiating innocence. Draco, who remembered the ritual last year in which they'd freed the Gringotts goblins, was very sure. "I checked and triple-checked the laws with Regulus Black last night. There's no way that anyone can take that account away from you, Professor Lupin. The Ministry tries, and they run into a thousand years of iron-clad tradition and laws piled on top of laws—and goblin law, as well as wizard law, holding things in place."

Lupin still looked gobsmacked, but he nodded, slowly. "Thank you, Harry," he said. "I—thank you."

"I'm not quite done yet," said Harry, and pulled a knife from his pocket. Draco saw some students gasp and flinch away, but those were mostly the Muggleborns. The purebloods leaned forward. They knew an oath-taking knife when they saw one. The distinctive diamond edges against the steel shone in the January sunlight.

"I hereby swear," said Harry, "by the blood that runs in my veins and by the blood I have inherited to, that I will fight for the rights of werewolves until I have changed the laws concerning them to the same laws that protect other wizards." The oath-taking knife flashed and cut deep down the center of Harry's left arm.

Draco felt the magic take hold. Harry's blood rose into the air as a mist of light, both red and stained with silver as it formed the crest of the Most Noble and Ancient House of Black above his head. Harry looked up at this with a calm expression, as if it were nothing very noteworthy. The red blood, now turned entirely silver, foamed along beneath the crest into lettering: Toujours pur, always pure, the motto of the Blacks.

Not now, Draco thought, a bit hysterical. Now it's something better than pure.

The crest and the lettering lost their form after ten heartbeats—the traditional pause, to let everyone present witness it—and fell back on Harry like molten rain. Silver melted into his hair, his arms, his shoulders, his face. Harry stood still under the rain, as he had to.

That would insure he kept the oath, Draco knew. If he broke it, the ancient magic would turn the blood in his veins to molten silver.

Harry bowed to Lupin, then turned and walked back to the Slytherin table as if nothing had happened. He left behind a terribly changed and charged atmosphere, of course, and Draco didn't have to look at Lupin's shocked, stunned, slightly teary face to know that. He'd just flung a declaration of war in the direction of those who opposed giving werewolves equal rights to wizards, and, for those slightly more alert, in the direction of those who valued some pureblood families less than others because of their lack of money.

And Draco could see other people accepting that. There was little most wizards wouldn't accept, even opposing politics, or ones that challenged ancient prejudices, for the chance to work with or otherwise secure someone like Harry to the family. Magical power was one thing, but there were people who wouldn't follow Voldemort just because he was powerful. Now Harry had shown he had wealth, and the obvious willingness to follow the most ancient pureblood traditions in at least some matters, and determination like a hurricane, and adaptability, the quality that so often made the difference in wizarding duels and on battlefields, the quickness to roll from one spell to the next and become what one needed to become to survive. Harry had shown that in the way he used an ancient oath to swear something quite new.

And beauty. Can't forget the beauty.

Combine that with the fact that Harry had announced he was Black heir, but not that he'd taken the Black name, and there were even more people who would see him as—not vulnerable, exactly, but free for the taking, if they could just coax or persuade him into joining their cause.

And Draco knew his risky plan was necessary, after all. It was absolutely intolerable, the idea that someone else would win Harry. He had to be free to make Harry an offer, and, if Harry would accept it, to show everyone else that he was committed to Harry beyond tearing away. Only the deepest and most sacred of the courting rituals would do, the one that took three years to complete, and involved twelve rituals, four for each year, and took and gave equally from and to both beloved and lover.

And the one that only a magical heir of the family could offer.

Lucius had so far refused to actually confirm Draco as the Malfoy magical heir, for many reasons, starting with his disobedience in attending Walpurgis Night last year and continuing from there. His latest letters were filled with hints that he didn't approve of the way Draco and Harry's relationship was going. He wouldn't confirm Draco as magical heir, and doubly so, if he knew the reason Draco wanted the confirmation.

But Draco was now determined that there was nothing he would not do to have Harry, including adapting his beliefs and expectations, and facing the old dragon in his den.

He would have to go have a little talk with Lucius Malfoy.

Chapter Sixty-Five: Lucius and Draco

Lucius permitted himself a single cold smile as he folded the letter. Yes, it made sense that the family of the Death Eater who'd hurt his wife had hidden themselves thoroughly the moment tidings of the battle on the equinox came to them. They would have known that, even dead, their son had made the rest of them targets of an angry Malfoy. That was why it had taken his people so long to find them. But they'd been located now, huddling in a tiny house in Finland, and Lucius had only to contact someone who could study the house thoroughly, then create a Portkey for it and send it to him at the Manor.

Of course, he hadn't yet decided on which of several spells he wanted to use on that family. He had pulled books from the shelves, but as time passed and the prey proved harder and harder to locate, Lucius's estimate of how much they needed to pay for hurting his wife had risen. The first three tomes he had looked through were not painful enough. He reached for a book that had no title, but which every Malfoy worth his blood had looked through by the time he was fourteen or so. Lucius had done that, and so had his father.

Draco did not.

Lucius felt his mouth tighten, and shook his head. It was unworthy of him to let thoughts of his son disturb his pleasure in vengeance. Abraxas, his father, would have put the thoughts aside in a moment, opened the book, and learned the spells. Then he would have turned his attention to writing a letter to make sure his son obeyed him.

Of course, Abraxas had never had the same problems with Lucius that Lucius did with Draco. Lucius had been trained in the dances, and how to be a worthy heir, from the time he was three years old. With Draco, Lucius hadn't begun training him properly until he was seven. Part of that was at Narcissa's insistence—she claimed they had to wait and be sure that Draco was psychologically normal, that he hadn't inherited the Black madness—but Lucius knew some of it was his own fault, too, his own leniency.

And he had a son who was weak because of it, far too inclined to share his emotions with the world, and involved in choosing a partner that he actually seemed to need, rather than, as Lucius and Narcissa had done, making the choice because each one of them wanted the other.

Enough. I said that I would not think about him now.

He flicked the titleless book open to a page he knew well, but which nevertheless changed every time he read it. The writing had powerful spells covering the description of other spells, so that Lucius, depending on his mood, would find more painful Dark Arts written there when he wanted to cause pain, more complicated incantations when he wanted a challenge.

He'd just started to read the description of a spell that promised to split the victim's body in half and then heal it again without killing them when he heard a short trill of phoenix song. Lucius turned his head inch by inch, eyes narrowed. That bloody communication spell that Rosier-Henlin had invented was a nuisance, and were it not for the fact that it had great advantages in battle, Lucius would have refused to let it be cast on him.

"Father," said Draco's voice a moment later from his wrist. "I need to speak to you. May I Floo home in half an hour?"

Lucius felt his eyebrows rise. It was Tuesday, and Draco should have been in class. "Speak to me on what matter, Draco?" he asked.

There was a pause, and then his son's voice spoke, not trembling, though Lucius thought it would. "I think it's a matter that both of us need to hear me speak of face-to-face," he said. "If that is well with you, Father."

Lucius bared his teeth. So it comes to this. Well. He had thought that his disapproving letters would sting Draco into a confrontation at some point. He had simply expected it to come in the form of a whiny, sulky letter, at which point he could chide Draco for exposing their family's private affairs to the posts. For Draco to risk facing him like this was unusual, but not so unpredictable. It only meant he would crash into the floor much harder than he would by letter. Lucius knew his son, and he knew that Draco was not his equal, and he knew that Draco thought he was. “Come ahead, Draco,” he said smoothly. “I will be in my library when you arrive.”

“Thank you, Father.”

His voice died, and Lucius knew the communication spell had ended. He put the book down and strode briskly from the library, finding Narcissa in the small blue antechamber she favored on the second floor of the Manor. She put down the letter she’d been writing and raised her eyebrows at him.

Lucius bent, kissed her once, and then said, “Draco is coming home to face me. I request and require that you stay out of this, my love. Draco has some hard lessons to learn.”

As he expected, Narcissa’s face went pale—she had been hoping that Draco would grow for a few more years before he tried this, Lucius knew; she understood their son’s weaknesses as well as he did, though she termed them strengths—but she nodded. She knew that Draco was more Malfoy than Black, and besides, he bore Lucius’s name and was heir to Lucius’s fortune and house and land. If he had been a Black, then he would have had to face her at some point. “Very well, Lucius,” she whispered. “I will remove to the third floor.” She picked up her parchment and quill. Lucius observed indulgently that her hands shook. Well, she was a fond mother, and Draco was her only child, and this was the first time he had decided on facing his father. When the second time came—as the second time would have to come, because Lucius would defeat his son in this one—she would be composed and calm.

As she was about to step out of the room, he caught a glimpse of the letter she was writing, and frowned inquiringly at her. Narcissa nodded to him. “No book in the libraries portrays the consequences of a broken threefold oath clearly,” she said. “I am writing to the healers at St. Mungo’s, from behind my Gillyflower persona, to ask what they know of it.”

Lucius felt his mouth tighten again. He could hardly think of Harry without contempt, either, lately. Narcissa had told him that Harry had become heir to the Black fortune last night, and before that, he had caused the oath to recoil upon Narcissa by killing Bellatrix. The boy meant well, but he was too young for the kind of power he wielded. Lucius had started thinking he was strong enough to bear it after their battle for Woodhouse, and again after the death of his phoenix at Midwinter, but his opinion was declining again.

“Good luck to you in finding the truth,” he told Narcissa, knowing that the fact he bothered to say the words at all would tell his wife how sincerely he meant them.

Narcissa held his eyes, the strong woman he loved again, and not the mother who had just learned that her son was coming home to face his father. “I will do more than find the truth,” she said. “I will confront it.”

Lucius nodded approvingly, and moved aside so she could go upstairs. Then he returned to his own library, glancing at the clock above the fireplace. It was twenty minutes until Draco would arrive home.

He could think of his son without resentment now, even with a little pride. Draco was following a family tradition, one that relatively few purebloods still preserved; it was kept so private that the Malfoy confrontations were the only unbroken line Lucius knew of in the last hundred years. (It was possible that it might have happened in the Black family as well, but Lucius didn't know if he could count Sirius Black's confrontation with his parents at sixteen, which had resulted in the absolute breaking of both his parents and Sirius's running away and disowning, as one or not). It had been far more common in the old days when most pureblood patriarchs or matriarchs still controlled their families almost completely, when it had been common to weave spells around the cradles to make a child's disobedience impossible for the first ten years of his or her life. At a certain point, the spells, placed when the heir was so young, would weaken, and the family head would see how long it took the child to notice and come to face them. It might take multiple confrontations, but ultimately the child would win and prove himself or herself worthy—or be rejected, and another child chosen or adopted as heir. In the very oldest traditions, the child had killed the family head, and so power had passed, or been killed in the rejection.

Lucius wrinkled his nose. That was a barbaric practice, the way Light purebloods thought of Dark inheritance practices in general. In the centuries when wizarding families still had children regularly dying before they reached ten years old, poisoned by powerful Dark artifacts or by their enemies, killing one's potential heir was a waste. The Malfoys had been one of the first families to adopt a different sort of confrontation, to see if the heir could make the family head respect him and declare him worthy.

Lucius had won his first confrontation with his father at sixteen—a good thing, because Abraxas had died of dragon pox the next year. Lucius had been ready, calmly, to take control of the family at the same time as he was initiated as a Death Eater.

And now Draco, callow and even younger than Lucius had been, not trained in the same way and far too emotional, imagined that he could face his father and win.

It was almost...charming, really.

Narcissa tried, but she couldn't write. She put down the quill and looked out the window at the sky. She felt nerveless, but no tears would come. She was not quite so abandoned to propriety as to weep, especially when the confrontation hadn't even begun yet and she didn't know what the consequences to her son would be.

She hoped it would not come to spells. Lucius was more than Draco's equal there, and he would not hesitate to use spells that affected Draco quite severely—perhaps ones that would change his memories, or even deage him a year. Narcissa knew Lucius's father had been prepared to use such a spell on him. Lucius loved Draco, but it was a fierce love, not a comfortable one. In the name of making his heir stronger, he would do something that might make Draco incredibly angry when he learned of it, so that Draco's fury would give him a better chance of winning his second confrontation with Lucius, and ultimately strengthening the Malfoy family.

Narcissa wondered when she had stopped believing that the survival of the family was more important than the survival of any one specific individual. Perhaps when one of her sisters turned out to have inherited the Black madness and the other ran away to marry Ted Tonks, she thought. Or perhaps the night that Sirius rose against his parents in revolt, and Narcissa had gone to Number Twelve Grimmauld Place see Aunt Capella screaming in mute, helpless pain, her brain wracked by contrasting compulsions that she could neither obey nor disobey. That wouldn't have happened had his parents not tried to make Sirius into the perfect model of the Black heir—had they not been so horribly afraid of his compulsion gift, so much stronger than their own. For that matter, Narcissa wondered what would have happened had her own mother done something besides simply accept that Bella's madness was incurable, or that Andromeda was irredeemable because she had first resisted the pureblood dances when she was eight—done something besides pin all her hopes on Narcissa to carry her family's future.

If you believed that in truth, her conscience whispered at her, you would go down there and stop this confrontation.

But she could not. If she had married someone with the last name of Black, she would have the right to interfere. But both Lucius and Draco were Malfoy by blood, not just name, and Narcissa could no more step into this testing than she could observe the ritual that would mark Draco as the Malfoy magical heir—if Lucius ever performed it.

So perhaps she did believe that family was more important than one specific individual, after all.

Or perhaps she simply mistrusted her judgment sharply, after realizing how much her broken oath could cost her and how much of the cost would be her own fault, and knew that neither her husband nor her son would thank her for the interference.

Restlessly, she put aside the letter to St. Mungo's, and began working on one to Harry instead. She still blamed him somewhat, but she didn't blame him as much as she had before, and she wanted to say that, and the mixed emotions suited her mood at the moment.

She felt the flare of the Floo downstairs a few moments later. Draco had arrived.

Draco stepped out into the antechamber and handed his formal cloak to the house elves. In reality, he hadn't had much reason to wear a formal cloak, but he'd known that things had to be done properly, and so he'd changed into the kind of simple, elegant clothes his father would have expected to see him wearing if he'd just come home from a long journey.

He hesitated a moment, drawing up his courage and breathing it in great, rolling puffs of freezing air through himself. For a Gryffindor, maybe, courage was symbolized by fire and a hot temper. Not for a Malfoy. A Malfoy's courage was ice, the deep ice of the south, which never melted and never cracked no matter what the pressure of the sun. When Draco stepped forward again, he was calm, and cold, and as ready as he would ever be.

He moved through the house in a surreal state. It wasn't far from the fireplace he'd come through to his father's library, but it seemed to take hours to walk the distance. The walls bent and warped around him. Draco could feel his own fear struggling beneath the ice of his composure like a trapped seal.

And I think that Father is unbalancing me on purpose.

Draco narrowed his eyes. He touched his wand, resting in his robe pocket, and whispered, "Finite Incantatem," under his breath. The odd stretching sensation vanished, and the walls went back to their normal places. Draco snorted lightly, and wondered if this was a spell that Lucius had cast to test him, or one in place on the Manor walls, prepared to spring into motion when any heir came to face the head of his or her family. Draco wouldn't have put it past his father, who had said much in his recent letters about how Draco was too weak, and too disobedient.

Does he think that obeying him will make me strong?

But Draco knew the channels his father's thinking ran in, like deep, icy rivers. An heir was supposed to gather strength in silence, in quiet, obeying faultlessly until the moment he was ready for the challenge of asserting his own will. Draco had not shown, at least to his father, that he had the necessary strength, and he had disobeyed him in several matters, large and small, since Walpurgis Night.

Lucius's latest letter had contained the sentence: I find myself wondering if you are a true Malfoy, Draco, given how you have done many things that are unworthy of us.

Draco knew he wasn't accusing Narcissa of infidelity. But Lucius could doubt Draco's fitness all he liked, and would, until Draco proved himself worthy. Lucius loved him, Draco knew, but it was love as high and cold and lofty as an eagle's love for the air—love like an iron fist. And he had done the best he could, and Draco had still turned out—the way he turned out.

I'm half Black, too, though. And the Blacks have—not weakness, but a different kind of strength.

Draco halted outside the door of his father's library. He envisioned to himself why he was doing this. For a moment, he had thought of only speaking the reasons his father would want to hear, but no, that was false, to both himself and his purposes. He was going to win this confrontation with what he was, not an icy mask. Besides, Lucius would be perfectly within his rights to disinherit Draco if he found out later that his son had won through a trick, or lied about his purposes in demanding to be made Malfoy magical heir; he had told Draco often enough about what happened to heirs who used compulsion or subtle spells to cheat their parents into giving them their legacy.

This is probably one of the few points in his life where my father values honesty, Draco reflected, as he gathered all his strength. He's opaque the rest of the time. But today, I get to see the real Lucius Malfoy, as much as he gets to see the real Draco.

The idea made a frisson of excitement run through him. He reached out and rapped firmly on the library door.

His father's voice answered, absolutely calm and absolutely level. "Come in, my son."

Draco opened the door and stepped into the confrontation. Lucius turned and regarded Draco. He noted with distant approval that Draco wore the fine shirt and trousers of a well-traveled heir returning from a journey, not his school uniform. He would not have put it past Draco to come in like that, despite all his own training, and Narcissa's.

"Close the door, and sit down," he said, the first of many tests. Whether Draco obeyed or not, that would tell Lucius something about what he was here for.

Draco shut the door, but did not sit down. "I would rather face you on my feet, Father," he said.

Lucius nodded. This confrontation would likely be short. Draco was too raw, too open, and didn't trust himself enough to sit down while Lucius remained standing, as of course he would. There were cracks in his composure already. "Of course, Draco. Tell me why you came." Those words would have begun the ancient ritual among the old wizarding families, the one where only one wizard or witch would leave that room alive. Abraxas had used the same words to him, though they had not designed to kill each other. And Lucius had given the proper ritual response. He hoped Draco would.

"I want you to make me Malfoy magical heir," said Draco bluntly.

Lucius concealed a sigh. Well, there will be other times. When he faces me again, perhaps he will use the words. "I will not do that," he said. "And you know why not. I have my purposes answered in you remaining as you are. You are not strong enough or worthy enough of the title."

Draco lifted his head as if hearing a distant horn call. Lucius didn't know what to call the expression that came over his face next, except weakness. He was not closed enough. "I have inherited a magical gift from Julia Malfoy,” he said. “I went through the ritual to summon her, and she gave me her gift of empathy. You know that. You watched the scene in the Pensieve this past summer.”

Lucius nodded again. “And again I say, you are not strong enough or worthy enough of the title,” he murmured. “The gift of empathy will prevent you from ever Declaring for Dark, Draco. It has made you weak, made you show your emotions more frequently and more often. And while it might be considered a technical inheritance from the Malfoy family, since you did receive it directly from a Malfoy ancestor, that does not mean I need make you my magical heir.”

“I’m not your magical heir,” said Draco steadily. “I know I’m not. Your soul and mine don’t resonate, Father.”

“With as weak as you are, I would be worried if they did,” Lucius shot back, and waited to see if that would break his son.

Draco’s lip curled. A most peculiar look came into his eyes. “How old were you the first time you cast the Killing Curse, Father?”

“Seventeen,” said Lucius. “During my initiation into the Dark Lord’s ranks. You know this, Draco.”

“I was fifteen.” Draco took a step forward. “I cast it on that werewolf, Greyback’s mate, in the Woodhouse battle. I did it a full two years younger than you, Father. I found and summoned the hatred and the strength to do so, and survive. Will you still say that I am weak, Lucius?”

Not bad, Lucius thought. Draco was testing him now, calling him by his name, and bringing up a comparison in which Lucius might suffer, if not for other, contrasting circumstances. But he was still going to lose.

“Yes, I will,” said Lucius. “For this reason. I completed my initiation and accepted it as the Dark Lord purposed that I should do. You needed comfort, Draco. I saw your face afterwards. You did not accept the Killing Curse as something justified, a spell that you always knew you would need to cast. You collapsed into your boyfriend's arms as soon as we were away from Hogwarts, I trust?" He kept his tone coolly inquiring.

Draco laughed, a sound like lightning. "Lucius, do you still think that bowing to Voldemort made you strong?"

Lucius stiffened. Of all the topics he had thought Draco might bring up in this confrontation, he had not realized he would dare to touch on Lucius's days as a Death Eater.

"Careful, my son," he said, feeling freezing anger spread over him, and self-resentment that he had shown even that faint sign of his shock in the rigidity of his muscles. "Oh, be careful. I accepted the role of lieutenant to the most powerful Dark Lord the world has seen in generations. He was stronger than Grindelwald, and more successful. The Malfoys have followed Dark Lords when they appeared, save for those times when a Lord-level wizard appeared among their own family. I held a position that did me honor. You will not dare to cast aspersions on it."

"Oh, but I can, and I will," said Draco, moving a step forward. "If it did you such honor, Lucius, why not hold to your loyalty to him, the way that Aunt Bella did, and go to Azkaban for his sake? Instead, you pretended that you'd been under the Imperius Curse the entire time. You told me that as I grew up, too, and it took Harry persuading me that you'd been a willing Death Eater to make me see sense. So, you see, I never believed that you were an honorable follower of the Dark Lord. First I thought you were a victim, and now I'm just disgusted at the contradiction."

Lucius found it hard to breathe for a moment. Then he snapped his teeth, and said, "Malfoys have always adapted, always survived. I did what I had to do to remain alive and free. The lesser wizards are jealous of us, Draco. I would have been Kissed by Dementors, not merely sent to Azkaban, if they had believed I was a willing Death Eater."

"And you could have told me that story, and I would have accepted it," said Draco. "Why did you tell me that you were a victim, though, Lucius? Why did you want your son to believe that?" He tilted his head to the side, a gesture that Lucius knew he'd inherited, or copied, from Narcissa. "Could it be that you didn't want me to know that you'd tortured children? Killed a family that included a baby, instead of just taking out the one Bones wizard dangerous to you? Could it be that you were ashamed?"

"You would have betrayed the secret," Lucius said between gritted teeth. And when had that happened? He forced his jaw to relax. "Children will chatter. I wished to keep the story consistent."

"I never chattered, and you know that very well," Draco said.

"You were a spoiled, indulged child, Draco, and you would have told someone else the secret to make you seem more important than you were," Lucius snapped. "And yes, I do affix a large portion of the blame to myself for making you that way."

Draco chuckled at him, and Lucius was reminded of his father's laugh. He narrowed his eyes. He had seen little of Abraxas in Draco before. Where had this piece come from?

Of course. He's been keeping some of his strength hidden.

But that clashed with what Lucius knew of Draco—that he was too open, too vulnerable, too weak, to inherit as Malfoy magical heir, though Lucius had no other choice for a blood heir. This strength was a contradiction to everything Draco had shown so far.

Which means that this is the mask. I need only strike back strongly enough, and it will shatter.

Draco was surprised at how easy it was to drive his father in circles. Did Lucius really think he'd learned nothing from him? Draco had been Sorted into Slytherin for a reason. Just because he'd never said these things didn't mean he'd never thought them. He had, and sometimes he had felt a festering discontent when he looked at his father, but love and pragmatism both had kept him quiet.

He watched his father's face, though, and saw determination there, as if Lucius was settling back on his haunches. He decided that Lucius had had a chance to get used to this tactic, and was getting ready to strike back.

Draco braced himself in turn, and called up every bit of determination, every reason he was doing this, and put them all together into a great wall, solid as a mountain, that his father would not destroy no matter how hard he tried.

And he did try.

"You are a spoiled child, Draco," said Lucius, his tone as fatherly as it ever got. "You are too young for such a responsibility as you demand from me. Even your means of asking shows it. Tell me, Draco: why are you doing this?"

Draco held his eyes. "Because I want to," he said. "Because my gift of empathy has changed, and it's now the ability to possess people." He paused to watch and enjoy as shock flooded Lucius's face, however briefly. "That means that I can Declare Dark if I wish. And I know that possession also has flourished in the Malfoy line, once or twice, so I am still the inheritor of the magic of my family."

"You have not inherited the magic of your ancestors directly," said Lucius. "And you are still not my magical heir."

Draco sneered at him. "And I know that that doesn't matter, Lucius," he said. "There are rituals that will allow a wizard to transfer his powers to another wizard on his death, if he really wishes to. It happens automatically with a magical heir, but that doesn't make it better. Why should it? You make the confirmation, and, if you wish to, arrange the ritual, and then I will be your magical heir in truth, whenever you die. I hope that won't be for some decades, by the way," he added. "I want you alive to see what I achieve, and to see me surpass you."

He had to hold back his laughter as he watched Lucius's face change again. He would wager his love for Harry that his father was trying to reconcile what he knew of Draco with the words coming out of Draco's mouth, which sounded like calculated, guided insults, and failing.

What he doesn't know is that this is me, Draco exulted. Fashioning insults on the fly is something I'm good at, like spells. Just because he has to plan out what he says in advance doesn't mean I do.

"Such rituals are ugly and barbaric," Lucius began, "and no one in the Malfoy family has used them for thirteen generations."

Draco shrugged. "Because we were lucky enough to have an unbroken line of magical heirs, and all our powers could transfer automatically," he said. "Besides, what happened in that fourteenth generation back? Someone used one, didn't he? And it was for the family's sake, so that we could adapt and survive. Why are you so reluctant to confirm me as your magical heir now, Lucius? Adapt and survive. You want a magical heir. I want to be one. We both win."

"I will not use it," Lucius spat. "I will not use one of those rituals."

Draco shrugged again.

"And stop that," said Lucius. "That is a peasant gesture."

"I've seen you shrug, you know, Lucius," Draco sniped back. "You're not convincing." His mind was filled with memories his father certainly wouldn't want him thinking—not only of the shrugging, but of the fact that he had outdanced his father when he was twelve years old, when he found out that Lucius had been the one who gave Riddle's possessed diary to Harry. Memory sparked inspiration, and he crafted another insult. "Nor are you currently convincing in your role as guardian of the family honor," he added. "Of course, you lost your grip on that three years ago, didn't you?"

Once again, the shot went home, and Lucius's lips clamped shut so tightly that Draco almost thought he would draw blood from that alone. He kept his exultation off his face, mostly, limiting himself to a mocking lift of his eyebrows. Really, why was this so easy?

Because my father underestimated me. Badly. He judged me by himself. Draco thought of some of the comments Lucius had made in his letters to Draco, that he thought badly of the way Draco acted around Harry because it was not the way Lucius acted around Narcissa. He only loves two people, my mother and me, and he's blind to other forms of love.

He's blind even to the fact that I might love differently than he does. And at the same time, thinking differently about that would mean doubting his own judgment, which he almost never does. He's bound himself in chains of certainty. Not so flexible and adaptable, after all.

"I need only refuse to make you magical heir," said Lucius, very softly, "and there is nothing that you can do about it."

"Oh, yes, there is," said Draco.

"What, then?"

Draco cocked his head. "Well, I will give you a partial list, since I don't want to reveal all my tactics to an enemy," he said. "But here it is. I can reveal our family troubles to the Daily Prophet, and tell them the real reasons that you won't make me magical heir. I can refuse to become your blood heir unless you make me magical heir, and give you no one to leave anything to." He smiled at Lucius, as if he were seriously considering the next tactic he named. "I can possess you and force you to confirm me, and then your pride would prevent you from taking the confirmation back."

Lucius's whole face was pale now. "Someone would know," he said.

Draco raised his eyebrows. "Do you really understand what I mean when I talk about having possession, Lucius? It's not like the Imperius Curse. I move with your body, gesture with your hands, and speak with your voice, while you're trapped in a corner of your mind, helpless to intervene. And I possessed Dumbledore, and held him." Lucius did not need to know how short the time had been. "I think it would be much harder to detect than the Imperius Curse, really, and I'm damn sure that there are no laws saying that it's illegal to possess your father and force him to confirm you as magical heir. The possession gift is too rare."

“This is about your boyfriend.” Lucius’s voice was low, and ugly, and Draco understood that he had broken through his father’s stubbornness at last, and was seeing the honesty he had assumed he would see from the beginning. Thank Merlin. It’s about time he danced to the music. “You’re only doing this because you think he won’t want someone who isn’t the magical heir to his family.”

That did startle Draco into laughter. “Are you mad, Lucius? Of course not. Harry wouldn’t look twice at someone just because he was a magical heir.” He looks for other things, like compassion, and that’s where I might not be able to hold him. “I will admit, I want to court him properly, and I need to be a magical heir to our family to be able to use the ritual I have in mind. And I’m sure he’ll ask me all sorts of questions about the ritual when I tell him I want to court him, so I’d like to be able to reassure him that I have everything in order.” He cocked his head, secure, confident, feeling as if they were both in freefall down a mountain and he was the only one who had wings. Lucius was better at studied and practiced situations, and he was better at situations in motion. “I love Harry, Lucius. That’s not going to change. You should get used to it.”

“You are unworthy of courting a Lord-level wizard, with the weaknesses you have,” Lucius said, face twisted. Draco supposed he was being forced to change his mind about his son now, but he was obviously still resisting. “A true Malfoy would have his own interests and ambitions at heart. You think to adapt yourself to Potter—“

“His name’s not Potter any more,” said Draco helpfully. Inwardly, he cheered. Lucius was rattled if he’d forgotten that.

“To Harry,” said Lucius, with a glare that said he resented even Harry’s dropping his surname at that moment, “and not to stand for yourself. Do not lie, Draco. I have seen the way your eyes follow him. You think of nothing else but him.”

Draco cocked his head and hummed. And he had the answer to this, too, rising smoothly to his lips as he could not have imagined it doing before this confrontation. “That’s because I’m thinking of the future, Lucius, and not just the present. Yes, right now I don’t know everything about what I want, and a lot of what I want is Harry, and I'm probably not standing enough on my own." But it's still enough to face you and best you like this, isn't it, Father, without Harry's help? "But I know that I can change, and, unlike you, I don't think I need to have the change accomplished right this moment. You want me to be some perfect little statue who never changes again. And that runs counter to the Malfoy adaptability you were just telling me about, the same quality that let you survive Voldemort." He noted in delight that Lucius had flinched at the name. "I'm going to change, instead, to become who I am and who I want in my own time. Even worse than changing myself just because of Harry would be trying to change myself into someone 'independent' of him just because someone else told me I should. I don't let others' desires guide me that way, Lucius. I want what I want, and if I want to take some time to discover how I should change, then I'll take that time."

"This is ridiculous," Lucius snapped. "This is mad. You are weak. You need Harry too much. You spend too much of your life spinning around him."

"I know that you think I should love him more the way that you love Mu—Narcissa," said Draco, deciding at the last moment that calling her "Mum" would weaken his posture of strength. "But I don't, and you'll just have to live with that, too. Part of who I am is bound up with him. That's all right. I accept that. I even want it that way." The expression of horror on his father's face really was going to make him laugh if Lucius didn't stop that. "I do need him, and trying to change that would be stupid. So I didn't choose him out of pure disinterested strength to strength, the way you chose Narcissa and she chose you, but that doesn't matter. Harry worried about the same thing, once, when he believed that he'd compelled me into liking him with the strength of his magic. I told him that it was impossible to sort out true friendship from magic, and that I didn't care. And now it's impossible for me to sort out how much is choosing and how much is needing. I don't care. I'll look into what should change and when it should change, and change it as needed. But no one else is going to hurry me into that, no one else is going to rush me. Not you, and not Harry, and not Snape, and not Narcissa. No one else in the world. I'm not a perfect, frozen statue. I'm not the perfectly independent, disinterested spectator that someone choosing Harry based on his power would be. I'm not some mad dueler who ignores his weakness and tries to increase his strengths until he's defeated, inevitably." Draco took a deep breath, feeling that the next words were incredibly important, for some reason. "I'm not you, Lucius."

And he saw them do their work.

Lucius could see that now, actually. He wondered how he had missed it for so long.

He prided himself on being able to survive because he did not make stupid mistakes, because, once he was faced with reality, he accepted it and rode it. He had done that when his father died, when the Dark Lord fell, when he realized that he had no choice but to ally with Harry, when he had seen how the Ministry changed in the wake of Fudge's departure. He might try to keep his options open, as he had once done in his alliance with Harry, but when his choices were cut off, then he could take the only one left.

And the only reasonable conclusion left now was that he had been wrong about Draco, wrong about the kind of strength he had. To go on denying that just to salve his own pride would be to act more stupidly.

He'd underestimated his son. It had taken Draco only a few insults to make him crack. His own blows had made little impact. It should not have happened, would not have happened if Lucius had been a little more clear-eyed, but it had happened, and Draco was revealed as not the ice cliff Lucius had despised him for not being, but as a fierce, fast, lithe survivor. He had that quickness that enabled wizards to win on the battlefield, when he wanted to have it.

Lucius had seen him shaken in the past, had seen his son unable to counter insults and lose his temper, and he was of the opinion that Draco needed to summon his determination more often. But that did not excuse his own profound mistake in denying the nature of the opponent he faced.

He held out his hand to his son, who was not him, and not Abraxas, and was not any of the Malfoys Lucius had studied for the last thirteen generations, but surely might be the heir to Septimus Malfoy, who had argued his mother into transferring her powers to him on her death, even though Septimus was not her magical heir. "You have faced me," he said. "I shall do as you have asked."

Draco smiled at him. "Thank you," he said. "I'm glad." And those were, if not the concluding words of the ritual, at least appropriately simple. "You'll confirm me as magical heir?" he asked, testing.

Lucius nodded.

"And you'll use the ritual to transfer your magic to me when you die?"

Lucius gave him a swift, reprimanding look, and Draco nodded, understanding that he had pushed too far. He hadn't asked for that, only suggested it, and with the facing ended, they were father and son once more. He had no right to ask for something Lucius did not yet want to give.

"Then should we approach the confirmation now?" Draco turned towards the door, but looked expectantly at his father over his shoulder.

Lucius studied him for a long moment.

There had never been much room in his life for delight. The closest he could remember feeling to it was when Narcissa agreed to marry him, and when Draco was born. Lucius took a long moment to recognize the emotion that was rising in him with as much determination as a green plant forcing its way through a stone.

He had raised a son who was a worthy heir. He had spent years reconciling himself to the fact that he'd spoiled Draco, indulged him so much that he had little chance of getting a decent Malfoy out of him, and to the fact that he was not Lucius's magical heir. And now Draco had proved him wrong, and given him a worthy heir in the process.

He had made one mistake, but it had kept him from making another, and more profound, one—seeing only just enough of Draco to try to mold him in an absolutely contrary direction to the one he wanted to go. Instead, he'd left him almost alone, and Draco had grown strong and flourished without his interference.

"We shall," he said, and strode past Draco to take the lead, letting the delight grow in him for the moment. It was not as though the other emotions would not come back later.

I have a son. And he is worthy.

Chapter Sixty-Six: Malfoy, a History

Draco followed his father steadily towards the back of the Manor, not surprised that he could feel a low buzzing in the walls now. He hadn't noticed it before because he hadn't been that connected to the Manor. Now he was truly the accepted son of its master, and the building was taking an interest in him that it would otherwise have reserved until Lucius died. Signatures on a piece of paper meant little next to acceptance from magical artifacts, Draco knew.

He wished for a moment that Harry could know this sensation, then shivered. He's Voldemort's magical heir. I don't think that Harry would really like the sensations that Voldemort's house would give him, assuming that he even has a house.

Lucius halted in front of a door that Draco had tried to open about twice a year, each time getting a nasty, twitch-inducing shock for his troubles. Lucius opened it effortlessly, and stepped into the room beyond, motioning for Draco to enter when he hesitated.

Draco did, and felt the difference at once. The room was so heavy with wards that it entirely shut off perception of the outside world; the rest of the Manor could fall off the face of the earth while he was in here, and he'd never notice. The room was circular, with blue-gray walls and floor, and no decoration to soften the bleak stone. Draco heard a rustling murmur of many voices, rising and falling in his ears as if he stood in the middle of a vast, invisible crowd. He couldn't quite distinguish what any of them were saying even when he listened, though. But he knew instinctively that they were Malfoy voices.

"This is our room, Draco," said Lucius softly. "This is the heart of the Manor, the part where the first stones were laid, and the one room into which neither our enemies, nor the house elves, nor anyone not of Malfoy blood, can enter. It was built as a sanctuary for the family heads and their children, if anyone ever invaded the Manor itself." His mouth tightened for a moment. "Wives and husbands not of Malfoy blood were not included, because they might have been the ones who betrayed the family in the first place."

Draco nodded. He could feel the difference in the stones here. They were the color of the Malfoy crest, and they gladly accepted him, now. But he would not be able to bring even Harry here to hide, perfect as the hiding place would be. If and when he adopted or had an heir, then he could bring him or her here, and no one else.

Lucius held out a hand, and Draco was startled to see a staff made of what looked like blue light extending from it. He knew his father hadn't been holding that when they came in. Lucius stretched his arm out to its furthest extent, and the end of the staff brushed the far wall.

"I come," said Lucius softly, "with my son and my magical heir, sealed in the blood, sealed in the bone. I accept him as magical heir of the Malfoy family. I confirm him as my magical heir."

The stones rumbled, and the room seemed to grow tighter. Draco sucked in his breath. Had the walls actually drawn closer? Maybe not, but it seemed like it.

"I ask," said Lucius, and this was the only time Draco had ever heard his father sound humble, "for my ancestors' approval of my choice, and for their confirmation of my son as heir, if they will give it." He dropped his hand, the staff vanishing, and then knelt, his long hair falling around his face. Draco had seen him make the gesture in front of Narcissa before, but then, Lucius had always used one knee, rendering the submission less than complete.

This time, he knelt on both knees.

Draco swallowed.

"Down, Draco," Lucius said, and Draco felt abruptly that it was close to blasphemy to be on his feet in this room. He knelt, using both knees. His hair wasn't long enough to fall around his face, but it extended to his shoulders, and he hoped that would work. He bowed his head, and waited.

The pressure of watching eyes and voices grew greater, and then Draco felt as if someone drew blood from his arm. He looked that way, expecting to see a knife and a cut, but he wasn't losing blood. He was losing a thin trickle of blue-gray light that he didn't understand.

And then he did, and fear cut through his awe. He was losing magic. He tried to scramble to his feet.

Lucius's hand shot out and clamped on his knee, squeezing so hard Draco was sure he heard the joint grinding. "Still, Draco," he snarled. "It will be returned to you. But it must be drawn out of you and examined, first. This is why we hold this ceremony in this room, so that our enemies may not attack us while we are at our most vulnerable. Our ancestor who enchanted this room for the confirmation ritual was an absorbere. Kneel. Be still."

Draco dropped his head and was still, though his body vibrated with pain and discomfort, and he thought he could feel himself growing gradually weaker and weaker. And then he was in the middle of a deep, motionless, almost emotionless state, and he wondered if this was what it was like to be a Muggle.

If so, he wondered why in the world Lily Potter hadn't killed herself, and he felt sorry for Dumbledore for the first time.

And he felt a frisson of fear he had never contemplated before about Harry. He had the power to do this. Of course, so did Voldemort, and Draco wondered that he could have so witlessly charged into battle against the Dark Lord. He would be more cautious in the future, that was all.

Assuming he got his magic back.

He glanced up to see a corona of blue-gray playing around his head, widening and then spinning back in towards him, as the magic of the room considered his magic. Draco held his breath. He had never heard what happened if the ritual didn't work, if the child was judged unworthy of becoming the magical heir. Would he stay a Muggle for the rest of his life? He could see why some of his ancestors would have thought that a fitting punishment.

He bowed his head, and tried to ignore his cold shivers. This was bringing him face to face with weakness. Draco couldn't say he liked the sensation, but he needed to know it, as well as his strength.

The corona abruptly brightened until it was strong enough to send shadows bouncing on and spinning off the walls. Draco squinted, and then the voices returned to his conscious notice for the first time since he entered the room. This time, he could hear what they were saying. They didn't seem to be commenting on him, but to be living and playing out dramas that must have been real at one time. He suspected that some of them had been translated from French or Latin or even other languages into English.

"...never should have trusted a Saxon to keep his promises."

"My son, I will say this one more time. If you do not unbind me from this altar this moment, you will not live to see the moon rise."

"Never to be parted, no, never."

"Of course he is your son, brother."

"And how can I think that love is less than complete here, in this wonderful place, beside the slow-flowing river?"

"Will you please tell me how a daughter of mine got herself transported by the Muggle authorities, however briefly?"

"I do not think—" That one ended in a death gurgle, which might have been made by a knife plunging into a throat, and Draco shuddered.

"I will rise again. The phoenix does not stop burning because you kill it once."

"It was only Muggle-baiting, Mother! Only a bit of fun! How was I supposed to know that she was my Squib cousin?"

"Because, Mother, you aren't stupid, and you know I'd make a better magical heir for you than any of the other children you've got, lazy bastards that they are.” Draco grinned briefly at that one, thinking he’d like to meet the Malfoy who’d said it.

The voices rose and danced around him, and then the corona shrank, his own magic spiraling back into his body. Draco opened his arms to welcome it, and into his body he took the memories the voices had been speaking of as well.

Images rushed and blurred through his head. The effect, oddly enough, wasn’t of a stream, but of a few images that he isolated from the rest and remembered. They seemed to be in no chronological order. He saw a woman he recognized from her brilliant eyes and serene countenance as Julia Malfoy cradling a baby and singing to him. That would be her son, Draco supposed, the one she’d borne her own brother when she decided that he needed an heir.

Then came a vision of his father entering this room beside his own father. He couldn’t have been more than sixteen, and his face had been cold even then.

Further back the visions reeled, and further back, and Draco caught a glimpse of a young woman on a horse pounding through broken, rocky ground and soaring mountains, bent so far forward over the saddle that he only caught a glimpse of her face because the wind tore her long white-blond hair back. Behind her came three men who all looked like her, probably brothers or cousins. Draco could feel her desperation, and knew she was thinking that if she could only get to the border of Spain, then she would be safe from the disgusting things they wanted her to do.

Then he was in a soaring room, a cathedral of some sort, and with a young Malfoy man who knelt among the chanting Muggles and sneered. Let them chant, if they would. His Dark Lord was coming soon enough, and he would cause destruction here of the kind that would be remembered for a thousand years.

He caught a glimpse of a lovely, dark-skinned woman whirling beside a river, dancing because her captors made her do it. She looked completely different from a Malfoy, her hair black and her skin brown and her eyes a deep brown, but the defiance and the sternness in her face was the same as that in Julia Malfoy's, in his father's face, in the face of the young woman escaping desperately through the Pyrenees.

Forward again, and he was riding a horse with a Malfoy man who thought being among Muggles and pretending to be one of them was fun, and especially when you came across the sea with a brilliant commander and had the fun of seeing if he could actually conquer the man who had tricked him out of a throne and settle his Norman French on this irritating island.

Lightning raked across a deep sky, and Draco stood on a pile of stones beside a Malfoy Dark Lord, who was laughing as he grabbed the storm out of the air and hurled it at his opponent, a Light Lady who fell before him. He laughed again, and then he grew alert and snapped to the south. A storm of Light was brewing there, rolling golden up the sky. The Malfoy, who called himself Lord Lightning, braced himself. The rumors were true, then; the Lady had had a brother of equal strength, and he was coming.

Draco saw weakness and strength and defiance that could have been either. He saw endless faces, endless fates, endless incarnations of the Malfoys, sometimes in a large family, sometimes in a small, mostly marrying purebloods, sometimes sneaking off and marrying Mudbloods or even Muggles, born to Lord-level power and born Squibs. The one thing that thrummed between all of them was that they did not give up, and they reached endlessly for what they wanted, even when they did not achieve it.

Draco nodded. This is what I am heir to. I can handle this.

And then the room wheeled back into his view, the parade of images ending, and he felt the magic draw in a breath. He had been tested in his weakness, and he had seen the strength that he was heir to. What now? Draco asked silently, panting and wondering what else the room had in mind.

A voice answered him like the tolling of a bell. You must face your own weakness.

Draco frowned slightly. He knew he was magically weaker than Harry. Was that what was meant?

No. This is not the weakness in the magic itself, but the weakness that may prevent you from using it.

Knowledge slammed into his mind like the crack of Lord Lightning's storm. Draco saw himself in many ordinary moments: arguing with Harry, putting aside homework when it was too hard, turning away with a sigh from a spell that he knew he could learn but which required such fancy wandwork that he didn't see why it was worth it.

Laziness, said the implacable voice of the room. You are capable of great things when you push yourself to be. Most of the time, you will not push yourself. You lapse, you do not work, you allow yourself to be conquered. That is intolerable.

"It's hard!" Draco burst out. "I don't see why I should have to put in the effort when I don't have to!"

Then you will never become better, said the room. There was no sympathy in its voice, only judgment. You will never achieve as you could have. You must ride the storm in all times and places, not only when you truly want something or want to save your beloved's life. The only way to become better at magic is to do magic. Determination means nothing if it is not sustained.

Draco's skin crawled at the thought of living like Harry did, pushing himself all the time, barely knowing the meaning of relaxation. Harry had said that he lived most of his life by enduring. Draco could not imagine it. He liked enjoying himself.

You are still making a mistake, said the voice, steady as the iron clump of hooves in the vision of the fleeing Malfoy heiress and horse. This does not cut out enjoyment. It cuts out uselessness, and that is something very different.

Draco admitted, reluctantly, that the room was right. When he enjoyed himself most, it was by doing something, whether that was dreaming up punishments on people who annoyed him or kissing

Harry. He also liked lying around and doing nothing, but apparently the room thought he could be using that time to master his magic and become a more useful and productive Malfoy heir.

Wanting does not bring your triumphs to you. Working for them does.

Draco blinked in spite of himself. "I think some of my ancestors didn't know that," he had to point out.

But your father does. Very well. And none of your ancestors who did not know this were magical heirs.

Draco bowed his head. He had called up his determination, hadn't he, and screwed it to the sticking point? He still didn't know if he could do that all the time—it would be both easier and more pleasant to lapse back into the selfish child he liked being, because even trying to see what others thought or meant was hard—but he would try, because he wanted to be magical heir more than he wanted to be anything else at the moment.

And he had had fun in confronting his father, he thought suddenly. The sense of motion, of not knowing what would happen until he actually spoke the words that blossomed in his thoughts, of skipping from rock to rock in a general downrushing fall, had been fun. He could probably learn to find opportunities for that in the rest of his life, if he just looked.

The room let him go. Draco stumbled, and fell forward, kneeling in silence for a moment as the magic withdrew into the walls. He sucked in a breath and blinked several times, then touched his throat, expecting it to be raw with screaming for some reason. He was slightly surprised to find it wasn't.

"That wasn't fun," he muttered.

Lucius's voice startled him; he had almost forgotten his father was there. "Such rituals never are. That is not their point." Draco turned around to find his father regarding him with narrowed eyes, kneeling on one knee now, his face cool and utterly composed again. "So your greatest fault is your laziness."

Draco's face flamed. "What was yours?" he asked, and then wondered why in the world Lucius should answer.

But being in this room, and having his vulnerability bared, was making Lucius do odd things, apparently. He said quietly, "My sense of direction. At one time, I had a horrible temper which caused me to search for someone to fix blame on, and I was always finding the wrong person—or I misunderstood simple concepts because I could not understand their source, and continually committed or wasted my personal resources in the wrong direction. So now I track misunderstandings and crimes and new social forces to their source, and understand them."

Draco thought privately that his father had overcorrected for that fault, but he was not going to say it now. This ritual, too, was ending. He'd come face to face with his weakness and survived. They were returning to positions of relative strength, and in this position, Lucius's was greater than his.

"Shall we go tell Mother the good news?" he asked.

Lucius smiled, the smile that only Draco and his mother ever got to see. "We should. Merlin knows what she imagines is happening."

Narcissa watched her owl wing away, and sigh. In the end, her very confused letter of apology to Harry had proved easier to write than the one to St. Mungo's. They would want to know why Linden Gillyflower needed to know about the consequences of broken threefold oaths, and so far no excuse that Narcissa had come up with sounded convincing to her own ears and brain.

She turned back to her table. Thoughts of Draco and Lucius tried to intrude. Narcissa confronted them with the image of a polished mirror, the one useful trick she had ever learned from Bellatrix, and threw them into the trunk at the back of her thoughts. She picked up her quill again.

Someone knocked at her door. Narcissa dropped the quill, and then cursed at herself. She sat back in the chair, and made sure that her shoulders were perfectly aligned and that her blonde hair fell precisely past them to frame her face.

“Yes?” she called. Her voice did not shake, she was pleased to note.

The door opened. Draco and Lucius stood on the other side of it. Lucius’s hand rested on their son’s shoulder, and Draco’s face shone as if a great fire had passed in front of him and left its reflection in his eyes. He stood taller than Narcissa had ever thought he could at this age. No matter how she scanned him, she could see no sign of a deaging spell.

“He passed,” Lucius said simply. “He is now acknowledged as my magical heir.”

Narcissa’s anxiety burned into joy so fierce that she laughed aloud. She flung herself into motion from around the table and came to stand before her son, staring down into his face. Lucius withdrew gracefully to give them a short time alone.

Narcissa realized for the first time that she didn’t have to stare down so far at Draco. He had not completed his growth yet, but he did reach her shoulder, and he looked back at her with such complacency that Narcissa thought he could intimidate several fully adult wizards of her acquaintance.

“How was it?” she asked, even as she lifted her hands to cradle his face and bent down to give him a kiss on the forehead.

“Difficult,” said Draco. “But I passed. And I’m going to start courting Harry with the full formal ritual on Walpurgis, assuming he accepts.”

Narcissa felt her joy flare brighter and brighter. She had to step away from Draco, to drink in the full sight of him again and understand what this meant.

She had subtly mixed her own influence with Lucius’s in the raising of Draco. She had known from his birth—Lucius could call it mother’s intuition in a contemptuous voice all he wanted, but still, it was real—that the son was different from the father, that Draco would never survive unbroken if Lucius tried to constrain him to the harshest of the pureblood rituals. So Narcissa had at once worked in partnership with her husband and waged a subtle war against him, to insure that Draco could pass his earliest childhood unconstrained by anything, knowing what love was, before the dances had to begin. Even that had been a risk, though. Narcissa had doubted herself often enough, and had had to return to that original intuition for strength, because this was a harsh world that Draco was growing up in, with the next war between Light and Dark on the horizon, and the countless other, less fatal perils that had always threatened a young wizard's life and wholeness swimming around. Theirs was a world that could break or splinter the heart. Sometimes Narcissa had thought that Lucius was right. Draco might have been broken in childhood, but if he could rebuild himself and survive, surely that was better than his death?

But now she could see the son she had hoped for standing before her, and she knew her high risk had paid off. Draco had taken his father's and his mother's lessons, Malfoy and Black, and blended them, instead of becoming so hard he could not feel or so soft that he would smash into pulp at the first harsh experience. He was much better than either ice or pulp, Narcissa thought. He was alive.

"Thank you, Mother," Draco said, as if he could sense the trend of her thoughts, "for all that you did for me, and tried to do."

Narcissa clasped him close in her arms, and shut her eyes. At the moment, her world was perfect, and complete, and she had nothing else to hope for.

Harry blinked, and looked again at the letter that Narcissa's owl, Regina, had just delivered to him, to make sure that he wasn't seeing things. The letter remained stubbornly the same.

Dear Harry:

There is no good way to say this, and there are no good words to carry my feelings. I will simply say that I am sorry for what I accused you of four days ago, and say that I know you did not violate my oath on purpose.

I have been unable to learn the consequences of broken threefold oaths, and that makes me uneasy. Generally, they were achieved, and though certain books speak of terrible consequences if they are broken, they do not specify what those consequences are. I think the authors themselves did not know. Perhaps the knowledge was so common that it was not seen as worth the writing down. I will write St. Mungo's. They may have treated a patient in the past for the consequences of one, and have more knowledge than the books in the Malfoy libraries (a sentence that would shock Lucius nearly to death if he had seen me write it).

I hope that you are well, and that things will soon grow well between you and Draco, and you and your guardian. I also know that you are heir of the Black fortune and houses. Please assure Regulus that I approve entirely.

Narcissa Malfoy.

Harry frowned, folded the letter, and laid it on the end of his bed. Then he looked at Regina and shook his head. "No response."

Regina hooted at him in disapproval. Harry could feel his lips thinning with irritation. "No response, I said. I'll have to think about it a little while."

That seemed to partially content the owl, as did the treat he fed her next, but she still gave him a disapproving look as she launched herself from his bed, through the open bedroom door, and down to the common room, where she would stare meaningfully at someone until they opened the door for her. Harry turned his attention back to the letter he'd been contemplating before Narcissa's arrived.

Scrimgeour had certainly heard quickly about his declaration in favor of werewolves' rights, and he was letting Harry know, regretfully, that they weren't on the same side in this matter. If Wolfsbane Potion were less expensive to make and able to be distributed to every werewolf in Britain, he told Harry, he might change his mind, but it wasn't, and that was that. He did agree that some of the laws were restrictive and needed to be changed, but he was not in favor of ending such things as the registration of werewolves. He argued that if the law-abiding ones were registered, then when an attack happened, they would know it came from one of those who refused to accept the rule of law.

Harry growled to himself. Scrimgeour didn't see the very concept as degrading, probably because he wasn't a werewolf. Harry would just have to write back and try to make him see it from that point of view.

He'd reached for paper and quill to make that happen when Draco entered the room. Harry started and turned towards him.

Then he froze. Draco had a smile on his face, but that wasn't unusual. He was walking with a step somewhere between a swagger and a strut, but that wasn't so unusual, either.

Something had changed, though. Harry thought it was a combination of subtle things—the way he carried himself, as if both the jerky angles and smooth motion that made up his gait were more themselves; the look in his eyes, as though he had heard some grand and terrible news and had to accept both parts of it; the impatience for the future in his face. Harry couldn't remember Draco looking that impatient for the future before, except when he was discussing something he wanted. Now he looked as if he wanted it to come for its own sake, so that he could see what would happen.

Harry knew he was staring. He realized he didn't care, and from the smirk Draco sent him, he surely didn't care, and might even approve.

"I—you went somewhere other than Hogwarts?" When he'd come back to Slytherin after dinner and Draco still wasn't there, Harry had assumed he was in the library or perhaps an abandoned classroom, sulking. He had stifled the urge to go after him. Yes, in one way he'd wanted to, but Draco was likely to take the gesture entirely the wrong way at this point, thinking that it would mean Harry was admitting he was right about pureblood superiority.

"Yes." Draco dropped onto his own bed. He was still staring at Harry with that odd combination of expressions on his face, and Harry still couldn't look away. It was annoying. "I went home."

Harry raised his eyebrows. "There was something you needed to speak about with your father?" He supposed it was too much to hope for that Draco had talked his father into accepting Muggleborns as equals and Lucius was coming to Hogwarts tomorrow to make an announcement about his conversion.

"Yes." Draco leaned forward. "I'm magical heir to the Malfoys now."

Harry found himself speechless. Draco had let him know last summer that Lucius was still angry about him attending Walpurgis Night, and that he'd refused to make Draco his magical heir as a consequence. Harry had expected that Draco would wear Lucius down eventually, but not this soon.

"Why?" he asked finally, and wished he knew what part of the question he was asking.

"Because I went to my father," Draco said simply, "and faced him, and forced him to respect me. He didn't really do it before, Harry, did you know that? He thought of me as this weak creature. It's the only explanation for why he put up as little resistance as he did." Then his expression, which had dropped away from a smile to something more intense, became a full-fledged smirk again. "I was ready because I wasn't ready. I just acted from moment to moment, the way I did when we attacked Dumbledore together, and Lucius thought it was part of some careful plan and tried to dismantle it, and he couldn't, because I didn't know what would happen next. It was rather fun, actually."

"I don't—" Harry said, and then stopped. There were so many things he wanted to say that that he didn't know how to choose among them. He was going to say that that didn't sound like Draco, but now he suspected that he had seen this Draco before, killing Whitecheek and kissing him last year for the first time and facing his father in second year as well as attacking Dumbledore. He wanted to ask more about what it felt like, but he wasn't sure Draco would understand him. He wanted to ask about the confrontation, but he wasn't sure Draco would tell him. He wanted to say that if Draco was now in favor of impulsive actions, had he changed his mind about Harry going to Durmstrang with Rosier? And that would spawn nothing good.

Draco turned and whispered a locking spell at the bedroom door. It slammed shut. Harry raised an eyebrow. "Blaise won't like that," he said, grateful that had come spilling out of his throat all on its own.

Draco turned around, and Harry swallowed. This wasn't going to be put off by distractions, he realized, any of it.

"Blaise can sod off," said Draco impatiently. "Right now, Harry, I want to have a conversation that doesn't involve yelling, or insults. It can involve apologies, but only if we both mean them." He eyed Harry. "Is that acceptable?"

"Did you plan this?" Harry managed to ask.

"I'm going to ignore the tone of that remark," Draco said pleasantly, "since I could consider it an insult if I wanted. But yes, as a matter of fact, I did. What I was going to do, anyway. Not what I was going to say." He leaned forward. "So I find the first thing I want to say is that I don't like fighting with you. So I want to stop."

Harry wished for a moment that he were in the lynx form he wore in his visions of Voldemort. He would have liked to flatten his ears. "I'm still angry at you," he said. "I'm not going to stop fighting just like that."

"And what are you angry about?"

"That you thought I endangered my life on purpose," Harry said. "You still seem to think that, and so does Snape. I told you, I did the best I could under the circumstances. And I can't alter my response to events that easily. People would rightly despise me if I became the kind of leader who let other people die instead of risking his own life."

Draco shook his head slightly. "I got angry out of worry, Harry. I do think, now, that you probably couldn't have done anything else right then. But I think you could plan a little more for some situations."

"Rosier is utterly unpredictable," Harry reminded him.

“Not Rosier,” said Draco. Harry bit his tongue on the temptation to say that of course Rosier wasn’t someone Draco could confront, and listened. “But these situations in general, Harry. Concentrate on learning more healing magic, for example, so that you won’t have to feel utterly helpless when an enemy throws a Severing Curse. Work on strengthening your own magic; you have powers, but you prefer to rely on your old training rather than learn anything new.” Harry tensed, but the tone of his voice was largely neutral, analytical, so Harry let it slide. “Look through the gifts you’ve been given and the artifacts you have now that you’re Black heir. Look at them, not just see if they can be useful later.”

Harry nodded. All of those suggestions made sense, really, and he could think of one Draco had neglected to add, maybe because he didn’t know about it. Harry supposed he had to find out what the hell it meant to have Fawkes’s voice, sometimes, and phoenix fire, sometimes. If those had been gifts from the wild Dark, Harry would have accepted that they had no laws or rules, but Light magic was much more about order and control, and phoenixes were magical creatures who lived by natural laws.

“Why haven’t you done more things like that?” Draco wound up his list of suggestions.

Harry looked away from him with a grimace. “Because I feel as if I’m stretched thin enough as it is,” he said shortly. “The more time I spend training my own powers, the more time I have to take away from something else. There’s been the Durmstrang crisis and Dumbledore and the wild Dark in the past month alone—” he shuddered a little as he realized how fast those had come, one right after the other “—and before that, there was my parents’ trial, and more work to try to determine how to undo the lightning ward. I haven’t even had a meeting of the dueling club in a month. I need to get back to that. Every time I start thinking about how many obligations I have, they start overwhelming me. I know I’m splayed about as far as I can go right now and still accomplish schoolwork, sleep, and eat. Start training my powers, and something else would have to end.”

“And do you think that most of your allies and friends would mind that?” Draco asked.

Harry raised his eyebrows. “Well, yes. Charles and Thomas certainly minded their children being trapped in Durmstrang.”

“But most of these obligations aren’t as urgent as that.” Draco leaned nearer to him to make the point. “And Charles and Thomas were willing to work on that particular problem themselves, while you did other things. Harry, you can delegate. You can tell people that certain things will have to wait while you try to become stronger. What you did in front of the school today was wonderful, though why you gave the money to the Weasleys like that I’ll never know—“

“So that no one would accuse them of stealing it,” said Harry. “So their parents would know they got it perfectly legally. Now you know.”

Draco smiled faintly, but that still didn’t lessen the utter determination in his face. “I was referring more to giving money to Weasleys in the first place, but never mind,” he murmured. “But you’ve only committed yourself to a fight for the werewolves’ rights. You didn’t say that you were going to knock the unfair laws down by next weekend and have a werewolf Minister in place by June. And I don’t think that anyone expects you to.”

“Who are you and what spell have you put Draco under?” Harry demanded.

“I had to learn a few home truths today,” said Draco, and for a moment he winced. “Some things about myself I didn’t really like. This morning, and then again this afternoon.” The next moment, his gaze was steady again. “And I think it’s time you did the same, Harry.”

“I’ve been through that,” said Harry.

“Only one set. Did you really think that was the end?”

Harry ground his teeth. “No,” he said at last. Sometimes he hated it when someone else made so much sense that he couldn’t duck and dodge and offer excuses any more. “But with the way crises have been piling up lately, I was hoping to put that off for a little while. I have to be ready and open to respond to any problem that comes this way, as Rosier showed me. Dedicating so much of my effort to training and delegating and so on would—“ “Not change things fundamentally,” Draco interrupted calmly. “Except that you’d be working with an eye on the more distant future than next week, this time. You’re holding yourself open for crises already, but you still did research on the lightning ward and found time to arrange that account for Professor Lupin.” He looked on the verge of asking Harry why he’d done that, too, but refrained, as he probably knew. “I think you can do this, too, Harry. And if someone asks you why you’ve changed, explain. Most of your allies and friends would be thrilled to know that you’re trying to become a stronger leader instead of simply losing yourself in the small problems.”

Harry had to snort a little, at the sound of someone calling the wild Dark a “small problem.”

“Understatement,” said Draco. “I know. I’m sorry. I’ve got to stop doing that.” While Harry gaped at the casual apology, he forged ahead. “But things have got to change, I think, Harry. Even if you’re still angry at me and Snape, know that.”

“I am,” said Harry. “Still angry, that is.”

“But you’re sitting here and talking to me quietly enough.” Draco gave him an inquiring look.

Harry scowled at nothing and tried to think of words to voice the realization he’d come to during History of Magic, since he’d nothing to do but think about his argument with Draco that morning. “I—the anger isn’t enough, by itself, to keep me from talking to you. It was the idea that you still didn’t see the sense of anything I was talking about that irritated me so much, that you still wanted me to give in about everything. And that’s not the way it works. That’s not the way it can work. Everything’s got to change all the time, Draco, from argument to argument, maybe even day to day. Sometimes I will be completely wrong and unreasonable. Sometimes you will. And I thought that was the way you were acting right then.” He raised his eyes to Draco’s, hoping he could convey what he meant.

Draco said nothing for a moment. Then he said, “Being compared to your mother hurt, you know.”

“I know.”

“Do you really believe that?”

Harry shook his head. “Only in the heat of anger.”

“Then why say it?”

Harry raised his eyebrows. “In the heat of anger, Draco. If we’re going to try as hard as we can to understand each other, then you should understand that I say things I don’t mean, too.”

“And you still haven’t apologized for it.”

“And you still haven’t apologized for anything you’ve said!” Then Harry hesitated. “Unless saying that you think I was right to do what I did in the Rosier situation was an apology.”

“It was supposed to be,” said Draco. “All right. I’m sorry for doubting your competence and your morals, Harry, and I’m sorry that I acted as if you had to become a different kind of person to fight this war.”

Harry nodded. “I’m sorry for comparing you to my mother,” he said. “The rest, not really. I do think that I’ll have to change certain things about myself, the training, like you said, but not the rest. I’m never going to alter myself that much.”

“I know,” said Draco. “I wouldn’t want you to. I’m thinking of you changing the things you concentrate on so you can protect what’s most important about you.” He leaned forward and captured Harry’s lips in a brief kiss, before settling back again. “Now. What you said about changing from argument to argument...it’ll have to happen all the time, won’t it? And just going back to being lazy, the way I was before, won’t work.”

Harry blinked. "I wouldn't call you lazy."

Draco laughed dryly. "That's because you haven't been inside my head. I was, Harry. I knew sometimes that I could have achieved better marks or more attention or even heroics like you, but it's so much easier to demand it, or throw a tantrum, or just not do anything than get it. It's hard. I think it's even harder than the putting your head down and pushing you told me about, because here I'm fighting my way uphill, not accepting what comes." He tilted his head at Harry, and his eyes shone. "But I'm good at dancing on a rockslide. I think I can do that. This. I think I can change from moment to moment, day to day, and not just in our arguments. All the time. I know I can; it's just been my own reluctance that's kept me from it." Harry wondered privately if that was really true, but Draco certainly sounded as if he believed it. "I can do this, Harry. Merlin, I can do this. And I know that you can, though I have to teach you some things about enjoying what you do and not just getting it out of the way, and you have to teach me some things about continuing, not just flaring once and then dying down."

Harry had to lower his eyes at the vision those words prompted. He and Draco, ever-changing, ever-whirling, ever in motion, achieving so many things that the times when they would slide back and make mistakes were beggared in comparison, because they would know that they wouldn't make those mistakes and get stuck in them forever. The future didn't end, wasn't cut off, and things would always change. So long as they could remember that, then they would avoid most of the pit traps Harry had seen other people fall into.

"Harry," said Draco. "I want you to think about this. Now that I'm magical heir to the Malfoy family, I can court you with a full ritual that no one but a magical heir is allowed to use. It takes three years."

Harry stared at him. Even with the vision in his head, to hear that Draco wanted to take this kind of step to make the vision a reality was—odd. Perhaps it was easier to think about than to do.

But Draco had taken a risk. The least Harry could do was meet it. He cleared his throat. "Go on."

"It's a joining ritual," Draco said. "Or a marriage ritual, but you are definitely not a girl." His eyes had a lazy, appreciative look in them as he ran them over Harry's body. "It takes place four times a year, so there are twelve rituals—or thirteen, really, but the final ritual is the joining itself. Walpurgis is one night, and then the holiday that used to be called Lammas, on August first." He grinned. "I think we can use your birthday for that one. Then Halloween marks the third ritual, and then the old holiday of Imbolc, on the second of February, is the fourth. Rituals will happen on those days, if you agree." He cocked his head at Harry. "I hope you agree, obviously, but take some time to think about it."

"Is that why you're not starting this Imbolc?" Harry asked wryly, when he'd recovered his breath.

"Right," said Draco. "So that you can have some time to think about it. Besides, all the best rituals like this one start on Walpurgis Night. Everyone says so."

Harry nodded absently, and rolled back on his bed. He had time to think about it. He really did. He could trust Draco to let him take that time.

And now he had a different kind of vision of the future, one that spun him dizzily around and made his breath come short and fast.

It didn't need to be totally separate from the world where he trained people in dueling and worked for werewolves' rights, either. Harry suspected that that was what Draco was most trying to show him.

"You're thinking about it?" Draco asked.

Harry closed his eyes. "I'm definitely thinking about it."

"Good," said Draco happily, and they leaped over a bit more of the argument between them, and into a new whirl of motion.

Chapter Sixty-Seven: When Light and Dark Get Together

Harry hesitated.

“Oh, come on,” Draco urged him. “It’s not as though anything in here will burn, not after we asked the Room for a room that won’t.”

“That was normal fire,” Harry muttered. “I’m not entirely sure about phoenix fire.” But on the other hand, he wouldn’t learn anything if he never used it, so he extended his hand and concentrated, for the first time, on making the flame spring up instead of simply accepting it when it appeared.

He felt an odd rush of blood in his veins, as though the fire intended to well to the surface of his skin that way, but nothing happened. He frowned slightly and closed his eyes, creating an intricate vision of what the flame had looked like the other times it had sprouted on his palm.

Blue at the center, clear azure, spreading out into orange and white. Harry found, though, that he could not remember exactly what the shape of the flame had been, or how the boundaries between colors looked. Was that why he was having so much trouble? He tried to cudgel his memory into behaving, and reached for a yet better vision of it.

“Harry!”

Harry’s eyes shot open in surprise, and he realized he was looking at the world through a blurry, blue-white sheet of flame. Phoenix fire covered his arms and shoulders like a mantle, crawled in his hair, and played around his face. Argutus, around his neck, was uttering a stream of excited chatter, basking in the heat. “Can we do this all the time? I think this is better than the sun. It feels more personal, as if the fire cares that I get warm. Maybe we could sleep like this? I think that’s a good idea. So what if you set a few blankets on fire? That’s all right. I—“

With an effort, Harry both stopped listening to the Omen snake and calmed the fire. It withdrew into his skin like wings retracting onto a bird's back. Harry let out a shaky gasp, and then touched his hair, his face, and other exposed parts of his skin. The fire didn't seem to have burned him. He had no idea what would have happened if he'd sent the fire at the walls of the large dueling chamber the Room of Requirement had provided them when they'd asked for a room where Harry and Draco could both work on their spells.

"Don't do that," said Draco furiously from the other side of the room.

"Sorry," muttered Harry. "I don't know what caused it, though. I was only envisioning the small flame in my palm."

Draco made a soft, exasperated noise. "Well, think about it later. I want to test my rune circle out." He gave Harry an expectant look, and Harry nodded and looked at the symbols Draco had painstakingly scribed into the stone floor while Harry searched through the books the Room had provided them for healing spells he wanted to study.

Harry hadn't taken Ancient Runes, so he only knew those shapes that bore some slight resemblance to the letters of the alphabet. Based on that, he had no idea what the circle did, and he had to eye it dubiously. The last full rune circle Draco had tried had left him trapped in the room where he'd drawn it until the sun stopped shining on the circle—perfectly safe, of course.

He asked Draco about that, and received a haughty look in return. "That was a circle for binding and confinement, Harry," he said. "This one has a different purpose."

"What's the purpose?" Harry asked.

"You'll see what it is when it happens," said Draco, and then stepped into the circle. At once he slumped to the floor, his head nearly smudging one of the runes, and fell asleep.

Harry blinked. Well, I suppose that could be useful for trapping an enemy, though we'd still have to have chosen the battlefield first. That rune circle took him forever to draw. He inched forward, wondering if the circle had some other property after all, and Draco was about to spring to his feet and catch him the moment he came up to the boundary.

Draco didn't move, though, other than the rising and falling of his chest in slow, peaceful breaths of deep sleep. Harry frowned. If that's his demonstration, how did he plan to get out of the circle without breaking it?

He studied the runes on the floor; they gave him no clue, of course. Harry shrugged and stretched out his hand, concentrating, to lift Draco with a Levitation Charm. He floated over the edges of the circle and landed on the floor.

Harry didn't think the landing had been that hard, but Draco was awake in instants, spluttering about "oafs who didn't realize that dropping someone onto a hard surface from a height hurt." Harry just shrugged again. "Was the rune circle supposed to put you to sleep?" he asked.

Draco's face turned a deep red.

"No?" Harry delicately suggested.

"It was supposed to render me invulnerable to any spells that might try to cross the boundaries of the circle, including your wandless magic!" Draco snapped. He scrambled to his feet and strode back to the circle, working around the runes. Argutus wriggled around Harry's neck, and Harry put him down on the floor. The Many snake poked her head out of the pocket of his robes, too, where, based on the hive's advice, he'd been keeping her lately, but pulled her neck back when she saw no danger to Harry. Argutus started slithering around the outside of the circle, reflecting the runes in his bright scales and staring hard at them. Harry bit his lips to keep from laughing, especially when Argutus mirrored one rune Draco had passed up and then looked at him, saying, "This one is wrong."

"Um, Draco?"

Draco sighed and looked back at him. "What?"

“Argutus found a rune you didn’t write down right.”

“That’s impossible, I can’t have come to it yet—“

“This one is wrong,” said Argutus. He still couldn’t understand English, but he had told Harry he knew from scent when he was being doubted. He flicked his tongue out now, and his hissing took on an annoyed sound. “Have him come back here and look at this one. There is a tiny hook that projects out to the left. In my reflection, it should project out to the right. But it goes right on projecting to the left. Something is wrong.”

Harry told Draco that. Draco gave him an extremely doubtful look and strode back, leaning down to peer into Argutus’s scales—which of course blocked the light and destroyed the reflection. Argutus hissed in deep displeasure, and writhed one coil that didn’t contain the mirrored rune as if he would grab Draco’s wrist. Harry raised an eyebrow. Argutus was long enough now to drape down over his shoulders when he coiled around Harry’s neck. He might break Draco’s arm if he squeezed hard enough.

“Don’t doubt him, please,” he said.

Draco sighed, and moved, and looked at the reflection from a different angle. Then he said, “That’s impossible.”

“Tell him he is ugly when he doubts me,” Argutus commanded.

Harry sighed. “Apparently not impossible if an Omen snake can sense that something is wrong with your circle, Draco.”

“But that’s a bit of spontaneously wrong magic,” Draco persisted. “I’m sure I didn’t draw the rune that way. It shouldn’t have gone wrong. Besides, most wrong rune circles just don’t work. They don’t have an effect so completely different from the one the creator intended.”

Harry couldn’t conceal a smile now. “I guess you’re just talented, Draco.”

“Really?” Draco leaned back with an expression very similar to Hermione’s when she’d got a potion right in Snape’s class and was hoping, against all expectation and experience, to be praised this time.

“Yes,” said Harry. “I do think that you’re talented, Draco. Prone to rush on small details, maybe. See what happens if you erase the rune and then draw it again. Maybe it’ll work this time.”

Carefully, Draco erased the tiny hook on the rune and redrew it. Then he stepped triumphantly into the circle and turned around to look at Harry. “All right, Harry. Send your most powerful spells at—“

He collapsed, deeply asleep again.

“Now it’s upside down in the reflection,” said Argutus helpfully.

Harry had to laugh then—it was not as if Draco were awake to hear him—before he used his magic to float him out of the circle again.

“Potter! What do you think you’re doing?”

Harry was so startled that he cut his arm more deeply than he’d intended, and the knife skittered out of his hand and onto the floor, joined by a cascade of blood from the wound. Muttering under his breath, he turned and glared at Millicent, who’d come down the stairs into the common room at an unfortunate time. Nearly everyone else was outside enjoying the first sunny day of February; Harry had thought she’d gone, too. “My name’s not Potter anymore,” he said. “I know you must have heard that news. Perhaps you disregarded it because your brain was half asleep at the time.”

Millicent ignored this, hurrying across and taking his arm. “May I ask why you’re cutting your own arm, Harry? And deeply, too,” she added, as her fingers became slick with the blood in a moment.

“Practicing healing spells.”

Millicent shut her eyes. “I’m going to pretend you didn’t just say that.”

“Well, it’s true.” Harry fumbled in his pocket for his wand, muttering under his breath again as it slipped from his grip and fell back into his pocket. He summoned it into his fingers, then aimed it at the wound. He found it better to practice new spells with his wand first, before he tried to make them wandless. “Integro meliusculus!”

The flow of blood slowed, and the wound began to reknit itself, slowly. Harry nodded in satisfaction as a thick scab developed over about half the cut. The cut itself was deeper than he’d planned to make in the first place, but the spell still worked.

“Why didn’t it heal completely?” Millicent asked, frowning at Harry’s wand as if it were to blame.

“Because I didn’t want it to,” said Harry. “Integro meliusculus is only meant to make the wound somewhat better. It’s used on cursed wounds where too much healing magic at once would just trigger the curse to flare up again. I wanted to see if I could do it, and I can.” He nodded at his arm, feeling absurdly proud. The first few healing spells he’d practiced had needed two tries each before they worked. He wondered if healing magic was one of those subtle areas of magic where the passage of certain spells through the wizard’s brain and body and wand “prepared” them to handle others of the same kind of spell better.

“You still have to have this healed,” Millicent said flatly, looking as if she were about to dash to the hospital wing on her own.

Harry blinked. “Oh, that spell I already know. Integro!” he added, showing off by doing it without a wand.

The rest of his skin knitted over, and became an ugly, but healing, scab. Harry tugged his left arm away from Millicent and flexed it. “See?” he added. “As good as new.”

“Not quite.” Millicent shook her head, her mouth still so tight with exasperation that Harry thought she was the one who’d been taking lessons from Madam Pomfrey. “You do realize the standard procedure to test healing spells isn’t to cast them on yourself, Harry, right? Apprentice mediwizards and mediwitches treat real live patients with their trainers, or they use animals.”

Harry laughed. “Well, I’m not about to begin training as a mediwizard—I’m not old enough for it, even if I wanted to—and I’m certainly not about to use magical creatures. I don’t see what’s wrong with this. I only cut myself that deeply because you startled me when you yelled my old name,” he added, feeling the need to defend himself before Millicent’s darkened eyes.

“It hurts, though,” said Millicent, as if Harry were mentally deficient. “And you could always damage yourself more deeply than you meant to, and be badly hurt or die before someone else finds you.”

“That’s not going to happen,” said Harry.

“Why not?”

Harry indicated Argutus, watching in interest from a nearby couch. “He knows to go for Draco or Snape if I tell him to or if I fall on the ground and don’t move. No, they can’t understand Parseltongue, but they’ll follow Argutus if he’s grabbing the edges of their robes and pulling.”

Millicent looked as if she were trying to decide between throttling him or herself. “And the pain?”

“I can ignore it easily,” Harry said, raising his eyebrows. He would have thought she would have remembered that before anything else. “The training, you know. If I can manage to concentrate through pain to tuck my guts back in, then I can concentrate through most of the pain I cause myself. Besides, it’s good practice. A battle that hurts other people isn’t going to leave me unscathed most of the time. If I have to heal someone else while concentrating through the pain of my own wounds, better I know what that feels like now, in a non-battle situation.”

Millicent still breathed deeply, her eyes fixed somewhere over his head. “I’m going to tell Professor Snape about this,” she said suddenly.

Harry flinched. Most of the other adults he had some hope would listen to his side of the story. Madam Pomfrey would cluck her tongue and glare, but accept that he could heal himself, and probably be more professionally interested than anything. Headmistress McGonagall had other things on her mind, given that the wards were starting to melt down into the earth again. Remus might object, but Harry thought he could talk him around. Snape, though, whom Harry had had a coldly polite relationship with for the past two weeks, would go mad. Harry was just starting to work towards reconciliation with him, was in fact planning on it when they could be in the same room for more than five minutes without wanting to bite each other's heads off. This would spoil it all.

"Look, Millicent, don't do that," he said, in the calmest voice possible, as if her threat hadn't affected him. "What do you want?"

Millicent cocked her head. "For not telling Snape, you mean?"

"For not telling anyone." Harry vowed to himself that he wouldn't let anyone catch him again. He didn't want to cast his Complete Vanishing spell, because then Argutus wouldn't be able to bring help if something nasty did happen, but there were out-of-the-way corners in the school where no one would think to look for him. And Argutus knew Hogwarts well enough, from his constant wandering, that he could find his way back to the dungeons from any corner of it.

Millicent bit her lip, chewing it. Harry waited. He could imagine a few prices she might ask from him. She'd been unable to master the last few spells they practiced in Charms. Perhaps extra tutoring was in order. Or perhaps she wanted some specific piece of magic from him? Harry could do that—"I want you to stop giving yourself injuries to practice the spells on," Millicent said abruptly.

Harry blinked. Then he said, "What? No!"

"Then I tell Professor Snape." Millicent shrugged and turned towards the door out of the common room as if she would go do that right now.

"No!" said Harry in frustration. Sometimes, the world really would be simpler if I could just go around compelling people. "Listen, Millicent, I have to practice them this way," he went on, when she turned back around, distinctly unimpressed. "I can't hurt animals for this, and I don't want to practice on humans when I don't really know what I'm doing and might hurt them, too. This is the best way for me to get battlefield experience without actually being in battle."

Millicent shook her head. "You always insist on doing things the hard way, Harry. You could have talked to Madam Pomfrey, you know. Why didn't you?"

"Because the only way she could have me practice is on other students," said Harry. "I already told you why I objected to that."

"So perhaps you should just wait to actually do the spells, and learn the theory first." Millicent's voice had several shades of sarcasm in it. "I know that your usual method is to throw the spells first and then learn how they work, Harry, except in Defense, but I really think you should treat this like Defense."

Harry controlled his frustration. He couldn't think of any way to sway Millicent. If there had been the slightest softening in her expression, he would have tried, but she looked as stern as she had when she caught one of the third-years talking about putting a love potion into someone else's breakfast. She'd been chosen Prefect for a reason, Harry knew.

And if she told Snape, he really would go mad, and every bit of progress Harry had made with him since the original argument would be undone. Harry valued his relationship with his guardian more than the chance to keep practicing healing spells on himself.

"All right," he agreed.

"Promise me," Millicent said. "Swear by Merlin."

"I promise, in Merlin's name," said Harry glumly. He could admit that, looked at from the outside, this probably did sound like a stupid idea, but the more he read about healing magic, the more he thought that it would be useful, and he absolutely had to practice it. The thought of deliberately injuring someone else so he could practice horrified him, and then what would happen if he couldn't master the spell and couldn't heal the hurt? This had seemed the best compromise.

"Then I won't tell Snape," said Millicent, and made a little dusting motion with her hands. "Now, I'm going outside to watch the second-years. There's a gang of them who've developed a rivalry with a whole group of second-year Gryffindors, and they're all little monsters when they think someone isn't looking—the kind of children to give a snowball a lead core if they can." She shook her head and swept out of the common room.

"Are those lessons done?" Argutus asked.

Harry sighed and Scourgified the blood on the common room floor and the knife blade. "Yes."

"Too bad," said Argutus. "But perhaps we will learn other things now."

Harry nodded and wondered if Millicent would have been more sympathetic if he'd revealed that this was only his second day of practicing healing spells this way. He doubted it.

Harry ignored the glances. He knew how it looked. There were six post owls sitting patiently on the Slytherin table, awaiting their turn for attention, and he was furiously scribbling letters, trying to be diplomatic and persuasive at the same time. Even though a few of his allies wouldn't be coming to this grand gathering on Saturday, most of them would. They were asking questions about when they should arrive, whether they really had to Apparate outside Hogwarts' wards, if they had to bring gifts, whether gifts would be brought for them, demanding that he add just a bit of persuasion to make them come instead of attending to other commitments, and saying other things that Harry was more than willing to answer, as long as it would coax them into actually arriving.

This had been his main political business for the last three weeks, sending letters to all his allies and to all the families, Light and Dark, that his allies had mentioned as being potentially interested in alliance, trying to get them to agree to meet in the Room of Requirement on Saturday the seventeenth of February. First he'd had to overcome objections about meeting with wizards of the opposite allegiance, and then mass efforts to make him choose a different day, and then declarations that they wouldn't arrive if such-and-such a wizard or witch was there, and then, at last, these petty objections. Harry was willing to do almost anything to make it work, except the stupidly obvious things like meeting with only Light or Dark wizards, and now he almost thought it would.

Mortimer Belville wasn't coming, citing family commitments, but Compton Belville, who had now offered Harry adoption several times, was, and several of the minor Light pureblood families Augustus Starrise had told Harry usually did what the Starrises did. There were also several wizards tied in to the Opallines who were coming, strangers, and apparently a French witch had heard of the meeting through someone else and had written to Harry herself, asking permission to come. Harry had been pleased, especially since she told him she sat on the Veela Council. No, this wouldn't encourage them to make a decision about allying with him any faster, but it might at least present a positive impression of him.

If he could pull this off. Harry had never met with this many people before, and the nearest meeting in size had had an overwhelming majority of Dark wizards. At this one, if everyone attended who promised to, then there would be more who claimed allegiance to the Light. There were approximately several million things that could go wrong, but if he could pull it off, then perhaps abominations like the one he'd seen Voldemort performing last night would stop.

Harry grimaced and paused in writing, both to rest his wrist and to rub his scar. He'd gone into vision last night as a lynx and quietly watched, and there had been no sign that Voldemort noticed him. He certainly had never paused in chanting the spells that stitched pieces of cut-up human bodies into a creature bigger and stronger than the worm Harry had seen in the graveyard, a creature that resembled a lumpish dragon if it resembled anything, and had wings.

Harry had a sick feeling that he knew what had happened to the Muggles whom Voldemort had captured, using sirens, on the autumnal equinox.

He took a deep breath and plunged back into his letter-writing, ignoring Argutus's peaceful eating of sausages off his plate all by himself. Let people think he had terrible manners if they wanted. He had to make this work.

"And how does this spell work?"

Narcissa hid a smile as she finished casting the spell that would alert them when someone entered the Room of Requirement. She had come early to help ward the Room, partly with such spells and partly with Black artifacts placed in discreet locations, and Harry had been following either her or Regulus around most of the time, asking questions about the theory behind spells as if he were going to have an exam on them any moment.

"It senses flesh and blood," Narcissa told him now, as she stepped back and considered the light shimmer of the spell across the doorway. "It's one of the spells I used when we were searching for my cousin's body, trying to find out if he was hidden somewhere as himself. If someone enters in an Invisibility Cloak or under a Disillusionment Charm, the spell will tell me—and you. It has its limitations. It doesn't sense flesh and blood surrounded by other flesh and blood, for instance. If a woman came in with a baby in her arms, it wouldn't sense them as separate entities. And it wouldn't sense something like a poisonous spider clutched tight in someone's fist, until the fist open and the spider moved."

Harry cocked his head. He looked so charming at the moment, so incredibly full of concentration, that Narcissa felt any resentment she still carried towards him on account of the violated threefold oath fall away. She still hadn't received an answer from St. Mungo's about what the consequences of breaking the oath might be, but that was all right. It hadn't been Harry's fault—certainly not something he intended to do. And having listened to other descriptions of the incident at Durmstrang now, Narcissa had to accept that Rosier would have killed Bellatrix if Harry had not.

“That sounds like a hard spell to escape detection by,” Harry said now. “What’s the point of clutching a poisonous spider in your fist for hours?”

“Well, it’s rumored to be the way Arabella Zabini killed her seventh husband,” Narcissa said, as she began casting the next ward. “He used that spell because he thought she would lure him to a room where her next lover was hiding and have them duel to the death. Instead, she had a spider in her hand, and he didn’t sense any other flesh and blood until she opened her hand and it bit him.”

Harry blinked. “I’ll remember that the next time I see Mrs. Zabini,” he said.

“You should.” Narcissa gave him a faint smile. “Many of your allies are dangerous, Harry, some of them more so than any wizard or witch left unallied with you—at least in Britain.”

“What about Indigena Yaxley?”

Narcissa felt her smile fade. “I misspoke, then,” she said. “There is at least one dangerous witch you do not have on your side.”

“Is there any way of getting her?” Harry’s face was intent. “Lucius told me a little bit about the debt of honor she has, when I asked, but it sounded as though she could choose to get out of it.”

Narcissa shook her head. “Debts of honor are a contrivance that very few families respect any more,” she said. “They’re not like life debts—not recognized by magic itself. In this case, Indigena’s nephew swore his loyalty to the Dark Lord, but ran away even before he fell, and pretended he’d never been a Death Eater; he was certainly never suspected in the Ministry. Nor did he respond to the Dark Lord’s call when he returned last summer.” She saw Harry’s hand move to rub the stump of his left wrist, perhaps unconsciously, and briefly let herself wonder if enough of her sister’s handiwork was undone to grant Harry a hand now. “Then Voldemort demanded a debt of honor from the Yaxley family, a loyal servant in return for a disloyal servant. He could have chosen anyone he wanted. He chose Indigena, quite sensibly. It is her choice, her will, that binds her to the Dark Lord. And she hates traitors and those who forswear their vows; most of the Yaxleys do. She would look on someone like Severus or Lucius as blasted and damned. I fear you will never sway her, Harry.”

Harry’s face assumed the mild, stubborn expression Narcissa had seen there a few times just before he went out and did the impossible, including riding a dragon into a storm of the wild Dark. “I still might try, if it’s her choice and her magic wouldn’t punish her for turning away from Voldemort.”

Narcissa sighed. “At least promise me that you won’t go marching up to her on the next battlefield you see her on and try to sway her.”

Harry gave her a fleeting smile. “I promise.”

Then the first of their guests began to arrive, and Harry turned to welcome them, and Narcissa turned back to warding the room, wishing fretfully that she could be sure Harry wouldn’t try to persuade Indigena out of her allegiance. Indigena’s nephew was the only cowardly Yaxley in the history of the family that Narcissa could remember. If they chose a side at all, they stayed with that side, no matter how doomed it was; a Yaxley had fought at the Eagle Lord’s side even when he knew that Calypso McGonagall was bringing an earthquake down on them, according to legend.

And why should this one be different?

Snape knew it was all going to go wrong with the arrival of the first wizards and witches.

Oh, they were polite enough; most of them smiled, and took chairs in the growing circle of seats, provided by the Room of Requirement, with their smiles still intact. But they were separating themselves rigidly, sitting with either Light or Dark contingents, and when they looked at the wizards and witches across the ring from them, their faces wore nothing more neutral than frowns. Snape shook his head as he watched. He was sensitive enough to undercurrents, Merlin knew, after a year of spying among the Death Eaters for Dumbledore and forcing himself to pay attention to not only the tiny gestures but what the tiny gestures added up to. Most people had come here not out of curiosity, but because they felt they couldn't afford to be left out of a meeting their enemies would attend. The dominant emotional tone of the gathering was belligerence, and nothing would persuade them to lay it down, unless Harry agreed to meet with the members of each allegiance separately.

Snape knew that wouldn't happen.

His gaze left the gathering and moved back to Harry, who remained near the door of the Room of Requirement and welcomed the new guests in. His courteous mask never faltered. He had obviously looked up any details of pureblood greetings he didn't know, and Snape had the satisfaction of seeing some of the cold masks falter, for a moment, as the strangers accepted more politeness than they'd counted on.

It wouldn't work, though. Their faces hardened again as they walked towards the circle.

Quietly, Snape cast a spell that would tell him if someone was influencing others with an emotional compulsion. Voldemort had sometimes used that to stir up enthusiasm for killing among his more sluggish Death Eaters, and it would be exactly the kind of tool that Harry's enemies would use to destroy something that he'd worked so hard on.

No trace of the spell came back to him. Snape felt his mouth tighten. So. It's only the fools' natural tempers.

On and on they came, Harry's old allies and new ones. A few Light wizards and witches were exchanging smiles with a few Dark ones now, but too little, too late. The meeting had been spoiled before they arrived, Snape knew. Harry's haste and hurrying probably had something to do with it, as did the fact that the Light wizards didn't trust the Dark ones to actually fight Voldemort, and the Dark ones didn't trust the Light ones not to hide their heads, now that the Light side had been trimmed of its last leader.

Snape allowed himself a single moment of hard satisfaction for that. Dumbledore was gone, and though Snape believed Harry should have absorbed the Headmaster's magic instead of storing it in a tie, of all things, he would not be a threat ever again.

Then he went back to studying the gathering, and shook his head. There were a few wizards and witches here he would have advised Harry not to invite, if he and Harry were on speaking terms that close. Gloriana Griffinsnest was so entirely under the domination of Augustus Starrise that she would do almost nothing without his permission, but in one thing she was firm, and that was her hatred of werewolves, since two of them had killed her parents. Her eyes had not moved from Remus Lupin since she came into the room, and Snape had seen her robes swirl and part, briefly revealing the silver knife she carried. She would kill Lupin in a moment if she thought she could get away with it.

Compton Belville sat like a black swan among the wizards on the Dark side of the circle, murmuring greetings and responses to questions with a blank look on his face. Snape had to fight to keep his snarl from his lips when the old wizard's gaze briefly touched his. Compton was timid in letters, and could sound like a fool; so long as he and Harry had communicated only by owl, Snape saw no reason to encourage his ward to drop the correspondence. In person, though, the foolishness was revealed for the act it was. Compton Belville, though eighty-four years old, was dangerous if he decided to be so. And now he could observe Harry close at hand.

And Augustus Starrise...Snape did not care if he was Harry's ally, not when the man's eyes lingered on several faces around the circle with that special contempt in them. He was looking at Snape that way, currently. Snape knew he would have cast a spell to determine which of the wizards in the room had either Muggle or Muggleborn parents. He would have sensed Tobias Snape's blood in Severus Snape's veins, and that Snape's mother had been a pureblood witch would matter little to him. Starrise lifted his lip as Snape watched. Combined with his eyes, they expressed a perfect, practiced, pureblood scorn.

Asking to have Augustus Starrise behave politely in any room that included halfblood witches and wizards was like asking a Kneazle to play nicely with pixies. Snape watched others become offended as they noted Starrise's scrutiny, and Lucius Malfoy watch Starrise all the while with a fixed air of hatred—they were too much alike for Lucius to do anything else—and ripples spread out from there, as wizards or witches who relied on others to guide them scrambled to adjust their positions to the emotions their guides were expressing.

Snape shot Harry a glance as he welcomed in the last guest, the French witch, who arrived in a cloud of shimmering silver hair and took a seat between the Light and Dark sides. It seemed Harry did suspect that not everything was perfect. Of course, his chin was up and his green eyes incredibly stubborn. He would not back off on holding the meeting now simply because of potential problems. He would persist until it collapsed.

Snape concealed a snarl. He would not be responsible for his actions if Belville or Starrise launched a spell at Harry. He wished that he could have simply stepped over the boy's barriers, or his own, to warn Harry about them, but Harry was stuck on handling their reconciliation slowly, and didn't want to talk about anything except that or Potions. Snape knew his warnings would have been unwelcome.

He concealed another snarl and turned back to the gathering. Harry had moved through a gap between the French witch's chair and her nearest neighbor's, and taken his place in the center of the circle. He turned in a slow circle himself, meeting everyone's eyes. He radiated power and confidence. Snape had to admit it made a difference from the trial, the last time Harry had been on such public display to a captive audience. This was more like his air during the press conference he'd held to warn the wizarding world of the danger of the wild Dark.

"Thank you for coming," Harry was saying, formally. "It has been decades since the last gathering of Dark and Light wizards this large. When I studied the historical records, the last time I could find a mention of one half so big was an alliance against the Dark Lord Grindelwald, in 1944. That fell apart after a few months of dissonance.” He paused and gave a sharp smile in Compton Belville’s direction. “I hope this one will prove steadier.”

“Perhaps it would help if you told us what you intend, Harry,” said Paton Opalline, one of the few wizards here Snape would trust to stand at his back with a wand in his hand. He sat with his tattoos exposed and gleaming on his skin, probably to show the others that his family was at Harry’s disposal. “What are your goals for this alliance?”

Harry nodded. “I intend for us to fight Voldemort,” he said, and a surprising number of Dark wizards flinched at the name. Snape rolled his eyes, and did not care who saw him. “But not only that. When he is defeated—“

“If,” said Compton Belville, with the soft-voiced and utterly stalling kind of interruption he was so good at.

But Harry did not stumble and ask what Belville meant, as so many of his victims did. He merely turned to face him and flashed him a dangerous grin. “I plan to defeat Voldemort in a few years,” he said casually. “I certainly don’t intend for him to run about for decades and wreak havoc on my life and my brother’s.”

“Perhaps you could see your way clear towards telling us the prophecy, then,” said Belville, leaning forward, his face full of bloodless curiosity. “What exactly does it say? Why should we believe that you will defeat the Dark Lord?”

Harry paused for a long moment. Then he said, “Forgive me, sir, but I know that a traitor lurks among the ranks of my alliance. I have reason to believe that this traitor warned Voldemort about a battle that my allies and I fought in the autumn. Unless everyone here will consent to swear an oath promising to speak nothing of this meeting outside this room, then I cannot tell you the prophecy. There is too much danger that it might run back to my enemies.”

“To ask us to take such an oath is an insult!” Gloriana Griffinsnest exclaimed, clasping her hands together. “Would you really ask us to do such a thing, Lord—“

"I am no Lord."

Harry's flat declaration stopped Griffinsnest as effectively as Belville could have done, Snape noted with approval, but not for long. Then she was bustling forward again. "I have heard that you call yourself a vates, a guardian of free will for the magical creatures," she said stiffly, raising her head. "Is this a sign that you respect the free will of wizards and witches less, then?"

Harry shook his head. "It is a simple precaution, ma'am. Unless I have that assurance, it would be stupid to let my enemies have that prophecy."

"Then you are afraid of the Dark Lord," said Belville. Had it not been for the fact that Griffinsnest and Belville hated each other too much to cooperate, Snape would have thought they had arranged this, so perfectly were they playing off each other. "I did not know you were afraid of him."

"Of course I am," said Harry, so simply that it was hard to wrestle fear out of his tone. "He is a Parselmouth, in possession of knowledge of how to breed basilisks—"

"Via books he stole from me," said Arabella Zabini, her face gray with rage.

Harry inclined his head to her. "Nonetheless, stolen or not, he has the knowledge now," he continued. "He is also an absorbere, able to swallow magic. He has drained—Muggleborn children too young for Hogwarts, and I think his victims may be legion in a battle. He is a compeller, an Occlumens, and a master Legilimens, as well as able in Dark Arts from years of study between the time of Grindelwald and his return to Britain and first rise. He had an alliance with the sirens, though they may have broken free of him by now, and he has sent negotiators to the giants, though most have failed. He can possess others. Indigena Yaxley fights with him, and I have already seen how much damage her plants can do." Harry took a deep breath. "I also have information from a new source that Voldemort is stitching pieces of dead flesh together into beasts. I faced one on Midwinter that looked like an enormous worm. The one I have been informed of is a dragon, or resembles one.”

“That is a Dark Art unpracticed for nearly two hundred years,” said Hawthorn Parkinson, who looked sick. “My—my husband, who was a necromancer, told me of the last time it happened. A monster in human form escaped among the Muggles and caused great damage before he could be stopped. One of the Muggle authors wrote a book about it, though of course most of the facts were wrong. Frankenstein, I think it was called.”

Harry nodded slightly. “I know he could animate the worm. I am unsure how he will bring the dragon to life, but I have no doubt that he will manage.”

Snape sat still in his chair. It might appear to anyone who looked at him that he was considering how much damage Voldemort’s beasts would do. He, however, was thinking of how Harry could have learned about the Dark Lord’s dragon. He could think of only two routes, neither of which pleased him.

Either Evan has been writing to him again, and he should know better than to believe the liar by now—

Or he has been opening the Occlumency link and stepping into the Dark Lord’s head. Damn him!

Snape sent Harry a furious glare just as Harry turned his way. Harry froze for a moment, eyes wide, then shook his head and set his shoulders and glared back. Snape sat back in his chair, suppressing his incandescent rage that his ward had taken yet another foolish risk, rather than coming and asking for help with his dreams and visions.

“How do we defeat him, when he has such armies?” That was one of the wizards from a minor Light family, Dawnborn or something of the kind. His eyes were wide and fearful.

Harry started to answer, but Edward Burke spoke before he could. “Why do you have to worry about that? You’ll just cower in your holes, which is the only activity proper to rabbits.”

The Light wizard squawked, and Augustus Starrise's voice rang out. "Do you claim that Dark wizards fought You-Know-Who in his first rise, Burke? They did not. They fawned at his heels as his hounds, or ran beside him as leashed slaves." His eyes found Lucius Malfoy's face.

Snape sat back in resignation as he saw Lucius lean forward. The circle was falling apart all along its fractures. Yes, Harry should have considered more carefully whom to invite.

"Some might say that, under the Imperius Curse or not, at least his servants saw battle, and often without him," Lucius murmured. He was using the kind of voice that did not sound loud, but could easily reach across the circle, and was the fiercer for being the softer. "They did not sit in their homes and wait for one wizard to lead them, as happened too often with Albus Dumbledore. Nor did they become first captives and then suicides."

Starrise stood in a single, flowing motion. He did not have the white staff bound with gold he had carried at the trial, or Snape would have feared for Lucius's life. But he was enraged enough that white, glowing sparks of wandless magic leaped about him. "Were you one of them?" he whispered. "Were you one of the bastards who did worse than rape my sister?"

Lucius merely leaned back in his chair and raised his eyebrows. "Did that happen to your sister? I had no idea. My humblest apologies, Starrise." His voice had no tone at all, which was worse mockery than laughter.

Starrise trembled as if he would rush forward. Gloriana Griffinsnest, beside him, fingered her silver knife and eyed Lupin. Hawthorn Parkinson sniffed once, and then focused on the knife; Snape could hear a low growl bubbling in her throat. Tybalt Starrise and Honoria Pemberley were tensed, bright grins on their faces. Snape did not know which way they would leap, but he was certain they would enjoy the chaos of it.

"Enough."

Snape winced. Harry had enchanted his voice to throb in the ears of everyone who heard it. Most wizards and witches fell back clutching their heads. Lucius and Starrise never took their gazes from each other, but they were the only ones who didn't.

"This is obviously not working," said Harry, with firmness and no disappointment in his tone. "Very well. I have thought of another plan, one I that considered as less preferable than this one. However, perhaps it will give you time to restrain your tempers and become accustomed to working beside wizards and witches of an opposing allegiance." Snape turned his eyes to Harry, along with everyone else, and saw Harry shrouded with a mixture of deep green light, one of the colors that symbolized Dark, and blue phoenix flame. It did make a striking tableau, and it kept most everyone transfixed while Harry spoke. "This is an alliance of Light and Dark, and always will be. I will never Declare for either Dark or Light. I am not a Lord. I am vates, and I will work for the rights of magical creatures. That does not mean I consider them more important my own species—and vice versa.

"Paton Opalline asked me what I wished the alliance to accomplish. While the first answer is finding ways to fight Voldemort, the next answer, and the more profound, is to find new ways of living. Most magical creatures are bound under webs that prevent them from coexisting equally, or at all, with witches and wizards. Light and Dark battle generation after generation, with useless slaughter in the name of names. Injustice prevails in many wizarding families, and not only child abuse. Muggleborns and their children are scorned by purebloods." His gaze came to Starrise, and it was hard, but it didn't soften when he looked at Lucius, either. "I would like to change all of that, and anyone who wishes to help me is welcome."

Silence gripped the room for a long time. Then Paton said, his voice still as cheerful as before, "What is this second opportunity for meeting that you were talking about, Harry?"

"On the spring equinox," said Harry softly. "The old day of reconciliation, of ending wars and making up family quarrels. The day when day and night, Light and Dark, are of equal length. I would invite anyone who wishes to come to an enormous gathering, not held in Hogwarts—"

“Where, then?” Compton Belville asked.

“In a place I will reveal to those who choose to come, and only those,” said Harry simply. “And I will require oaths, before you enter the area, that you will not cast spells save in self-defense. We are going to talk about revolution, but bloodless revolution only.”

“Such a thing has not been done since Merlin’s time.” That was the French witch, leaning forward and looking at Harry with interest. “The memories of the Veela are long, and such oaths of peace were rare even then. Will people from other countries who wish to attend the gathering be welcome?”

Harry bowed slightly to her. “Anyone who wishes, yes.”

“There could be centaurs there, then?” Augustus Starrise asked.

“And werewolves?” Gloriana Griffinsnest asked.

“And Muggleborns?” That was Edward Burke, who looked dismayed.

“Yes, anyone who wishes to attend and will swear the oaths.” Harry looked at them and shook his head. “I will remain here until everyone is left, to make sure the remains of this gathering do not explode into violence. It troubles me, indeed, that this had to happen, that so many powerful adult wizards in Britain will surrender themselves to names and no more than that.”

His tone was perfect, Snape had to concede, not exactly scolding but full of proud and stern dismay. More than a few people bowed their heads and looked chastised before they slowly began to leave. Snape waited until he was sure that most of them were gone, and the small crowd around Harry had cleared, before he began working his own way forward.

Harry was speaking with Paton Opalline when he arrived. Paton took one look at Snape’s face and raised his eyebrows. “It seems that your father wishes to speak with you, Harry,” he said, “and I know better than to stand between a parent and child. My brother gave me a scar I still bear for it.” He stepped back.

“He’s not my father,” said Harry.

His voice was querulous, sulky, to Snape’s ears, and it was that or it was the words that made Snape lose control of his temper—though he managed to keep his voice soft, so that no one would have reason to look their way.

“You have been going into the Dark Lord’s mind in your dreams,” he whispered harshly.

Harry stiffened. “What makes you think I’ve done that?” he asked, and his eyes met Snape’s, wide and guileless. Occlumency shields were guarding his emotions, so that Snape couldn’t read, even with a focused Legilimency probe, anything to contradict what he was saying. If Snape hadn’t taught Harry to do that, and in part to lie, himself, he might even have believed him.

If small winged pigs had been swooping overhead, perhaps.

“How else could you have learned about the Dark Lord’s use of a flesh dragon?” Snape snarled. “Unless Rosier has written you.”

Harry shook his head. “No, he hasn’t.”

“Then it was the dreams,” said Snape, and other emotions than pure anger were stirring in him now: resentment for Harry’s disregard of his own safety, and fear, and resentment of the fear, and a marrow-deep frustration. “You have done many things in the past month that you have not informed me of.” And he was thinking, now, of the fact that Harry had obviously made up with Draco and not him, and of Harry becoming Black heir, and of the fact that Harry had mostly arranged this meeting before he bothered to tell Snape about it.

“I didn’t want you to worry.”

Snape’s eyes snapped away from his memories and back to Harry. The words were soft and laden with poison. Harry’s gaze sparked with his own resentment and frustration. Snape could see the progress they had made in the past month falling to pieces in them.

“What have I said about that?” Snape said, more softly and more coldly than before. His anger was rending him again. It was one thing not to be able to protect Harry from suddenly appearing dangers like Dumbledore and Evan Rosier, it was another for Harry to have to face one only he could face, like the wild Dark, and it was another, quite another, for Harry to hide information from him that would have aided Snape in protecting him—for Harry to do things that damaged Snape’s role of guardian.

“That I have to trust you.” Harry’s voice rose a notch higher. Snape could see Draco hovering anxiously off to the side, but his mother had her hand on his shoulder and wasn’t letting him approach. “You don’t see that I do trust you. Merlin! Would I pour this much effort into arguing with you, would I care this much, if I didn’t trust you, didn’t love you? But that’s not the only role I have. I have to be a leader, have to do what I can to protect others. He hasn’t sensed me so far; I promise he hasn’t. I’m learning to distinguish between the dreams I get, the ones where he’s dreaming and the ones where I see what he’s doing and the ones where he tries to trap me. I know what the traps feel like, and he’s not using them.”

If he had ever been more sheerly infuriated at any point in his life, Snape could not remember it. “Perhaps he senses you,” he whispered. “Perhaps he is merely waiting you out. Did you think of that?”

Harry snorted. “Would he really let me see his plans that way? I don’t think he would. He would use a false vision instead. And I told you, I know what those feel like. He lured me to the Weasleys this summer with a misty dream of him attacking my brother. He’s not using those now. I’ve been watching him, and he can’t sense me. I haven’t been jumping into the connection like I did in September. I promise.”

“Why will you not let us protect you?”

Harry apparently couldn't speak for a moment. Then he snarled, "Because you can't. I'll never be safe. I've got used to that. You still haven't. And I'm not a child, and the ways you try to protect me are all ways you would try to protect a child. If I thought you would take the information I have about my danger and discuss it with me like an adult, then I would give it to you. But you don't, and you won't." He paused, then added, "Maybe that's the way I don't trust you, sir. I don't trust you to remember that this is a war, and I have to do my share of the work."

He turned and strode rapidly from the Room of Requirement, giving his head a single sharp shake when Draco tried to accompany him. Snape knew he was probably going off alone to brood.

He controlled his temper with a combination of Occlumency and sheer ruthlessness. He would go back to his quarters, conjure targets, and destroy them. Then he would brew potions. But not here, not here.

"Trying to raise a child is difficult," said Opalline. He didn't put his hand on Snape's shoulder, merely regarded him with compassion. "Particularly when they begin to insist that they are children no longer."

Snape only nodded once, curtly, and strode from the room. He hated vulnerability, and he hated helplessness, and he felt as if he were helpless on all sides, with his tie to a life that Harry refused to guard.

Interlude: The Serpent Strikes

February 17th, 1996

Dear Lord Voldemort:

By the incantation to take a letter directly to you I send this, with information that I hope and believe you will need. I have heard of the vengeance of Dark Lords upon those unworthy servants who dare to disturb their important plans, and I know that I have not been honored with Your Lordship's confidences, but I believe that you must hear this news, that it is important and will continue to be so.

I attended a meeting today with the rest of those fools who continue to overlook me and think I do not matter. In this case, I was very literally overlooked. Not a single eye alighted upon me. I can be ignored, but they do not know the depth of the cunning that hides behind my face, and they can never be bothered to find out. I believe they hold my bloodline against me, although I have done nothing that would taint it further than it is already tainted.

The meeting was a short one. No one could reach an accord, and Potter—so I call him, for though he rejects his family name he certainly has no claim to any other, and I will not call him by his first name alone, as if I were his friend—dismissed us, calling for a meeting on the vernal equinox. He will not tell us where the meeting is to be held until each person contacts him, assents to coming, and swears an oath not to use magic except in self-defense. I think he will find the numbers at this supposed reconciliation meeting between Light and Dark smaller than he thinks he will.

More than that, though, my lord, I sensed a weakness in the wards of the school. It seems that Albus Dumbledore's death tearing up the wards was not rumor or idle speculation after all. He has weakened them, and the weak point seemed to be below the Room of Requirement. I cast a spell that would enable me to see the wards—as no one still thinks I am worth anything, that was easy enough—and watched them running downward. The Headmistress cannot have found the weak point yet, however, or she would have sent the children home while she reestablished the wards. The movement of the spells was slow, but given that they were moving at all, I would estimate the waxing and waning cycle as no longer than a day. May this information be useful to you, my Lord, as you plan an attack on Hogwarts. I would suggest Draco Malfoy as a target, if your servant may have the cheek to hint at where you direct your illustrious might. The boy stays close to Potter at all times, and is rumored to be starting a formal courting ritual with him soon. His loss would break Potter.

With sincerity,

The Serpent.

February 19th, 1996

Dear Serpent:

I will use the name that you continue to prefer, so that if this letter falls into the hands of your erstwhile "allies" it will not reveal you. Lord Voldemort has directed me to write back to you, and to thank you for your information. Harry's meeting on the vernal equinox sounds interesting, and we will trust you to report what happens there to us. Make sure that you are invited.

We also thank you for the information on the wards, though we had already attained this from another source. (Strike more quickly, my dear Serpent. I would hate to see you no longer of use! My lord laughs most heartily whenever he receives one of your letters.) My lord has also chosen how best to employ their weakness. He will not attack Draco Malfoy at this time. There is another set of people connected to Harry whom he will bleed instead.

A most curious thing, my dear Serpent: When we broke the charm to disguise your handwriting on your second message, the one informing us of Harry's presence at his press conference, we learned that you are apparently ambidextrous. Are you, by any chance, able to take the Dark Mark soon? My lord welcomes one who, as in the old legends of ambidextrous wizards, could wield his wand with either hand.

May affection hold you like the embrace of thorns,

Indigena Yaxley.

Chapter Sixty-Eight: Stolen Child

“I think that if you just apologized—“

“Draco.” Harry controlled himself with an effort, which in this case meant he kept his voice calm, though cool, and didn’t look up from the letter he was writing. “We’ve been over this. I’ve tried all the compromises I can think of. I’ve told him I love him, I trust him, that I understand what he’s trying to do and why he’s trying to do it. I can’t just agree with him, though, and I think he’d take an apology the same way right now. When I work out what I actually want to say, then I still have to say it to him without shouting, and so far that hasn’t worked.” He looked up at Draco, who was leaning on his bed on one elbow and watching Harry as he wrote the letter on top of his Transfiguration text. “So stop talking to me about Snape right now.”

Draco snorted. “I don’t see why it’s so hard. You love and trust me, and you made up with me just fine.”

Harry rolled his eyes. “And you actually made an effort, Draco. Snape seems caught in his own little world, one where I’m a child to be protected and he’s the father to do it, and he and I have no other roles to play. He actually got huffy last weekend when Opalline said that he was my father and I said he wasn’t.”

Draco said, “It is very disturbing to hear Professor Snape being talked about as if he were paternal.”

“See?” Harry shook his head. “This needs to be fixed, but neither of us can fix it in the moods we’re in now.” He leaned back on his own elbow, disturbing the Many snake in his pocket, but she just squirmed into a new position and went back to sleep. Argutus was more vocal.

“What are you writing?” he asked, as he slithered along Harry’s shoulder and draped himself to look down at the letter. He still couldn’t read English, but that didn’t keep him from trying. So far, he claimed to be able to recognize “a” and “s.” “Is it a challenge to the other snake-speaker, so that you can fight him in a duel to the death?”

"You've been listening to too many fey stories in the Forbidden Forest again," said Harry, deciding that he could do worse than just close the letter with a simple thanks for the time the reader had put into reading it. "Not every war ends in a duel to the death."

"But lots of them do!" Argutus wound his head in several directions, which for him was the equivalent of bouncing up and down. "You could challenge him to a duel to the death, and then all the snakes in the world would come and surround you in a ring. And you would defeat him in a blast of fire, and the snakes would tell the legend of the other snake-speaker's death for the rest of time."

"You've been listening to the Many." Harry started to read his letter over again from the beginning. "Believe me, Argutus, most snakes aren't that concerned with me and Voldemort unless they actually come into contact with us. Even Sylarana only decided to come to me because she wanted someone to compliment her and feed her, and she decided that, since she'd seen me fighting in the Forest with Voldemort, I was able to talk to snakes and could do it. There's no mystical bond between Parselmouths and snakes."

"The Runespoors said there could be," said Argutus, sounding hurt.

"Do we have a mystical bond?" Harry raised his eyebrow and looked at the Omen snake.

Argutus lifted his head and flicked his tongue rapidly three times, one of his signs of irritation. "We could, if I was just a different kind of snake or you were a different kind of human," he said primly.

"Exactly my point." Harry turned back to his letter.

"I'm itchy," said Argutus, running his neck up and down Harry's. "Scratch me."

"My nails aren't sharp enough." Harry gently pushed the snake in the direction of the head of the bed, which had a few sharp ridges he could rub himself against. Argutus was shedding his skin for the first time, and continually wanted someone to oblige him by helping to scratch his skin off, and continually complained that nothing was sharp enough to actually tear the skin and give him relief.

Argutus huffed at him and slithered away. Harry shook his head, completed his reading of the letter, and then looked up to see Draco smiling at him with barely concealed amusement. "What?" he asked, reaching up to his neck, thinking Argutus might have left a bit of shed scales there.

"You have no idea how cute you look, arguing with him like that," said Draco smugly. "Even if I can't understand what you're saying. And I remember that I chose Argutus for you when I watch him with you. That's my gift you get on so well with."

"I am not cute," said Harry, because he didn't even have an answer to the rest of it. He lifted the letter to the Daily Prophet. "Well, here it is. I'm asking them to consider running an article about the equinox meeting, so that as many people as possible know about it. Want to go to the Owlery with me so I can post it?"

Draco made a face as he stood. "That means that Mud—" Harry's gaze cut him, and he flinched. "Uh, I mean, Muggleborns can be there, doesn't it?"

"You heard what I answered Edward Burke last week," Harry said as he turned away. "Yes, if they'll contact me about coming and swear the oath. You really should get over this prejudice of yours, Draco," he added, in the most chiding manner possible. He wasn't going to condemn Draco for his beliefs, but he was going to try to persuade him out of them. "After all, it's not as though there's any difference between Muggleborns and purebloods when it comes to magical skill, is there?"

"Of course there is!" Draco sounded scandalized. Harry made sure to keep his laughter silent. Luckily, he was facing forward as they went through the Slytherin common room, so Draco couldn't see the grin on his face. "Purebloods have been the most powerful wizards and witches throughout history, Harry."

“And I suppose you’re stronger than Hermione, then?” Harry asked, as if this were merely a question in which he had an academic interest.

Draco made an inarticulate sound at his back. He knew very well that he was not stronger than Hermione in sheer magical strength, though he probably knew more spells, and he hated it. “That’s not the point,” he said, finally.

“Really? I thought it was.”

“I mean—I meant, that is, that pureblood wizards are strong in other ways than sheer magical strength,” said Draco haughtily. “They have a completely different culture backing them than Muggleborns. Muggleborns lose one culture when they enter ours, and then they can’t adapt.”

“Then Zacharias Smith’s education has been sadly neglected,” said Harry. “I’ll be sure to tell him.”

There was a long silence behind him. They got up three whole staircases before Draco gave in and said, “What does that mean?”

“Hermione manipulated him with a pureblood ritual in the dueling club last week,” said Harry, grinning at him over his shoulder. “But she must have been making it up, because, as you said, Muggleborns can’t adapt. And Zacharias is a pureblood, so he should have realized the ritual was false. Such a sad gap in his education.”

“Look,” said Draco, and then stopped.

“Yes?” Harry kept his eyes on the staircases ahead of him, and his voice as free as possible of either smugness or laughter.

“Granger’s a freak of nature,” said Draco firmly.

“Oh,” said Harry, with a nod of his head. “So if a Muggleborn is powerful and tries as hard as she can to learn pureblood culture, then she’s a freak of nature? But you won’t deny that she might be able to be and do those things?”

"That's right," said Draco, sounding relieved.

"Then tell me," said Harry. "If it's neither power nor culture, then what does separate purebloods from Muggleborns?"

Draco seized his shoulder and spun him around, glaring at him. Harry looked up at him and cocked an eyebrow, secretly pleased to note that he no longer had to look so far up. He was growing again, and was probably only an inch shorter than Draco now.

"You can't argue this way with just anyone," Draco said. "You've got to understand that, Harry. There are thick, old prejudices in some of your allies from the meeting that you can't hammer down with mild, reasoned arguments like this."

"I know," said Harry. "But some of them, I will be able to convince just by showing how stupid they're being. The smarter ones, at least. And you're already getting there, Draco." He held Draco's eyes calmly. "You can't deny that Hermione exists and that she's done these things, because that would be even more stupid than holding these prejudices in the first place. So you'll need to start shedding them, unless you want to act like an idiot and shut your eyes to reality."

"It's the blood that separates us, Harry," said Draco steadily. "And you know it. Purebloods have pureblood ancestors. And you might consider that silly and separatist, but there you are. We don't have Muggles for parents. We don't get torn away from one world at eleven years old and plunked down in another. Merlin! You ought to understand that part, at least. You were raised in the wizarding world yourself."

"A very small part of it," said Harry quietly. "I learned most of what I knew about it from books. And one thing that my parents were never very successful at teaching me, even when they tried, was that only certain people could inherit certain things, because they were pureblood or Dark or Light. I learned the Dark pureblood rituals, Draco. I wasn't born to them, if you can even be born to such a thing. And as for having no contact with non-magical people, pureblood families have Squib children sometimes, and you know it."

Draco let him go with a scowl. "It's still different," he muttered. "I don't expect you to understand, Harry, I really don't, but it's about family. That's not something that people are going to give up easily."

"I know," said Harry. "I do know that, Draco. But saying that they won't give it up easily isn't the same as saying that they'll never give it up at all, or that I can't get some people to realize what blind gits they're being."

"You really do mean it, don't you?" Draco asked resignedly as they started to climb towards the Owlery again. "You want to change the way people live. That's what you said at the meeting."

"Yes," said Harry.

Draco sighed. "I don't know why I'm doing this," he complained to the ceiling. "Since I don't even believe in half of what you're spouting, and I'm a pureblood, born to lounge around and be served delicate sweets by house elves. But I'll tell you to start with the children first, Harry. I was thinking the other day that I didn't want to kill Muggleborns because I know some of them. It's different when you think about killing someone of a different kind of blood, and when they have faces. So you'll have better luck with Millicent than with her father, for example."

Harry turned around and smiled at him. "Thanks, Draco. I really do appreciate it."

"Someone has to protect you when you're being blind," Draco replied. "I—"

Harry dropped to one knee abruptly on the steps, his letter fluttering out of his hand as he slammed it to his scar. It had started bleeding. Harry tried to breathe through the pain that possessed every inch of his body, his mind racing. Was Voldemort here at Hogwarts? That was the only thing he could imagine that would start his scar flaring this way.

“Harry?” Draco’s voice, and even the touch of his hands on Harry’s shoulder, were distant, and no more important than blocks of wood.

Harry opened his eyes. He found himself in an unfamiliar house, looking straight at a window through which he could see a dark sky. This wasn’t now, then—it was still early afternoon—but some time at least a few hours in the future.

He turned, and saw a long trail of blood on the floor of what looked like an ordinary Muggle hallway. Harry followed it, not knowing if he was moving his body or not. He was so entirely gone into the vision that he couldn’t feel or hear Draco anymore.

The trail of blood ended in a room with Muggle devices shoved back to the walls, and an awful kind of rack set up in the middle of it. Harry felt his stomach heave as he stared at the two bodies hanging on the various branches of the thorn tree that had grown up through the floor. He knew them, though he hadn’t seen them in almost ten years, and had only met them once. This would be his Muggle aunt and cousin, the Dursleys.

Their blood ran from star-shaped holes in their bodies, probably cut with the help of knives or magic. It was painted over their faces in careful masks, patterns that Harry recognized from looking at some of the more unpleasant books Regulus had gifted him with. Dark magic, evil magic, magic that could be used only when the victims of the ritual were blood relatives of a target.

He heard a distant roar as he stood there, and he knew that Voldemort and the storm he would have raised from this blood were coming. It made sense that Voldemort would strike at the Dursleys, really, Harry thought numbly. They were the most vulnerable of his blood relatives. Connor, Lily, and James were all too well-protected.

The vision ended as Harry felt the hurricane gathering closer and closer at his back. If Voldemort completed that ritual, he thought from deep in his daze, he wouldn’t be able to defend himself against it. It would strike through the common bond that linked Petunia to Lily, and Lily to him—a bond that he wouldn’t be able to get rid of unless he somehow tore every bit of shared genetic material from his body.

And it would likely hurt Connor, too, and perhaps even his parents. It would depend on whether Voldemort thought he needed to get rid of them. Connor, at the least, he probably would kill.

Harry sat up, slowly, leaning against the wall of the staircase. He knew that he was moving too slowly—though not fast enough for Draco, who was shouting in his face—but he needed to get his bearings. He could not remember where the Dursleys lived, which meant he couldn't ride his broom there, and he wouldn't want to Apparate based on a glimpse of a bloodied, altered room several hours in the future. The Knight Bus was a possible solution, but he still had to learn their address. He hoped that Dumbledore would have kept it among his papers, and that McGonagall would still have those papers.

"Harry!" Draco was insisting on his attention. "What's the matter?"

"I had a vision," said Harry. His tongue felt thick in his mouth. He didn't know if that was from the searing pain that had finally left him, or the shock of the vision. "Voldemort's going to be attacking my Muggle aunt and cousin, I think. He'll use blood magic to get at me and Connor."

"You can't trust those visions," Draco said desperately, kneeling down next to him. "I didn't hear much of your conversation with Snape at the meeting, but I heard enough. Surely Voldemort could have sent you a vision to entrap you and make you do just this? Go running off to protect these Muggles, and straight into a trap?"

Harry let out a sharp breath. "I don't know. The vision could have come because of the blood connection we share, Draco. The magic of families will sometimes reach out and attempt to protect its members like that." Draco was nodding slowly, reluctantly; he'd probably heard of at least one instance where one member of the Malfoy family had a vision of another in trouble. "I have to look in one of the books Regulus got me." He strangled his own impatience, which was both trying to calculate how much time he might have left and get him to dash to the Headmistress's office right away. "You're right. This could be a trap. I'll have to look up this kind of vision in the books and see if this is actually likely, that it could be a real thing."

Draco's hands were shaking as he supported Harry to his feet. Harry glanced curiously up at him. "Are you all right, Draco?"

"You were on the floor in such intense pain that you stopped breathing for a little while, you prat," Draco said. "What do you think?"

Harry pressed his hand briefly, in apology, and then they started back down the stairs in the direction of their bedroom, and Harry's trunk, where he'd put the books Regulus gave him.

There is a blood ritual that can be performed with any blood relative in the first two generations of connection. Thus grandparents can be used against their grandchildren, and second cousins can be used against each other. Further than that, this ritual cannot bind them.

The words beat in Harry's head like wings as he lurched against the side of the Knight Bus. Draco, sitting in the armchair across the aisle, reached out as if to help him, and then lost his own balance and launched sideways. Harry heard him mutter something uncomplimentary about "Muggle-based" methods of transportation.

Connor, who was sitting in the chair in front of Harry, turned around with a grin. He had balanced himself perfectly, somehow. "Fun, isn't it?" he yelled, as the Bus spun around a corner and then shot down a street that Harry was glad he couldn't see too clearly.

Harry ground his teeth and didn't say anything. The vision he'd seen still blazed in his head, and the words of the Black book he'd looked up the ritual in still pounded in his blood, his heartbeat.

His blood.

The ritual must be begun precisely at the turn of nightfall, the moment of sunset. The victims—the ritual may be done with one victim alone, but every sacrifice gives it an added potency—must be trapped without the use of magic that binds or confines. The only magic used in this ritual must be that which draws blood.

Harry heard Auror Moody's voice from the front of the Bus, urging the driver, Ernie Prang, to go faster. Though that would mean more jostling, Harry was glad for it. They were still probably an hour from sunset, but it was February, not Midsummer, and the daylight was waning fast.

Tonks, who was sitting opposite from Moody, had already turned to him a few times with different faces and tried to cheer him out of his bad mood, but it was hard for Harry to be comforted. The vision was still present whenever he closed his eyes, and the book had said that it would be present for an unnatural period of time, unless he died from the magic raised by the blood ritual.

The ritual relies on star-shaped cuts. What "star-shaped" means has been widely debated, but in general stars with five points are used (though four-pointed ones may be cut as well, with no apparent loss of potency). The victims must be marked on every limb and on their torsos, and their hands and feet removed. Then their faces must be painted with the blood in the shape of a Guile mask (see the description on page 263), and their bodies impaled, preferably on a thorn. This operation must be completed before midnight. If it is, then a storm will come to the caster's call. Named a 'blood-gale,' this will tear through the shared bloodline at the caster's command, destroying any specified blood relative of the sacrificed victims within two generations of connection.

On occasion, this ritual has been thwarted by a vision—the family bloodline reaching out to defend itself. This happens most often with Lord-level wizards and witches. The vision, which usually comes to the intended victim of the blood-gale, will show the completion of the ritual several hours in advance, and thus warns the victim in time, hopefully, to prevent the sacrifice. The vision lingers behind the eyes, burning, for up to a month, or, in one case, six months. It gives no guarantee, however, that the victim can actually thwart the completion of the ritual. And it cannot be controlled, either compelled to appear by a victim who knows that his family may be in danger, or stopped by the caster.

Harry leaned back in the seat and closed his eyes. He'd read the book, and he'd discussed with Draco the possibility that this was a trap, and Draco had reluctantly agreed that it didn't seem likely, not when the vision would come in spite of everything Voldemort could do. But he'd insisted on taking proper precautions, and everything he said was so sensible that Harry had agreed to it.

They'd gone at once to the Headmistress. Though pale-faced, she had told Harry that, yes, Albus had retained information on the Dursleys, as he had on almost everything connected with "Lily's boys," which he usually referred to Harry and Connor as in his own writing. Their address was Number Four Privet Drive, Little Whinging, Surrey.

Harry tensed against the impulse to go charging off, and firecalled the Minister from McGonagall's hearth. Scrimgeour had agreed without complaint when he heard the vision to ward Lily and James as tightly as he could, just in case Voldemort intended to send Death Eaters to sacrifice them at sunset. If they were the targets of the blood-gale, and Voldemort did manage to kill the Dursleys, there was little any guards could do to stop it.

But Harry, of course, didn't intend that Voldemort's ritual should succeed. He abhorred the thought of someone dying simply because they were his relatives, when they'd done nothing to attract Voldemort's attention, and he would have ignored them otherwise.

That done, he would have been all for calling the Knight Bus and going to the Dursleys' house himself, in the company of Draco, who refused to stay back, and Connor, to make sure that he wouldn't be left behind as a target, held only by Hogwarts' weakened wards. But Scrimgeour had said—well, insisted, really—on sending two Aurors, and Tonks and Moody were both skilled, experienced, and trustworthy enough that Harry had accepted.

It made sense. Voldemort would surely have people in place already, since he would know that Harry might receive a vision like this. The Death Eaters were unlikely to move before sunset, since they would have to confine their prey without binding spells, and the easiest way to do that was inside their house. But while Harry thought he could face them alone, he had to admit that it made sense to have two battle-tested adults come along with him. Other Aurors would arrive later, nearer sunset, to help if they were needed, to catch Voldemort and some of his Death Eaters if they could.

Harry had asked the Minister why he was so determined to help. Scrimgeour had wrinkled his brow as if the question were a stupid one, and said, "When the wind blows, Harry, you don't pretend it isn't blowing. And I'd rather get the good from this ill wind, by helping the one Lord-level wizard alive who doesn't seem to have an interest in corrupting my Ministry."

Harry had nodded his thanks, and then they'd waited for Tonks and Moody to come through the fireplace. Moody had cast a curse first thing to test Harry's vigilance, and Harry had blocked it with a shield. Moody grinned, his familiar-strange face—Harry had seen it across the desk for months at a time in Defense Against the Dark Arts class, but of course that had been as Mulciber's mask—fierce and half-mad. Harry had heard Moody described as the wildest of the Aurors. It made sense.

"A chance to punish them as they should be punished," Moody had snarled, and slapped his wand so hard against his hand that Harry had thought for a moment it would break. "I like this mission."

Tonks had rolled her eyes and whispered at Harry from beneath her mop of currently long, currently blue, hair, "He's hated most of the missions Burke's given him. Complained that they aren't half as challenging as the ones when he was young."

Harry had nodded, and then they'd gone outside Hogwarts to catch the Knight Bus. The Ministry had no one who knew the area where the Dursleys lived well enough to Apparate in or create a Portkey, and no one magical lived very near on the Floo Network. Once Tonks and Moody saw the street, they could contact the other Aurors and give them a detailed enough image of it for Apparition.

"Here," Moody said, his voice sharp enough to cut Harry's absorption in a moment. "Stop here."

Harry looked up, or at least looked up once he'd recovered from the Knight Bus throwing him into the seat in front of him as it jerked to a stop. They were on a street that stirred vague memories in him. He thought he'd seen it the one time Lily brought him to meet the Dursleys. The sign said nothing about it being Privet Drive, though.

Moody turned back to look at him, teeth bright. "Don't want to alarm our little friends by arriving on the street itself in the Bus," he said.

Harry nodded. The Knight Bus was rather noticeable. Death Eaters might have seen them already, but once they got out of the Bus, they would be under Moody's expert Disillusionment Charms. They were more likely to think it was normal wizarding travelers.

At least, so Harry hoped. If not, the best the Death Eaters could do, since it was still half an hour to sunset, was try to stop Harry and his companions, and he was ready if they tried that. He called, and his magic swirled around him. He also touched the pocket of his robes, where the Slytherin tie with Dumbledore's magic stored in it rested. He still hadn't figured out a way to cleanse that power, but he had less compunction about using it against Death Eaters than just about anyone else.

Moody cast the Disillusionment Charm on himself, then on Connor, Draco, and Harry. Harry shivered a bit as the spell spiraled down over him like a cold, rotten egg. Tonks had already changed her features to that of a nondescript woman in ordinary wizarding robes, to give any watching Death Eaters an excuse for the Bus stopping here in the first place. She ambled off the Bus, looked around several times, and began wandering up the street, muttering and comparing addresses on a piece of parchment in her hand. Harry relaxed a bit. Tonks was in danger, that was true, but she was in less danger than most other Aurors in the same situation, if only because she so emphatically did not look like an Auror. She would find an out-of-the-way place where other Aurors could Apparate in.

Moody guided them off under the Disillusionment Charm, and they went slowly towards the street that Harry knew must be Privet Drive. Behind them, the Bus charged away like a mad thing. Draco gave another mutter about “Muggle-based transportation,” but fell silent quickly enough.

Privet Drive was a very Muggle place, Harry decided almost at once. The houses were small, and square, and neat, and looked as if their owners’ greatest ambition was for them to have as few distinguishing features as possible. Here and there a different kind of fence surrounded the snow-dusted gardens, or a different kind of curtain hung in a window, but altogether, it was uniform and devoid of magic. Harry shook his head. There are wizards in hiding, though. We have to remember that, that we’re almost certainly being watched.

Number Four had no one obviously standing outside it. Harry swallowed. He wondered if the rooms he’d seen in his vision were inside it, not blood-spattered right now, but about to be in another twenty minutes. The light above them and around them had turned red, as if in anticipation.

Harry arrived at the door and knocked, once, not yet taking off the Disillusionment Charm.

A loud voice shouted from inside, “Muuuum!” A moment later, footsteps sounded, coming towards the door. Harry tensed, thinking the Death Eaters might take the opportunity to attack, but nothing had happened yet. Besides, Moody would be standing at his back, watching the street, and his magical eye could see through Invisibility Cloaks and most other means of concealment.

A woman opened the door. Harry stared, but, try as he might, he could see barely any resemblance to his mother in her face. This woman had lived a perfectly ordinary life, he thought, and her face had querulous lines and laughter lines, and her eyes had a tendency to squint. She did not look as if she had ever seen the blast of a sacrifice burning, which was the thing Harry remembered best about Lily from his childhood.

Moody muttered a quick spell to make the doorstep and door of Number Four unnoticeable for a few moments, and then dropped the Disillusionment Charms. The woman, whom Harry knew must be his Aunt Petunia, reeled back, clutched at the door, and then put one hand over her mouth. Harry thought she was suppressing a scream.

He stepped forward, letting the movement draw her eyes to him. "Aunt Petunia?" he asked.

She froze for a moment, as though that combination of words was one she'd never expected to hear, and then looked at him. Harry saw her recognize him—by his green eyes, if not as the little boy she'd met once nine years ago.

"You," she said. "Harry." Her eyes found Connor for a moment, flinching away from Draco and Moody as too obviously "wizarding." "And you. Connor. Her boys." The words were poisonous. "What do you want? What are you doing here? Bringing this sort of—of freakishness to our doorstep?" Her hand scrabbled at the door like a rat's claw.

Draco stiffened. "This is your aunt, Harry?" he asked, his own voice icy. "Muggle or not, there's no excuse for such poor breeding." He lifted his head and managed to look down his nose at Petunia, though she was taller than he was.

"The freakishness is already here, Aunt Petunia," said Harry, ignoring Draco entirely. "Did Mum ever tell you about a wizard called Voldemort?"

Petunia bowed her head, and her cheeks grew paler. "That name," she whispered. "That man!"

"He's targeted your family," said Harry. "He plans to sacrifice you at sunset today. I came to stop it, but we don't have much time. I think his servants are already here, watching. May we come in?"

Petunia nodded as if overwhelmed, and stepped mechanically backwards. Harry went in first, but Connor wasn't far behind him, looking around the Muggle house with open curiosity. Harry wasn't sure what was stranger to him, personally: the furnishings, such as the unmoving pictures, or the fact that he couldn't sense any magic in the house at all except what they brought with them.

“Muuuum!”

An apparent half-giant watered down and made to grow sideways instead of up came waddling down the hall. Harry blinked. That must be Dudley. The vision hadn't shown him just what his cousin would look like while still alive. He looked grotesquely fat, that was how he looked.

“Who're they?” he asked, staring at Moody. Moody's magical eye rolled around to point at him, and Dudley shrieked and backed away, waving his hands in the air as if he thought that would make Moody cease to exist.

“Friends, Dudders,” said Petunia in a voice which had lost all its tone. “Go to the kitchen, all right? Sit in the kitchen. Mummy will be along in a moment.”

Dudley hesitated a moment, eyeing all four of them as if he thought they might chop him apart and use him for Potions ingredients, and then turned and lurched back up the hall. Petunia returned her gaze to Harry.

“We should all be in one place, shouldn't we?” she whispered. “Just in case they try to take us while we're isolated.”

Harry nodded, wondering now just how much Petunia knew. Lily had claimed that Petunia was jealous of her magic and had cut off contact with her completely, but this sounded like Petunia knew at least a little about the Death Eaters.

“Yes,” he said. “You should call your husband, too. Uncle Vernon?” he added, when Petunia just stared at him.

“Vernon's dead,” Petunia said shortly. “A car accident, two years ago.” She shook her head, as if asking herself why in the world she was discussing this with freakish wizarding strangers, and then turned and led the way into the kitchen. Her back was thin, her shoulders set with determination.

Harry followed her, and found Dudley cowering on the other side of a large table. "Mum?" he whispered the moment he saw Petunia. "Who are they?"

"Your cousins, dear," said Petunia. "Harry and Connor Potter." She cast a thin-lipped glance at Moody. Harry had to admire her strength of mind; some of his students who'd had weeks to get used to Mulciber-as-Moody couldn't have looked at him as if he should be binned. "I don't know who these two are," she added, in a tone that implied introductions should have happened by now.

"Alastor Moody," said Harry quickly, indicating Moody. "He's an Auror, the wizarding equivalent of a—"

"I know what the Aurors are," said Petunia, eyes distant. "And this one?" She glared at Draco, who glared back.

"Draco Malfoy," Draco said. "And really, Harry should have introduced you to me, because I'm above you in ways you can't imagine."

Petunia's gaze became glacial. Harry stepped on Draco's foot and shook his head at him, then looked back at Petunia. "I'm sorry to burst in on you this way," he said. "I know it's sudden."

"You said that my family had been targeted for a ritual," said Petunia, apparently recovering herself enough to remember that. "What kind of ritual?"

Harry winced. "A blood ritual," he said.

"So he's targeting us because of my sister," Petunia finished, in a dead voice.

Harry nodded.

Petunia sat down at the table and said nothing. Harry hesitantly arranged himself across from her. Connor took the seat next to Dudley, still looking around him with friendly fascination, while Dudley peered at Connor through his fingers, shaking. Moody began pacing a beat between the kitchen window and the door, his wand already out. Draco stood behind Harry's chair, putting a hand on his shoulder as if that was the only way he could keep from screaming at the sheer Muggle-ness of it all. Harry waited, trying to be as alert as Moody, and suspecting he was failing. His gaze kept coming back to his aunt's strained, pale face, filled with memories, all of which looked bad.

"Where is Lily?" Petunia asked abruptly. "Why didn't she come?"

Harry winced. He hadn't thought of the fact that Petunia wouldn't know what had happened to her sister, either. "Mum's in prison," he said.

Petunia spun and stared at him.

"For child abuse," said Harry, and looked away from her. The silence in the kitchen was thick with unspoken things. Harry caught a glimpse of Connor looking anxiously at him, and shook his head to tell his twin he was all right. Connor sat back in his chair, but didn't seem reassured. Draco's hands were both on Harry's shoulders now, rubbing as if they could calm him that way. Harry didn't think he would relax until this was all done. He reached out intently with his magic, seeking some sign that Voldemort was here.

"She was stolen from me, you know."

Harry looked back at Petunia. None of the Muggle lights in the kitchen were on, meaning the only illumination came from the sunset. Harry shivered, even though the light wasn't nearly as bright as the blood in his vision depicting the Guile mask on Petunia's face.

"She was stolen from all of us, but mostly me," Petunia whispered. "She was my sister before that letter came. My sister. My parents could accept it, after a while. I think she convinced them it was her destiny to go." Petunia spoke "destiny" in a high-pitched voice that told Harry exactly what she would think of prophecies and the wild Dark and the rest of it. "And she was never the same again."

She turned and looked at Harry. "You're like fairies," she said fiercely, "all of you."

Harry blinked, trying to figure out how wizards were like creatures only a few inches high and not very bright.

"You steal children," Petunia said. "Just like the old legends. You took my sister from me. She was never the same after that first year. Just talked a lot of nonsense about blood status and not fitting in, and when I tried to tell her what did it matter, because she had a family that loved her, she looked at me and said, 'That's why you can't understand, Petunia. Because you're a Muggle.' She made no sense any more. She'd spent eleven years of her life being as Muggle as I was, and now suddenly she wanted to be some kind of grand witch, respected by all. Magic was all there was to her. I didn't matter. Nothing mattered but that freakishness."

Harry could feel Draco opening his mouth. He reached up and squeezed one of his hands, hard. Draco shut his mouth with an audible smack.

"And then she came home after her third year there and started talking even more nonsense," Petunia went on. Harry wondered if she even realized she was speaking aloud. Her voice rambled, and didn't make it seem so. "About sacrifices, and how she understood what they meant now, and almost no one else did, and they were all going to save the wizarding world from Voldemort." She clenched her hands on her arms as if she were cold. "I told her I wanted my sister back. She got this pitying look in her eyes and said, 'I'm not just your little sister anymore, Petunia. Can't you see that? I'm going to save the world, and you're just going to live a little, petty life and die a little, petty death. This is better. The Headmaster says so.'"

Petunia turned around, as if she'd exhausted her reserves of bitterness. Harry didn't think so, though, and waited, still reaching for Voldemort. Sunset was drawing closer and closer.

"And now she's in prison for child abuse." Petunia laughed dully. "I wonder if she thought of that, too, when she was making sacrifices? But she couldn't have. She was stolen." She stared down at the table, and said no more.

It was just past sunset, and Harry was jumpy.

Dudley had finally decided Connor wasn't going to hurt him, and tried to make conversation. Connor replied with bright incomprehension, but Dudley kept it up, probably to soothe his own fear.

Petunia hadn't looked up from the table since she'd finished her strange little speech. Draco was currently hovering over Harry as if he would protect him against an attack from the door, and muttering phrases that Harry recognized as ones they'd used in his training in possession under his breath. Moody snarled like a grumpy hound, glaring out the window as if it was the sun's fault that he hadn't seen any action yet.

Then pain grabbed Harry by the throat so suddenly that he couldn't speak. He stiffened, and his scar burned, and a vision stole his sight again.

Voldemort was laughing, and the words overrode and twined with the vision, until Harry found he was listening more than looking.

"I couldn't stop a vision if I sent a blood-gale, Harry, but I could make up a false vision that would make you think of a blood-gale," he said, and he laughed, and his laughter tore the world apart. "Carefully manipulate it, and send you running to the wrong place. Lord Voldemort is more clever than you think.

"And now this." His voice sharpened, turned racking. Harry shook with the force of it. "Come without your wand. Come alone. If I sense either your wand or someone with you, including your Omen snake or your little Malfoy, I will destroy him at once. It's a simple enough matter, Harry. You can see where we are in my vision. You know how to get here." His voice soared exultantly again. "I swear, Harry, by blood and breath and bone, your life for his. Come to me, and yield yourself willingly, and he lives. Violate any of the conditions I have named, and he dies." He laughed again. "I wouldn't hesitate very long, Harry. Each moment you wait gives me more time to bleed him."

The vision ended. Harry sagged forward over the table, working to get breath back in his lungs, and answer Draco's shaking and shouting, and assimilate what he'd seen.

Voldemort had Snape.

Chapter Sixty-Nine: There Is Also Love In The World

Indigena Yaxley did not much like torture, and she found suffering a source of boredom. Thus, she wasn't enjoying her latest mission—on which Voldemort had told her that she was the only one permitted to accompany him—that much.

On the other hand, needs must, and a duty wouldn't be much of a duty if it didn't have an objectionable part buried in it somewhere. So she had come along, doing exactly as her Lord had told her.

When Evan Rosier had found her alone one freezing night in January and told her about the weakness of Hogwarts's wards, Indigena had disbelieved him. Rosier had fled, quite sensibly, before her Lord could find him, but Indigena had carried the news to the Dark Lord anyway, thinking he might know better than she did the truth of it.

He had laughed. How he had laughed! And then he had sent her to spy in the Forbidden Forest, guarded by her plants against animal betrayal, and bade her to send some of her vines twirling about the bones of Hogwarts, testing for a hole. If the wards were at full strength, even a plant like Indigena's, under the control of a hostile mind, should have been seen and destroyed. But all her vines came back to her alive, and with reports of the wards melting each day. They had been stabilized, but there was a weakness in the middle of them, a hole, into which they continued to run. The melting was simply slower than it had been.

Indigena jumped, a bit, as a deep groan came from behind her. She was facing the stone wall, and having one of her vines that bound wandless magic grow up it and around in circles. No matter how fast Harry entered the room, she would bind and hold him. She kept her concentration on that, and not on what her Lord was doing behind her. And if she could recite the events that had brought them here in her head as another distraction, so much the better.

The Dark Lord had changed his original plan for their February outing, which involved some Muggles who happened to be related to Harry, and chosen to target Hogwarts instead, as soon as his own spies, two of his bred snakes, brought back word of where the weakness in the wards was located. It seemed the Dark Lord had had a good idea, and the snakes had confirmed it. So they had come to a tunnel beginning in the Forest that the snakes had shown them, Indigena had hollowed it out further with her vines, and they had walked underground and into an older tunnel, and then into Hogwarts.

They'd emerged from behind the statue of Salazar Slytherin, into the Chamber of Secrets.

Indigena looked up from her vines. She had to admit the Chamber made an impressive sight for someone, like her, who had never seen it. The Dark Lord had touched the statue of Slytherin and spoken in incomprehensible Parseltongue to it, walked about with his hand lightly brushing the walls, and had in other ways acted like a man coming home.

Then he had gone up through the Chamber—which, he'd told her in slit-eyed amusement, was guarded from the notice of both Headmistress and Founders' spirits by Slytherin's old spells—and to fetch Snape. It had all been ridiculously easy, more than Indigena would have expected it to be.

She jumped at another groan from behind her. She shouldn't be reacting like this, she thought. Severus Snape was a traitor. He had taken the Dark Mark, the kind of brand that in the old days would have signaled an unbreakable contact between Lord and companion, and yet turned against the Lord he had sworn to serve. He had said one thing, and then learned to mean another. And from the stories Indigena had heard about him, he had done it more than once, or he would not have given up Albus Dumbledore to the Ministry. A small, sniveling worm, a snake who didn't obey the Dark Lord, a damned man with no honor. Why did her stomach still twist as she listened to her Lord torturing him? It was true that she found most torture boring, but she didn't find it revolting. Setting her thorns on Evan had even been fun. At the least, it gave her information about how they reacted to human food.

She told herself sternly that revulsion was not permitted to a Death Eater—and that was what she was now, however much she might wish it otherwise. She settled her stomach, and then turned.

Voldemort had taken Snape into the center of the Chamber, a good distance from most of the plants Indigena had had overgrow the walls, all except a set of the vines that would bind Snape from using wandless magic. He had his limbs splayed out, stretched to their fullest extent, and gradually moving further apart; Indigena had told the vines to do that. Being on a rack was the least Snape should experience, really, Indigena thought, and did her best to convince her mind of that. It didn't help that Voldemort had removed Snape's robes and left him only shirt and trousers, so that she could see exactly how far his limbs were stretched.

The Dark Lord paced in a quick circle around Snape, currently, hissing to two snakes curled around his arms. They had their fangs locked into Snape's flesh, pumping in venom. Indigena didn't know what kind of snakes they were, other than ones that her Lord had bred out of his Parseltongue books. She only knew that they were what made Snape utter those groans every now and again. Her Lord had said something about the venom withering the flesh from the inside. Indigena could see why that would hurt.

Her Lord paused now, eyeing the snakes, and then abruptly hissed out a long, breathless command. The serpents released Snape and slithered off him and towards their Lord, twining around his pale arms as he stooped to receive them. They were black, with long red dashes running the length of their spines. They swayed their heads back and forth even when the rest of their bodies were coiled along the Dark Lord's arms, as if they could not miss a moment when they might dance.

Indigena saw Snape recover, somewhat, from the cessation of pain. He really was extraordinarily tough. Of course, he had survived two years at Voldemort's side during his first rise, and Indigena knew he would have suffered curses and pain from both his Lord and other, jealous Death Eaters. Now, he opened his eyes, and while a spasm crossed his face, he kept his gaze locked on the Dark Lord's and did not look away. Indigena saw no defiance in his face, unless it was a patient, stony kind.

"Now, Severus," Voldemort said in what was almost a croon, "I did so want you not to be distracted while I spoke to you." He gestured at the Chamber. "We are in the sacred place of Salazar Slytherin, the Founder of our House. Will you not look at it? Will you not enjoy?"

Snape never looked away from Voldemort. He said nothing.

"You have fallen so far from a Slytherin's true ideal," said the Dark Lord. One thing Indigena marveled at was how he could make his voice seem almost caring. Of course, he might use Occlumency to control his emotions, she supposed. "Poor Severus. Serving a Light Lord. Ignoring the call of your rightful master, who will bring back the world Salazar would have wanted." His voice altered, and Indigena learned why in the next sentence. The Dark Lord really did find it hard to control his passionate hatred of Harry. "Running about after a boy, as if he were the one who could grant you the power and prestige I know your heart so desires."

Snape continued saying nothing. Indigena supposed he was trying to avoid giving Voldemort what he wanted. So far, he hadn't even screamed.

"Do you know, Severus," the Dark Lord said, "that I considered sparing you at one time? My Potions brewer. My servant who overheard the prophecy concerning the supposed Boy-Who-Lived for me. My perfect spy." Shockingly sudden, one of his hands flicked, and a strip of skin separated itself from Snape's leg and peeled away. Snape closed his eyes and held still, muscles trembling as if he were a horse on the verge of running, while Voldemort flayed his leg with precision and care. Indigena watched the coating of skin slide from muscle and bone and delicate red-pink coils of flesh, and told herself it didn't matter, that this was the least a traitor like Snape deserved.

She could not convince herself. She was not so far gone to honor as to vomit, but she did have to look away for a moment.

When she turned back, Voldemort had begun to flay off the muscle as he'd flayed off the skin. Snape did make a sound now, not quite a scream, but an abbreviated cry, forced from him entirely against his will. Indigena looked into his eyes, but she knew he didn't see her. His face was blank with suffering.

"I will do this," the Dark Lord said, his voice and face gone emotionless now, "as payment for your transgression, Severus. But I made a promise, and I shall keep that promise." And now he was laughing, a sound that made Indigena feel as if he were flaying off her ears. "I will leave you alive. I swore an oath. When Harry arrives, Severus, and trades his life for yours, then, I think, it will not matter to you whether you ever walk again."

Indigena saw the bolt go home. Snape must have thought, until that moment, that he was being tortured solely for betraying the Dark Lord. Voldemort had said nothing to indicate otherwise, and had seemed interested in inflicting physical pain more than emotional. Now Snape knew he was bait in a trap, and for the boy Indigena did believe he must love, as much as traitors could love anyone.

He made a valiant effort to fight. He bucked and twisted in the vines' hold, and Indigena felt them briefly begin to burn as Snape's wandless magic started to rise through his skin. But the vines had been bred to take care of that. They bore down a little harder, and the magic turned into ashes and embers

Snape slumped back again, and Indigena looked away from his face. Snape knew he was bait now, knew that Harry was coming to save him—if by "save him" one meant "lay down his life in his place."

Indigena fully expected her Lord to keep this oath, in fact. He had told her what he intended from this evening. Not just to kill Harry, not just to destroy the one who might destroy him, but to drink all of Harry's magic, make the boy an empty shell and himself powerful beyond measure. The power would be doubled or tripled if the boy came as a willing sacrifice, and his willingness would end if he did not see Snape safe before giving himself to Voldemort.

Indigena had wondered that her lord was prepared to give up vengeance on the traitor so easily, but she'd seen Snape's eyes now. This was not giving up vengeance. It was deepening it, spreading it through Snape's flesh like the venom of the black-red snakes, to linger and cause damage even after the sacrifice was complete. The Dark Lord was destroying his right leg layer by layer; he'd reached the level of tendon and ligaments now, and was untying them like cords around a Christmas gift, laughing softly all the while. The pain was hideous.

Snape knew that laughter. He'd stood beside his Lord often enough when it sounded, as they watched some poor victim taken apart at the seams by Bellatrix Lestrange, or killed during an initiation, or, on rare occasions, tortured by Voldemort himself. He writhed under the pressure of it, his eyes closed and his throat now and then opening to release a scream.

But the physical pain and the sound of the laughter only intruded on his consciousness in jolts and flashes. He was an Occlumens, a better Occlumens than the Dark Lord was a Legilimens, and his training had run deep enough that he could retreat behind the suffering and think.

And perhaps Voldemort had known or guessed that, because now he had polluted the serenity of Snape's mind, his near-resignation to dying, with the one venom he could not purge.

Over and over, Snape saw the vision of Harry coming to the Chamber of Secrets, allowing Voldemort to bind him, allowing his magic to be drained or his blood to be taken in whatever obscene ritual the Dark Lord had planned—it was always rituals with him, always, always, as if he could make up for his own corruption by appeals to something greater—and then dying.

Because Snape had allowed himself to be taken. Because he had never expected, ever, for his vision to go dark as he paced in his quarters, worrying about Harry, and for it to come back in the Chamber of Secrets, his former Lord looming over him.

The realization pried deeper and deeper, tore open his mind and touched delicate places that Voldemort could not have assaulted with the most tireless torture. There was no safety. There never would be.

They had relied on the wards of Hogwarts, and those wards had failed. He might try to protect Harry, but he would be turned into the very victim that Harry must come to rescue. And Harry would die, because, it seemed, there was no other fate that could take him.

When Snape screamed, he felt that pain more than the other.

They had tried. They had fought, and in the end, it was not enough. They had lost.

Snape had thought himself resigned. He had believed that he thought their struggle desperate, that he respected the Dark Lord as a powerful enemy Harry might not defeat. Now he saw how foolish that had been. He had lived as if he had hope. There was none. Why should there be any?

Despair moved on him, the heaviest snake Voldemort had yet created, crushing and strangling him both at once. He could not breathe. Fire ran up the inside of his arms, but it was only an echo of the anguish slowly destroying his mind. This must be, he thought, his thoughts dim and sluggish, what it is like at the end of the world, when one can no longer deny that the world is ending.

Strange. He had always thought himself stronger than this. There was a point in his life when he would have welcomed the Dark Lord's triumph, had worked for it and hastened it on, and another when he had not wanted it but had believed he could survive it, since he could always go cold, the way his mother had taught him. He could have endured being a slave, being tortured and humiliated, seeing people he knew die. What tie did he have to the wizarding world so precious that it was more important than survival, that most Slytherin of goals?

And now the end of the world was here, and he was breaking before it.

He had to fight. He understood now the kind of suicidal courage that Harry had told him Black had exhibited, moments before his death. Black had understood that his death was the best way to destroy the fragment of Voldemort growing within him, and it was no wonder he'd smiled as he died.

If Snape destroyed himself, then at the very least Harry would have no reason to come here. The Dark Lord would have no hostage.

He began to gather his magic, folding it in under his skin. Now and then he screamed more often, to distract his Lord and get him excited. Let him think Snape's Occlumency barriers were crumbling, and he was surrendering to the physical pain. He ought to know better, since he was the one who had told Snape about his purpose as a hostage, but that was the Dark Lord for you. He never had understood the existence of love, let alone how it actually worked.

He hated and feared death. He would never think that someone else might rather die than contribute to the death and torture of someone he loved.

Snape waited until a moment when the Dark Lord had stopped to consider what torture he should begin next, and the vines had showed no sign of readjusting their grip on him, a kind of breathing pause.

Then Snape focused his own magic on his heart, bearing down, going from no pressure to all pressure in a moment, willing it to stop beating. He felt his heartbeat speed up, the instinctive fear that threatened to destroy his attempt, the crushing sensation that he had always heard signaled a heart attack. But stronger than any of those feelings, and the reason he was doing this at all, came his vicious satisfaction. He would do this, and his Lord had laid no defense against it—

Then his will drained away quite abruptly, the way the wards had run into the weak point of the Chamber. Snape found himself lying flat on his back, or as flat as he could in the hold of the vines, with his Lord kneeling above him and staring at him. His scarlet eyes conveyed a moment of genuine amusement.

"Sssseverus," Voldemort said, deliberately hissing the name. "Did you think your Occlumency barriers would hold in such a moment of focus elsewhere? Did you think I would not see what you intended to do, and that I could not stop you?"

He reached out and stroked Snape's hair, his white fingers moving as quick as beetles' legs over his face. "No," the Dark Lord said, with a hint of the tenderness and compassion that Snape remembered from his speeches about poor young pureblood wizards whose culture would be lost if Mudbloods overwhelmed their world. "No, that would never do, would it, to lose my pet when he is on the verge of fetching me the fine fat prey I want?"

He lifted a finger from Snape's face to his mouth, and smiled at what he tasted there. "There was once a potion recipe I read of that used the tears of true despair as an ingredient," he murmured. "A pity I have no use for what it creates."

Snape gave up. Physical pain and mental pain had blended into each other, and he was lost in suffering, so pure a state that keeping track of where the various sensations came from was pointless. He could feel him coming.

Oh, yes, he could feel him coming, could Lord Voldemort, his head high as he prowled around the bloodied and half-skinned mess of his former servant, and gazed at the doors to the Chamber of Secrets. The doors were closed, but that did not matter. His heir could open them. Had not his heir received the gift of Parseltongue from him? He could open the doors.

Harry.

He restrained a snarl. Lord Voldemort was too dignified to snarl. He had done what was needed, and this night, this night under a frosty February sky and in the presence of the greatest of the Hogwarts Four, he would receive back what he deserved. He had created a magical heir when he never meant to. It was only fitting that his heir's gifts would come back to him.

This was a day of no particular distinction, not Midwinter and not Midsummer and not even an old Muggle or wizarding holiday. That did not matter. When he rose again, after having consumed all of Harry's magic and licked his corpse clean, then it would become a day of horror and loathing for all who opposed him, a day of celebration and rejoicing for those who knew the right way of things.

He could imagine, he could imagine, children being brought to the Chamber in the future and learning that this was the very site where the Dark Lord had regained his full powers. Their eyes would gape. Their mouths would open. And then they would turn and look at him, Lord Voldemort, because surely sometimes he would be here. And he would be here however long the children might come, because he was never going to die.

He paced. His serpents, of a kind not seen, not bred, for a thousand years, sang and danced on his arms. Now and then he spoke to them, and praised them. Snakes were the only creatures he had ever truly understood. They obeyed him, and were loyal. They understood power, and yielded to it. There were no suicidal charges with fangs bared. He had often thought that life would be improved if more people were like snakes, and understood his dominance instinctively.

Oh, yes, he could feel him coming. He cocked his head and laughed softly, exultantly, hunter's pride singing in his veins. Harry was at the entrance to the tunnel far above them, now. Soon he would speak to the snake with the snake carved on it and begin his descent. Oh, yes, soon. He was a hunter, a hunter who did well. Any prey could be lured in. One merely had to know what bait to set.

Lord Hunter! He had considered that as a title for himself once, before he had seen the value of using his common, ordinary, Muggle name as the basis for a name both the worlds that had betrayed him would learn to hate and fear. But he could adopt it as a secondary title when he took the Ministry. He could insist that the Minister take the title of Lord Hunter. He could insist that people speak of him as that every second time they spoke of him, should he wish.

He was dizzy with the possibilities of the future opening before him. All his study and pursuit of Dark Arts knowledge—all the years in Egypt and China and Russia and even that year in New Zealand when he had thought he would die of strain as he painstakingly learned bone magic—all the years of his first rise, and the thirteen years of suffering he still owed Harry for, and the eight months since, all had led to this moment.

The boy was walking willingly into his trap. Had he considered, at all, that coming to his destroyer of his own free will would mean that his surrendered magic rang with power? It would be one thing if Lord Voldemort had to take his magic, tear it from him; it would still aid him, it would still give him what he needed, but it would still be a spoil of conflict, a prize of war. Surrendered, given up, then Harry's will would agree with his own, and when Harry was dead, the force of his will as well as his magic would join Lord Voldemort's.

And why not? He is my heir.

He prowled back and forth, back and forth. His heir was coming up the tunnel that led to the Chamber now. He knew where they were. Had not Lord Voldemort shown him the Chamber in the vision? The true vision, not the false one. The false one had moved Harry out of Hogwarts, where he would have sensed Lord Voldemort the moment he arrived, otherwise. The true one told the truth: that he intended to let his little Severus live, as long as Harry came alone and without his wand.

And now Harry was coming. He lifted his head and focused his senses forward, through the numerous spells he'd put on the tunnel when he went to fetch Severus. Among them were spells to sense cypress wood, to sense flesh and blood, to sense Omen snakes.

Harry came alone and without his wand.

He laughed exultantly.

Harry had not realized, as he walked the tunnel to the Chamber of Secrets, that it would be such a process of stripping away the unnecessary thoughts.

There was Draco's voice, sounding in his ears, furious, panicked, as Harry explained his vision of Snape and Voldemort in the Chamber of Secrets, Snape's limbs wound with vines that Harry had good reason to recognize after that night at the graveyard. "You can't go, Harry! I forbid it!"

Oh, he had said other things, too, especially once they got back to Hogwarts and Harry found out that Snape was gone from his private rooms, but they were all variations on that one, central theme. Harry could not go, because Draco had forbidden it. A rescue party could be organized, but Harry could not be one of its members. Or, if he had to go to defeat Voldemort, Draco would be at his side.

Draco had not changed his tune. Harry had tried reasoned argument, had explained his plan, had told him what he thought would happen to Snape if Harry did not go, but that did not matter. In the end, it was largely because of Draco that Harry had first used Extabesco plene to vanish from the sight of the people around him, and then used wards to block the door to the bathroom where he would enter the Chamber of Secrets. Let them bang on that barrier all they liked. They were never going to get through it. Harry had carefully set the ward so that it would take an equal amount of magical power to his own to burst it, and only one wizard in the school had that.

"This is...most disturbing, Harry."

That was McGonagall, her face understandably pale at the thought that the Dark Lord had walked the halls of her school, and was under them right now, and she had had no clue. She had to admit that the Chamber of Secrets made an excellent candidate for the hole in the wards, though, and that none of the Founders' spirits would have been able to sense anything; they had never been able to find Slytherin's Chamber, or they could have told Headmaster Dippet the truth about Tom Riddle's first opening of it fifty years ago. And she was concerned about Snape.

Nevertheless, she, too, had told Harry not to go, though her face said she understood why he wanted to better than Draco. She had told Harry that he could not trust Voldemort to keep his word, an understatement if there ever was one.

She didn't understand, though, not really. Harry had to go because there was no other choice. Voldemort had Snape, and Harry had to go, and that was really all there was to it.

He set the memory on fire and sent it drifting in ashes behind him.

Tonks and Moody had tried to reason him out of it. Connor had looked into his face and said nothing, but his eyes spoke his fear. Remus, summoned at McGonagall's insistence, had said he would rather bite Harry than see him go to the Chamber.

Harry set all the memories on fire, and he was going to the Chamber alone, quiet, feeling the tingle of Voldemort's spells seethe over him. Argutus was not with him. Draco was not with him. Snape, especially, was not with him.

He had come, quiet, with Dumbledore's magic in the tie in his robe pocket. He didn't think Voldemort would have cast spells to detect cloth, since that would only reveal that Harry wore robes.

He had come, and he was quiet. He did wonder what he would do about the doors to the Chamber, but, as it turned out, Voldemort had opened them before he ever reached them. The bastard probably wanted him to make a dramatic entrance, Harry thought, dimly, as he stepped inside.

Three things happened at once, so quickly that he had to think about them to sort them out. Vines lashed around his arms and legs, binding his wandless magic. Voldemort Vanished his robes, leaving him naked and rendering any weapons he might have hidden in his robe pockets perfectly useless.

And Harry saw Snape, lying on his back in a nest of vines, one leg a looped, unwound, bleeding mess, his arms red as fever with magic destroying them from the inside, his head lolling on his neck, and realized that the sight hurt him more than any moment of his parents' trial had.

He let his hand hang, and watched as Voldemort strode forward to pick up the tie containing Dumbledore's magic, which had fallen to the floor. He stared at it for a moment, then laughed. Harry bowed his head further, squeezing his eyes shut.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

"A fine feast you have brought me, Harry," Voldemort said, and under his voice Harry could hear Snape panting, small and breathless and desperate sounds. "Yourself, and this tie. You know, I trust, that a willing sacrifice of magic makes it all the more powerful?"

Harry shuddered, let himself shudder, made the vines tremble with the force of his shuddering. He had not really thought that he could simply walk into the Chamber of Secrets and use the magic stored in the tie. But he wanted Voldemort to think that. He wanted Voldemort to think him helpless, nearly conquered, so gone, so lost, to anything but the rescue of Snape that he had not thought to come in fighting, or use the magic in the tie before he entered the Chamber.

Harry knew what he had to do. He had known from the moment he confirmed the vision was real, from the moment McGonagall came back from Snape's quarters with a white face. And causing a battle that could destroy the school was not part of that plan. Nor was causing the battle only after the children had been evacuated, partly because none of the people he cared about and who cared about him would have let him go to the Chamber even then, but also because Harry wanted Hogwarts to remain standing, thank you. He was done with sacrifices, except the ones he chose. And a sacrifice of pride was a small one. Look helpless now. Lure him closer.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

"You have not answered me, Harry," said Voldemort, his voice low and sweet. "Do you know, it was through your forays into my mind that I learned the secret of the wards' weakness? I sensed you at once, my little dreamer, but I preferred to wait and see what you wanted. It seemed a small cost to reveal some of my plans when I could read your mind at my leisure."

That nearly did destroy Harry's self-control, but he clung to the plan in his mind, straight and sleek as an arrowhead. Snape had been right about the danger of the dreams and he had been wrong, and Snape had suffered because of it, but that would have to come later. There was a place for love here, but not for apologies, and not for guilt.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

"Still no answer." Voldemort paced closer to him. "Do you think it a point of honor not to scream, then? Is it the last strength left to you, when you've yielded every other one to me—willingly?"

Harry flinched, a half-jolt that he seized up before it had gone too far, as if Voldemort had accidentally hit on his best-kept secret. He leaned further back in the vines, and closed his eyes.

Voldemort laughed softly. "Well, then, Harry, let us see how long it takes you to scream, then."

Harry had known it would be Crucio, sooner or later, but Voldemort did not speak the incantation aloud, and the sudden pain seizing him seemed to come out of nowhere. He tipped his head back, and felt his muscles shudder and judder and shake themselves apart. He didn't know if he would be able to stand when it was done.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

"Still no scream from you?" Voldemort had moved closer, from the sound of his voice. Harry did not yet know if it was close enough, and he did not dare open his eyes, just in case Voldemort used Legilimency to read the truth in them. "Well, then, perhaps this is in order."

A weight smashed into his right elbow, and filled Harry's vision with blinding yellow pain. He suspected that Voldemort had chosen the spell for its shock value. He had known agony was coming, but not from where, or how braced he should be.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

Voldemort snarled, and moved closer. Harry half-slitted his eyes, and found him standing a few feet away from him, still too far. He was angry, from his tone; Harry shut his eyes again before Voldemort could actually meet his gaze.

"I will make you scream yet," Voldemort whispered, and then invisible fingers seized Harry's kneecap and began to pull. The pain was exquisite.

Don't scream. Don't scream.

Harry clung to the mantra, calling up every bit of training he had received to survive, and rode the pain out without screaming. Another shuffle of Voldemort's boots. Harry peered. He was close. He was very close.

"Now, this," Voldemort whispered. "Ulcerio iterum!"

And Harry felt, again, the pain of his left hand being severed. Voldemort leaned over his face, bending nearer and nearer to him.

It served.

Harry opened his mouth to scream.

And the tiny Many snake, coiled inside his mouth and thus invisible to the spells that sensed flesh and blood, lifted her head and spat her venom directly into Voldemort's eyes.

Harry saw the Dark Lord blinded, that blindness that neither Muggle nor magical cures existed for. The Dark Lord reeled back, screaming, his hands flying to his face. His pain spell on Harry's left wrist wore off.

The Many snake slithered out of Harry's mouth as Harry hissed a command at her, and straight towards Indigena Yaxley. Harry looked up, catching a glimpse of the woman's startled face, and yelled in English, "Let me go, or I set her on you!"

Indigena might have done better in a different time and a different place, a time when she hadn't just seen her Lord blinded and a place where she had chosen the battleground. She might have been startled, or she might have seen how quickly the Many snake moved, and known that none of her vines or strangling grasses, which depended on her will to guide them, were that fast. Or perhaps she thought she had to stay alive to serve Voldemort, and that was more important than holding Harry, since there would be other chances for battle.

Whatever the reason, she believed him, and the vines holding Harry relaxed.

Harry dropped to one knee, ignored the fact that he was naked as well as he could, and then reached out and began to swallow.

He had reconciled himself to what he would have to do. As Voldemort screamed in his blindness, as Snape thrashed in his nest of vines, as Indigena did Merlin-knew-what, Harry ate magic. He reached out towards the Slytherin tie, Draco's tie, and unfolded the magic he'd contained there. It flooded towards him, a great filthy tide, and he swallowed it.

Before, he had feared that Dumbledore's magic would overwhelm him, because it was stronger than his own, and he didn't know how to cleanse its taint. Now, one fundamental thing had changed: he no longer objected to the taint. It was a weapon, and he would use it. He had become reconciled to what he had to do. As it filled him, he rose above it, his will greater than his distaste, and lashed out at Voldemort, using that swallowed magic to increase his own absorbere abilities.

Voldemort screamed as he felt his own magic being ripped away, and he might have tried to stop it. But his blinding had unseated him, distracted him fundamentally; he could not even command the snakes wound around his arms to attack Harry. Harry gulped, and gulped, and gulped, and still Voldemort could not absorb the sudden loss of his sight enough to fight him. Harry had counted on that. He ripped and tore and ripped and tore, and did not allow himself to think about what kind of damage he was doing, or what kind of filthy magic he was swallowing. This had to be done. He would do it.

No more sacrifices of lives to my morals. I'll hurt him if that's what I need to do.

Voldemort screamed, and screamed pitifully, and Harry's limbs shook as magic flooded them. He felt like a great, sloshing reservoir of polluted water, and still he drank.

"Harry! Call her off!"

That was Indigena. Harry turned his head, feeling swollen, and saw Indigena hanging from one of her own vines that had grown up the wall. The Many snake was climbing the vine tenaciously.

"Enough," Harry hissed, and she turned and slithered back to him, winding around his neck. Harry turned to look at Voldemort. He had never felt more like him than in that moment—full of Dark magic, having used Parseltongue and snake venom and absorbere magic to get this far.

Perhaps that was what made him speak the words he did next. Perhaps it was only the idea that, since he had the Dark Lord so much at his mercy, he should kill him now and save the war that might follow.

"Avada Kedavra," he whispered.

The green light took form at his fingertips. It gathered, it blazed, it fled forward. It hit Voldemort with the force of the Hogwarts Express.

It did nothing. When it faded, Voldemort was still screaming, his hands clutching at his eyes.

Harry nodded. Somehow, he was not surprised. The Dark Lord had sought to make himself immune to death. It seemed he had succeeded, at least in part. After all, he had not died from the rebounded Killing Curse the night he cursed Harry.

Or perhaps it had something to do with the prophecy. That needed an elder and a younger to kill him, and Harry didn't know which role he might play in it, but there was no thunder of prophecy in the air now.

He turned, slowly, feeling ponderous with the weight of the taint he carried, to look at Indigena Yaxley. She looked back at him, and was silent.

Harry knew he could kill her. The problem was that he no longer knew which reason he would be doing it for. He had come down determined to drain Voldemort's magic and Dumbledore's so that he would not cause the destruction of Hogwarts and he could save Snape from unnecessary death. But, so filled with Dark magic, with power that had been used to kill and hurt and scar, he felt detached from the world. He could kill Indigena, but he would never know whether he had killed her because she could be a threat in the future, or because it had seemed fun at the time. A sluggish current in his own thoughts said it would be fun.

No more sacrifices. If I will not sacrifice lives to my morals, neither will I sacrifice my morals to this war. I must know why I am killing.

He turned away, back towards Snape. This one thing he could be sure of. Rescuing his guardian was still a good thing.

Wandless magic scooped Snape up on a bed of wind. The vines slid from his limbs, and he rose, gently, his head lolling. His eyes were open, though, and sane, and fixed on Harry.

Harry met Snape's eyes in the middle of the Chamber, the only sound Voldemort's screams of pain and horror, and reality surged back into him with the force of the pounding tide, of the magic he had swallowed. He was more than the soldier who had determined he would need to wound, and he would have killed Indigena just because it sounded fun at the time, because he hadn't been himself, and getting Snape out of here was not only a good thing but his first priority.

There is also love in the world, he thought, and realized he was weeping and did not know when he had begun.

He called the bed of wind towards him and stood on unsteady feet. Crucio had left him shaky, and the spell pulling at his kneecap had hurt, but he could walk. The magic in his body saw to that. He realized he was naked, still, but that didn't seem important. He turned towards the entrance of the Chamber.

"Harry."

Harry didn't know why he looked at Indigena Yaxley. She stood with arms around her Lord, who had at last fallen unconscious, gazing at him with a complex mixture of emotions on her face.

"You should know," she said softly, "that we had the information on the wards' weakness from Evan Rosier. Not from your dreams. My lord knew of it back in January, and only waited so long to attack because he wanted to be absolutely sure of our way into the school."

Harry blinked, once, twice. Then he said, "I don't understand why you're telling me this."

Indigena gave him a kind of fragile smile. "No," she said. "I suspect you never will." She paused, and freed one hand from Voldemort's twitching body to make a fist of it and touch it to her heart. "Thank you for my life."

Harry just stared at her. Indigena smiled once more, and then she drew her Lord towards herself and Apparated.

Harry floated Snape towards him, and saw that his guardian had fallen unconscious as well. He did not look at the ribbons of blood and flesh that covered him; he looked to make sure that he was alive, and then he turned towards the entrance into the Chamber.

It was time to go back up.

Chapter Seventy: Rapprochement

Draco hated the barrier on the entrance to the second floor loo more than he had ever hated anything in his life. It was a smooth, shimmering opaque curtain of gray light, which didn't yield for all the spells Draco had cast at it; it simply ate them, much as Harry would. A fist pounded on it made it feel as hard as stone. Draco cradled his bruised hand and glared some more. McGonagall and Lupin and the others who'd been standing here with him had gone upstairs to discuss ways of breaking it, but Draco refused to think that there wasn't some easy method to get through.

Perhaps he could create a spell in his head to dissipate the barrier? He narrowed his eyes and reached for the will that he'd used when Dumbledore threatened Harry. He kept losing it to fear of what Voldemort might do to Harry, but surely he could think, Go! And the barrier would have to go, wouldn't it?

The barrier vanished so suddenly that Draco was left stunned, and blinking, and wondering if his spell really had worked. Then he realized that Harry was standing on the other side, with a white-gold wave of light behind him, supporting Snape.

And Harry was naked.

Draco hastily whipped off his own robes—he was wearing a shirt and trousers under them, so that was all right—and slid them around Harry's shoulders. He barely seemed to notice. He was breathing so slowly that he sounded mesmerized, or asleep. Draco stepped in front of him, though, and those green eyes tracked him. They looked so exhausted that he winced.

"Harry," he whispered. "Harry, what happened?"

Harry whispered back, as if he were intent that no one hear them, "Voldemort is blind. And most of his magic is gone. I—I've got it." He grimaced. "It feels like I swallowed half a river, and the river was more shit than water."

Draco didn't know how to react to any of that, so he said, "I think we should get Professor Snape to Madam Pomfrey."

"Yes," said Harry. "Yes, of course." He gave a faint frown, and then turned towards the stairs to the hospital wing. Draco walked beside him, now and then glancing back at Snape. The gleam of bone came through the torn mess of his right leg. Draco looked away again. It wasn't that he had a squirmy stomach, he told himself, just that—well, he couldn't perform healing magic as well as Harry, and right now he'd rather make sure that Harry stayed upright on the way to someone who could help.

And he wanted to think about Harry.

He was absurdly glad, now, that McGonagall and Lupin and the rest hadn't been with him when Harry came through the barrier, even though at the time he had hated them for giving up too easily. He wouldn't have wanted to share the sight of Harry without his robes with anyone.

Perhaps his guilty enjoyment of the sight meant he was a bad person. Draco preferred to think of it as a gift from some kind fate that had noticed his patience and his worth and given him that brief glimpse as a reward.

Of course, to a certain extent that would increase his impatience—now that he knew what Harry looked like naked, he was more interested than ever in sharing a bed—but fates were like that, he thought complacently, fond of contradictions.

He had thought he would spend the first minutes after Harry came through the barrier yelling at him for going alone and using that ridiculous Vanishing spell again, but the look in Harry's eyes and the sight of Snape mutilated argued against the wisdom of that. And the sight of Harry naked did help to make up for a lot.

Draco was aware that his thoughts were not the most virtuous in the world. He didn't care. As he helped Harry up a step when he stumbled, and admired the Many snake gleaming like a torque around his throat just above the deep green robes, he didn't care at all.

Harry entered the hospital wing feeling as if he floated beneath a scrim of dirt. Everywhere he looked, objects were gray for a moment, and then color bled into them. For that first moment, Harry thought he wouldn't want to live in the world his sight portrayed.

He knew it came from the filthy magic he'd swallowed, and as soon as he managed to shed that and tuck it into an object somewhere, then he'd be free of this feeling. But he couldn't help it right now, and so he watched Madam Pomfrey utter a sharp gasp and float Snape at once into a bed from behind that thick glaze of dirt. It scummed over his emotions, too, and stretched them out, and some of them never seemed to arrive at all.

That left him, oddly, more open to intellectual truths. He looked at Snape's still face, and his red-glowing arms, and the mass of looped flesh and tendon and skin that Madam Pomfrey, with tears in her eyes, was beginning to wind back into its proper place, and knew he had caused it, at least in part.

Oh, Voldemort would still have come hunting. If Yaxley told the truth and Rosier had been the one to tell them about the wards, then he could have hurt Snape even without Harry's dreams. But that open link had allowed Voldemort to send him the false vision of the Dursleys in trouble. If Harry had kept the Occlumency barriers up, he would have remained in the school, and sensed Voldemort the moment he came out of the Chamber of Secrets—or even before that. Since he could enter the Chamber, and knew its location, Harry wasn't entirely sure that Slytherin's spells were proof against him.

The guilt hovered a long way behind the realizations, thanks to the magic. Harry blinked. He saw Madam Pomfrey turn to him with tears on her face, and ask him to fetch a Blood-Replenishing Potion from the cabinet on the wall. Harry walked over to it mechanically, only then feeling the swish of cloth around his ankles. He looked down in confusion. Oh. He was wearing robes. He had wondered if Draco tucking them around his shoulders was a vision, or a concoction of his mind. He didn't remember the walk to the hospital wing, come to that.

He glanced over his shoulder, though, and saw Draco leaning on one of the beds, staring at him anxiously. Harry relaxed a little. He wasn't alone here, especially if Madam Pomfrey had to say that Snape would never walk again.

Yes, the guilt hovered a long way behind the realizations. He handed the Blood-Replenishing Potion to Madam Pomfrey and watched her force it down Snape's throat. Snape swallowed with some difficulty. Harry listened intently, trying to hear if his breathing had eased, and then pulled himself up short. He wouldn't be able to hear that yet, if anytime soon.

He had caused this, in part. But more important than the blame and the guilt was the acceptance of that fact, in all its sharp-edged dimensions. Harry let out a long breath, and asked, "Madam Pomfrey?"

"What is it, Harry?" The matron never looked away from Snape, tracing white lines in the air with her wand. The pieces of his leg followed the lines, dancing like snakes charmed to a flute.

"Can you save his leg?"

"I think so." Madam Pomfrey extended a hand towards him, still not releasing her concentration on his injury. "But it would help if I had more magic. Can you pass power to me the way that you once drank the old Headmaster's?"

Harry blinked a bit, then said, "Yes," and reached out, clasping her hand. He closed his eyes, thinking of the way he had passed magic to Elfrida Bulstrode, so that she could continue to be a witch after pouring all of her magic into her daughter.

The trickle of clean power crept past the taint and into Madam Pomfrey's fingers. Harry felt her jump, heard her gasp. He wondered if it came from the suddenness of the gift, or the growth of her magic. She would never have experienced that after a certain point in her childhood that she was probably too young to remember, he thought with giddy affection. He closed his eyes and poured a little more, carefully straining out the impurities that might come from Dumbledore's or Voldemort's magic.

"That's enough, Harry, I think," said Madam Pomfrey, her voice unsteady.

Harry opened his eyes, and had to blink against the sheer shine of the white lines that sped above Snape's body now. He listened, and could hear them singing as they put Snape's leg back together. He stepped back. Madam Pomfrey could attend to Snape's leg. Harry was going to watch his face, and absorb this particular sharp edge of what had happened.

Snape might walk again, but if so, it would take a long time for him to heal. Or he might walk with a limp, or his right leg might be next to useless. And Voldemort had had him for a relatively short time.

Harry touched his right arm, and frowned. The fever-colored magic still danced beneath the surface, and he wasn't sure that Madam Pomfrey, in her rush to attend to Snape's leg, had even noticed it. For that matter, he wasn't sure that anyone but him could see it.

"Madam Pomfrey?" he whispered.

"What is it, Harry?" The matron's voice was hard, but she spoke in the way that someone did who was utterly concentrated on a task and easily passing through it. She could spare a bit of focus for the outside world.

"Will it disturb you if I drain out the venom from his arms?" Harry thought it must be venom. He remembered the red-black snakes coiled on Voldemort's arms with a shudder of revulsion. Then he blinked. It seemed his emotions had caught up with him at last.

"Of course not," said Madam Pomfrey, her voice abstracted. "It would be a help."

Harry nodded, and then turned to Draco. "Draco, will you fetch me an empty vial?"

Draco ran and got it without questions. Harry didn't know if that came from his understanding that questions would hold things up right now, or his anxiety to be of use. Harry positioned the vial just under his own left arm, then reached out and began to eat the fever-colored magic from Snape's arms.

It burned as it passed into him, and it also tasted foul. This was like drinking boiled shit. Harry grimaced in resignation, and concentrated the venom into his own arm as fast as he could, then forced it to the surface of his skin. He had to close his eyes as a bloody blister erupted above the vial, burst, then began to drain into it.

"Harry?"

Harry opened his eyes and met Draco's concerned ones. He smiled. "I'll be all right in time, Draco," he said quietly, though he could feel the venom ravaging the flesh inside his arms and knew he would probably have to stay in the hospital wing himself when this was done. "But Snape's had this time in him for longer, and Merlin knows what it'll do if it stays there."

He dropped his head and took several harsh breaths as the magic continued to pour through him. Draco took control of the vial, moving it along Harry's arms to receive the fluids from the several blisters that appeared. Harry studied his face, and saw disgust there, but determination to remain until things were done.

He looked around the hospital wing, searching for another empty vial to Accio to himself, and caught a brief glimpse of the Headmistress standing in the doors. She had one hand to her mouth, and Harry didn't know if it was to conceal an expression of horror or hold back her dinner. She met Harry's eyes, and he nodded, once. McGonagall nodded back, then withdrew. She would tell the others that he had returned safely, Harry knew, and that Snape was still alive—neither he nor Madam Pomfrey would be working that intensely if Snape were dead—and that they couldn't be disturbed right now.

“You’re dripping on the floor, Harry.”

Draco’s voice recalled him to himself. Harry shook his head and used a non-verbal spell to swing open the doors of Madam Pomfrey’s Potions cabinet. That way, he could see the empty vials, and call another one.

So it went, until Harry had filled four and a half vials with the mixture of blood and venom and tainted magic, and no matter how he looked, he could see no trace of the feverish glow left in Snape’s arms. He sat down in a chair that someone—Madam Pomfrey? Draco?—had brought to him, beside the bed, and stared at Snape. His face was still slack with unconsciousness. Harry didn’t know if any of the lines of pain had eased. He hoped they had.

He turned his gaze to Snape’s right leg. Madam Pomfrey had done an extremely careful job of reassembly, aided by the magic he’d given her, but she’d warned Harry that she wouldn’t know all the consequences until tomorrow afternoon. The leg still seethed with the “heat” of the spells she’d used. When that cooled away, then she could see how much permanent damage had ensued, and whether Snape would have a long recovery, a short recovery, or none at all.

Harry nodded. So he couldn’t quite absorb all the dimensions of what he had done or not done, yet. He wouldn’t know that until tomorrow afternoon.

Was there anything else that he could do right now?

Yes, one thing.

Harry closed his eyes and began, carefully, to rebuild the Occlumency barrier between his mind and Voldemort’s. If he probed, he could sense great pain on the other side of the link, waiting to swallow him. He smirked, which stretched his face oddly, and then blinked. He hadn’t known he would enjoy his enemy’s pain this much.

But he did. Voldemort was blind, and drained of a good part of his magic, and mingled with the rage and pain came a great deal of fear, like sluggish, chill water. Voldemort had not really feared him before,

Harry thought, crouching on the edge of their connection like a werewolf in high grass. Now he did, and as he struggled to heal, he would know that his enemy might come down on him at any moment, and take advantage of his weakness. It was what Voldemort would do, and Voldemort judged all other minds by his own.

Harry withdrew behind the high grass, and thickened the barrier again. He didn't think swooping off after Voldemort would be a help right now, particularly when he had no idea of the Dark Lord's physical location without opening the scar connection wide. He would prefer to set a trap that took advantage of his surroundings, the way Voldemort had tried to take advantage of the Chamber as home ground for Slytherin's heir. And he knew when he wanted to set the trap. If cosmic events and world-shaking storms were going to happen anyway, one might as well use them.

"Harry?"

Harry opened his eyes, and blinked, and saw Draco standing beside him, with a vial of sweet-smelling potion in his hand. Harry lifted his eyebrows. He knew only one potion that smelled that sweet. It would put him into a healing sleep. Presumably, Madam Pomfrey had decided it would heal the damage the venom had done within his arms as well as relax him, but there was no saying how long that would take. And Harry wanted to remain awake until he was sure he understood everything he had done.

"Harry," said Draco, pushing the vial at him.

Harry bit his lip thoughtfully. Perhaps Madam Pomfrey was right. He might miss some of the considerations he needed to make in this state. Certainly, seeing the world from behind a scrim of dirt wasn't normal, and nor was the almost emotionless determination with which he made decisions right now. Perhaps he would do better when he had rested.

He accepted the vial and swallowed it quickly. Then he stood and made his way over to another bed, not far from Snape's.

He actually didn't know if he made it there before he fell asleep. If he didn't, though, he trusted Draco to catch him before he hit the floor. Snape opened his eyes slowly. He remembered everything, of course he did, but the fact that this was not the Chamber of Secrets still overwhelmed him for a moment. He had given in to despair so thoroughly before Harry arrived that his mind could have made up the delusion of a rescue for him.

But no. He was in the Hogwarts hospital wing, and if a twinge from his right leg warned him not to move it and his arms ached as though someone had beaten them with a Flagellum curse, at least he was alive, and the Dark Lord did not stand beside him.

A light snore attracted his attention. Snape turned his head and saw Harry curled up in the next bed over, sleeping. Draco was in the bed beyond that, but he didn't look hurt, though Snape scrutinized him closely for a moment before turning to stare at Harry.

Harry had come in with one of the Many snakes in his mouth—presumably the same one coiled around his neck now and watching Snape with glittering eyes—and proceeded to save Snape's life.

It had been risky, of course it had, but they had all been at enormous risk from the moment Voldemort had stepped inside Hogwarts's wards. And, Snape had to admit, it had been a calculated risk. He had heard Voldemort elaborating on Harry's refusal to scream; every minute of that torture blazed in his mind like letters of fire. He had thought it strange, since he knew Lily had trained Harry to scream during pain, overriding it and giving his enemies what they wanted while maintaining more of a chance to save his own sanity and break free later. So he had looked over, and seen Harry open his mouth to scream at last, and instead of overwhelmed pride, a snake's venom had erupted.

And the Dark Lord was blind.

Snape laid his head back on the pillow and stared at the ceiling, and thought about the implications of that.

No one that he knew of had dealt the Dark Lord such a blow during the First War. Dumbledore had stopped him from taking over wizarding villages several times, and sometimes he took a punishing loss in the form of Aurors or Order of the Phoenix members ambushing his Death Eaters, but he had more magic, and he had more Death Eaters, and he had inventive, cruel magical geniuses like Adalrico Bulstrode. He had always risen, always grown mightier—slowly, true, but steadily. His fall had been only temporary, and when he returned on the night that Harry was taken to the graveyard for the first time, Snape had assumed the Dark Lord would move forward again, gaining ground until a final battle.

Reversals such as this were not supposed to happen, not to the mightiest Dark Lord in ten generations.

Snape looked at Harry again. Harry breathed normally, as if he had never done anything remarkable. Of course, the illusion of innocence was disrupted, if one knew how to look, by the snake around his neck and the way his left sleeve lost substance abruptly around the wrist.

Harry had saved his life.

Snape closed his eyes and shook his head. He was still angry with himself for letting the Dark Lord take him so easily, but other than that, he felt none of the emotions he would have expected to feel. The idea that he ought to be angry at Harry for taking such a risk was there, of course, but it met the memory of the Chamber and stopped dead.

Something had happened there, a crossroads that afforded him a choice of paths forward. He could take the one he had walked before, accusing Harry of risking his life needlessly. He knew that Harry would accept the blame from him because of the injuries he'd sustained. He might never cease silently resenting Snape's attitude, but he would not oppose it when he had only to glance at the remains of Snape's right leg and feel guilt.

But that wasn't enough, because Snape did not feel that way anymore. It would be the easier road, because of the changes that the others implied—a path laid over a broad and flat course that Snape had walked many times in the past, rather than the treks over mountains and dales that the others promised. But ease was not enough. Choosing a path because it was easy seemed almost insulting, after what both he and Harry had endured.

He could admit that he'd been wrong, about everything, and see the dawning of forgiveness in Harry's eyes. But that wasn't enough, either. If Harry ever found out that Snape had spoken of his guilt merely to earn that forgiveness, he would be disappointed—perhaps blame himself. Or he would blame Snape, and so far as Snape was concerned, there had been more than enough of that.

So that left another path. Snape scowled at nothing; other than himself and the two sleeping boys, there was no one in the hospital wing. Snape wished there had been, so he could snap at their well-meaning concern instead of being alone with his thoughts.

This path would involve changing himself. He didn't want to. He knew what he was—former Death Eater, repentant spy, horrible teacher, someone who cast blame and aspersions on others. The potion he had brewed that had let him look at his soul when he was seventeen had shown him all the ugliness of what he was. And Snape had accepted that ugliness. Why shouldn't he? When someone else clashed with him, he had the satisfaction of knowing that, yes, he was not a good man, that he was a bastard, and that it was a comfortable niche to be in. If he knew himself, he never needed to delve deeper.

And then this.

"If the Dark Lord has never suffered such a reversal before," Snape whispered to Harry, who went on healing and sleeping and didn't hear him, "then neither have I."

So much of what he'd believed about the world had turned out to be true. Given Dumbledore's methods, there was little difference between Dark and Light. James Potter had been even more of a coward and a bully than Snape had credited him with, and he had lived to see his rival fallen and humiliated. Black had been a fool. Lupin was, perhaps, not so bad, but he'd certainly never made an overture to friendship, either. Regulus had returned, and proved just as much of a hero, just as much of a shining guide star, as Snape had suspected he was when Regulus's example inspired him to turn against Voldemort. He's readjusted his mind a bit around Harry, but Harry's recklessness had seemed to prove that Snape was right to play the role of clutching guardian.

And now he would have to change. He'd have to treat Harry more as a comrade-in-arms than a child. At the same time, he'd been right about the danger of Harry opening the Occlumency link, and he would have to emphasize that. And that didn't begin to cover the fact that he had no idea how to apologize, not really, and his humiliation at being such an easy capture, and the fact that he'd loved Harry enough to take his own life.

All of this was very confusing, and Snape did not like confusing things.

But his three most powerful emotions—rage and pride and love, say it—would not allow him to walk any different path. It would have to be this one.

Snape scowled at the ceiling and lay down again, to contemplate wrenching his life and self out of line, how impossible it would be to do that, and how impossible it would be to do anything else, and how in the world he was to keep the balance between what he needed and what Harry did.

Harry patiently held out his right arm as Madam Pomfrey finished running her wand down his left one. She checked the right one, then glanced up with a nod and a look of pleasure. "The venom did nothing more than chew some of the flesh inside your arms, Harry," she murmured. "There will be some pain, but you bled it out fast enough that the damage should heal quickly."

"And Professor Snape?" Harry asked, casting a glance at the far bed. Snape was asleep, still, though it was almost noon on the day after the rescue. His chest rose and fell with such deep, even breaths that Harry envied him. He'd slept the same way under the potion, but he really couldn't remember it. At least the scum of dirt was gone from his vision. The tainted magic had flowed back from the surface and settled into the depths of his own power. That worried Harry a bit—he needed to drain it into an object that couldn't be broken or shredded easily, and he needed to do it before it mingled so completely with his own magic that he couldn't tell the difference any more—but at least he could think and feel normally again.

"His leg still needs to cool, Harry," said the matron, and stepped away from his bed. "I believe his arms should recover, though they'll be weak and have tremors for a few months. Now, I'll have a house elf bring you lunch—"

"No need."

Harry turned towards the door, and blinked in surprise. There couldn't have been many students who had seen the Headmistress carrying a tray of tea, bowls of soup, and what looked like scones. Madam Pomfrey herself blinked as though she suspected she were seeing things, then shook her head.

"If you wish, Headmistress," she said dubiously.

"I do," said McGonagall firmly, and put the tray down on Harry's bed.

Harry studied the tray, and was grateful that McGonagall had thought to bring two cups of tea and two bowls of soup. Draco had gone to the loo, but he would return in a moment, and he would want to eat. McGonagall sat down in the chair Draco had been using so far, and waited both until Harry had had a sip from his cup and Draco had emerged, sitting down in another chair.

"I wished to discuss the wards with you, Harry," said McGonagall.

Harry nodded and sipped at his soup. "The wards were draining into the Chamber of Secrets, Headmistress," he said. "Slytherin worked some magic into the stone that kept the other Founders from discovering it, I think. But I'm not sure if they can enter it even now. You know where the entrance is, and I left the sink open behind me—at least, I should have—"

"You did," said McGonagall. "I've found it advisable to put up a barrier on the loo, however. It seems that many of my students, the first-year Gryffindors in particular, think an adventure in the Chamber of Secrets would be fun.” She pinched her lips tight and shook her head.

Harry blinked, wondering how in the world they could want to be somewhere Voldemort had walked, and then remembered that they’d had no direct experience of the Dark Lord. “And so I know that you can enter,” he finished. “But I don’t know if the Founders can go with you.”

“I was thinking more of your entering the Chamber, Harry, and doing what you can to stabilize the wards,” said McGonagall. “What would happen if you sealed the stone, do you think? Closed every entrance for a ward?”

Harry paused in lifting a spoonful of soup to his mouth, at least until Draco glared at him and his right arm began to shake from the effort of holding it up. Harry swallowed the food and said carefully, “I don’t know if that would work, Headmistress. I didn’t sense the magic of the wards themselves when I went to the Chamber. It’s more as if that’s the central weak point, and the magic flows down towards it and passes through and around it.”

“If we destroyed the Chamber?”

Harry winced. He hadn’t recognized the spells woven into the stone, even after a few weeks of studying the Dark Arts books Regulus had gifted him with. “I don’t think that would work either, Headmistress. Knowing Slytherin, he used spells that would bring down the school itself if his Chamber was hurt.”

McGonagall nodded. “Then what would you recommend?”

“The construction of new wards altogether,” said Harry, and smiled despite himself as she winced. “I know, it’ll take time, and it can’t be a time when any students are in the school and need you for other duties. But I believe it has to be done. The wards that were connected to Dumbledore will be tattered and go on draining. You’ll have to create an entirely new set of them that are tied to you and won’t fall into the Chamber because you don’t want them to. Easter holidays, perhaps?”

“And until then?” McGonagall asked.

“I’ll talk to Scrimgeour, and ask him about having Aurors to guard the school, the way we did last year. And I can create a ward protecting the outside of the school,” said Harry, “and the more vulnerable areas, like the common rooms. I think sealing the entrance to the Chamber, and any of the other tunnels the Founders know about, should be done, as well.” He started to push the tray on his knees away. “I should do that now, in fact, before—”

“Relax, Harry,” said McGonagall firmly. “It’s daytime, and the wards are stable for now.”

“And you haven’t finished your lunch,” Draco added, sitting back and sipping at his own soup as if he wanted to provide a good example.

Harry scowled at him. Draco raised his eyebrows, in a gesture that made Harry feel ultimately childish. Harry sighed and turned back to his soup.

“I have been in contact with the Minister once already today,” said McGonagall, “as he wanted to know the details of what had happened in the Chamber. I told him that I didn’t know yet.” She fastened her eyes on Harry and waited.

Harry let out a sharp breath, and began to tell the story as emotionlessly as he could. It helped that he’d related his plan to McGonagall and Draco before he entered the Chamber, and they knew why he’d used the Slytherin tie embedded with Dumbledore’s magic—to make Voldemort think both that he’d come armed and that he didn’t have any other weapons—and the Many snake. When he spoke about the spell slamming into his elbow, Draco snatched up his arm. Harry winced, but allowed it.

“You didn’t tell me about that yesterday,” Draco said.

“Because it left a bruise,” said Harry. “And bruises are just a little irrelevant compared to what else went on down there.”

“Harry, they—“

“They are, Draco.” Harry was surprised by how vehement his voice was. It was a voice for making speeches with, not replying to his boyfriend’s concern with, but he’d started and he couldn’t stop now. “I realized quite a lot of things down in the Chamber, including how I need to fight this war. Without mercy to Voldemort, yes, but it’s not going to be as simple as dueling him. I cast the Killing Curse, and it accomplished nothing at all. And I only managed with the Many snake because he hadn’t thought I was cunning. Now, he knows I am, and he’ll be more cautious next time. I’ll have to fight him in a different way.

“I plan to lure him to Hogwarts on Midsummer Day—“

“What?” Draco said that, rising from his chair and staring at Harry. McGonagall remained seated, but the look of shock on her face could not be greater if Harry had slapped her. “Why?”

“Because a storm is going to happen then,” said Harry quietly, “the twin of the storm that the wild Dark woke. A storm of Light. A prophecy that Professor Lestrangle recited to me says so. And it’s going to fall here. I plan to draw on the strength of that storm. I have allies who can use it, even if I can’t.” He glanced at McGonagall, who nodded slowly, her eyes alight with wonder. “Choose the time, choose the place, and lure him in.”

“He’d never just launch an attack on Hogwarts on Midsummer Day,” said Draco skeptically. “Why?”

“Because he’s obsessed with symbols.” Harry shrugged. “There are other rituals he could have conducted to resurrect himself, but he chose to come back on Midsummer Day, and go through the bother of tricking the Light into giving him the power to bind me. And it was a limited power, at that, ending at the moment of true sunset—but that mattered to him, that symbolism of Dark overcoming the Light. He chose to stage this latest confrontation with me in the Chamber of Secrets, partly so he could choose the battleground, I’m sure, but also because that’s the home ground of Slytherin’s heir. He tortured me; he didn’t use the Chamber’s spells against me. I believe it was the symbolism that was important to him. He'd even opened the doors for me when I arrived, to insure that I'd have to enter the monster's lair with my eyes open. A good thing, too, since I was wondering how I was going to hiss the command without opening my mouth and letting him sense my snake." Harry touched the Many snake's smooth scales.

"He was interested in the prophecy, too," Harry added. "But he never knew the full thing. What if I created one? What if I hinted, pretended, that part of that prophecy says he'll face me at Hogwarts, on Midsummer's Day of this year, and that he'll stand or fall when he does so?"

"All of this depends on his dancing to your tune, you realize," said Draco, doubtfully.

"I believe it can be done," McGonagall said; her eyes were still alight. "Albus—that is to say, Dumbledore tricked him several times that way during the First War. He never seemed to connect our use of his weakness for symbols to our attacks. He merely believed that of course we would choose to face him on the first day of spring, or on Halloween, because those were important days."

"He even attacked Connor and me on Halloween," Harry told Draco, "months after we were born, and sent the Lestranges after Neville's parents on the same evening. Why? Because it's the night of the dead come back, one of only two nights that necromancers can speak. It's symbolic." He spat the word, but he felt a grim satisfaction. It would take work, but they had nearly four months until Midsummer. He would make Voldemort dance to his tune yet.

Some of the icy disbelief in Draco's eyes melted, and he nodded. "I think you can do this, after all," he murmured, smiling at Harry.

"So nice to have your faith in me," Harry said.

Draco sniffed. "I make fewer mistakes than you do, Harry. I think it only right that I should have more faith in myself, first. You get gifted with it when you prove you can do something right." But his hand found Harry's and gripped it. Harry grinned at him, feeling fierce determination rise up in himself.

If I know my enemy, and he doesn't know me, then I can take him. Snape stared at the ceiling of the hospital wing, while he kept his breaths moving in the mimicry of deep, peaceful sleep, and damned himself for a fool, again.

He had assumed that he would have to do the majority of the changing in his relationship with Harry. What had happened to him in the Chamber had carved so deep and profound a change into him already that he had forgotten much the same thing might have happened to Harry himself. The fact that he had come in with a plan and managed to win had, Snape supposed, signaled to him that he was wrong about Harry's tendency to go dashing into dangerous situations without a thought in his head, but he had assumed that it would not last. He had certainly never expected to drift lazily back to consciousness and hear Harry calmly listing the reasons why he had some chance of luring the Dark Lord to him.

And that was a contradiction in terms. If Harry could create a plan when he had only a few hours to do so and someone he loved was in danger, why couldn't he create a plan when he had months and the chance to think more rationally? And if Harry was incapable of creating plans at all, then he would have come into the Chamber as a sacrifice only, the way both Voldemort and Snape had at first assumed he had.

So Harry had changed, or could—his methods, at least. Snape supposed he would have to look at the last few months in light of this new information, again, and see what he had missed and what was new and what methods Harry had formed in response to his anger.

He must have huffed once too deeply, because abruptly McGonagall was bending over him, saying softly, "Severus?"

Snape nodded at her. It was too late to pretend he really had been asleep, and certainly he couldn't ask the Headmistress not to reveal that fact to Harry.

McGonagall did something he hadn't expected, though. She stepped back, her face stern, and called, "Mr. Malfoy, come with me, please. I would like you with me when I speak to the Minister. You can give him another perspective on the events of yesterday."

"But I—"

McGonagall had turned away from Snape, so he couldn't see which expression she wore, but whatever it was, it made Draco swallow audibly. A moment later, he walked past Snape's bed, pausing to give him an expression that was a mixture of a smile and helpless relief.

"I'm glad that you're alive, sir," he said.

Snape only nodded, since he thought he would need all his words for the coming—conversation? confrontation?—with Harry. Draco turned away a moment later and hurried after McGonagall, who firmly shut the doors of the hospital wing behind her, and might have spoken a locking spell, too. Barring the entrance of Pomfrey, Snape supposed, he and Harry had a chance for uninterrupted conversation.

He started to turn over, slowly, but Harry had already kicked his own blankets off, with an impatience that showed how little he thought he needed them, and pulled up one of the chairs grouped around his bed next to Snape's.

Snape stared at his ward in silence for a moment. Harry's face was lined, but Snape thought that not all of that came from last night; he'd been stressed before it, after all, with his attempts to gather his allies for the spring equinox meeting and knock down misconceptions about it, and the very polite argument he'd been having with Scrimgeour over werewolves' rights. The real change was in the eyes. Snape had not seen Harry look at him in months the way he was looking right now, as if he were the crisis Harry needed to conquer, the person he needed to heal or protect.

But guilt was not the only emotion there; Snape would have felt ready to strike out if it had been, because he had survived, and he must have a good chance of keeping the leg, or Harry would have told him at once. Instead, Harry spoke concern in the way he reached out and grasped Snape's hand with his own, and resignation in the twist of his mouth, and determination in that he never looked away, even when he began to speak words that he must have thought condemned him.

"You were right about the visions. It was a false one that lured me out of the school, because I thought my Muggle aunt and cousin were in danger." He took a deep breath, and gestured towards his scar without releasing Snape's hand. "I should have known it, from the way this burned. That's always been a sign of Voldemort's presence. He got me out of the school just so that he could go after you. I'm sorry."

Snape forced his voice to work. "What happened as a result of this was dangerous," he agreed. "The Dark Lord is an incredibly accomplished Legilimens. It may still be possible for you to use the link as a weapon against him, but it would need to be very carefully controlled and regulated."

Harry blinked at him warily. Snape realized he must have braced himself for another scolding, the way he had received after Rosier had taken him to Durmstrang.

Perhaps it is best that I tell him now. He shall never face that again.

"Harry. Listen to me."

Harry nodded. He shifted in the chair, but it was only to get more comfortable; his eyes and his hand remained steady.

"You are not a child in the sense that I thought you were," Snape said. Merlin, this was hard. He wanted to be both honest and qualified, so that Harry could see what this truly was: an offer of reconciliation, not a surrender. He would not, he could not, become only what Harry needed him to be. Even if he'd had the ability, Harry would have hated that, to think he was forcing someone else into a different mold. "You can plan, and I accept now that you made a calculated sacrifice when you went to Durmstrang. You did the same thing last night." He tried a smile, and if it came out as a half-sneer, even that minor effort made Harry sit up as straight as if he'd been stung, so it was worth it.

“I should know the signs of it. I took the same kind of gamble when I served as a spy among the Death Eaters. Sometimes a risk, a sacrifice, is the only way we can win anything at all. When we fight the Dark Lord, that is even more true than it is at other times.”

Harry responded, his voice soft and full of such mingled emotions that Snape couldn't tell what they were yet, only that he was glad for their existence. “I—you were right in some things, sir. Not all. I have changed enough. I know that I need plans to fight Voldemort, let alone to gently tell wizards and witches what idiots they're being about magical creatures, and Muggleborns, and Squibs, and Muggles, and everyone else they might treat like scum on the soles of their boots.” He squirmed, as if he didn't like what he had to say next. “But I didn't discuss my plans with you. So I suppose from the outside they might have looked fragmented, as if I didn't know what I was doing.”

“They often did look that way,” Snape had to admit. “With the meeting that you held last weekend, I believe that you lost control because you did not realize that Gloriana Griffinsnest hates werewolves, for example.”

“She hates werewolves?”

Snape nodded, hiding his amusement. Harry's face had twisted in dismay that indicated he hadn't learned that since the meeting, either.

“No wonder Claudia Griffinsnest finds it so hard to tell her family that Fenrir Greyback bit her,” Harry muttered, and then looked up at Snape, making a visible attempt to shake the perils of his allies away. “That's the kind of thing that you can help me with then, sir,” he said quietly. “And if I tell you what my plans are, they'll make sense to you, and ease your worry about me.”

“I would not blame you if you didn't trust me, after my efforts to dig myself out of your good opinion in the last month,” said Snape.

Harry cocked his head. “It's more complicated than that,” he began.

“Is not everything, with you?” Snape would have restrained the comment if he could, but when Harry grinned at him, he realized that the humor had probably reassured Harry more than a dozen words might have that he was coming back to normal.

“Yes,” Harry cheerfully agreed. “So this should be, too.” He bit his lip, and his smile faded. “I trust you, but only to do certain things. When I can predict you, sir, then I’m confident. I thought I could trust you to react to my every possible risky plan with anger, so I didn’t tell you about them. That included the dreams and the meeting and the vision about the Dursleys. And when you got angry at me after the meeting, I only had that reinforced.” He gritted his teeth and drove forward through the next words. “It contrasted with the way that you helped heal me after Midwinter, but I think I convinced myself that that was a mistake, that you didn’t care, or that you could only do that because I’d been hurt so badly. If I escaped unscathed, the way I did from Durmstrang, then you’d yell at me.”

Snape nodded slowly, and restrained several of those things he wanted to say before he spoke. No one else was here, he reminded himself. That meant that he could speak words that would make him look weak in front of an audience, even if that audience had consisted only of Draco.

“Some of that is true and some of it is not true, Harry,” he said carefully. “I conceded you had no choice but to face the wild Dark; it was you or no one. And much the same thing was true of the battle at the beach. I grew angry when I believed you had made a sacrifice, when you leaped in front of your brother to take a curse or when you, as I believed, put yourself in mortal danger from Rosier to save others.”

“But he never tried to kill me,” Harry said.

Snape shook his head. “He is wild, Harry. Wild in the sense that the Dark is, or a dragon is. He cares for nothing but his own purposes, his own entertainment. Perhaps you were safe with him because he chose to honor the life debt, but at any moment he could have turned and struck at you, if he decided that was the more amusing thing. You know now that the collar he used to compel your cooperation was false. Think of everything he does as false, as changing all the time. If it had been anyone else but Rosier you went with, then I would not have been so angry.”

“And again, I didn’t know that,” said Harry, his tone noticeably cooler now. “Because you hadn’t told me about the collars, and you’ve never warned me in detail about Rosier before.”

“About the collars, I did not,” said Snape, and restrained both his impulse to lash out and his impulse to apologize for everything. This was the discussion that they had needed to have since January. He would not pretend he was sorry when he was not, and he would not show anger that would drive Harry away. “For that, I am sorry. But about Rosier, I have. I have told you again and again that he is dangerous, Harry, that we could not trust the hints that he pretended to give about the Dark Lord’s plan last year.”

“One of those hints was true,” Harry argued. “I should have been wary of the sun.”

“But he did not tell you what it meant, and he helped Voldemort restrain and torture you,” Snape said, keeping his voice to the calm, neutral tone he had sometimes used, to good effect, when arguing with Bellatrix Lestrange, in the days before she was mad. “I think you still have an amount of trust in him, Harry. You took the gamble of going with him because you believed there was a good chance that you would come back from Durmstrang alive. But there was not. There was no chance at all, no way of calculating the possibilities. Where Rosier is involved, there never is. He sends all predications into chaos.”

Harry lowered his eyes. “Yaxley said that he was the one who had told them about the wards on the school weakening,” he murmured. “And I never anticipated that he would do that, that he could.”

Snape let out a harsh breath. He wasn’t entirely sure if he’d been conscious to hear that, or had heard it and simply forgotten. At least it meant there was some chance of persuading Harry never to trust Rosier again, to never depend on him. This was information from an independent source, not Snape. “That is Evan,” he agreed. “He was Voldemort’s loyal servant, for a certain value of loyal, because Dumbledore would never have trusted him, and in those days there was no other side to which he could apply himself. And now that there is, he will do what he can to explode both your own plans and the Dark Lord's."

"There's one thing I don't understand," said Harry. "Why would he disguise himself as Dolohov and go to Azkaban, if he wasn't loyal to Voldemort?"

Snape curled his lip, but he did believe he had the answer to that. "Because he was interested in Dementors," he said, with a shrug. "He said more than once that he would like to be under the thrall of one, and experience how it affected his mind. That is the only response I can give you."

Harry shivered. "He is mad."

Snape nodded, confident he understood now. "He is," he said quietly, thinking of the days he had spent fighting beside Evan. The man had charmed other Death Eaters into trusting him, thinking of him as some tricky but ultimately honest rogue, and he had engineered their deaths each time. Snape had never given any sign that he noticed, lest he be Evan's next target. "And more dangerous than ever now, since Azkaban and his ability to play two sides against each other. Never trust anything he tells you, Harry. Kill him the next time you see him."

"I already said I would."

Snape looked steadily at his ward. "And I know now that I cannot protect you," he said. "No more than you can protect me. Blame yourself for not being here last night, if you wish, but it will have no more foundation than my own blame, and my own rage, that I could not protect you from going to Durmstrang, or from Diggle's knife."

Harry's hand clenched around his for a moment, then relaxed; Snape could feel a tremor of weakness racing up his right arm. "It has a foundation in the dreams," he said. "I'm to blame for that part. But, about other things—you're right. You're right." He leaned back in his chair and closed his eyes. "People are going to die in this war, and I won't always be around to protect them. For all I know, Draco might fall from taking a curse in the back on the field of battle, or you might, or Connor.

"And you know what the problem is?" Harry smiled, though his eyes glistened with tears when he opened them.. "I realized last night that I care more about you than I ever did about my parents. I care more about Draco than I do about—almost everyone else. I like to think that I'm only devoted to principle, that if I had to choose between saving Draco and saving Hermione I would at least hesitate, but I know now that I won't. It's not a real choice. I would save Draco." He cocked his head at Snape. "And that's a hell of a thing to reconcile with 'people are going to die in this war.'"

Snape closed his eyes. "Will you allow me to help you reconcile it?" he asked. "It cannot compare, not entirely, because I am a different sort of man than you are, but I did fight Order of the Phoenix members during some battles, and then take what information I could to Dumbledore at night." Memories burned and flashed behind his eyes—memories of days when Bellatrix had been sane, and Albus had been noble, and Lucius had been a relentless killer and torturer. And now Bellatrix and Albus were dead by the magic of the boy sitting with his hand clasped firmly in Snape's own, and Lucius was as gentle as he would ever be, for the sake of the same person. How different we all are, or were. "It will help."

"Yes, thank you," said Harry, his voice coming more strongly. "In fact, any offer of help that you make me is gratefully appreciated, sir. How angry I got at you does show how much I love you, but it's time for me to start doing other things than just getting angry."

Snape opened his eyes. Harry was staring at him, and the tears had vanished from his eyes, and his voice was calm and sad and steady.

"There's going to be so much death, sir," he said. "I wouldn't be Pansy for anything in the world, right now. She stares at everyone, and I wonder how many of us are going to die in the war, and how, but of course I can't ask her.

“I want to make more of them die than there are of us dying. I want to know how to become reconciled to death, even Connor’s or Draco’s death, or yours, if that’s what I need to do. I want to know when killing someone is moral and when it isn’t. I think leaving Indigena Yaxley alive was the right thing to do, but maybe leaving Rosier alive was a mistake.” He took a deep breath, and shifted forward until Snape could feel the ending of his left wrist. “I want to know how to make war without losing my soul to it.

“All of that’s a grim study to ask you to help me with. So I really do need to do other things than get angry with you.” He was looking directly into Snape’s eyes now. “So that I can make sure you understand how much I love you, and how grateful I am that you’re alive, and I can share something of life with you outside that training.”

Snape put out his free arm, shifting so that the pillows behind him took his weight, and embraced Harry, drawing him nearer. Harry at once grabbed him, as if he’d been waiting for that signal, and hugged him right back.

This is not the end, Snape thought. Of course it is not. We have not spoken of his anger at my turning his parents over to the Ministry, among other things.

But it was a beginning. And he would not have to make all the changes himself, and he would not have to walk alone on the difficult road he had spied leading beyond the Chamber of Secrets.

Nothing was settled, and nothing was easy. Snape was beginning to think that if either of those things happened around Harry, he would have to be dead.

They would continue moving, and choosing from day to day, and likely arguing until they had hammered out all the sources of Harry’s anger and distrust, and Snape’s anger and overprotectiveness, and then they would find new sources of anger and distrust and overprotectiveness.

But they had made a good start on the motion here, and on the choices, and there was no law that said they must race to the end of the track.

Chapter Seventy-One: Not Since Merlin's Time

"I just don't see why you don't want to keep it."

Harry smiled as he turned the stone slowly over and over in his hand. Yes, he thought it would do. He had asked Hagrid, who ought to know, what the strongest kind of stone in the Forbidden Forest was, and the half-giant had brought him a sample. It was a simple gray color, egg-shaped like the rocks the centaurs valued, veined with gold and white. Harry didn't think it would break easily, which was his main requirement for a vessel to store the befouled magic in.

"Because it would corrupt my own magic, Draco," he answered Draco finally, sitting down on the bed and turning to face his boyfriend. Snape was out of the hospital wing right now, limping up and down the seventh-floor hallway to exercise his leg. He would walk with a limp for perhaps a year, Madam Pomfrey had warned him, but as long as he used the leg constantly, he ought to recover after that. Harry tossed the stone to Draco. "Here. You squeeze it, and make sure that it just doesn't feel strong to me because my hand is still weak." He looked at his arms and made a face. Madam Pomfrey had insisted that Harry stay "just a little longer" in the hospital wing, until she could make absolutely sure that the venom had done no damage to his arms. Since her magic revealed nothing, and the only symptoms of "damage" Harry had were trembling and weakness, he didn't see the point, but the matron had saved Snape's leg. He wasn't about to argue with her.

Draco tested the stone in both hands, then shook his head and tossed it back to Harry, who caught it easily. "It's an ordinary stone, Harry. Hard enough. It'll work. It won't shatter easily, which I think was the main thing you were worried about. But I say that you should keep that magic and work the foulness out of it."

"I haven't the least idea how," Harry said simply. He held the stone in his hand and closed his eyes, reaching for the magic that he'd swallowed from the Slytherin tie and from Voldemort. It had sunk into him and mingled with his own magic, but Harry still knew the difference, as easily as he could distinguish scum on the surface of a lake. The magic, hostile towards him still because of the intentions of its wielders and what they'd been doing when he swallowed it, swarmed up his arms and into the rock.

"Then find out," said Draco, somewhere beyond the flood. "I think it would be better, Harry." His voice was deep with dreams. "Imagine what you could do with magic like that. Can you imagine? Maybe not. Then I'll imagine for you. Not just defeat Voldemort, though that's a priority, of course. But force other people to listen to and respect you. Set up your own magical school if you wanted, one that would take only the best of the best students. Create new spells and artifacts that would become the stuff of legend. Breed snakes that aren't basilisks and aren't disgusting monsters like the ones Voldemort makes. Make—"

"And that's precisely why I won't keep it, Draco," said Harry, opening his eyes and peering down at the stone. He nodded with satisfaction. The Slytherin tie had had much the same feeling as the rock did now. "I have no wish to see what I would become if I did those things."

Draco stared at him. "I don't understand you," he said. "I don't understand how in the world you got into Slytherin. You have some ambition, don't you?"

Harry raised his eyebrows. "Of course I do. You know what it is. To change—"

"Yes, but—" Draco made a chopping motion with his hand in the air. "Not compulsion. Forget about compulsion, even the unconscious kind that you'd exude if you weren't holding your power so tightly under control now. The sheer respect that someone would have to pay a wizard with your magic and Dumbledore's and most of Voldemort's is so enormous that you'd get what you wanted without much trouble, Harry. They'd accord your opinions more weight than the Minister's. They'd agree to what you wanted for the chance to get what they wanted. That's how politics works, Harry, especially around powerful wizards."

"It's the way Dumbledore made it work for him," Harry retorted. "Why should he have had as much power as he did otherwise? He was only a Headmaster. His opinion would have mattered to parents and the board of governors, but no one else, really. It's his magic that made them look to him. Voldemort just takes a route of terror."

"And while Dumbledore was a bastard, some of his methods are worth adopting," Draco said in an encouraging tone. "Why not, Harry? That's the kind of politics that you'll have to work at the alliance meeting. It's the kind of politics that your allies will show up expecting. Since you're not that old and you don't have a powerful family at your back—though of course your Malfoy connections help make up for that—"

"And my being Black heir," Harry reminded him sweetly.

Draco blinked, then said, "Right," as if he'd prefer to forget about that. Harry watched in amusement as he waved a hand. "Your main political tool is your magic," he went on in determination. "And your reputation as Boy-Who-Lived, but you haven't tried to use that. It's your magic that's let you accomplish most of what you have so far. We won't mention the clever, talented, day-saving boyfriend, since that's self-evident." He wore the arrogant expression which made it impossible for Harry to tell how seriously he was taking his own words.

Harry laughed in spite of himself. "I don't disagree."

"Then why—"

"Because I don't want to intimidate people," Harry interrupted. "Of course I'm going to anyway. If someone backs down from an argument with me just because I'm a Lord-level wizard, then there's nothing I can do about that. But I won't set out to intimidate people. And I'd do that if I kept magic that wasn't mine sheerly as a political weapon. I'll use the magic that accident and Voldemort and my mother's machinations gave me."

"It was prophecy," said Draco. "Destiny. Merlin, Harry, don't start thinking of it as accident. Professor Snape," he added, turning towards the doors of the hospital wing as Snape came limping in, his face dark with pain and determination, "Harry thinks that he got his magic by accident."

Snape sank down onto his bed before he tried to respond, massaging his right leg. His eyes were closed. Concerned, Harry started to stand and go to him, but Snape replied in a voice that showed only faint strain. "It was an accident. A bizarre magical accident that no one could have predicted beforehand would fall out like that. No one had ever survived the Killing Curse."

Harry turned to Draco with a smile he knew was a bit vicious, then paused as Snape added, "That is what made it the cornerstone of a prophecy. Prophecies, by their very nature, predict things that do not happen in the world every day."

Draco could outmatch Harry in the vicious smile department, and he did so now. "You were saying, Harry?"

Harry shook his head and held up the stone that contained the befouled magic. "That I won't use this to achieve my ends until I can be sure that I know how to use it without dirtying the people around me, and I won't use my magic to force or scare people into doing what I want."

"What if it turns out to be the only way that you can free the magical creatures?" Draco had dropped the smile. He leaned forward and spoke with quiet intensity. "I think it might be, Harry. A powerful wizard can win them free, and in just a few years. Someone devoted to arguing won't win them free while he still lives."

"Then that's what happens," said Harry steadily. "I'm vates, and that means that I have to respect the free will of my enemies as well as my allies. The magical creatures know that. They wouldn't advise me to do anything in a different way, lest I fall from the path and stop being vates."

Draco sighed. "That magic is yours, Harry, if you can drain it. I think you should use it."

"If I can clean it, I will," said Harry. "To weave wards and heal hurts and defend people, not achieve my political ends. There have to be limits, Draco."

"You said something like that once before," Draco said. "That you don't want to see what you would become if you had so much magic. What does that mean, Harry?"

Harry shot an uneasy glance at Snape, but he had his eyes closed, and if he was attending to the conversation, he didn't show any sign of interfering. He turned back to Draco and answered, "I don't want to become unlimited, Draco, the way I might if I took my ability to drain magic so seriously that it was the only weapon I used. I don't want to intimidate other people with my mere existence. I want them free to argue with me, to hate me, to not fear me. And showing up to an alliance meeting blazing with power like that, most of it from other Lords, would not help me leave other people free."

Draco folded his arms, usually a sign of huffiness with him, but his voice was sure and his look steady. "I don't see why your will needs to be restrained for their sake, Harry. Surely your will is as important as theirs?"

"Yes," Harry snapped. "And I've told you, Draco, my will is to not be that powerful, to not lose myself to my magic. I'm more than the sum of my power. I do keep saying that. I don't know why you don't listen." He rose moodily to his feet and paced back and forth, but didn't storm out of the hospital wing. For one thing, he preferred not to run from his arguments with Draco; for another, Madam Pomfrey wouldn't like it.

"I suppose," Draco said after a few moments, "that I can't credit that it's your will because it's so different from what I want, from what I'd do with that level of magic."

Harry shot him a quick smile of thanks, and nodded. "I know," he said. "But it's what I'm going to do. And I promise, if I do work out some way of cleaning this—" he held up the stone "—then I can use it. Just not now." He tucked the stone into his pocket.

Draco sighed dramatically. "And you'll deprive me of my chance to appear in public as the boyfriend of an all-powerful wizard," he said. "That's just like you, Harry."

Harry was glad to change the tone of the discussion to teasing, especially when he looked over his shoulder and saw Snape watching him far too thoughtfully.

“Yes,” said Minerva softly, glad that she didn’t have to do this alone, that she had Godric and Rowena as well as Harry to help her. “I think that should do, Harry.” She extended her hand across the desk to him. “Take my hand, hold tight to it, and follow the lines you’ll see behind your eyes.”

Harry leaned forward from his chair, his eyes intent, but closing as he latched onto her wrist. Minerva eyed him for a moment, then leaned back in her own chair and closed her eyes as instructed. She felt Godric’s hovering presence ease closer, to lend her strength. Rowena stood on the other side of the room, to serve as anchor and guide; the Ravenclaw Founder knew the wards better than the others, and knew where the most essential, vulnerable places in Hogwarts were, the ones that had to be most protected. She would lead. Minerva would follow, with Godric linked to her through the bond that the Founders’ spirits and the Headmistress shared, and Harry would come behind that, lending them magic to weave the wards as needed.

“Follow.” Even now, Minerva wasn’t used to Rowena’s voice, high and aloof and passionate in what Minerva could only describe as an academic way. Minerva saw a shadow move across her eyelids, as though the Ravenclaw had just thrown one arm forward, and then the world opened around them. Minerva resisted the temptation to look with her physical vision, and hoped Harry had resisted it, too, even as she heard him gasp. Two conflicting sets of visual information would be too much for them, Rowena had explained. They would not go mad, but they would be confused and unable to help in the reweaving of the wards.

This world was one of transparent, glittering stone and dancing shadows—the way that Rowena saw Hogwarts, Minerva thought, rather than the clear, diamond-struck way Godric did. Rowena was a small, dark, winged shape against all the light, probably an eagle or raven. She spread her wings and soared through a tunnel that Minerva knew wasn’t there in the physical Hogwarts, calling all the while. The sounds, whatever they might have been, burst in Minerva's ears as one word. Ward! Ward! Ward!

Minerva reached back to Harry and sideways to Godric, wordlessly asking for the magic to help her do this. It poured through her as more light: a flame from beside her, a sunrise from behind. She sent it reeling through the arm that pointed in the direction Rowena had gone, unable to suppress the sensation of flight even as she knew that she sat in one physical place, motionless.

Rowena's winged shape rose and dipped ahead of her, and Minerva directed the new ward to follow. It curled through the stones, supported and held upright as no ward had been since Albus's fall. Minerva guessed that had something to do with both the tide of magic behind her, and the fact that Harry could sense the Chamber of Secrets and keep the spell from draining downward.

Rowena led them a dance, flashing her wings here and here, and the ward followed, finding its anchors here and here. When the tunnel in the transparent stone was laden with the shimmering defensive magic, Rowena turned and flew towards Ravenclaw Tower. Concealing a chuckle—of course the Founder would think about defending her own House first—Minerva followed.

Rowena flew in a ring around the House common room and bedrooms, her voice ecstatic. Ward! Ward! Ward! Minerva tossed the ward, a glowing purple rope this time, after her, and it securely snared Ravenclaw Tower, guarding against Apparition, use of Portkeys, and any use of Dark Arts. Minerva was taking no chances, even though no other Death Eaters had been found in the House, or, indeed, anywhere in the school.

Rowena turned and circled slowly around Gryffindor Tower. Minerva felt confident enough to take the lead here, so many years had she spent sleeping in and climbing into and out of these rooms. The ward was red and gold this time, almost without her conscious choice. She could feel a moment of pure irritation from Rowena; she had wanted her own House wards in the Ravenclaw colors.

She said nothing about it, though, and pulsed downward, instinctively finding the weak places in the walls and showing them to Minerva: windows a Death Eater could fling Dark spells through, loosely fitted stones that could be more vulnerable than others to magic that manipulated the earth, small deserted rooms that no one knew about and might become targets of a Portkey. Minerva sealed them all. She expected to feel tired or empty at any moment—her usual reaction when she'd worked a great deal of magic—but the flow of power through her was as steady as ever. Godric's delight and Harry's stern resolve to guard the school might have been her own emotions.

Down and down and down, and they warded the Hufflepuff common room. In deference to Rowena's feelings, Minerva made these wards orange rather than yellow and black. The bird that represented the Founder did seem more at ease as she danced delicately around the bedrooms, showing the spells the way to go.

Minerva caught a flicker of another presence as they headed towards the dungeons. She hadn't yet met Helga Hufflepuff, but this certainly felt like a Founder's specter—a shy one. Minerva took a moment to glance aside from the path of light and shadow Rowena opened in front of her, and nodded gravely to the brown-haired woman she saw watching them. Helga's eyes widened, but she dipped her head, and then they flowed on towards the Slytherin common room and left her House's territory behind.

Harry took the lead, unexpectedly, as Rowena flew in slow, mournful circles around the Snake House's sanctuary. Minerva understood why a moment later. Godric had helped her guard their House, Rowena had led the guarding of hers, and Helga had probably lent unobtrusive support to the warding of Hufflepuff. But none of them were Slytherin, and all of them had reasons to hesitate concerning that House, either because of Salazar or because of their own personal history. Harry alone had positive feelings towards it. If someone didn't lend enthusiasm to its wards, then they were unlikely to hold strong.

Harry breathed life into Slytherin's wards, making them silver and green; Minerva didn't know if that was on purpose, or if those were simply the first colors he'd thought of. He tightened the wards, weaving them double-deep, when Rowena would have said that one flight was enough. Then he rose without having to be told, leading the way towards the Great Hall, the next vulnerable place to defend.

Minerva frowned as she followed. She would have said that she had overcome her prejudices towards Slytherin; certainly she felt no animosity towards Harry or Severus, and she treated her students from that House as she treated all the others. But the idea of Slytherin and what it represented, or once had, evidently lingered enough in her mind to poison this effort. She would have to be sterner, more careful still, to insure that she did not push a quarter of the school towards Voldemort simply because he claimed a right to their loyalty.

“How deep would you say that Gloriana Griffinsnest’s hatred for werewolves runs, Professor?”

Snape lay on his bed in the hospital wing, absently massaging his right leg. He’d exhausted himself with walking practice yesterday—well, of course he had; it was a week since his wounding and he wanted to go back to his rooms—and Pomfrey had ordered him to stay still and rest today. Harry was pacing in front of the bed while he studied the letters he’d so far received promising attendance at the gathering on the vernal equinox. Snape was trying not to show how very much he envied his ward for being able to pace at all.

“She will never yield,” Snape said now, remembering the proud, haunted girl he’d known briefly in school. She’d been five years ahead of him, but she’d already lost her parents when he arrived at Hogwarts, and her hatred for werewolves was almost all anyone knew about her, almost all anyone was allowed to know. She appeared to have no hobbies except studying lycanthropes and how to kill them. “She carried a silver knife at the meeting last month, Harry. It was a calculated insult, when she knows how close a werewolf stands at your side. She was pushing to see how much you’d allow her to get away with. What does she say in the letter?”

Harry floated it over to him. Snape scooped up the parchment, noting absently that Harry used Levitation Charms as casually as he would a second hand now. Perhaps that was good, perhaps not. Snape would at least wait a short time before suggesting some of the ideas he had for Harry to create or find a left hand.

Snape scanned the lines quickly, and nodded. "Yes. As I thought. She won't swear the oath not to use magic except in self-defense for 'personal reasons.' She'll kill Lupin if she can, Harry, and the state the laws are in would allow her to get away with it on the flimsiest of pretexts." He glanced up to see Harry standing still now, frowning. "And I trust that Mrs. Parkinson is attending the meeting as well?"

Harry nodded.

"Gloriana Griffinsnest is an expert at identifying werewolves," said Snape. "She could sense and expose Mrs. Parkinson's condition if she spent too much time with her."

Harry winced. "I can't let that happen," he murmured. "Mrs. Parkinson would lose custody of Pansy, her estate, her money, probably her freedom..."

Snape nodded again, though he was of the opinion that the witch he had fought beside in the Battle of Valerian would not meekly lie back and let the Ministry walk all over her. But the whole point of negotiation, and of Harry not simply facing Scrimgeour head on, was to achieve a resolution to the werewolf problem that both the werewolves and the Ministry could live with. "Then do not accept Mrs. Griffinsnest's response. You have a simple enough reason in her refusal to swear the oath."

Harry called the letter back to him, and then grinned at Snape as he laid it carefully in a pile of responses he'd rejected. "Planning the other meeting would have been a lot easier with you to help me," he muttered. "I can't believe how much you know about most of these people."

Snape shrugged, keeping his face relaxed and neutral. He doubted Harry would want to know most of the sources of his information. "We were both at fault there," he said. "And there are some ways in which you know the attendees better than I do." A smooth enough segue into a subject he'd meant to raise since Harry had mentioned, casually, whom among the Hogwarts students had already spoken to him about attending. “Are you sure that your brother should come?”

Harry blinked at him. “Why not? He wouldn’t hurt me, you know that, and he can finish his formal Declaration to the Light in a public setting. I think he’d like that. Besides, it would help with any rumors that he resents me for being the Boy-Who-Lived when he’s not.” Harry rolled his eyes. “Stupid rumors, really. He was the one who told everyone at the trial that I’d bounced the Killing Curse back, and why would he have done that if he wanted to retain his prestige? But there are already a few articles muttering about Connor in the Prophet.”

“It is not his motivation I am worried about, so much as his...lack of experience,” Snape said smoothly. He would trust Harry in front of a crowd, and Draco, and a few of the other older Slytherins and Ravenclaws whose parents had trained them into calm, easy assurance in such situations. Even Zacharias Smith, though Snape disliked the boy for his arrogance, knew how to handle public speaking; his family would not have allowed him to assume full adult rights as heir if he didn’t. But Connor Potter did not. His honesty had served at the trial. Snape could imagine dozens of ways it would hurt Harry if he stood up and spoke whatever nonsense came into his Gryffindor head on the equinox. He would be sincere—blindingly, painfully sincere. But only Harry, or someone of his power, could get away with that kind of honesty at a gathering like this. Half-truths would be the least of the political tricks on stage.

Harry shook his head. “He wants to come, Professor, and he can add valuable testimony if someone asks about Voldemort. He’s faced him four times, after all, five if you count his being a baby during the first attack. He’s been possessed by him, and he can tell them what that’s like. And he’s my brother, and heir of a Light pureblood family. Yes, I want him with me.”

Snape stared into Harry’s eyes, and Harry stared back, with that slight, stubborn lift of his chin that told Snape he was not going to win this one. Snape narrowed his eyes and gave what concession he could. “So long as you keep him away from any lengthy and detailed speeches.”

“He did well at the trial.”

This, Snape could counter. “He was speaking on a subject he knew well, in front of an audience sympathetic to his message. Do you think that will be the case here?”

Harry lowered his eyes. “No.”

Is he seeing sense, or simply giving in to me? Without more proof, though, Snape could hardly accuse him of the last. “Then do not allow him to make speeches unless you are outmaneuvered and forced into doing so,” he said. “Or unless the subject is Gryffindor lack of tact,” he added, thoughtfully. “That, he could give an excellent example of it a hundred words or less.”

Harry laughed, voice low and delighted, and Snape had to resist the urge to say something entirely inconsistent with even his new relationship with Harry about how glad he was to hear the sound. Instead, he turned to a subject he thought he might get an answer out of Harry on, now that he was relaxed. “Why do you resist having power so mightily, Harry?” he asked. “Do you truly fear that you will lose yourself to the temptation?”

Harry stiffened in surprise, then nodded. “Yes, I do,” he said. “Dumbledore did.”

“You are a very different person than Dumbledore ever was,” said Snape, thinking, for one wistful moment, of what it would have been like if Harry had been alive fifteen years ago and leading the First War.

“But he was noble, wasn’t he, professor?” Harry stared intently at him. “Once upon a time. I can’t see you following him if he wasn’t. I can’t see Peter agreeing to become a sacrifice on compulsion alone. Even Sirius, though he owed Dumbledore more than anyone else, probably—I can’t see him just giving in and following a leader who was an ignoble hypocrite from the time he met him.”

Snape inclined his head stiffly. “He was noble, Harry, but he had already begun his fall by the time I turned to him for protection. That is clear, now.” When he had come to Dumbledore in the summer of 1980, he had already heard the prophecy. Dumbledore must have been planning how and who to sacrifice to insure it came true. “I do not think you need to worry about the desire for power overcoming you.”

Harry shrugged. “Perhaps not, but why take chances? I’ve felt the temptation to compel people, and I made Greyback cease to exist simply because I was angry. If something like that happened and I had still more magic than I have now—” He shook his head. “Until I can learn to control it, this way is better.”

Snape raised his eyebrows, masking his surprise that Harry thought he needed more lessons in self-control. “I can help you in learning to control it. If, that is, you think the problem is one of temperament.”

Harry shook his head again. “What else would it be?”

Snape did not have a satisfactory answer for that himself—except one that would consist of Harry being able to wield any amount of magic perfectly well—so he let it go for now, and nodded to the letter that Harry held. “And this one is from?”

“Compton Belville.” Harry laughed again at the face Snape pulled. “Potter—I mean, Harry?” The voice was vaguely familiar, but Harry was sure that he’d never heard it so soft and uncertain. He felt Blaise and Millicent tense up on either side of him, and turned around to face the speaker.

When he saw her, Harry was glad that Draco had become too involved in his latest argument-by-letter with his father to come to dinner early. Marietta Edgecombe, the Ravenclaw girl who had cast the Blood Whip curse at him in October, stood behind him, biting her lip.

“What is it, Edgecombe?” Harry made sure that his voice was perfectly neutral. If she wanted to flinch at it—and she did—that was her affair. She certainly wouldn’t have trusted him if he’d offered her a warm smile and a congratulatory handshake, Harry thought.

“I’ve,” said Marietta, and stopped. Then she took a deep breath and started again. “I just wanted you to know that I have no animosity towards you. None. I never knew Gilbert was a Death Eater, either. I swear I didn’t.”

It took Harry a moment to remember that Gilbert was the first name of Rovenan, the Death Eater boy who’d cast the Entrail-Expelling Curse at him, and that Marietta had been his girlfriend. He nodded at her. “I believe you.”

Marietta paused for a moment, then added in a high, nervous tone, “And Madam Pomfrey told me when she finally managed to undo the spells on me that you’d killed Dumbledore.”

Harry eyed her wearily. Am I going to have to endure another suicidal charge? “Yes. He’d been using a Dark Arts spell called Capto Horrifer on the people in the Ministry. By the time I killed him, he deserved it. Believe me.”

“I do believe you!” Marietta clasped her hands before her as if she were about to fall on her knees at any moment. Harry wished she wouldn’t. Gestures of humiliation made him uncomfortable in the way that stares had almost ceased to do. “I was just going to say that I’m sorry, and I hope that you’ll accept my presence at the gathering you’re having on the vernal equinox.”

Blaise gave a sharp laugh. “Are you mad, Edgecombe? You try to kill our vates, and you think you can just count yourself as one of his allies as if nothing had ever happened?” Harry stared at him, frowning slightly. Blaise had never claimed himself as one of Harry’s allies in public before; informal guard duty was one thing, and this was something else. And he’d certainly given no indication that he thought of Harry as vates.

“I didn’t know what I was doing!” Marietta looked half-desperate. “I didn’t, I swear. I wasn’t myself during those months. Please, let me have another chance.” She nodded to Harry, and her face shifted further, towards an expression that Harry had often worn himself. She’d do whatever she thought necessary to survive, and for some reason, she had decided that survival lay with him. “Look, Harry, I’ll be blunt. I think you’re going to win this war, and even if I didn’t think that, You-Know-Who is an idiot and a madman. I’ve never wanted to serve him. I want to join you.”

Harry raised his eyebrows. “You’re still in school. Don’t you need your parents’ permission? And you could stay neutral, you know. I’m not Light, either.”

“Harry!” Blaise hissed. “You would let her join us?”

“What’s this us?” Harry asked, voice low enough that Marietta didn’t hear. Blaise only frowned, as if he didn’t know what Harry was talking about. Harry shook his head and faced Marietta again. “You’re welcome at the alliance meeting if you think about it some more,” he said. “Ask your parents’ permission, or attend with them. And you’ll need to swear an oath that you won’t use magic against someone else except in self-defense.”

“Thank you,” Marietta whispered. “I promise. They’ll want to come. They’ll swear the oath, too. This is—you don’t know what this means to us, Harry.” For one horrible moment, Harry thought she was going to kiss his hand, or, even more embarrassing, stoop and kiss the hem of his robes. But instead she bobbed a curtsy, then hurried away.

Harry turned back to his food, certain his face was as red as a Weasley’s.

“Would you really let someone so close to your back who once tried to slice it open?” Blaise hissed at him.

“It doesn’t matter,” said Millicent, in the calm, settled tone that she used when a conversation was shut. “She won’t get the chance. We’re going to be there, Blaise, and my father in particular has no interest in seeing his ally get hurt again.” She smiled at Harry, a not particularly pleasant smile. “We’ll obey the oath, Harry, but if someone casts a curse at you, we won’t consider it binding. Defense of you is defense of ourselves.”

Harry narrowed his eyes. "Thank you, Millicent," he chirped. "And if you cross the line and hex someone before they show lethal intent towards me, I hope you realize what it would cost your family."

Millicent grinned. "There it is," she said. "That is what we wanted to see, Harry, some indication that our vates is taking his safety as seriously as we are."

"Would you please not say the word in that tone?" Harry complained. "It sounds like a title when you say it."

Millicent hummed under her breath, and went back to eating. Unwilling to cause more of a scene than he had already, Harry joined her, but added that particular concern to the list already taking form in his mind: that his Dark pureblood allies seemed determined to serve as bodyguards. Very jumpy bodyguards.

"I must admit," Regulus murmured into Harry's ear, "this is a wonderful place to have the alliance meeting."

"Isn't it?" Harry gently removed the wards above the valley. "We'll have more than enough room for everyone, and it doesn't hurt at all that this place has such impressive natural magic."

He and Regulus nudged their brooms forward when the wards were gone, lowering themselves into the Woodhouse valley. Harry had time to be awed, in a way he hadn't been during the battle, by the sheer power brewing in the valley. It wasn't an aura, exactly, but a current, patrolling the valley's sides and the entrance in the woods that Hawthorn and the other werewolves had used during the battle, and never going beyond them. The closest analogy Harry could find for it was the pool of wind in Silver-Mirror.

He didn't know very much about place magic, he had to admit as he and Regulus touched down gently in grass still wet with rain and stiff with frost. Most wizards no longer studied it due to its inherent limitations; wands were portable, while place magic couldn't be drawn on outside of the valley or house or room in which it existed. But Harry remembered reading in the long letters of information Paton had sent him that some of the Opallines had made an attempt to recapture place magic through studying the druidic arts. Harry planned to corner some of them during the alliance gathering and ask about it if he could. Paton's latest communication had made it sound as if half the attendees would be Opallines.

Woodhouse answered to no master. Harry could feel the current of magic ignoring him entirely. When he studied it, though, he could see that it centered on the quadrangle from which the Death Eaters had conducted their ambush during the battle here on October's full moon. The giant wooden house in the middle of the stone buildings fed the current and ate the current when it circled back around again. Wards so ancient had settled there that Harry couldn't decipher which spells underlay them. The most prominent, however, would do inventively nasty things to anyone who tried to burn the house. Harry made a mental note to warn Ignifer to be careful, again.

"Impressive," Regulus murmured, picking up on the last thing Harry had said. Harry glanced at him curiously. Regulus had agreed to come with him today without pause—Draco was with his parents, Snape wasn't cleared by Madam Pomfrey to fly a broom or Apparate yet, and Remus was remonstrating with several impulsive second-year Gryffindors—but Harry had thought it was solely because he wanted to spend time in Harry's company. Now, he had a look on his face that made it clear he wanted to say something more. Harry resigned himself to waiting until such time as Regulus wanted to speak.

"Impressive," said Regulus again, and then batted irritably at a load of water that the tree they were walking under had dumped down his neck. "Yes, Harry, you'll have to appear impressive during the gathering."

Harry raised his eyebrows. "I know that."

"Remember to keep it on your own terms," Regulus continued. "If they want you to speak on a certain topic, consider it carefully before you agree. And, well, I know you want to be honest, but a little diplomatic lying never hurt anyone." He smiled, but the expression was abstracted, and his gaze was on the far side of the valley. Harry looked in that direction, but saw only the rising Welsh hills, cresting waves of brown and gray and green.

“You’re talking as if you won’t be there,” he said, to try and lighten the mood.

“I will,” said Regulus firmly. “But—after that, I’ll be around for only a short time, and I want you to remember the lessons to tackle other political situations.”

Harry stopped. “Why?” he asked, more sharply than he’d intended. His mind was playing over Regulus’s insistence on his being Black heir in a different light now. He narrowed his eyes and stared hard at Regulus. “Are you sick?”

Regulus blanched for half a second, then laughed. The laughter sounded forced, however. “No, Harry. Of course not. Where would you get such a silly idea?” His hand briefly rubbed along his left arm.

Harry snapped his fingers, and his magic pulled up the sleeve of Regulus’s robe before he could think to yank it back down. Harry stared in silence at what the disturbed garment revealed. The Dark Mark was clearer and blacker than he’d ever seen it, and was surrounded by raised, angry red-white flesh. Harry knew that Snape’s Dark Mark didn’t look like that.

He raised his eyes to Regulus’s face, and waited for some sort of explanation.

Regulus winced. “The Dark Lord’s laid traps in my Mark,” he admitted, his hand hovering above the symbol as if he didn’t actually dare to touch it. “We don’t know what they do yet—”

“We?”

“Severus and I.”

Harry scowled.

“We didn’t see any reason to worry you,” said Regulus defensively. “The traps won’t activate unless someone tries to use my Mark to contact me. But now, this has happened.” He nodded to the red flesh around the Mark. “I need to find a cure for it. I’m going into one of the portraits from Silver-Mirror. It leads me to a world where several of my ancestors discovered healing for sicknesses or wounds that were destroying them in the past.” He brightened briefly. “Cousin Arcturus, who built Wayhouse, used it once for an incurable bee-sting,” he added.

Harry’s mind had shifted into a different path. “Do you think you can wait until the meeting is over, then?”

“Yes,” said Regulus. “The redness is advancing slowly, swelling a little more each week. I can wait until the equinox. And then I’ll enter the portrait. Time slows down in that world. The swelling won’t advance any more once I’m inside, I think.”

“You think,” said Harry.

“This is the Dark Lord, Harry,” said Regulus gently. “Nothing is certain with him. But yes, I think so. And I want to stay here until the alliance meeting, and you can’t stop me from doing that. Not without being a hypocrite yourself.” He raised his head and challenged Harry with his eyes to deny that he’d often hidden his own pain and his own wounds because he didn’t want other people to worry.

Harry sighed and glanced the other way. “If you’re sure—”

“I’m sure.”

Harry nodded miserably. He didn’t like this. He wished Regulus had told him beforehand so that he could try to heal him. On the other hand, touching or healing the Dark Mark at all might activate the traps hidden in it. Perhaps it was best that he hadn’t known about it and had time to convince himself that he could do something to speed up the healing.

“Now,” said Regulus, with forced lightness, “shall we readjust the wards?”

Harry nodded, and turned to face the valley, forcing lightness on himself, too. If he didn't alter the wards about the valley, then no one would be able to enter or find it except himself. Harry had to insure that anyone who'd sworn the oath could enter. A fine thing if the alliance meeting failed because people were bouncing off his defensive spells.

A week later, it was the first day of spring, the time of the balance of Dark and Light, and Harry stood on the high northern side of Woodhouse and looked down at a sight supposedly not seen since Merlin's time.

Tents crowded Woodhouse, shimmering with spells to counteract the cold and the unpleasant ground, which had less frost than during Harry's last visit, but more mud. The current of magic rushing around the valley had altered when it felt the first spells cast, but to Harry's relief, none of them had triggered a defensive reaction. Now the current was ignoring the tents again, as if wizards were not worth its time.

The tents shimmered in various colors, sometimes the hues of various family crests—Lucius had a pompous blue-gray tent that covered a lavish spread of land, and the Opallines' tent blazed with the blue and gold of the sea and the sun—but more often deep green or gold in celebration of both spring and their occupants' allegiance. All the tents flew flags depicting old family symbols, however. There were far more attendees than Harry had thought there would be at first, nearly five hundred.

Harry let his gaze travel from the Dark pureblood tents just beneath him to the brilliant golden ones clustered near the forest choking Woodhouse's one ground entrance. Those were the Irish Light pureblood families. Cupressus Apollonis, Ignifer's father, had written requesting to come, and along with him had come most of his allies. Harry hadn't yet met the Apollonis patriarch face to face, and was reserving judgment until he did. It was his unbiased opinion, however, based on the infertility curse he had cast on his daughter, that Cupressus was a bastard.

South from the golden tents was the Opalline gathering, which looked more like a refugee camp with the number of children running around and shouting in both Manx and English. Harry smiled as he watched one of them tackle another and send her sprawling with a loud, inelegant cry. Someone who might have been Calibrid herself, from the long fall of pale hair, stooped down and began untangling them.

Next to the Opallines, as if trying to prove something, the Bulstrodes had set their tent, huge and dark and imposing. Their pennant was a black stone on a white field, and the motto Duramus. The Parkinson pavilion was small next to it, a deep green streaked with gold, their pennant a flower; Harry couldn't make out the motto from here, as the letters were too small. Both Hawthorn and Pansy were attending, though Pansy had withdrawn so far from the rest of the world in the last few weeks that Harry was privately surprised she had chosen to do so.

Starrise's circle of sun and stars flapped near them, and Harry frowned a little. He'd seen Augustus already, carrying an enormous staff of white wood bound with gold that Harry remembered from the trial. The staff had sparked with magic that Harry instinctively distrusted. With him was a pale young man Harry hadn't met before—Tybalt's brother, he supposed, the heir, Pharos. And there was a gull continually wheeling over his tent, which Harry didn't like at all.

The tent next to that one made him smile. Connor had contacted the Potter solicitor, Proudfoot, and assigned him to figure out what colors the Potter tent and flag were supposed to be. As a result, there was now a garish white-gold tent standing proudly among the others, and the flag depicted a—thing. Harry hadn't figured out whether it was supposed to be a crown, or a set of antlers, or a thorn tree. It was larger than it strictly needed to be to contain Connor, but that was all right. Most of the other Gryffindor students who'd come were staying there with him, including all four of the younger Weasleys. Fred and George were the main reason that Harry wished their tent was further away from the Starrise one.

Draco and Harry and Snape had argued over a tent for him, until Harry put his foot down on any finery. Snape had grudgingly agreed that Harry could share his own small, dark, and utterly unassuming tent. Draco had carried on longer, until Harry pointed out that he couldn't use the Black colors because he didn't carry that name, and he couldn't stay in the Malfoy pavilion without everyone assuming that Lucius controlled him, and he couldn't create his own crest because he had no surname chosen and no ideas for a symbol that wouldn't look ridiculous.

Besides, along with the value of impressing people, there was the value of encouraging them to underestimate him. Harry was all for the latter. Even though he had taken Snape's advice and eliminated anyone from the gathering who seemed to want to come only to cause trouble, he knew there were people here who wished him less than well.

He took a deep breath and shook his shoulders, letting some of the tension fall away from them. Whatever happened now, this was still an achievement, to have this many Light and Dark families in the same place without a war to cause it. He could be proud of that.

He took up his Firebolt and flew down towards the valley, ready to begin.

"They look fine," said Narcissa, gently settling the dark blue robes around Draco's shoulders. "Don't they, dear?"

Lucius didn't look up from writing invitations at the table in the corner of their tent. "You chose them, Narcissa," he said. "I will know who to blame if anything goes wrong."

Draco put his shoulders back and made a face at the expression in the conjured full-length mirror. The dark blue robes weren't the best color for him, but he had little choice as to their shade. Lucius was writing invitations for a festival to be held on his sixteenth birthday, which would formally celebrate Draco's elevation as Malfoy magical heir. Between then and now, in such a public gathering as this, he couldn't wear plain robes, because he was, technically, the heir, and he couldn't wear any color that would indicate he'd been acknowledged to everyone already. That eliminated a surprising number of hues. Dark blue was the only acceptable one of those left.

Besides, Draco had to admit, the robes did fit. His mother had been very careful about that.

Narcissa bent down to kiss the back of his head. "You have grown, Draco," she said softly.

Draco nodded. He didn't entirely recognize himself, but that wasn't entirely a bad thing, either. The robes made him look paler than normal, and made his blond hair stand out like a coronet on his head. Fastening it back was a band of beaten silver, worked into the Malfoy crest and set with small blue-gray stones that Draco didn't know. He looked adult, stern, responsible.

"Draco."

He blinked and met his mother's eyes in the mirror again. Narcissa's hands were pressing on his shoulders, and her face was unusually set.

"Do not let Harry overwhelm you in this meeting," she murmured. "All eyes will be on him—that's hardly avoidable—but those in the know will be looking at you as well. Do honor to your family, your name, and your power." She stepped back, but didn't yield his gaze. "I care for Harry, but it is more difficult to appear to advantage when your consort is so much more powerful than you are."

Draco nodded, his heartbeat slowing again. He'd thought for a moment that Narcissa had a much sterner message to deliver. "I'd thought of that, Mother. Don't worry. Everyone who sees me will know that I'm a Malfoy." He lifted his head, and found his expression working into the haughty defiance he'd seen on many of his ancestors' faces in the confirmation ritual.

"Good," Narcissa murmured, smiling again. "And, Draco, that reminds me. Has Harry agreed to the courting ritual yet?"

Draco sighed. "No. He hasn't." It had been almost two months since his initial question, as this was the twentieth of March, but other than reminding Harry gently about it, he hadn't wanted to press it. Harry had had politics to deal with, and then Snape and Voldemort, and then politics again. Besides, if Harry meant to refuse, Draco was sure he would have done it by now.

It was far more likely that Harry just didn't think about it often. Draco made a rueful face, and caught his mother's eye again.

"It might not be a bad idea to ask for a commitment by the end of the gathering," said Narcissa calmly. "I do think that Harry will accept you, Draco, but the sooner you start courting him, the better it will suit your own impatience, the fortunes of our family, and Harry himself."

Draco nodded, his resolve steeling. He could do that. He'd seen Harry that morning before they flew to Woodhouse, the way his eyes were focused and his mind was racing. His determination beat off him like another form of magic. In such a mood, he thought better, and Draco was confident that he could make a clear-headed decision.

And, of course, a gathering like this would show Harry off to advantage to a great many pureblood families. It would be no bad thing to make sure that most people knew that the rumors of Harry undergoing a courting ritual were not just rumors, but had a solid basis in reality, and he was not, therefore, a suitable target for marriage or joining proposals.

And I want it, Draco admitted to himself, and that sealed the matter as far as he was concerned.

"Are you ready, Millicent?"

Millicent stepped back and critically examined herself in the mirror that her mother had conjured. Then she nodded. The formal dress robes would hang no better on her than this, and if she lingered much longer, then she might cause her family to miss the start of the meeting. She didn't want to do that. Most of the wizards and witches here were meeting Harry for the first time. It would be seen that the Bulstrode family stood at his side, and was honored with a place in his inner circle.

Millicent shook her head for a moment, amused at herself. She was capable of thinking in two modes at once—of Harry as a political leader who had the ability to influence the Bulstrode luck, for better or worse, and of Harry as the fellow Slytherin she had to scold out of wounding himself for the sake of practicing healing magic. She had tried before to catch herself in a contradiction, to find the impulse to forgive him for being an idiot or despise him when he was acting like a leader, and she couldn't do it. That pleased her. From what her father said, many of the people the Dark Lord had attended school with had not been able to pull themselves out of seeing him as one or the other. But Millicent had two more years in Hogwarts with Harry, and Merlin knew how much time as someone who followed him in politics, or war, or both. She needed that mental flexibility.

Her father swept towards her, studying her for one moment with intent dark eyes. Millicent stood straight and proud under his gaze. She was taller than most of the boys in school, and had features that kind people described as "strong." She found that she didn't really care when he looked at her like that. She was his heir, and that was all that had ever mattered.

"I have heard some rumors that disturb me, Millicent," said her father gently. "It seems that there may be at least one agent of the Dark Lord in the crowd, sent to assassinate or maim Harry. And though of course no one knows who this agent might be, I have heard it repeated too many times to make me think the gossip has no foundation." He cocked his head. "It disturbs me," he repeated, "to think that some people do not have the proper respect for the vates the Bulstrodes have allied themselves with."

Millicent's eyes widened as she caught a flicker of darkness traveling around the outside of her father's hand. It was rare that he allowed his magic to manifest like that at all, never mind in one of the abilities their family kept mostly secret. He had once told Millicent that the only people who knew what Bulstrode blackfire looked like were either of their blood or dead.

"I gave you permission once to use your gifts to defend Harry," said Adalrico, catching her gaze. "I give it to you again. And if you are closer to him than I am when the assassin moves, and it does not seem likely that he will notice it himself, then do not hesitate to wield the blackfire."

Millicent blinked and nodded. "We are losing our secrecy, then, Father?" she asked.

Her father chuckled. "Do not say that we are losing it, Millicent, but...gaining respect. Perhaps it's time to emerge from hiding beneath our stone."

Millicent bobbed a curtsey, and her father's hand briefly traced through her thick, heavy brown hair. Then she stood up, and they turned to face Elfrida.

Millicent thought her mother looked lovely. For one thing, she wore robes covered with the pale silver filigree that denoted puellaris training; for another, she held Marian in her arms, since it was only right that both the family's magical heirs attended a gathering like this. Marian was over a year old now, and she was reaching towards the blackfire around her father's hands with no sign of fear. Elfrida gave her a fierce, adoring smile which she widened a moment later to include her husband and older daughter.

"We should give them a show," she said quietly, and then turned and stepped to the entrance of the tent.

Millicent let a spark of blackfire flare on her fist in answer to her father's gaze, and then followed.

Are you certain that you wish to go through with this?

Hawthorn used her hands to ask Pansy the question. They both knew the necromancers' sign language well enough, since Dragonsbane had used it to communicate with Pansy since she was born, and with his wife before that. But Hawthorn had never really imagined using it with her daughter.

She found she was startled by the changes in Pansy, and disturbed, despite her pride in her daughter for following this path. Pansy wore robes that completely concealed her body now, except for her hands, flashing quick responses to her mother's concern. Now and then, Hawthorn saw one of her sleeves flutter in the tug of no mortal wind.

And she wore a ring with an enormous red stone on her left hand, though Hawthorn knew their family had never owned such a ring, and it had not belonged to Dragonsbane, either. She was beginning to believe that the spirits of the dead spontaneously formed such jewelry for those who chose to talk with them.

I'm all right, Mother. The crowd in Hogwarts's Great Hall is smaller than this, and I've got used to seeing their deaths. The visions here will be new, but after a few hours, I'll have my balance.

Hawthorn nodded slowly. Then she sneezed. Someone was walking past the tent draped in coils of perfume that irritated her sensitive werewolf nose. She shook her head and embraced Pansy for a moment.

"Leave at any moment you need to," she whispered. "I would never think less of you for that, you know."

I know, Mother.

Pansy hid her face even from her mother, now, but she had a way of tilting her head to the side when she smiled that she still retained, and that Hawthorn could make out even under her shapeless hood. She did it now, and then turned and walked forward calmly into the world outside the tent.

Hawthorn followed, slowly. She had loved Dragonsbane since the last days of his training in necromancy, and had accepted then that she might lose him someday soon, and he wouldn't be able to tell her beforehand when that day was, though he knew it himself. She should not have such a problem becoming reconciled to the knowledge that Pansy, too, carried the date of her death in her head now, and had to have accepted it, or the dead would not have let her advance in her studies.

If Pansy had made the sacrifice willingly, and Hawthorn had already lived through the love and loss of one necromancer, why did it bother her so much to think that Pansy might die next year, or the year after that, or in a few years?

Because it has nothing to do with the path she follows. No mother should have to bury her child.

Harry strode rapidly towards the dais that he and Regulus had shifted rocks from the valley's sides to build at the southern end. There was plenty of open ground there, not crowded with tents, and people would be able to see him when he stood on it. Besides, it was almost three o'clock, the time when Harry had said he would make a welcoming speech. He did not particularly want to make a welcoming speech, but it would let him get a sense of the audience response to him, and perhaps he could get some of the sillier questions—whether he would ever consent to Declare himself a Lord, for example—out of the way at once.

His mind was rushing forward, and for a long moment he did not notice that someone was walking beside him, matching his pace, instead of flowing sluggishly towards the stage like the rest of the crowd. He looked sideways, and found Ignifer Apollonis there, her yellow eyes still. Flames leaped up through her palms and cracked briefly. Harry wondered how he had made her so angry, and then realized the real target of the flames when Ignifer inclined her head towards the man walking on her other side.

"Harry," she said, "vates, leader of my alliance and the holder of my soul, I would like to introduce my father, Cupressus Apollonis."

Harry nodded, as if he had expected the elaborate series of titles she'd given him, and then wheeled to the side so that he could see the man who'd cursed his daughter and magical heir to be infertile for as long as she remained dedicated to the Dark.

Cupressus was older than Harry had expected, definitely in his sixties; of course, Ignifer herself was in her thirties, so Harry supposed that wasn't a surprise. He had golden hair touched with so much white that it appeared almost the color of a Malfoy's or an Opalline's. His yellow eyes shone like a hawk's. Harry saw magic pulsing and shivering in the web of silver rings on his hands, each set with a different stone. His eyes narrowed briefly as he realized that there were twelve rings, twelve stones. Cupressus had six fingers on either hand.

"I am quite glad to meet you, Mr. Potter," said Cupressus, his voice deep and strong, a good singing voice. He inclined his head to Harry.

"Harry," said Ignifer, voice light and perfect with rage. "I introduced him to you as Harry for a reason, Sir Apollonis. He has forsaken his surname."

"So sorry," said Cupressus, inclining his head further. "Of course. I should not have forgotten. When such shame as your parents' has been spread far and wide, it is a dishonor to your own sacrifice to forget your disassociating yourself from it." He produced a polite smile he seemed to have hidden under a handkerchief, like a stage magician's egg.

Harry understood the reason behind Cupressus's "forgetfulness" then. He'd wanted to insult his daughter more than he'd wanted to either insult Harry or get into his good graces. He revised his earlier judgment to one closer to the truth. Cupressus Apollonis was not just a bastard, but an unmitigated bastard.

"Mr. Apollonis," he said, and inclined his head. "Ignifer has told me almost nothing about you, and now I see why. I know you already. All the best parts of yourself are reflected in your daughter."

Cupressus's face assumed a complex expression. "Is that true?" he murmured. "I would have said that you knew only a distorted reflection of me, Harry, as she is without the Light to make those characteristics shine."

"She has given her loyalty to me, and saved my life," said Harry, with an elaborate shrug. "So I see her by that light."

Cupressus sighed. "And thus I must apologize to you, Harry. She would have brought you honor had you known her fifteen years ago. Now, though she still carries the name Apollonis, she carries a taint, also, within her, given her Declaration. Any loyalty she brings you is stained, any motive she might have for saving your life an ulterior one. I feel compelled to warn you of this, since you do not seem to realize what being Declared Dark means."

“Father.”

Harry could feel the heat billowing up behind him. He turned his head, and saw Ignifer wreathed with flames. She spat something in Latin, too quick for him to follow. It wasn't a spell, though, or Harry would have had to defend Cupressus. He remembered, a moment later, that the Apollonis family taught its children to speak Latin as a first language.

Cupressus responded, voice gentle and tolerant. Ignifer said something else, and this time Harry caught “magic of the Dark.”

He shook his head, marveling at the spectacle of a father who hated his daughter enough to try to humiliate her and get her punished in the middle of an alliance meeting, and stepped more firmly between Ignifer and her father. “I know Ignifer,” he told Cupressus. “And Light and Dark both mean less to me than how a wizard or witch acts. At the moment, sir, I hope to have better acquaintance with other Light wizards. If I allowed your actions to represent them all to me, then I would send them out of the meeting at once.”

He turned his back, and grasped Ignifer's elbow. He had grown enough to make his escorting her look less than ridiculous. He wouldn't stay here or let her stay here, because Cupressus would only have another retort, and he would try to make Ignifer break her oath to use magic only in self-defense. “My lady?” he asked, purposely using a title that Ignifer's outcasting from her family said she shouldn't receive. “Will you honor me with your presence on my journey to the stage?”

Ignifer nodded stiffly, once, and walked quickly off. Harry walked more slowly, forcing her to slow as well, and she let out several harsh breaths before saying, “You see how he is. I'm sorry, but I thought you should meet him that way, rather than in the crowd before the stage. Once allow him to speak, and he won't hush. And of course all of his questions will be so reasonable that no one could forbid them without looking dangerous or outrageous.” Her voice creaked and cracked and ran with poison.

Harry nodded. "Thank you for letting me know."

Ignifer glanced sideways at him. "Are you still going to let him be part of the alliance?"

Harry stared at her in turn. "Are you all right?" he asked, wondering if her father had cast a compulsion spell on her. It sounded like something Cupressus would do, and it would explain her temper—though so would hatred of her father. "Of course not, Ignifer. He insulted you."

"He's my father," Ignifer said, biting off the words. "That's what he does. I don't want you to lose a powerful ally just because of me."

"It would be because of him, not you," said Harry firmly, guiding her around the first rows of seated witches and wizards. Some had conjured chairs; others had Transfigured stones or logs or humps of grass. He could feel eyes boring into him, lingering on him, coming at him in sidelong glances. He didn't care. Reassuring Ignifer was more important. "Quite apart from any insults he offered you, he's a fanatic for the Light. I know the type," he added dryly, thinking of Marietta Edgecombe as she had been, of the Order of the Phoenix members, of Dumbledore, of his mother. "He won't get along with my Dark allies. That means that I'm going to reject his further participation in the alliance out of hand. He's already doomed himself. I hope he enjoyed the fight with you, since it cost him so much."

Ignifer's hand closed convulsively on his for a moment. "Thank you," she whispered. "Thank you."

Harry squeezed her hand back, then parted from her at the end of the third row of seats from the stage. Ignifer sat down next to Honoria Pemberley, whose face lit up at once when she saw her. She leaned closer to Ignifer and whispered something. Ignifer gave her a look that combined weariness and wariness. Honoria laughed and laid a gentle hand on Ignifer's arm. Harry turned away to hide his smile at Ignifer's confused look.

He climbed up the steps to the stage, piled boulders fitted close to each other with a mortar spell that Peter knew, and turned to survey the crowd. Hundreds of expectant faces stared back at him. Harry gave a small nod when he recognized someone. He couldn't restrain a smile when he saw Draco, Millicent, Pansy, and Connor, and again when he caught sight of Paton Opalline with a child on his shoulders, waving solemnly at him. He knew the smiles were being taken note of and remarked upon, but he couldn't care about that. There were certain things he saw no reason to hide.

He settled himself with a shake of his shoulders, as he had on the ridge above the valley, and then turned towards the forest at the western edge, behind the rows of seats. If he had calculated the time correctly, then a slight surprise, and one of the most blatant points he could make, was about to arrive.

Yes. He had cast a spell already to make himself sensitive to slight vibrations in the earth, and he felt them now. They were coming.

He whispered the spell he had used in the press conference in December, the one that let him sound as if he were speaking directly into the ears of each person. "Welcome," he said clearly, "to Woodhouse. I wish to give wizards and witches, purebloods and Muggleborns and halfbloods like myself, those of Dark and those of Light, my acknowledgment and my thanks for coming, but we are not quite complete. A moment—ah!"

By now, the sound of hoofbeats was audible to everyone. Harry smiled slightly as a group of centaurs, twenty strong, cantered out of the woods and towards the stage. The audience turned to stare, and murmurs rose like high tide. Harry bowed to the lead centaur, whose name was Magorian, and he slid to his knees in return. The rest of the centaurs likewise bowed in a rippling flourish, dipping and rising so quickly that one was upright again almost before the next was down, and only those wizards and witches who sat to the sides of the wide central aisle could get the full effect.

"Now," said Harry, lifting his head and letting the other wizards and witches see his wide, benign smile as the centaurs took their places near the front, "we are—"

A roar interrupted him. Harry wheeled, and saw a blazing shape looming into view behind him. The scales shone iridescent, and fractured the sun into rainbows. The dragon, an Antipodean Opaleye, flew with swift grace towards the stage, and came down beside it in a landing so neat that her wings barely raised a wind. Nor had the wizards and witches in the crowd done much stirring. Harry supposed some of them were shocked senseless, but the dragon's speed had prevented it, too.

A cloaked figure leaped from the dragon's back. Harry recognized Acies's smell of smoke and fire before she bowed to him and caught his eye for one intense, wild moment.

"The Singers greet you," she said, pitching her voice into a roar that everyone in the audience could hear, "Harry, vates."

Harry could not have asked for a more dramatic gesture. Yes, there was fear in some of the eyes that watched him, but more awe. It didn't hurt that Opaleyes were the most beautiful of the dragons, or that this one had settled down beside the stage, immovable, displaying no interest in the wizards and witches as snacks.

And he needed no lessons in how to take advantage of something like this.

"Now," he announced, turning back to the gathering with a smile more serene than before, "we are all here, and can begin."

Chapter Seventy-Two: A Path of Green and Gold

Harry could feel the temper in the valley changing almost from moment to moment. His coming to the stage had begun the alteration; the centaurs had changed it, and the entrance of Acies with the dragon had changed it yet again. He wanted to speak now, while it held overtones of both fear and awe, rather than wait.

“Most of you know me, by reputation if not by sight,” he began. “My name is Harry—I was born Harry Potter, but I have permanently severed myself from that last name, due to the actions of the witch who bore me and the wizard who sired me. My brother still carries it, and I have no wish to sever that particular bond.” He gave a little bow in Connor’s direction. Connor stood up and bowed back. He was enjoying this, from the wide grin on his face. Harry relaxed. See, Snape, he’s not going to embarrass me. Just in case, though, I won’t give him any speeches to make. “I also am becoming vates, the wizard who tries to free the magical creatures from their webs and encourage them to coexist with wizards while making sure that neither their wills nor anyone else’s is impinged upon.”

A hand rose in the crowd. Harry smiled when he saw that it came from a cluster of wizards in golden robes, indicating their devotion to the Light. “Yes?” he asked. Truly, almost anyone else was welcome to speak at the moment, as long as it wasn’t Cupressus Apollonis.

“What do you mean by becoming this vates thing?” asked an unfamiliar voice, which sounded like an older witch’s. “I thought you had already achieved that title.”

Harry shook his head. “It is not a title that a wizard or witch can achieve and then keep,” he said calmly. “It is a task I must always be proving my claim to. If I use compulsion or impinge on the free will of another, such as by setting house elves free without consulting their owners or not working for their freedom once I know about their webs, I fall from the path. And it is not a title, not the way that Lord or Lady might be said to be. I must keep changing, moving forward all the time.” He smiled at the disconcerted expression on the witch’s face, and then turned back to the crowd. “Are there any other questions about what a vates is meant to achieve?”

There seemed to be none for now. Harry nodded. "I am other things, some of which you already know. For example, I am a Lord-level wizard, but not a Lord. I do not plan to Declare, ever." He hoped that might get rid of stupid questions about Declarations for Light or Dark, and if anyone intended to try to force him to those Declarations, they would know that it was useless. "I am also the heir of the Black family, thanks to the graciousness of Regulus Black."

"Do you claim the surname Black?" That was probably Edward Burke, his voice nasal and irritating.

"No," said Harry easily. "I have not yet chosen the surname I will wear, if any. As I am legal heir to the Black family, I was not required to take their name."

"Is it true that you've sworn an oath to fight for the rights of werewolves?" asked someone else. Harry had the feeling that he knew the voice, that it might have been someone who was in the meeting in February. He could not identify it at once. "And that the blood took the form of the Black crest when you made it?"

"Both are true," Harry confirmed calmly. "But the blood took the form of the Black crest because I used the Black oath-taking knife. And the oath to fight for the rights of werewolves does not mean I will invade the Ministry and demand that they follow my will. I think Minister Scrimgeour might have something to say about that." He smiled as a few people chuckled. "I intend to find a solution to the problem that both sides can accept, and that will involve persuasion, politics, speaking to the Wizengamot, petitions, and likely making common cause with people who want similar things. It will not involve use of magic to overwhelm someone else's will."

"What do you want to accomplish with this alliance, exactly, Harry?" That was Lucius's voice, and Harry nodded to him, grateful for the opportunity to lay out his goals.

"I intend to change life in the ways that I have said I would," Harry said. "I think the treatment of most magical creatures is a blemish on the honor of the wizarding world. The web that confines house elves to their service is particularly so, since it makes them long to serve instead of simply live under their web with self-knowledge, the way that the centaurs and the unicorns have done. I intend to unbind those webs once I have knowledge and opportunity to do so and once everyone involved in them has agreed to it.”

“What is the benefit for your allies in this?” Adalrico’s voice was near the stage, nearer than Harry had expected him to be. Of course, he might want the other spectators to see how close the Bulstrode family stood to Harry.

“In knowing they have done the honorable thing, of course,” said Harry, and then laughed when he saw the looks of dismay on many faces. “And in accomplishing more of their own magic and furnishing more of their own lives,” he continued. “We can perform simple cleaning and cooking charms to sustain ourselves, but most of us prefer to rely on house elves, for no reason except that we have always done it. We will have new business opportunities as well, since the magical creatures who choose to mingle their lives in the wizarding world will need help, advice, and special magic.” He met Magorian’s eyes as the crowd reacted to that. The lead centaur scraped his hoof slowly on the ground, as if he were considering this. In truth, he and Harry had discussed this in the last few weeks, and he had agreed that Harry could say this, though of course there was no guarantee that a centaur traveling among wizards would choose to rely on wizards for what he needed. Harry nodded once, and then turned back to the crowd.

“I admit it might sound like a great sacrifice for very little. But we have walked in a secure world that has nearly nothing to do with reality. Our house elves are not willing, natural servants, but slaves constrained to like their service with ancient magic. Werewolves are not evil beasts who chose their curses, but victims of a web that transfers itself through the bite. When we shun them and push them out of our society, we are doing what Voldemort, among others, wants us to do.” Some people actually covered their ears, Harry saw, as if they couldn’t bear to hear the Dark Lord’s name spoken. “He used one of his werewolves, Fenrir Greyback, as a tool for political intimidation, and we do nothing but oblige him when we give up on those wizards and witches who suffer from lycanthropy. Currently, werewolves cannot hold paying jobs, and cannot have custody of their children, even when they are related by blood. Is it any wonder that many of them become desperate and cruel, trying to survive? This is an entirely avoidable problem, now that we have the Wolfsbane Potion to insure that werewolves can survive the full moon nights with their minds intact. We are the ones being cruel in the first place. And if a werewolf bites one of our children in vengeance for his treatment, then we are the ones to blame.”

“Does the Wolfsbane Potion actually work?” someone asked from a section of the crowd containing mostly Dark wizards. “I’ve heard rumors that it didn’t.”

“Yes, it does.” Harry scanned the crowd slowly, though he had already spotted Remus during his initial gazing. Showing himself apparently a bit less observant than he really was had its advantages. “Professor Lupin, will you come here, please?” he added.

Remus strode easily out of the crowd and towards the stage. Harry could feel their eyes raking him, trying to see an aura of evil fluttering above him. But with his back turned, he had few identifying features, and even when he turned, only the people sitting close to the stage could make out his amber eyes and the gray streaks in his hair. He nodded at them, as if amused, and then looked at Harry.

“Will you tell us about the effects of Wolfsbane Potion?” Harry stepped back, sweeping a bow as he deferred to an expert. He wondered how many people in the crowd would realize that he was granting Remus a chance to speak that he would never have had in a normal gathering. Werewolves couldn’t legally testify at trials, or even talk to informal public gatherings without fear of persecution, as long as most people knew they had lycanthropy.

“Of course.” Remus faced the crowd with his usual mild gaze that hid the strength of the will he’d developed after his year at the Sanctuary. “My name is Remus Lupin,” he said, as Harry whispered the spell that would carry his voice into the spectators’ ears as well. “I have been a werewolf since I was a child, a victim of Fenrir Greyback’s bite. I am also the godfather of Connor Potter, and watched over both him and Harry as they grew. I was Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher at Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry for the 1993-1994 school year, and I currently hold the post of Gryffindor Head of House there.”

“How can the Headmistress have hired you?” demanded Augustus Starrise. Harry rolled his eyes, glad that he stood behind Remus’s shoulder and Augustus couldn’t see him do it.

“She does not pay me a salary, but gives me room and board, to cooperate with the laws,” said Remus peacefully. He paused, then glanced at Harry. Harry understood what he was asking permission to refer to, and nodded. Most of the people in the crowd would probably have heard of it anyway.

“Also, Harry has been kind enough to create a Gringotts account for me, which contains enough gold from the Black vaults to keep me happy for some time,” said Remus, almost carelessly.

The gazes swept back to Harry. Harry concealed his chuckle at the amount of shock in them. Have they not heard, or did they not take the rumor seriously? He lifted his shoulders in an elaborate shrug. “Professor Lupin has been kind to me,” he said, “and he made my childhood the richer for having known him. Of course I would wish to establish an account for him, since the Ministry is not currently enlightened enough to let him work for his keep.”

“The effects of Wolfsbane Potion,” said Snape’s voice. Harry had to bite his lip to hold back his grin. The voice was deeply cold, as though Snape were a random stranger annoyed by the introduction of another topic on the stage, rather than someone, like Harry and Lupin, adding his touch to keep the dance under their control. “You were going to discuss the effects of the Potion, Lupin.”

“So I was,” said Remus, with a smile that said he knew perfectly well who the voice belonged to. “Under the Potion, I do indeed retain my own mind, so long as I swallow it before the moon rises. I transform, but I am in control of my actions. I can run through the Forbidden Forest and prowl Hogwarts’s grounds in defense against intruders, or I can curl up in my office and sleep if I like. The Potion has given me my choices back again.” Remus’s head tilted, and Harry saw a hint of the werewolf in his narrowing eyes and flaring nostrils. "It is a precious thing, since in so much of wizarding society I have no choices at all."

Harry raised an eyebrow. He and Remus hadn't discussed his saying that, but what good was inviting Remus to speak if he stuck to a prepared script? Harry could not, in one sense at least, speak for him, since he wasn't a werewolf. Nothing could substitute for the words of one who suffered the curse openly and was willing to speak for those who couldn't reveal themselves.

"Do you deny," said a ponderous, wheezing voice, "that werewolves have done great harm and damage to ordinary wizards and witches? Would it not be better to avoid that?"

"I do not," said Remus. "Do you deny that the wars of Light and Dark have done incredible damage to the wizarding world? Would it not be better to avoid those? Perhaps we should ban anyone from Declaring for either allegiance." His muscles were poised and sharp, on the edge of trembling. Harry saw it and wondered whether to ache for him or exult. Though this had to hurt Remus, he was at last, at least, getting the chance to speak.

"The free choice of wizards and witches has determined the nature and extent of our wars," said a far-too-cultured voice. Harry narrowed his eyes and looked, and was sure a moment later that the speaker was Mortimer Belville. "Werewolves, on the other hand—or paw, begging your pardon, Mr. Lupin—had the chance to object to the laws as they were being formed, and yet never did so."

Remus laughed. Harry heard the edge of a bark to it, and was momentarily glad that this wasn't a full moon night.

"Of course we did not," said Remus. "We were barred from making any appeals to the Wizengamot as they decided upon the laws. This was under Minister Fudge, but since it was the first of the anti-werewolf laws passed, it determined all the others. They passed with our apparent silence and complicity because we could not break that silence unless we wanted to be arrested."

“How can you possibly know that?” Belville demanded. “Those are secret Wizengamot proceedings—“

“Then how would we have had the chance to object to them?” Remus asked, with a shrug. “Answer me that, my lord.” The flat contempt in his voice made Belville’s face flush. “But I do know,” Remus added. “Conspirators should not think their secrets can remain secrets forever.”

Harry stepped in then. Remus was angry enough that he might reveal secrets that weren’t his to reveal, like the existence of Auror Wilmot, the werewolf Harry was certain had told Remus about the Wizengamot’s debate. “They should not,” he added, drawing attention back to himself. “Those ancient wizards who wove the webs to contain house elves, centaurs, unicorns, and almost every other magical species I’ve talked to didn’t pass the knowledge on to their descendants. How many of us believed that house elves were naturally servile?” He saw guilt people wouldn’t admit in most of the faces turned towards him, and nodded. “So did I, when I gave it any thought at all. But now that we know about it, we have no excuse for not acting.”

“I don’t see why,” said a witch, whose bells braided into her hair indicated she’d had war training. “We could leave things as they are. It would be the easier course.”

“And a wrong one,” said Harry quietly. “I, at least, will not leave things as they are. The reason I accepted your requests to come today is that I thought there was at least a chance you might be interested in helping me with this.”

“I still have seen very little of what you offer those who follow you,” said Cupressus Apollonis, his voice gentle and grave and utterly reasonable, “other than hardship and struggle that cannot be completed in their lifetimes. Even you, my lord Harry, young as you are, will be hard put to free all the magical species before you die. Why should we follow this path? What is in it for us?”

Harry could practically feel Ignifer’s nervousness; now that her father had made an inroad, she must be afraid that he would dominate the conversation. But Harry had the counter to this one, given Cupressus's claimed allegiance. He smiled at him. "Sir Apollonis," he said, choosing the sarcastic title Ignifer had used, "how can you ask such a thing? The Light is fair. The Light is noble-minded. And you serve the Light. Surely you should wish to free the house elves and others because it is the right thing to do?" He cocked his head to the side and assumed a confused expression. "Of course, that is if you serve the Light. As you reminded me before the meeting, I do not know you at all. Perhaps the Dark is actually your preferred allegiance."

Cupressus's face wavered, as if a curtain were briefly pulled off a stage. The ugliness Harry saw behind the curtain made him wince. Here was an opponent who would sacrifice even his own advantage for the sake of seeing his enemies suffer. But he lifted his head and held the man's eyes. He would not back down. He had faced far greater threats than Cupressus Apollonis.

"I assure you, Harry," said Adalrico Bulstrode's voice, "that not all Dark wizards are committed to those outworn ideals that pretend to separate our two allegiances."

Harry turned to look at him, and saw the hope in his face. Adalrico wanted to be distinguished, to have those who might not know see that his family stood close to Harry's side. Well, why not? It was the truth, after all.

"I know that, Mr. Bulstrode," said Harry, bowing his head. "If you will come on stage, we can show those who might doubt us living examples of wizards who care more about actions than Declarations."

Adalrico brought his whole family, of course. Harry would not have expected less. He turned his head, seeking out and beckoning the Parkinsons, the Malfoys, and Arabella Zabini with his eyes. They came up to join him as if they'd been expecting this. Harry grinned and glanced at Acies, wondering if she wanted to be introduced as well. Acies held still for a long moment, then inclined her head so suddenly that Harry jumped.

I hope we aren't about to cost the Headmistress her Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher. On the other hand, if Acies chooses to acknowledge who and what she is, I don't think McGonagall should necessarily have a say.

Harry faced the crowd again, and murmured, "May I introduce the Bulstrodes—a Dark pureblood family, sworn to me in a formal family alliance, and the lucky parents of two magical heirs." Millicent lifted her chin. Marian stood with fortunate solemnity at her mother's side. Harry knew he wasn't imagining that some of the gazes from the crowd sharpened, with envy and admiration both. He supposed he might be the instrument of the Bulstrodes getting more offers of alliance, perhaps even of marriage for Millicent, which was no bad thing. "May I introduce the Parkinsons—also a Dark pureblood family, sworn to me in a formal family alliance. Hawthorn's husband and Pansy's father, Dragonsbane Parkinson, died for me in the graveyard where Voldemort resurrected himself." He met Hawthorn's eyes, and saw more than a tinge of gratitude in them. He couldn't see Pansy's face, but she gave him a small nod.

"This is Arabella Zabini, a Songstress and an ally I am fortunate to have," said Harry, inclining his head to Arabella, who nodded back. She was beautiful in the sunlight, her black skin perhaps accented with cosmetics spells, Harry thought. He did notice that Blaise hadn't come to the stage with her. "And Acies Lestrangle, who currently teaches Defense Against the Dark Arts at Hogwarts under the name of Acies Merryweather."

More than one gasp came from the crowd at that. Harry saw some Hogwarts students shaking their heads. They would be wondering how they hadn't recognized their professor in the cloaked woman who had ridden the dragon to stage, Harry supposed.

"And, last but far from least," said Harry, wheeling to face Lucius, Narcissa, and Draco, "the Malfoys. Lucius Malfoy has graciously entered into a truce-dance with me." Lucius nodded, his face blank, his eyes the color of steel. "Narcissa Malfoy is a large part of the reason so many other allies have gathered to me, since she is an accomplished dancer." Narcissa gave a smile like winter sunlight. "And Draco Malfoy," Harry said, meeting Draco's eyes, "my first friend other than my brother, the first student to welcome me to Slytherin House, and—“

For a moment, he nearly faltered. Then he pushed himself forward. He could do this. He had planned to do this, to show Draco how serious he was. It was and wasn't a dramatic gesture. It would look like that to most people who weren't standing on the stage, but Draco was standing close enough to see Harry's eyes and hear the slight shake in his voice.

“And the man I currently plan to enter into a formal courting ritual with, once Walpurgis comes,” Harry finished firmly.

Draco's eyes widened, but he controlled himself almost at once. It was doubtful that even Millicent or Pansy had noticed that he hadn't expected that. He extended a hand, and after one panicked moment when he couldn't remember the correct positioning of his own hand, Harry accepted his wrist. Draco bowed his head and kissed Harry's pulse point. Harry returned the gesture the moment Draco straightened enough for him to do so.

Life to life, Harry had read about a formal public acknowledgement of the ritual. Heartbeat to heartbeat. It is a remnant of an older gesture in which both lovers were required to strip and touch their hearts to each other's, in order that their parents might check them for glours and deformities.

Harry was grateful that the kissing of pulse points had substituted for that. He held Draco's eyes for a long moment, hoping that was enough to show how much he loved him. He was willing love to show in his own eyes, but he didn't know if it worked. It wasn't an emotion he had practice expressing in that form. I can be a brother, I can be a godson and a simulacrum of a son, but I've never been a lover. I want this to work.

Draco's own eyes held his love, Harry could not doubt that, and a kind of wild, tender pride. Harry wasn't sure whether that was simply because Harry had accepted his proposal, or if the public nature of the acceptance had something to do with it.

Draco placed a hand beneath Harry's chin a moment later and draw him nearer, asking and daring him with his eyes both at once.

Harry hadn't planned beyond this moment, because he hadn't known how Draco would respond to him. But his own courage was up, and it would be stupid to back out now. He took a deep breath and leaned nearer before Draco could complete the gesture, kissing him strongly.

Draco made a little muffled sound in the back of his throat. Harry took advantage of that, and continued the kiss at a leisurely pace for several moments, then drew back and looked at Draco with a lazy smile. "And why didn't you anticipate that, hmmm?" he whispered. "Surely a Malfoy always anticipates everything."

Narcissa had something as close to an idiotic grin on her face as Harry suspected he would ever see. Lucius looked as if he couldn't decide between a smug "I knew it all along" expression and an abstracted "Let me calculate how this will affect my political fortunes" expression. And Draco...

Draco had recovered remarkably quickly. Anticipation of more and delight and affection and appreciation and possessiveness mingled in his face as he answered, "I always knew you were going to be mine, Harry. I just didn't anticipate the timing, that's all."

"Well, do keep up," Harry retorted, feeling his own grin stretch his cheeks wide, and turned to face the crowd again, Draco's arm settling around his waist.

Most of the spectators were appropriately stunned. Harry paused to savor that for a moment, then continued smoothly. "I am able, I hope, to provide my political allies with more than just the satisfaction of doing the right thing, strong as that motive is." He threw a little half-glance at Lucius, and saw people follow his gaze and realize that Lucius Malfoy, surely, would never enter into an alliance solely for "the satisfaction of doing the right thing." "But for myself, that is and will remain the strongest motive.

"I was raised in the knowledge of Dark pureblood rituals, though neither of my parents was a Dark pureblood. I have a deep love of the wizarding world and what it has accomplished—its dances, its arts, its sports, its history. But I will love it more, allies and potential allies and friends, when its foundation of slavery and suffering has been destroyed.”

“How can you say that it is built on a foundation of suffering and slavery?” Cupressus Apollonis asked, his voice as smooth as if Harry’s public declaration of his joining hadn’t fazed him at all. “What have our dances to do with the supposed suffering of house elves? I must confess I do not see the connection.”

“Because so many of our achievements are the result of time and leisure,” said Harry, feeling passion enter his voice. He hadn’t planned to say this, at least in these exact words, but perhaps Draco’s acceptance of his acceptance had given him the courage. “Our artworks came about only because our ancestors were freed from caring for themselves by house elves.

“We pride ourselves on our fortunes. But we do not guard our own money, and we do not watch over it, and we do not mint it.” Harry fought to conceal a smile then as he thought of what would happen when the southern goblins chose to reveal their freedom. The fact that they could destabilize the currency of wizarding Britain if they chose should be a good reason for humans to listen to them. “I would argue that that does not really make our fortunes ours.

“Our dances, beautiful as they are, enshrine vengeance instead of reconciliation, pride instead of forgiveness, separation rather than a common cause. I think that is directly connected to the fact that, when wizards did encounter those who challenged their beliefs and sympathies, they responded with webs. Rather than find some way to live with them, they pushed them away. The Muggles are the only strangers we have ever encountered strong enough to overwhelm us, so instead we hide ourselves and wield our magic against them if they show any sign of intruding into our tiny world.”

“Very well said!” Harry wasn’t surprised that it was Calibrid Opalline who’d called that. Her eyes were as brilliant as her family’s blue and gold colors.

"I want to change that," Harry said, feeling fire rising and racing through him. "I want to have the beauty of our world built on a foundation of beauty. I want the façade to match what's beneath. I want to find a way to evaluate what we have built. Some traditions are worth keeping. Others are not."

"You are speaking of revolution," said Laura Gloryflower. Harry could not make out the tone in her voice, but he thought it was one of wonder.

Harry bowed his head. "I am."

"But we can't change that much!" objected Mortimer Belville, his face turning downwards in a frown. "How can we? We'll lose our identity. We're already doing that with the flood of Muggleborns into our world. We're threatened on all sides, and you want us to lower the walls?"

Harry couldn't help snorting. "We have tended to overestimate our own persecution," he said dryly. "We are the ones who placed webs on the magical creatures, not the other way around. And as for Muggleborns, Belville, I must ask you: what do you think separates a Muggleborn from a pureblood?" He could feel Draco's arm tighten around his waist, but he wasn't sure if it was in amusement or an attempt to caution him.

"Their blood," said Belville. "Their customs. Their view of the world. Their magic. Everything." There was genuine revulsion in his voice. Harry tried to conceal a wince as he thought of Hermione and John Smythe-Blyton sitting in the crowd, listening to this spew.

"I hope, in time," said Harry, "to show you that the majority of those things are pureblood perception, not reality, and the barriers that are real can be overcome." Hermione, he knew, had learned enough pureblood rituals to surprise Zacharias. He wondered what the spectators would make of her at the festival that would follow this first part of the meeting. "I know it will take time. I will not force you to give up those beliefs any more than I would force you to free house elves before you believe that they belong free. But if you wish to be part of the alliance, then you should know that I consider the rights of Muggleborns as important as the rights of purebloods, and I will fight beside them and for them equally.”

“How can you, when you say that you were raised as a Dark pureblood?” someone he didn’t know inquired.

“A Dark pureblood with a Muggleborn mother,” said Harry, and smiled as he saw uneasy shifting in the crowd. How many of them forgot that already? It’s the behavior that matters to most of them, I would wager half my fortune, and when someone acts the part well enough, they forget about the blood. Which just goes to show how many of their prejudices are nonsense. Hard-to-overcome nonsense, I’ll grant that, but nonsense at the bottom. “I am both, in this case. And I see no contradiction in the union of those opposites. I am more interested in reconciliation than vengeance, in forgiveness than pride, in a common cause than a separation. Those I plan to leave out of this alliance are those who will exile themselves.” He caught and held the eyes of Cupressus Apollonis then. “They would not wish to work with me in any case, given what they believe.”

Cupressus’s face was a study. He had apparently believed that Harry would accept him even after he’d insulted Ignifer. Harry supposed he might have been overestimating Harry’s investment in forgiveness, or perhaps he had thought he was powerful enough that there would be no choice about it.

Harry gave him a sweet, envenomed smile. Revolution can come a little later to Ireland, that’s all. He turned away from Cupressus and said, “Understand. I intend to fight beside anyone who wishes to join me. But to do that, they must have the intention of striving for more than just the defeat of Voldemort, though that’s part of the goal for the alliance. I won’t allow this war to dominate my life, because peace is worth more than war. Prophecy supposedly marks me as the defeater of Voldemort—“ and he saw many people in the crowd lean forward “—but nothing marks me as vates but my own free will. My dedication to the same possibility in other people is what drives me forward. If I Declare for any belief, it is that one.”

He let his eyes roam the crowd for a moment, then bowed his head. “It is true that this will require work,” he said quietly. “I expect to die in the work. By then, however, I hope to have invested enough other people with my ideals that they will continue with the revolution for its own sake.”

There. Introduce it quietly, at first—the notion of them following a set of principles, rather than a name or a person. Not all of them will accept, at first, that I don’t intend to be a substitute Dumbledore. But I’ll continue to emphasize that until they learn. This is the cause of the magical creatures and change and peace and free will and dozens of other things, not the cause of Harry.

“Does anyone have anything else to say?” he asked, into the profound silence that followed his statement.

The Antipodean Opaleye swung her head towards Harry and uttered a deafening cry. Acies translated it a moment later, in the shock of the echoes. “This Singer says that she has chosen to come because she wishes her children to escape being hunted and tormented by wizards. The vates provides the best chance for that.”

Magorian reared and then came down with his forehooves hard enough to make a distinctive thump, calling all eyes to him. “And we say that we will stand beside our vates in war, because he has freed us from both our web and the compulsion to rape that once would have followed our freedom,” he said calmly. “He pursued the road of blood and willing sacrifice in order to do so. If he can walk such a hard road, we will follow him down this broad and easy path.”

“And we will stand beside Harry because we have chosen to do so, and we honor our word.”

Hawthorn, Adalrico, and Lucius all said that at the same time. Harry refused to believe it wasn’t practiced. But it gave the necessary impression of his allies’ unity, and no one else did have any other questions or remarks after that.

Harry nodded, then lifted his hand. Magic poured forth from it and swirled lazily above everyone’s heads, then dived into the middle of the large clear area behind their seats. Harry willed and molded the power, and it became a large dark green tent streaked with gold on the sides, the colors of his soul, or mingled Dark and Light.

“There will be festivities now,” Harry said, enjoying the shocked stares immensely. “Some of my allies have graciously agreed to provide food and drink, and others music.” He glanced at Arabella Zabini, who nodded, eyes amused. Some people would go out of their way to avoid listening to her now that they knew she was a Songstress. “I intend to wander myself. If you wish to speak to me, search me out.” He stepped gently away from Draco’s half-embrace and towards the edge of the stage.

Draco caught his left wrist. “I think we need to talk, Harry,” he said, his eyes intent.

Harry coughed, feeling his cheeks flush. “In a while, Draco,” he said, with as much dignity as he could muster. “First, I need to mingle.”

Draco nodded. “Then I’ll search you out when I want to speak to you,” he said, and smiled with a force that took Harry’s breath away, and walked towards the steps off the stage himself.

Harry shook his head dazedly, and then turned to make sure the centaurs were comfortable, trying to control the wild beating of his heart. That had not gone too badly, any of it, and it made a marvelous beginning.

Falco Parkinson took a delicate step backward, testing the strength of the magic-made tent’s roof against a sea eagle’s weight. It held. It was truly remarkable that Potter could raise a creation like this on a moment’s notice, and that the magic that made it would feel so much like cloth.

Remarkable—and unnatural.

The longer Falco observed Potter, the more he grew disturbed and unnerved at what he saw. He had known many Lords and Ladies in the past. He had watched them all Declare, and stand or fall in the wars of Light and Dark, and he had valued them even as he despised them for their weakness in having to Declare. Those Declarations helped to balance the world. They were part of the reason that he could speak of magic, and the wizarding world he guarded, as stable. Powerful wizards and witches could divide people, split them into two equal factions, or lure the wavering and the neutral in their direction. Thus Falco had felt happy enough retreating from the world fifty years ago. Albus was a Light Lord, but he would face a wizard strong in the Dark soon enough. And he was as committed to ideals of balance and unchanging calm as someone with an allegiance could be.

Now here was a powerful wizard who refused to Declare. Falco would have been intrigued, interested in, proud of Potter if he had the sense that the boy was someone like himself—someone who had decided to remain alive as a guardian on the world's balance by tricking both Dark and Light into extending his years in the hopes that, someday, he might Declare.

But instead, Potter used both Dark and Light magic with no regard for the inner consistency and principles of either. He used the magic that fit the situation at the time. He rejected power when it grew beyond a certain limit, but never seemed to consider that, to not be a hypocrite, he really ought to give up all his magic and become a Squib. And he aspired to an impossible path, the vates, and to destroying and altering many old institutions of the wizarding world merely to suit himself.

He was a relativist. Falco had never been comfortable with them. He might do anything, and manage to justify it to himself.

And he was considering changing, altering, the whole world without a thought for what it would look like a hundred years hence.

Falco had found Tom Riddle exactly as he expected to find him: he was a Dark Lord, and good at it, maintaining one side of the balance as it should be maintained. Falco was growing increasingly concerned, however, that Harry would not Declare for Light, and that he had been able to drain so much of Tom's magic. Even nearly a month after their catastrophic encounter in the Chamber of Secrets, Tom was wounded, dazed, hurting, barely able to swallow the magic that would eventually restore his own power.

All these concerns tumbled in his mind as he sat on the tent's roof, a bird no one paid much attention to, and he saw, clearly, the path that he would have to tread if he couldn't convince Harry to Declare.

He sighed. Well, I value the balance of the world more than my own life. I always did. He raised his wings and circled down so that he could observe the people clustered in the tent. Perhaps he would yet see something that would convince him Harry was not, as he appeared, a powerful, irresponsible child.

Augustus shook his head and smiled. He did enjoy verbally sparring with Cupressus Apollonis, who could never resist the temptation to test him. They had been comrades and enemies for decades, since one was the leader of the Light families in Northern England and the other the leader of the Light families in Ireland. They believed the same things, but never approached them in the same way.

Currently, Cupressus was trying to find out—with extreme tact and politeness, of course—how Augustus had managed to get Harry to accept his alliance.

“But what was he like at his parents’ trial?” Cupressus coaxed him.

Augustus sipped at a cup of wine, which, he had to admit, was quite good even if it had come from the cellar of a Dark wizard. “He was graceful,” he responded. “Strong, like a young tree. He made a speech that still stirs tears in my eyes when I think of it, about why his parents had done what they had.”

“And you heard the details of their crimes?” Cupressus asked, his nose delicately wrinkling. “I glanced over the newspaper articles, but did not pay them much attention.” Implicit in that statement was the one that only a cretin would read the Prophet, much less give credence to what it said.

“I did,” said Augustus. “One can see the way those crimes have shaped young Harry. He tends, for example, to hate compulsion and any attempt at controlling others’ wills, though he will restrain himself for the sake of others—as if he has turned the hatred that properly belongs to his parents' treatment of him on other wizards. And he takes a very poor opinion of feuds in families."

Cupressus's face flickered the slightest bit. Augustus hid his smile in the rim of his goblet. They had shared situations where they were matched, situations where Cupressus had the mastery, and ones like this, where Augustus held the higher ground. He liked the third kind best.

"Then he must have been upset about the rift between you and Tybalt," Cupressus murmured.

Augustus restrained his own scowl now with difficulty. He still remembered the day he had first heard of Tybalt's involvement with the Muggleborn wizard, and demanded, in a firecall, that Tybalt drop him at once, or consider himself as no longer heir of the Starrise family.

He'd received an owl the next day. Rather than an apologetic letter, it contained a copy of Tybalt and Smythe-Blyton's joining papers.

Augustus had altered his will that same afternoon. Since Pharos was also of his blood, and Tybalt hadn't been his magical heir, there had been no great barrier to doing so—except that Tybalt's stubbornness burned in the back of Augustus's mind like a hot coal.

"He was," Augustus said, recovering himself. "But he did make an attempt to reconcile us." There. Let him think how unlikely that is to happen between him and his obstinate bitch of a daughter. "And he understands the cause of the disagreement between us. He knows, for example, that Tybalt was in Gryffindor, while the rest of our family is traditionally Hufflepuff." He lowered his voice. "Meanwhile, Ignifer was raised and educated at your house alone, wasn't she, Cupressus?" He didn't need to say, aloud, that Cupressus bore the whole burden of not insuring his daughter wasn't Light through and through.

"She was," said Cupressus, his face gone smooth again. "And I should remind her of that, as she seems to have forgotten it herself.

Thank you for your time, Augustus.” He turned and melted into the crowd.

Augustus shook his head and finished his wine. He planned to retire early, after just a few more hours of watching the people circulating through the tent. Harry had said nothing unexpected in his speech, after all. And Augustus had made no progress on his own personal quest that day. The white staff had buzzed with such unhappiness he’d left it in his own tent. There was no telling whom Alba’s spirit might have meant to signal out in this mass of Dark wizards.

But tomorrow, he would bring the staff forth again. Perhaps it might sense one of her murderers, and then he could achieve vengeance for his twin at last.

Ignifer liked things to make sense. For example, the enmity between her father and herself, though encrusted with hatreds and insults and refusals to apologize on both sides, made sense at bottom, because it was a simple matter. She had Declared for the Dark after it saved her life. He had said that he would cast her out of the family and perform an infertility curse on her unless she changed her allegiance back. Ignifer had refused, her father had performed the outcasting and the curse, and that was that.

Honoriam Pemberley did not make sense. She knew that Ignifer didn’t like her much. She knew that Ignifer did not think illusions and glamours were funny. She knew that Ignifer had Declared Dark for a serious reason, not because it sounded like a good idea at the time, which seemed to be Honoriam’s whole reason for doing so. She knew that Ignifer was eleven years older than she was, and she knew that Ignifer had had no lovers, male or female, since her reversed Declaration; that had been in the gossip pages of the Rookwood, and Ignifer saw no reason to deny the truth. So Honoriam Pemberley flirting with her, fetching drinks for her, and trying to cheer her up made no sense at all.

“Go away,” Ignifer tried when Honoriam brought her a second glass of wine, because all her less direct means of dismissal, including haughty stares, had brought forth a flood of bright chatter instead.

“Why?” Honoria made a small phoenix perch on the edge of the cup and sing until Ignifer took it in embarrassment; people were starting to stare. The phoenix vanished as Honoria smiled up at her. She had done her red-gold hair up in some elaborate style that Ignifer didn’t recognize, and her blue eyes matched the shade of her robes, or at least one of their shades. She wore a glittering ton of jewelry, but Ignifer had no way of telling how much of it was real and how much an illusion. She seemed to have no idea how much of a spectacle she was making of herself. Or perhaps she did and enjoyed it, Ignifer thought. It would be like her. “I like you, and it’s not like you hate me or have anyone who would try to hex me if I pursue you.”

“It makes no sense,” said Ignifer patiently.

“Yes, it does,” said Honoria, her eyes reflecting honest surprise for a moment—unless that was a glamour, too. “You’re beautiful and intelligent and powerful and very stubborn—everything I like in a woman. Add to it that you’re fighting on the same side as I am, and I think it’s inevitable.”

Ignifer listed the reasons she’d thought of. Honoria listened to all of them, then shrugged, said, “Don’t care,” and made a small row of tap-dancing lions appear above her head, sticking their tongues out at Ignifer. Ignifer shook her head.

“Daughter.”

The voice spoke in Latin, and that alone would have made Ignifer know who it was, even without the tone. She stiffened and turned just her head to look over her shoulder. It was Cupressus, of course it was, but now Ignifer’s mother, Artemis, hovered anxiously at his side.

“Father,” Ignifer said, also in Latin. If he was going to stage a public confrontation like this, at least he’d had the grace to do it in a different language.

“I am sadly disappointed in you, daughter,” Cupressus chided her. “Why have you soiled this gathering with your presence? At least the other Dark wizards around you were misguided from birth; they knew no other way. But you—you knew better, you had the best raising, and still you chose the path of damnation. You should depart at once, Ignifer. The stars are ashamed to look down upon you.”

Ignifer tensed her shoulders. This was no worse than many other arguments they’d had. Yes, it was in public, which made it worse inevitably, but in content and tone it wasn’t new, and she thought that if she deserved damnation for anything, it was in letting the words go to her heart still.

She knew why they did. She’d been raised knowing her place: her father’s magical heir, and future leader of the most prominent Light pureblood family in Ireland, and daughter of a magnificent legacy. And since she’d destroyed it, she’d been scrambling to find another place. She had found one with Harry, but it would never give her the security, the confidence, the absolute poise, that her father’s did him.

And that confidence always made her wonder, a tiny niggling worry, about whether she’d been wrong after all, and should go back.

“Pardon me.”

Ignifer started. She had forgotten Honoria was there. The smaller witch worked her way around between Ignifer and Cupressus now, her smile fixed and glammers of roaring lions on her shoulders.

“You are an arrogant son of shit,” Honoria told Cupressus in flawless Latin. Ignifer stared at her. Cupressus and Artemis stared at her. Honoria didn’t appear to care. “Your veins flow with it, far more than mine, Muggle mother and all. I would check your family legacy, and make sure that one of your ancestors didn’t fuck in a cesspit along the way. That’s the only thing that could explain your behavior, unless you have daily meals of shit. I wouldn’t put it past you, blind as you are.” She arched an eyebrow, and Cupressus’s face became smeared with a glamour of feces, looking—and stinking—impressively like the real thing.

She extended a hand to Ignifer, and Ignifer accepted it and let Honoria lead her away in a daze. Honoria walked until they were next to a table full of food; then she turned and stared at Ignifer, eyes bright with concern.

“Are you all right?” she whispered in English.

Ignifer nodded. “I—thank you.”

“You’re welcome,” said Honoria, and brightened. “But I think I deserve a kiss for that, at least.”

Ignifer thought of the shit smearing her father’s face, and had to agree. She bent and lightly kissed Honoria, noting that her breath smelled of wine, and faintly of peppermint. When Honoria tried to deepen the kiss into a full-blown snog, however, Ignifer drew back with a headshake. “That was only worth one kiss,” she said. “You have to earn more.”

Honoria’s eyes lit with a passion that rivaled the glow she showed in battle. “I can do that. Do you have any siblings who listen to your father’s shit?”

“Zacharias! How nice to see you again. And who is your young lady?”

Hermione turned and dipped into a deep curtsy on seeing the witch who’d accosted her boyfriend, spreading her deep green robes around her. She knew it was the right gesture to make, because the woman was both old and in possession of a silver widow’s ring. Whether or not her family was distinguished, she deserved respect from a girl of Hermione’s age.

The witch smiled. Her eyes were brown and her hair blonde, but Hermione didn’t think she was Zacharias’s relation. He wouldn’t have been quite so haughty if he were presenting her with an aunt or cousin or great-aunt, she thought as he first bowed and then extended his hand along Hermione’s arm.

“Helena Deeping, this is my girlfriend, Hermione Granger. Hermione,” he added in a side-tone, “Mrs. Deeping is currently next in line to head the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures.”

Mrs. Deeping blushed and said, "Oh, Zacharias, you make it sound as if it's going to happen next month! It might not, you know. Or the Ministry might shuffle me somewhere else. Minister Scrimgeour does give those people who might head Departments under him a most uncomfortable level of scrutiny."

"I wish you success, Mrs. Deeping," Hermione murmured, peering at the woman from beneath lowered lashes. With luck, this would turn out to be her third surprised witch of the evening. "The Light ought to favor someone who keeps to the old customs."

The witch glanced at her. "And how do you know I keep to the old customs, my dear?"

Hermione nodded to the snowflake design around the wrists of her robes, melting into twined flowers on the bottom of the sleeve. "Because you honor the seasons, ma'am. Today is the day winter becomes spring, and you've worn robes that reflect that."

Mrs. Deeping's face flushed even more with pleasure. "Miss Granger," she said, "you're a credit to your young man. I'm ashamed to say that I don't recognize your family name."

Hermione flashed a sweet smile. She loved this part. "Oh, you wouldn't, Mrs. Deeping," she said. "I'm Muggleborn."

She savored the expression of stunned surprise on Helena Deeping's face for a long moment, and then turned and swept towards the far side of the tent on Zacharias's arm.

"There's more to being a pureblood than confounding other purebloods, you know," Zacharias murmured in her ear. Hermione heard the touch of breathlessness to his voice and knew he'd been fighting to keep his laughter under control. "Besides, most of them are so unintelligent—not worthy targets of your time, my love."

"By exploding their expectations, I'm helping them ascend to our standards," Hermione said. "It's a public service. Look, there's another one.” She nodded to a wizard in golden robes with an almost frighteningly deferential expression on his face.

“Hermione,” Zacharias sighed.

Hermione looked up at him and fluttered her eyelashes. “And it provides entertainment for you, too, love.”

Zacharias hesitated, then straightened himself with all the dignity due the Heir of Hufflepuff and the Smith family and took her to meet the wizard.

Hermione smiled for him. Really, this was gentle vengeance, and far better than drawing her wand and casting curses in all directions. She couldn’t count how many times she’d heard the word “Mudblood” since she’d been here, always spoken casually, always spoken with no sign that these wizards and witches actually knew anything about the people they were denigrating.

Hermione had spent enough time getting angry with Zacharias’s assumptions of pureblood superiority already. It was far better to get even, and show them how much better she was at their own games—and that a supposed Mudblood could learn anything, do anything, that they could.

“But it’s true,” said Thomas, wondering, as he usually did, why other people couldn’t see things that were perfectly obvious to him. This time was even stranger than usual, since he wouldn’t gain anything from telling a lie. “It’s called the Grand Unified Theory of Every Kind of Magic. Oh, some of the branches of hereditary magic are giving us a little bit of trouble, I grant you, but we’re finding exceptions in all of them, to prove that they’re not that hereditary after all, and the passage of magic is much more complicated than we ever guessed. For example, did you know that Parseltongue is only passed on from one parent in a hundred? It’s true. By tracking records of Parselmouths who had children, we found—“

“That’s all well and good,” interrupted the man Thomas was talking with. He couldn’t remember his surname, except that it was Raven-something. Thomas was far more interested in his ideas, which were in disagreement with all of Thomas's. "But to return to your main point. Do you really mean to tell me that there is no way of predicting when and where Muggleborns will be, er, born?"

"Of course not," said Thomas, with an airy wave of his hand. "But you aren't paying attention. We've learned that there really is no difference between a pureblood's and a Muggleborn's magic. All those old ideas about children of mixed marriages being less powerful than their parents are lies, and so are the ones that say it's Muggleborns coming into the wizarding world that result in the increased birth of Squibs. We—"

"That isn't true."

Thomas frowned. The man was stupid. How funny that he hadn't noticed before! "Yes, it is," he said. "We've studied it."

"Who's we?"

"Oh, an international group," said Thomas. "I met some of the members years ago and I've been exchanging notes with them since, and then of course I got to meet them personally when we removed our children from Durmstrang. Nasty business," he added, with a shrug of his shoulders. He remembered Rose telling him some of the stories about Bellatrix Lestrange, whose cruelty was not only repetitive but stupid, and for a moment he lost the thread of the conversation. Then he shook his head and came back to it. His children were rescued now, and everything had worked out all right. "We owe Harry a great deal for rescuing our families—"

"Then you really call him Harry," said Raven-missing-syllables, looking at him with increased attention. "I thought that was only a political stunt, for him to have abandoned his last name, and that you called him Lord Potter among yourselves."

"Why would we?" Thomas asked in bewilderment. Really, he is rather stupid. "Harry is his name."

Raven-whatever chuckled and leaned nearer to him. "You can tell me the truth, Mr. Rhangnara," he coaxed, his voice gentle. "I mean, we've all heard the stories, and they're good stories, but don't you think it's just a bit unbelievable that a boy who's not even out of school yet did all that? I've heard he has a friend at the Prophet, that Skeeter woman, who'll alter stories for him as it suits him. And, likewise, you can tell me what really happened at Durmstrang. It might help me make the decision on whether to join the alliance. A boy who disclaims his last name and speaks nonsense about wanting to help house elves isn't an attractive proposition, but if I knew that he had a circle of advisers around him, sensible adults, who know and speak the truth and are just letting him run on his rein right now to play out his wilder excesses—"

"You'll have to find one of them elsewhere, then," Thomas interrupted. Now he understood what was going on, and he was irritated. It was no wonder that Raven-rest-of-name was overly invested in the idea that there were fundamental differences between purebloods and Muggleborns, no matter what the evidence said. He was an idiot altogether. "Because Harry did rescue my children, and he is what he says, and the freeing of house elves is, at the very least, an interesting philosophical question that ought to be attended to with interest by anyone not utterly blinded by his own pride. Good night, sir."

Thomas turned and stormed off towards the nearest table of food, where he could see three of his children talking with some of the other young wizards in attendance. He huffed under his breath. Why were so many people having trouble accepting that Harry was vates? It wasn't a matter of picking a side and closing one's eyes. It was a matter of looking at the evidence and seeing what actually worked, what was actually true.

Then the crowd shifted, and he caught a glimpse of Harry talking to a centaur, and he smiled, his bad mood forgotten almost at once.

In the end, evidence and truth would win out, because they had to. And Thomas got to watch a real vates at work. He relaxed and walked forward, whistling, his native optimism restored. The ignorant couldn't be ignorant for long, surely, when truth shouted at them from every corner of the world.

And perhaps Harry and the centaur wouldn't mind if he listened in on their conversation, for research purposes. So far, most of the centaurs their research group had contacted had proven reluctant to let wizards interview them for information on their magic.

Millicent turned her head abruptly. She thought she'd just felt a familiar flare of magic at her shoulder, as if someone she knew was standing there. But no, though she'd been startled, what had startled her was someone passing drenched in an uncomfortable amount of perfume. Millicent winced, imagining what that would be like for the werewolves in the group, and started to face her food again. She was sitting down, because only the gauche would eat while walking around.

"Miss Bulstrode?"

Millicent looked up. Next to her was a boy she didn't recognize, standing slightly taller than she was only because of the chair. He bowed to her, as if he wanted to apologize for interrupting her meal. Millicent leaned back and studied him. He must be from Beauxbatons, she thought, because his English, though almost perfect, did have a slight French accent to it, and he looked as if he'd been in the sun far more often than Durmstrang would permit.

Millicent was sure that she would have remembered him if he attended Hogwarts. His eyes were piercing green, almost the color of Harry's, and he was her age.

"Yes?" she asked, since she realized the boy was patiently permitting her to look at him, and that meant he wasn't here for just a quick conversation.

"My name is Pierre Delacour." He gave her a slightly self-deprecating smile as her eyebrows rose. "Yes, my cousin Fleur attended the Triwizard Tournament at Hogwarts," he confirmed. "And my family is at this meeting partly because of Fleur's reports of Harry's power." He cocked his head like a curious bird. "But since Harry's speech, I have found myself more interested in you personally, Miss Bulstrode."

Millicent felt her lips curve in a smile. This sounded like the first stages of either an alliance or a marriage offer, and she was fully prepared to accept either one.

"I am flattered, Mr. Delacour," she said, standing. "Would you like to meet my parents, so that yours might talk with them?"

"It would be a delight," said Pierre gravely, and claimed her hand. "But, not just at the moment, no. My first business is with you, Miss Bulstrode."

A marriage offer, then. Millicent wondered how many others would be started or even concluded tonight, and whether Harry knew what purpose the alliance meeting would serve. Probably. It was not often that this many European wizards and witches came together, and they would take chances to conduct negotiations that might otherwise happen only in small festivities.

"I'm flattered, Mr. Delacour," she said, and offered him her arm. From one corner of her eye, she caught her father's delighted grin. "Shall we walk?"

"Look at him," Regulus whispered into Snape's ear, with a slight chuckle. "If I was choosing my heir on the basis of political acumen, I could hardly do better."

Snape had to admit that Harry was steering himself well through the crowd. He spoke to most of the people who came up to talk to him, his face friendly and open enough. In about half the conversations, it wound up closing, and he shook his head gravely and stepped away. It needed nothing more than that to let his listeners know that he didn't find their terms, whatever they were, acceptable.

Snape did think that the unassuming posture Harry had chosen here, eschewing his own tent and colors, and even formal robes—he wore his Hogwarts ones—went a little too far. And it was contradicted by the fact that he'd stood up in front of them all and made a speech, with a dragon blazing at his side and his allies gathered around him and Lupin practically declaring war on the Ministry.

And then the public kiss with Draco...

Snape frowned and shook his head. It was not that he disapproved of Draco's courting ritual—it would take both of them being different people before Snape would think Harry should marry or join with someone else—but it also struck against the humility that Harry affected, and made it seem more of an affectation. He could say what he liked about being a Dark pureblood with a Muggleborn mother. More of his gestures, trappings, and actions spoke "Dark pureblood" than the other way around.

He is a Lord, in the eyes of most of the people here. Far be it from me to press the title or the Declaration on him, but he should realize that he seems to be making himself into a Lord even without either.

"You're too quiet tonight, Severus," said Regulus, dragging him out of his thoughts. "You should dance."

Snape gave him a sharp look and shifted his right leg, which was sore enough from the short walk from the seats to the tent. "And how would you suggest that I do that, Black?" he asked. "Perhaps you intend for me to set a new fashion for unspooling one's flesh on the dance floor?"

Regulus laughed at him. Snape reluctantly smirked. Regulus had always been able to pull him into amusement, as regularly and inexplicably as Sirius Black could infuriate him.

"Your leg wouldn't come undone," said Regulus. "Madam Pomfrey fixed it up too well. Come on!" He grabbed Snape's left arm, pointedly resting one hand on the concealed Dark Mark, and tugged him off his seat. A wave of his wand, held in his other hand, and music began to play from nowhere, a slow, sedate piece that would allow Snape to dance, if he really wished to, without hurting his leg.

Snape, of course, scowled and refused to at first. Regulus capered by himself, and attracted attention, and looked so utterly ridiculous that Snape finally began, reluctantly, to move, if only to save his friend from the embarrassment of dancing alone.

“There,” said Regulus. “I knew you had it in you! You certainly dance enough in your mind, making up enough clever insults for any ten wizards.”

“You forget which one of us dances better, my friend,” Snape murmured, and kept his eyes fixed on Regulus’s face.

Regulus’s expression faltered for just a moment, and he jerked his head up, his nostrils flaring. Then he said, “Well, but some dances are just unpleasant to recall, Severus. Clumsy partners, stepping on one’s feet, reversing direction while the music’s still playing and forgetting what one does in the formal waltzes. And Voldemort had a particular predilection for clumsy partners, don’t you think?”

“I don’t know,” said Snape thoughtfully, as he moved in a slow circle. “He had me. And Peter. And Lucius. And Hawthorn. And you,” he added.

“Ah,” said Regulus, voice pitched low. “I’ll grant you your own mastery. And Lucius, his too. I think he was responsible for some of the deaths you believed Evan orchestrated. And none of us even suspected that Peter was a devotee to the Light, and not just jealous of my brother and his friends. And Hawthorn, well, the way she maneuvered to make sure her husband wouldn’t have to serve her Lord was wonderful.” Regulus spread his arms and adopted a big, goofy grin. “But me? Severus, I couldn’t even maneuver Harry into becoming my heir. How am I supposed to have been a good enough intriguer to weave elaborate plots among the Death Eaters?”

“And yet, here Harry is, your heir,” said Snape. “And here you are, alive.”

“After having spent fourteen years as a wooden dog,” said Regulus. “Poor Severus, if that’s your definition of triumph.”

“We take our victories where we can find them,” said Snape. “And we make out own defeats, half the time. I still allow a prank that occurred in my sixth year to bother me.” A month ago, he could not have said that. But then, a month ago, he could not have seen himself considering suicide for any other reason than to escape his own pain.

“And you still act as if you carry a secret Harry would find it too hard to forgive you for.”

Regulus tossed his head, a nervous gesture, like a half-bridled horse. His gray eyes shone with a light Snape remembered well. “I told him about the trapped Mark, Severus.”

“Not that. What you kept from all of us for a year, Regulus. Or was it two? How early did you know what the Dark Lord tried to kill you for?”

Regulus’s hands clenched and opened. “Long enough to do certain things because of it—things I’m ashamed of now.”

“Things that Harry could forgive you for,” said Snape. “If you could overcome your own shame.”

“It’s not that easy—“

“It wasn’t for your brother, either,” Snape said, and stamped with his left foot when the music called for it. “Voldemort used his own shame to strangle him, and keep him from telling anyone of it until it was too late.”

“I’m very sure that Voldemort’s not possessing me,” said Regulus, and tried to recover with another grin. “He’d object to some of what I put my body through.”

“Not as much as Harry would object to your death,” Snape said, and waited.

It was the end of the dance, in more ways than one. Regulus drew back with a shake of his head, and whispered, “And what if my shames and my crimes are multiple, Severus?” and turned back to his seat.

Snape went to watch Harry’s back. He’d been mingling with the crowd unguarded for long enough now. And Regulus needed time to think and realize that people could forgive him, even for things that he himself considered unforgivable.

Regulus had once been the only person Snape considered worthy of his time among the Death Eaters. Then he had been more than that, and deeper. He had come back changed, but unchanged in what was at once his most endearing and his most irritating trait: his conviction that he needed to do things himself, because that was the only way he could measure up to the standards of the people around him.

Harry grimaced and nodded. "Yes. That was a mistake, and I shouldn't have allowed it." He glanced ruefully at the half-empty tables of food, and the more-than-half-empty table of wine and goblets. "I'm going to take care of that in the future."

"Good," said Magorian, with a grave scrape of his hoof. "We did wonder, vates, whether you noticed the irony in allowing house elves to provide food for you and your allies."

Harry knew he was blushing, but he grinned at the centaur. "That's one thing centaurs will do that almost no wizards will: keep me honest."

"It is our honor, vates."

Magorian and the other centaurs took their leave then; Harry suspected it came at least partly from people starting to drift up to them, having overcome their fear, and ask them impertinent questions. He watched them thunder away, and returned Magorian's backwards-glancing salute with a sharp nod. Then he took a deep breath to try and still his nervous excitement. Magorian had given him, in amongst all the other things they'd talked about, two pieces of extremely good news: Firenze's mission to the giants was going well, the last his friends had heard of it.

And the centaurs were ready to join in the trap Harry intended to lure Voldemort into on Midsummer.

Harry saw the other wizards, frustrated by the centaurs' sudden departure, turn towards him. He pasted a smile on his face. He could control his expression when he felt no emotion stronger than frustration. He was tired—it was well after nine o'clock now, and he hadn't had anything to eat, what with the constant talking. But he had secured several new people to the alliance, and dismissed many others, and he had the chance to do more. Frustration could wait.

Besides, he wasn't sure he should eat the food when house elves had provided it. It was time to start paying closer attention to his morals.

"Mr.—I mean, sorry, Harry?"

Harry smiled at the first young wizard who'd forced his way forward. He was drenched in perfume, as if he feared to offend with the least scent of sweat. Something about his movements was familiar, but Harry didn't know what it was. From his bright blue eyes, he could be related to a quarter of the pureblood families here. Harry had probably met and talked with his relatives already.

"Yes?" he asked. "I'm sorry, I didn't catch your name."

The young man bobbed nervously. "I know. Sorry. My name's Alan Morningturn. I just wanted to tell you that I'd—I mean, if you're serious, I don't know if you were—I'd like to free my house elves."

Harry blinked. "You are? You would?" That was the first such offer all evening, and he could feel his heartbeat speeding up in anticipation and the miasma of weariness and frustration falling away. "That would be wonderful. I am serious. Do you have a formal contract to give me permission to free the house elves?" Though the wizard's word was probably enough, he'd like something written. That way, if Alan was offering a gift he couldn't deliver on, like house elves who belonged to a relative, Harry could make sure to refuse.

"Yes. Right here." Alan's face was pink with excitement as he fumbled in his robe pocket. "Oh, Merlin, this is so exciting, thank you, thank you, thank you—"

Harry wasn't sure afterwards what warned him. Perhaps it was as slight as the indentation of Alan's robe pocket around something that definitely wasn't a sheaf of parchment. Perhaps the boy's practiced nervous expression faltered at the last moment. Or perhaps he remembered, suddenly, where he'd seen those familiar gestures before.

He was on the ground before Alan pointed his wand and screamed, "Avada Kedavra!"

Harry rolled safely away from the jet of green light, which had been aimed so directly at him that it struck the earth instead of flying over his head, and he didn't have to worry about anyone else. In a moment, he was on his feet, his hand snapping out and drawing tight. In his mind, he chanted, Expelliarmus. Petrificus Totalus.

Alan's wand flew out of his hand, his body went rigid, and he fell to the ground, his eyes rolling back in his head. Harry took a deep breath and scrambled to one knee, whispering, "Finite Incantatem."

But the glamour, if glamour it was, remained on Alan's face. Harry murmured a charm to turn his robe pockets inside out, and found no flask of Polyjuice Potion. He frowned at Alan, wondering who he was, and how he could have managed a spell that Harry's magic wouldn't expose.

One suspicion he could allay, however. At his gesture, Alan's left robe sleeve rose. Harry let out a harsh breath at the sight of the Dark Mark gleaming on his flesh.

"Harry!"

Draco's arms were around him in the next moment. Harry reached back to pat him absently on the shoulder, staring still at Alan, trying to figure out his deception. Alan stared back, his frozen eyes wild with rage and fear.

That expression was familiar to Harry, at least. He had to transport it into another face and into eyes that weren't that shade of blue before he could make the connection, though.

And in the end, it was Snape, limping up to them just then, who spoke the name aloud. "Montague!" he barked, the name of the one Slytherin Death Eater, who had vanished from Hogwarts on the same night as Rovenan had died.

Harry winced as he saw the expression in "Alan's" eyes change. "What's been done to him, sir?" he asked, raising his voice and stepping gently away from Draco. He appreciated the support, but he needed to stand upright. Otherwise, rumors that Montague had managed to wound him might circulate.

"A permanent change to his face and voice," Snape murmured, leaning forward. "Very powerful and Dark magic. It can't be reversed, so it's rarely used. But the Dark Lord did force such a change on a few of his followers in the First War." He glanced at Harry, ignoring the wake of shrieks and gasps and horrified gestures spreading behind them. "I recognize him as Montague, but we'll need to use Veritaserum on him to be sure."

Harry hesitated. Technically, only the Ministry had the legal authority to use Veritaserum. And while he could be said to be the authority in this gathering, since he was both its host and the most powerful wizard, he wasn't entirely sure what would happen if word of this got back to Scrimgeour.

Even more, though, he did not dare to look afraid. He doubted that Montague would confess to his crime. He could claim that he was Alan Morningturn to anyone who asked, and here by Harry's own invitation. And if he said that Voldemort had compelled him to do this, then Harry would have to accept it, since he had accepted that the victims of Dumbledore's spell were compelled to horrible crimes against him. They could use Legilimency, but that was even more invasive, definitely illegal, and not something that Harry wanted to reveal he, Snape, or Charles could do.

He nodded, once. He would make the decision, and if consequences followed it, then he would deal with them. "Veritaserum it is," he said.

Snape pulled a vial of the clear liquid from his pocket, uncapped it, and moved his fingers towards Montague's face. Harry relaxed the Body-Bind just enough for Montague's jaw to open and Snape to place the three drops on his tongue. Montague gave a gagging sound.

Snape, his face full of quiet, contained rage, massaged his throat to make sure he swallowed.

“What is your full name?” Harry asked, as the test question.

“William Richard Montague,” said Montague, his voice flat and his eyes glazed.

Harry nodded. He had expected this, he told himself. There was no reason to feel as if a cold wind were blowing down his spine, as if it had really taken him by surprise that Montague had tried to assassinate him. He had known the other boy was a Death Eater.

“What was your purpose in coming here today?” he asked.

This time, Montague fought to hold the answer back, but it emerged anyway. “To kill you if I could,” he said. “Our Lord is so weak that I wanted vengeance.”

“So you didn’t come at Voldemort’s command?”

“No,” Montague grunted, biting his own tongue as he struggled. “I’m supposed to be out recruiting other Death Eaters. Most of the Death Eaters are.”

Harry smiled. He knew it wasn’t a pleasant smile. “I suspect we’ll treat you a damn sight better than Voldemort will for trying this and failing,” he muttered. “Was your plan really just to come up and try the Killing Curse on me?”

“Yes,” said Montague, his eyes on the ground now. Harry didn’t think he was unable to meet his victim’s gaze. It was Snape’s that seemed to disturb him. “I thought if I could get close enough, I had at least a chance. And there’s no saying that you can resist the Killing Curse a second time.” He did glare at Harry then, as if challenging him to say that he could.

Harry shrugged, and looked at Snape. “Can you think of other questions to ask him before I turn him over to the Ministry?”

“Are there any other Death Eaters here today?” Snape’s voice was low and merciless.

Montague sneered, looking, for no reason Harry could fathom, triumphant. “Yes.”

Harry understood a moment later. Of course, there were other Death Eaters here today, or those who had once been Death Eaters: Peter, Regulus, Lucius, Adalrico, Hawthorn, and Snape.

But Snape swung around, drawing his wand as he moved, using his bad leg as a pivot. His voice was equally low and merciless as he cast the spell, and Harry could feel his magic surging up behind the incantation, to insure it touched everyone in sight. “Abscindo manulaes laevaes!”

Every robe in sight lost its left sleeve. Harry could hear cries of outrage, and sighed. Of course, some of his new allies, touchy already, would consider this the ultimate insult, to be suspected of following Voldemort when Harry had invited them to a peaceful gathering and made them swear an oath not to use magic except in self-defense.

Harry could see people looking at their neighbors’ bare left arms as if expecting a revelation. He shook his head when long moments passed and there was no reaction more extreme than some of their watchers flinching at the sight of Snape’s bared Dark Mark. “I think we should—”

A hoarse cry sounded abruptly behind them. Harry whipped around, and saw Mortimer Belville dragging someone forward. He cast the other wizard on the ground in front of Harry with a triumphant shout that was almost a bark.

The man was Edward Burke, and he had one hand on his left arm, trying to cover something up. Harry narrowed his eyes when he saw the curve of the black snake and skull sticking out from under his fingers, and his heart gave a single, harsh jump.

"Did you betray us to Voldemort during the Woodhouse battle?" he whispered.

"You know nothing," Burke hissed, his eyes wild. He tried to back up, and failed as Belville's wand poked him in the back. The next moment, he'd whirled around and snapped at Belville, "Yes, I was a traitor, if you want to call it that, and he helped me!"

Harry looked at Belville. He raised one eyebrow and turned his left arm towards Harry, showing him the unmarked flesh.

"You did!" spat Burke. "You did, you bastard! You told me that you were going to be Marked!"

Belville gave a short, helpless laugh and shook his head. "I was joking, Burke. I thought we were having a drinking and complaining session about Potter, back when he was still Potter, yes? And here I find out that you took me seriously." He clasped one hand to his face. "My apologies, Harry," he added, from between his fingers. "I never thought he was serious, or I would have suggested that you look for the Mark on his arm sooner."

Burke uttered a short, wordless scream and tried to climb from the ground to attack him, but Snape's wand flicked, and he was still. In a Body-Bind, Harry thought, until he squinted, and saw Burke twitching with small, swift jolts of pain traveling through him.

"Sir!" he hissed at his guardian.

Snape converted the spell to an ordinary Body-Bind without a word, but the expression on his face was fixed, and he never took his eyes off Burke. Harry sighed and stared at his ally for a moment. He could guess why the old wizard had done this, but it would be good to have confirmation.

"Why?" he asked, and gestured for Snape to relax the spell on his jaw.

Burke was more than anxious to tell him, it seemed, perhaps because his cover had been blown and this was the only chance to air his grievances he would ever have. "Because you're tainting the Black bloodline," he said, staring at Harry as if he could bore holes in him with his eyes. "Because you're going to bring Mudbloods into our world and this alliance, and you act as if you don't understand what a—a blasphemy that is! Because you just had to resurrect the Black heir, and then become his heir! Because you're going to corrupt us and tear us, rend us and shred us, and cause our deaths at the hands of the Muggles!" His hands twitched as if he could break the Body-Bind and grope at the air. "At least His Lordship has the right idea about keeping our worlds separate! I bear his Mark with pride, and he was good enough to accept me, even though two heirs of my bloodline betrayed him and should have tainted it in his eyes!"

Harry concealed a sigh. Perhaps he should have thought twice about becoming Black heir, but that wouldn't have stopped him from bringing Regulus back, and he had had no idea that Burke felt this deeply about Harry's becoming heir. "And that was really all of it?" he asked softly.

"I thought I'd give you a chance to prove that you respected me," said Burke. He spoke so violently that spit flew with his words, and Belville moved a step away to stop the saliva from getting on his robes, face twisting in disgust. "I made contributions to the meetings. But you ignored them, and you never looked at me for more than a few seconds. You overlooked me, in your eagerness to let your pet Mudbloods and werewolves and Light wizards have a say. I refused the Dark Mark, at first. I didn't tell my Lord everything. I wanted to keep my options open. It was a test. And you proved that you didn't care. You granted my relatives more respect than you ever granted me."

Harry controlled his breathing with an effort. Burke's confession opened its own set of problems to him. He could feel eyes boring into him, resting on him. And no matter what he did, someone would account it the wrong decision.

If he drained Burke of his magic, it would frighten some of the people here. If he killed him, it would frighten them even more badly, and he could wind up being charged with murder by the Ministry. Dosing Montague with Veritaserum was pushing as it was. If he simply turned Montague and Burke over to the Ministry, then some people would think he was too lenient.

So, since he could not please everyone, he might as well please himself.

“Mr. Rhangnara,” he called, raising his voice.

Thomas hurried through the crowd a moment later, his face flushed with something that might have been excitement. He was such an optimist that Harry could see him treating this as an opportunity for observing traitors as a sub-species of wizards. “Yes, Harry?” he asked breathlessly.

“Would your wife be willing to take charge of Montague and Burke?” Harry asked. Priscilla Burke wasn’t here; since she was the Head Auror, attending this meeting might have sent the signal to Scrimgeour that she had greater allegiance to Harry than to him. But she had proved useful after the Woodhouse battle, taking charge of the captured Death Eaters after Harry and his allies had left. She might prove useful now.

Thomas beamed. “She would like nothing better. I’ll Apparate with them to the Ministry, if you’d like.”

Harry nodded. “I’ll give you their wands.” A flick of his hand sealed Montague’s and Burke’s jaws again. “If they need additional proof of their crimes—though the Dark Marks should be enough, really—then I can provide that.”

“It sounds like enough to start with,” said Thomas, and smiled at the two Death Eaters. It wasn’t a pleasant smile. Harry shook his head as Thomas floated the bound Burke into the air. He wasn’t going to be as easy with them as Harry had thought. Well, he had saved the man’s children from Durmstrang. Perhaps he was less sympathetic to Harry’s enemies as a consequence.

He turned back to the people staring at him, some of them clutching at their ruined robes. Belville was examining his missing left sleeve with a mournful air.

"I use justice when I can," he said, raising his voice again. "I won't kill them, because they haven't hurt me, though not for lack of trying." His mind flashed back to Fergus Opalline, who had died in the attack on Woodhouse, and he wondered if Paton would claim justice on Burke for that. There was no direct proof that Burke's information had led to Fergus's death yet, though. "I do try to offer justice, and not vengeance, to my enemies. I try not to act hastily." He took a deep breath and met pair after pair of eyes. "That doesn't mean I won't strike quickly if you battle me, or come after someone under my protection."

Reluctantly, he dropped the barriers on his magic for the first time. Most people here would have been able to feel that he was powerful, but not how much; Harry had been holding back so as not to intimidate them into allying with him. But now, it was necessary to show strength, so he would counter any unfortunate perceptions that mercy was weakness.

The chatter went silent as waves of magic washed through the tent. Harry blinked as he saw the walls of the tent briefly start to lose their form, and stabilized them. Then he shook his head when he saw how many of the watching eyes had gone wide.

"I don't enjoy having to do that," he said quietly, and raised his barriers, and went off to be by himself for a while, and think. Draco spoke his name quietly. The last thing he wanted to do was startle a jumpy Lord-level wizard who was brooding on what he would consider his latest failure.

"Harry?"

Harry turned his head and nodded, which Draco took as permission to approach more closely. He sat down next to Harry, who'd taken a seat on the stone steps of the stage and tilted his head back to watch the slender sliver of moon rise among the stars. It was a wonderfully clear night, though still cold enough to require warming charms. Draco could see lights coming from Lumos spells cast inside the tent, and the tent's walls themselves, which glowed softly where golden streaks marked the deep green cloth. A softer radiance seemed to shine from inside the Antipodean Opaleye, who was curled, a glowing diamond heap, not far from the stage.

“Why did you leave?” Draco asked at last, even though he thought he knew. At least it would get Harry talking. He’d sat for ten minutes in silence already, and it was getting on Draco’s nerves.

Harry shrugged. “Thinking on what I could have done differently,” he said. “I’m not good company when I’m like that. And, well, all anyone would have wanted to talk about were Burke and Montague. I didn’t want to discuss them.”

Draco snorted. I know why he thinks like this, but honestly, it’s ridiculous. “Of course they would want to talk about it, Harry! One of them just tried to kill you, and the other admitted to being a traitor to your cause.”

Harry shrugged again. Draco stifled the impulse to hit him, or to argue that Harry should have killed Burke and Montague instead of letting them go to the Ministry. There were people here who would be horrified that Harry had killed in cold blood, and some of them might be wizards Harry would need in the future. And Harry wasn’t the kind of person to respond to lethal force with lethal force, more was the pity, or he could have slain Montague in the moments after he cast the Killing Curse—Draco would have done that—and then they could have searched his body and found the Dark Mark. Draco supposed the information they’d acquired from him was valuable, but he’d be dead.

And Burke would still be hidden.

Draco stifled a sigh this time. Perhaps there wasn’t an answer for that, after all.

“Well,” he said, forcing lightness into his voice. “I didn’t come to talk about them.”

Some of the tension melted from Harry’s shoulders. “About what, then?”

Draco snorted. "Oh, you know very well, Harry," he said. "You accepted the courting ritual in public today. You kissed me in public. You acted as though we were acknowledged partners already, which I didn't have any idea you were thinking about." He felt the exhilaration that had gripped his heart like claws then, along with the exasperation. He would have enjoyed a moment like this in private beforehand. Harry could have told him what he planned, and Draco would have still played the part of stunned and thrilled boyfriend to perfection. "Why?"

Harry turned to face him. "Because I did want other people to see that you're important to me, Draco," he said. "Because I want anyone who thinks to offer me marriage or joining to see that I'm already claimed." Draco was fairly sure he would have gibbered if he opened his mouth then, so he kept it shut. "Because, just maybe," Harry added, a faint smile playing around the corners of his lips, "you looked so fetching in your dark blue robes that I couldn't resist."

"Prat," said Draco, but without much heat. "You planned that."

Harry nodded.

"But it wasn't just a political stunt?" Draco pursued. "You do mean to accept my courting when it starts on Walpurgis Night?"

Harry blinked, then hissed, "Idiot! Would I do something like that if I didn't mean it? You know me better than that!" He shoved Draco's shoulder, hard enough that Draco could tell there was genuine anger behind the motion.

Draco reached out and caught both his hand and his left wrist. "That was all I wanted to know," he murmured. "I did think that, Harry, but when you avoided me all afternoon—"

"I did not avoid you all afternoon! Other people got in my way all evening and wanted to talk about other things—"

"But now we're alone," Draco said, pitching his voice deliberately low, "and other people aren't here to talk about other things. So, Harry."

He leaned closer. "When joined partners and marriage partners are acknowledged, they're perfectly free to touch each other, you know, even when the ritual isn't complete yet."

Harry flushed. Draco marveled that he could have such courage in front of a crowd and not now. Of course, there, Draco thought, he's conscious of dozens of different pairs of eyes dividing consideration of him with other people. Here, I'm the only one focusing on him, and he does seem to have a problem with that.

Draco didn't intend to let that deter him, though, not when Harry hadn't let other people deter him from the kiss in public today. He leaned nearer still, lifted a hand to slip it behind Harry's neck, and brought him closer.

Harry initiated the kiss with an awkward lunge, as if to prove that he wasn't afraid, but Draco was the first to open his mouth. Harry made a soft sound in the back of his throat, startled. He was relaxed enough to yield, however, and Draco gently pressed him backward onto the step they sat on, pooling Harry's robes beneath him. Harry was far enough gone that he didn't seem to notice Draco removing his robes, but he definitely noticed when Draco slid a hand beneath his shirt. Draco sat up and looked down at him. Harry, his breath rushing in a mixture of panic and pleasure, held his eyes.

"Well?" Draco whispered.

Harry swallowed. "Go ahead," he said, and lifted his head and opened his mouth in invitation for another kiss.

Draco obliged, and obliged himself, at least, by unbuttoning Harry's shirt. Harry was flushed all down his chest, too, making his skin an odd color in the yellow-green light of the Lumos charm from Draco's wand. Draco moved his mouth gently from Harry's mouth to his neck, and then down towards his chest.

Harry was gasping, and then he seemed to decide this wasn't fair, and murmured a charm Draco couldn't make out. In an instant, his own dark blue robes were folded neatly beside them, and then Harry was unbuttoning his shirt with fingers and magic made clumsy by haste and, Draco thought, looking into his clouded eyes again, by arousal.

Draco lay down gently beside Harry, and closed his eyes as Harry skated nervous fingers over his chest, and then leaned forward and placed something that was half-kiss, half-bite on his collarbone. Draco groaned, and had the thought, only relevant in another time and place, that his father would be mortified to hear that sound coming from a Malfoy. His impatience danced and strained at its leash, and he wanted to roll on top of Harry, uncomfortable as that might be with both of them on a stone step. Merlin, he felt so good, and the cold air had vanished, they might have been bathed in sunlight, and he reached for Harry again—

Harry shuddered, and gasped, and then gave a sharp cry that woke Draco from his daze at once, because that was a cry of fear, not of pleasure. “Harry?” he asked. He was talking to Harry’s shoulder, though, because he’d rolled away.

“I’m all right,” Harry whispered into his hand. “Really. Just—a little too far, that’s all.” His voice was shaky, but it gained steadiness quickly. He rolled over again and smiled at Draco. “I can see why you have a hard time waiting,” he murmured. “And yes, I’ll accept the courting ritual on Walpurgis Night, and—and everything that comes with it.” He lifted his chin as if daring his mother to appear out of the night and tell him that no, he couldn’t have this.

Draco’s body boiled and churned with impatience and pleasure, and he wished that Lily Potter was there, too, so he could kill her for having trained Harry the way she had. But they had come further this time before Harry felt too good to continue. He’d have what he wanted, they’d have what they wanted, sooner or later.

He was about to say something like that when a strange noise erupted from beside him. He raised his eyebrows. “What’s that?”

“Um,” said Harry. “While I was talking to other people about other things, I might possibly have forgotten to eat anything.” His stomach rumbled again, to confirm this.

Draco was relieved to have an excuse to claim Harry was a prat, an absolute idiot, and needed a minder almost as much as he needed a boyfriend, while they both put on their shirts and their robes again. It slid him past the moment when he had the instinct to just watch Harry, and his flushed cheeks, and his hair which was sticking in several directions, and grin like a fool.

I'm not a fool, I'm a Malfoy. But I think I can be excused, just this once. Harry is going to join with me, and share a bed with me. The second sooner than the first, in fact. That bit of advice about waiting until the joining ritual is complete is sheer and utter nonsense, and Malfoys don't need to listen to it.

Chapter Seventy-Three: The Teeth of the Past

Harry wasn't surprised to wake the next morning and find half the tents dismantled. Enough wizards and witches had spoken to him yesterday as should leave them in no doubt of his politics. Some were still lingering in hopes they could change their minds or his, but most of the hopeless cases were gone now.

That still left almost three hundred people in the valley, though. Harry shook his head, smiling. He wondered how many of them actually meant to swear an alliance with him, and how many were hoping they could drag him into a compromise of some kind.

"Harry! You shouldn't be out here alone!"

Harry turned, startled, and then laughed as he saw his brother emerging, hair mussed with sleep, from his golden-white tent, which Harry was passing on his way towards the Malfoy one. "Connor! I don't think anyone else is going to attack me, not after the way I handled Montague."

Connor tried to respond, but wound up yawning. "Wait here," he said, ducking into the tent again. "I'll get you an escort. Fred and George are already awake."

Harry rolled his eyes at the thought of actually taking two Weasleys to breakfast with the Malfoys, but Connor was insistent, and Fred and George would only follow if Harry didn't walk beside them. Harry had no desire to have the twins and their inventions chasing him, perhaps calling his name in various embarrassing ways. An escort would work.

Fred and George tumbled out a few moments later, yawning so widely that Harry started to think Connor's idea of them being awake was exaggerated. But they recovered in a moment, and focused on him with identical grins that reminded Harry of the way cats looked at mice—if cats baited mice with the smell of cheese and sent them back to lure out the rest of the nest.

"Where are we going to have breakfast, O Great and Grand Lord of Light and Dark?" the one Harry thought was George asked.

Harry sighed. "With the Malfoys. But you don't have to stay with me. You can just take me to the tent, and—"

"Oh, no," said the other twin, probably Fred. "After all, we're the brothers of the best friend of your brother, and Draco's your consort now." The other twin sniggered. "That makes the Malfoys practically our in-laws," Fred finished innocently, and Harry choked.

"Please don't mention that in front of them," he begged when he'd recovered his breath.

"We won't," George agreed. "We'll save it—"

"For the joining," said Fred, looking delighted. "Then we can photograph them as they—"

"Choke on the cake," George finished, nodding emphatically. "Can you imagine it, Fred?" The twins exchanged dreamy smiles.

Harry bit down on the instinct to protest. The sooner this started, the sooner it would be over with. "Come on, then," he said in resignation, and led the way towards the Malfoy tent. It was a beautiful morning, the sun blazing off the dew that coated the grass and mud, but he no longer took as much cheer in that as he had a few moments ago. Lucius Malfoy had always disliked Weasleys.

It had to do with their pure blood and their refusal to have any standards. It had to do with personal insults that Arthur Weasley had offered him. It had to do with a feud that extended backwards between their two families into decades where Weasleys had certainly committed crimes and Malfoys might, just might, have retaliated with the good taste and breeding they had always possessed.

And now Harry had brought two Weasleys to breakfast.

Lucius eyed them warily as he sipped his tea. The two boys were lanky as ropes, and exactly identical, and even though they had done nothing so far but grin, Draco and Harry were both flinching as if they expected more every moment. Narcissa had taken one look at the twins and absented herself from breakfast, claiming that she had a headache which only walking about in mud would cure. Lucius had offered to escort her, but had been reminded that the owner of the tent should remain to offer hospitality to his guests. Implicit in Narcissa's reminder was the one that they would probably lose the tent if they left two Weasleys alone in it with only Harry and Draco for company.

Lucius sneered. Probably return to find it Transfigured into a pile of Galleons. Merlin knows the Weasleys need the money.

"Mr. Malfoy."

Now one of them was addressing him. Lucius tightened his grip on his teacup and wished he could pretend to be oblivious, as if he read the Daily Prophet for his own edification. But when the same voice repeated his name, he concealed a sigh and lowered the teacup to the table. He had altered the table's composition from stone to wood when he saw the visitors. There was no reason to treat the Weasleys with a higher standard than they were accustomed to.

"Yes?" he snapped at the twin. The boy grinned at him. There really didn't seem to be much of Arthur in him, Lucius had to admit, but he had red hair, and freckles, and the Weasley air of looking at the world as if it were an enormous gift to be unwrapped, instead of a maze to be understood and walked through. That was enough.

"Allow me to offer you our congratulations on the joining of your son and Harry," said the boy pompously. "We have a number of products that you might be interested in—"

"Oh, Merlin, George, not here," Lucius heard Harry say, with the smallest of groans in his voice.

Lucius felt his muscles grow tight, to the point of snapping. He knew his voice had dropped onto a glacial level when he said, "I beg your pardon?" and felt the table shiver with the force of his leashed magic.

“A number of products to make the eventual joining more poetic,” the Weasley said, and gave him another of those idiotic grins. “We have a prototype here. Fred?” He nodded to his brother, while Lucius was meditating on what sort of pureblood family would give their children such prosaic names, and the other pulled a small, silk-wrapped package from his robe pocket.

“Imagine,” said the other twin, in a hushed voice, “this beauty proclaiming the joining ritual to all and sundry, when you decide to have it!” Then he whipped the silk off, and tapped the object.

Lucius started hard at it. It appeared to be a green box ornamented with golden curlicues—garish, of course, the way he would expect of something the Weasleys thought a treasure, but otherwise ordinary. Harry and Draco were both edging away from it as if the boy held a snake, however.

No, Lucius thought, as if the boy held a piece of the Dark Lord. Harry would not fear any snake, no matter how venomous, and Lucius could have spoken to one as well.

“Please do the honors, Mr. Malfoy,” said the Weasley, and extended the box towards him with a little bow.

Harry hissed, “Fred, no!” and shook his head at Lucius. Fred turned a wounded, innocent look on Harry.

“Now, Harry, I never believed those rumors about the Malfoys being a pack of slimy cowards,” he said. “Your consort does a good enough job of protecting you in school. I think Mr. Malfoy deserves a chance to show that he’s just as brave as his son.”

Lucius knew there was no way he would get out of this without embarrassing himself. At least, if he accepted the box, it would only be embarrassment that they were forcing upon him. If he walked away, then he would be committing the sin of abandoning guests in his tent without just cause to dismiss them. With a smile that hid how tightly his teeth were clenched, he reached out and opened the box.

A puff of colored light and smoke rose into his face. Lucius blinked, and then looked around. He could see no obvious effect of the box. Then he caught sight of Draco staring at him in horror, and looked down at himself.

His robes were a brilliant, garish green, like a Gryffindor maniac's idea of what the Slytherin colors should be. Red lettering marched along it, making him look like a bloody Christmas tree. The lettering spelled out Happy joining, Harry and Draco! and sometimes smoked and sometimes steamed, to draw further attention to itself. The robes now had pink, gleaming lights fastened at the cuff, and they blinked and beeped happily, now and then imitating the sound of faint cheers.

Even through his fury, Lucius had to admire the amount of magical skill that must have gone into developing this trick. It wouldn't have been easy to fold so many spells into such a small container, much less insure they interacted without influencing each other into unfortunate effects, or activated when the box opened and not before. But that was through his fury.

He looked up in time to catch the flash of a camera. Then the Weasleys were out through the entrance of the tent, laughing all the way, and Harry was sitting there with an absolutely mortified look on his face. Draco didn't look as if he knew whether to sit there in answering embarrassment or to chase the Weasels with his wand held out and avenge the honor of his family.

Lucius managed to control his impulse to shout. He put the box back on the table, though he closed it first, hoping that might remove the spells from his robes. It did no such thing. He smiled tightly at Harry.

"How...interesting," he said.

Harry winced and stared at him through his fingers. "I'm sorry, sir," he murmured. "I thought they could behave themselves. I hoped they wouldn't insist on staying for breakfast, or offering you one of their products, but..." He shrugged helplessly, as if to point out that what he hadn't wanted had happened, which Lucius knew perfectly well. One of his robe cuffs beeped, to emphasize the point.

“I understand that you were the one who gave them the thousand Galleons they would need to start their business?” Lucius asked, as if only mildly interested. When Harry nodded, he added, “Can I ask why?”

“Because they have the talent and determination to do what they want,” said Harry, blinking at him. “And they’re magical geniuses, sir. They really are. They’ve already created amazing effects with a limited amount of money. I thought they might become even more amazing if they had the fortune to do what they wanted. It could prevent them from becoming bitter, and turning their pranks into jokes of true malice because they didn’t have any better outlet for their emotions.”

“And, of course, you weren’t thinking at all about what weapons they might make for us in battle,” Lucius said softly.

Harry swallowed. “That wasn’t at the top of my mind, sir.”

But it was under the surface, I think. Lucius found comfort in thinking of his future son-in-law this way. Really, it was all very well to acquire a reputation as a philanthropist—sometimes it was one of the most powerful political tools one could wield in the Ministry—but being one was a different matter. Harry would have to learn that there were better things to spend the fortune on.

And he would have to learn that there were better means of vengeance than the immediate strike that both Harry and the Weasleys seemed to have expected Lucius to launch. Lucius would wait, and watch, and see when the best opportunity to avenge the insult arose.

It would be one that both helped him and hurt the Weasleys, ideally. He had had no idea that those troublesome twins were so close to Harry, and it would be better to separate him from them as soon as possible.

“This is nothing magic cannot cure,” he said, soothingly, and that was true, though he might have to give these robes to his house elves and let them try their magic on them. “Now, finish your breakfast.”

Harry nodded, murmured another apology, and then turned back to do so. Draco slid a hand down his shoulder in comfort, and whispered something. Harry leaned into him so readily that any of Lucius's fears about Harry's acceptance of the joining as only a political stunt were allayed.

Now that he is so closely allied to us, we can do far more. Lucius felt his mouth curl into a vicious smile. Avenging ourselves on the Weasleys is only part of it. There are other families waiting for us to take our rightful place above them. I wonder if Harry will ever realize that, by declaring himself about to be joined and closing off paths with which other people might claim him, he has made himself an enemy of those families the Malfoys are enemies of?

He did not think Harry realized it. He believed that most of his would-be allies who had left the gathering had done so because their principles didn't march with his. Lucius knew of at least three families, however, who had departed because they knew they would not be able to combat the Malfoy influence on Harry.

That is well for right now. When I die, then Harry will have to have more political competence, but I can guide him until then. It would be confusing for him to try and absorb this right now.

With that comforting thought, Lucius felt equal to returning to his breakfast, even though Narcissa came in, looked at his changed robes, and declared that she had another headache.

Harry ducked the sweep of a wing as the Opaleye settled the stones she'd been carrying into place. Then he finished Transfiguring the last of his own boulders, eyed the lines of the circle they'd drawn on the grass, and nodded.

The current of magic that ran through the Woodhouse valley had proven unexpectedly resistant to letting them put boulders from the valley's sides together in a circular shape, even though it hadn't cared when Harry, Regulus, and Peter assembled the stage and steps. After the third attempt, and the third time that the current tore the stone from his imagined "hands" and put it back where it belonged, Harry had given in and asked the dragon to assemble the boulders.

The current appeared to accept the dragon as a beast to put up with, and while she flew back and forth with stones, it continued its tame circling.

She was done now, and they had a round table, with boulders placed around it which Harry had Transfigured into chairs. He had thought of draping family pennants over them, but for all he knew, he wouldn't get a detail right and one of his allies would be insulted. If they wanted to mark their own seats, then they could do so.

The table was more than a hundred feet wide and more than twice that long. The dragon had been clever enough to put the boulders with their smoothest sides upright, so that it worked out as a tabletop. Harry had already selected his seat, which was on the southern side of the table, somewhere near the middle but not exactly. He wasn't going to look as if he had a more important position than anyone else by taking the head, when the whole point of a round table in the first place was to give an impression of equality.

"Harry."

Harry turned towards Acies, who was standing beside him with no sign of how she'd arrived. That was all right; Harry was almost used to her sudden appearances and disappearances by now. "Yes, ma'am?" he murmured.

Acies looked up at the Opaleye, as if communing with her, and didn't respond for a long moment. Then she said, "You are on an anvil. The hammer is about to descend upon you again."

Harry blinked. "I do consider the meeting a forging," he said. "But I consider most experiences in my life a forging." He wondered, sometimes, what ultimate end most of those experiences were shaping him for: facing Voldemort, accomplishing his vates task, or something altogether different. Then he scolded himself for thinking that the world turned around him like that. Prophecy or not, he didn't want to weave a narrative of his life in which destiny was the primary focus. Perhaps the experiences shaped him simply for living. That would make the most sense.

“And the harder they temper you, the less likely you are to break,” said Acies, pulling his gaze back to her. “But this one will fall as a hard blow. Remember that you cannot heal everything, and that when the blades of others’ lives shatter, they cannot always be repaired.” She turned and walked away, her cloak swishing along the grass. Harry stood and watched her go.

She had confirmed for him already that a prophecy might come true three times, that there was no mystical rule against it—though none that said it could happen, either. She had recited that prophecy about the storms again when Harry asked her, and strengthened Harry’s conviction that he was right, that a storm of Light would descend on Midsummer Day, and at Hogwarts. Two storms for the year, the prophecy said, and Midsummer Day marked halfway around the year from Midwinter and the storm of the wild Dark.

And a year since the day Voldemort and Bellatrix had taken his hand.

Harry winced as a sharp twinge of phantom pain jolted up his left wrist, then resolved not to let it bother him. The important thing was setting up the trap so that it would take Voldemort, and, before that, getting through this meeting.

And if a hammer would fall on the anvil this time...

Well. That was what would happen.

Harry turned towards the Opaleye, who had landed next to the table and cocked her head at him, and nodded his approval of the table’s construction. As if that had been a signal, she lowered her head and laid it down next to him. Harry let her stare at him, not knowing what else she wanted.

Perhaps that’s a good thing. I don’t want to get so confident that I forget there are forces in the world greater than I am. For a moment, his hand brushed against the stone impregnated with the foul magic, still stored in a robe pocket. Nor absorb so much magic that I think magic is the end-all and be-all of someone’s strength.

Augustus Starrise stretched luxuriously as he stepped out of his tent. His staff of white oak was in his hand, the bands of gold catching the sunlight and sparking it back, and he had a head full of good dreams.

Last night, he had seen and spoken with Alba for a long time in his dreams. She had reassured him that she loved him, and that he had not taken too long to find her murderers. That had reassured Augustus. Dedicated as he was to his justice quest, he could not help feeling like a failure that it had lasted so long.

He strode rapidly through the grass in the direction of the immense stone table Harry had set up, in deliberate echo of another stone table. Augustus found the gesture amusing, but not as amusing as the fact that the Apollonis tent was missing from its place. It appeared that Cupressus hadn't been able to accept Harry's ultimatum, and had taken his leave.

He listened to threads of conversation as he wandered in circles, yawning and touching his staff now and then as if he weren't quite awake. The sense of his sister's spirit accompanying him hadn't faded yet, and it mingled with the opinions that people didn't know he overheard. Augustus found the various reactions to Harry's little speech yesterday interesting.

"—don't really think that he has the right to tell us what to do with our house elves," said one stuffy voice.

"Then why are you still here?" countered the other, and the first person didn't seem to have an answer to that. Augustus smiled, though he kept his eyes straight ahead. In time, he thought that most of the wizards and witches who had decided to remain past that initial statement of revolution would yield to Harry's demands. Keeping house elves was a luxury, now, not a need; there were plenty of Muggleborns and even poorer pureblood families who did without them. That didn't mean Augustus was eager to give up his own, but next to what Harry could offer his allies, it was not sensible to continue clinging to outmoded custom.

“Think that he’ll stay with the Malfoy boy?” Flora Dawnborn was asking her sister Fauna, one of the most inveterate matchmakers in wizarding Britain.

“Only until someone better comes along,” Fauna said with a sharp nod of her head. “He said it himself. The Malfoy boy’s the first one who snared his attention, that’s all, the first friend he ever had. Bonds like that last only until a deeper and more mature love comes along and absorbs a young man’s passion. I think Proteus might be perfect for him, don’t you?” she added.

Augustus had to rack his brain for a moment before he remembered Proteus Dawnborn. Then he snorted. A puffed-up little Light wizard, that one, even worse than the Malfoy heir, with only his allegiance to recommend him. Fauna was mad to think he stood a chance of capturing Harry’s interest.

Of course, the ritual he referred to, the one that begins Walpurgis Night, is a three-year dance, if I remember correctly. That means that someone else might interrupt it before it finishes, and snare Harry’s attention before the crucial Halloween when he’ll be unable to back out of it...hmmm.

Much as he tried to think of a relative of his who would snare Harry, however, Augustus couldn’t come up with a candidate. Pharos was to be married soon, and his brother’s children were all too young—and girls besides, which might not be a barrier, but, on the other hand, might be. Certainly Tybalt had refused to consider any of his cousins, even when Augustus had pleaded political expediency. Some wizards and witches were like that, seeing the sex before the person. Augustus couldn’t understand the attitude himself, but then, he didn’t need to understand it, just be aware of it and manipulate it—or, in Tybalt’s case, give up in disgust when he threw himself away on a Muggleborn, not even an eligible young man.

“Paul won’t like it,” a witch he knew only slightly was telling a friend of hers.

“Really?” Her friend leaned nearer, her voice a bit breathless, and Augustus took the opportunity to pretend to search for something he’d dropped in the grass, so that he’d have an excuse to listen.

“Really,” confirmed the witch, with a nod. “After all, if Lord Harry’s going after centaurs and house elves and dragons this year, who’s to say that he won’t be going after Granians the next? Paul and the other breeders won’t be pleased, oh no, if His Lordship wants them to free their stock instead of breeding and selling.”

“I hadn’t considered the economic aspect of this, I must admit,” her friend said, looking disturbed.

Augustus frowned as he moved on. He knew Paul, at least if he was Paul Fredericks, breeder of the fastest Granian flying horses in Britain. He was part of a more than slightly fanatical political group called Shield of the Granian, which had leaned on the Ministry in the past to change laws that would have affected their breeders. They had money and power backing them. Harry should think twice before he went up against them, or encouraged them to go up against him.

Of course, he won’t. Say what you want about our young Lord, but he’s more than dedicated to his cause.

Augustus moved on, taking in reactions and a cup of hot tea that one of his house elves, when summoned, brought him. Most of the reactions he heard were positive, but cautious. Harry was refusing to play by too many rules for these wizards and witches to feel entirely comfortable with him. He wouldn’t claim the title of Lord. He wouldn’t use the Black fortune, at least so far, for bribery and the more subtle gifts that bought future favors. He had joined himself to the Malfoy family, but had reached out to Light wizards. And now this, his determination to haul the wizarding world into revolution whether it wanted it or not.

Augustus shook his head as he assumed a seat at the table. He is making this harder than it needs to be. If he learned to compromise, he might achieve more of what he wants.

It was not long before the other allies who had chosen to stay assembled, many of them casting a glamour of their family flag on the back of their chairs. Harry had one of only two blank seats in the midst of them, by the time he showed up. He had his scowling guardian, Severus Snape, on one side, who refused to cast the glamour he was entitled to; Augustus knew his mother had been a witch of the once-powerful Prince line. The other side was thick with Malfoys and their blue-gray. On the far side of Snape sat the resurrected Black, Regulus. He had tried to cast a glamour of the Black crest on the back of Harry's chair, but the moment Harry appeared and looked at it, it vanished.

Harry leaned forward and cast whatever charm it was that made his voice appear to sound directly in one's ears. Augustus shook his head. It was an effective political tool, in one way, but in another, it promised an intimacy, a personal touch to the politics, that Augustus doubted Harry would be able to sustain.

"Thank you for coming," said Harry. "Yesterday was a general introduction to my purposes and the purposes of this alliance, which I thank you for enduring, as I know the recitation was redundant for those who've paid attention to me." A chuckle moved up and down the table. "Today, I have a favor to ask of the Light families who have linchpins in the north of England." And he turned his eyes on Augustus, and the Dawnborns, and the Griffinsnest representatives, and Laura Gloryflower.

Augustus caught his breath in surprise. Can he mean to ask us to give up our linchpins? Surely he would not be that bold.

He was distracted for a moment as his staff gave a spark. But when he glanced at it, his sister had nothing to say to him as yet. Augustus could feel her spirit searching the table, however. He leaned back in his chair and tried to relax.

"The linchpins are the stakes in a web that binds the northern goblins," said Harry bluntly. "It was done to make them unable to hurt wizards, so far as I can determine, and also to stop some land that wizards valued from sliding into the sea. There are two ways I know of that the web can be removed. One is to sacrifice enough magic to take the place of the linchpins in the web.” For some reason, his hand brushed his robe pocket. Augustus repressed the temptation to snort. If he thinks he can channel enough magic through his wand for that to happen, he should think again. “Another is to change the nature of the inheritance, so that the linchpins are no longer linchpins and each Light family inheritance is bound to one person, as happens in some Dark families, including the Blacks. My brother has already allowed this to be done.”

Pandemonium answered him. Augustus leaned back in his chair, distracted both by the way that the golden band at the end of his staff sparkled and by the fact that he thought he should say nothing. Of course Harry’s second suggestion was ridiculous; the linchpins were precious, a matter of pride and a family’s legacy, and perhaps only someone like Connor Potter, a half-blood reared away from his ancestors’ traditions, could consider it seriously. But the first might have possibilities, merit. Augustus had no particular investment in the slavery of the northern goblins, as long as Harry could persuade them not to attack the wizards.

The southern goblins are a different matter, but we would know if they were free. They would have attacked the wizarding world at once.

As he had expected would happen, one voice emerged, calmly, from the center of the maelstrom. That was Laura Gloryflower’s. The puellaris witch had a commanding presence when she chose to exert it, and she was on her feet now, her face set and a golden aura playing around her. Augustus was close enough to smell the thick, musky scent that came from her when she was on the edge of transforming into a lioness.

“Harry,” she told the fifteen-year-old they were here, nominally at least, to follow, “tell us why you think we should give up our heritage.”

Harry smiled. “Because you would not be giving up your heritage,” he said. “I could spare your houses, your lands, and all the priceless treasures inside your houses. The only thing that would change is that your houses would no longer have their connection to the earth.”

“But that makes them linchpins,” said Laura intently.

Harry leaned back in his seat and raised his eyebrows. "I was under the impression that what made them linchpins was their link to the moods of the current family leader, and the fact that if the house is attacked by an enemy, it will drain strength for its wards from the family."

"That is true." Laura settled her hands in front of her, a gesture that Augustus recognized of old. She was trying to keep herself from fussing with her robes. She lowered her voice, too. "But the link is grounded in the earth. That is what, as you pointed out, keeps the earth from sliding into the sea. How do you propose to change the nature of that link and yet keep them linchpins?"

"By linking the wards to the sacrificed magic," said Harry, just as quietly. "Some power will be given to maintain the linchpins as they are, but with their wards flowing into pure magic instead of the earth. The rest will go to replace the linchpins in the northern goblins' web. Then, when the goblins pull, the web will shred without disturbing your estates." He cocked his head. "The goblins have already agreed to this. I need your permission, and your permission only, to change the anchor of the wards. Then they shall be free."

"And the goblins really won't attack the northern families?" Laura asked. Her face was so stern that Augustus hoped no one tried to interrupt her. The last thing they needed right now was a lioness springing on someone who'd insulted her or Harry.

"They swore so, by the most sacred oaths they have," said Harry. "They used to do mining and minting for our ancestors, but most of those tasks have been taken over by the southern goblins. All the web does now is assist the paranoia of our ancestors, and prevent the goblins from practicing some of their most sacred rites. With it gone, the only difference you'll notice is that any goblins you encounter might be a bit less deferential than normal. I think you can live with that," he added, and his voice was smeared with an emotion only partly contempt.

"I can live with it," said Laura. "I do not know about everyone else." She sat down, yielding the table to members of other northern families.

Augustus spoke first, partly because the sparking of his staff had died for the moment and partly because even Harry's preferred solution had something wrong with it. "It sounds as though unbinding this web will take an enormous amount of power."

Harry nodded. "It will."

"And where will you get that much magic?" Augustus eyed the boy, wondering if his sacrificial instincts were really so strong that he'd leave himself a Squib for the sake of some goblins. Perhaps he did think that others would follow him even if he were powerless, which indicated a lack of basic understanding about the way the wizarding world and its politics worked.

Harry raised his eyebrows, and a dark smile touched the corners of his mouth. "You forget I'm an absorbere, sir," he said. "I can gather in that much magic, and channel it for my purposes. Both my gift and my will are strong enough."

Augustus refused to shiver. Being reminded so suddenly that the teenager sitting across from him was a magic-eater did shock him a bit, but he would just have to get used to it. "I thought that you would not take magic unless it was willingly yielded," he said.

"There are some of my enemies who've given up their immunity to my dislike of eating magic," said Harry. "Voldemort, for one. And I have other sources that I haven't told anyone about." That made the Malfoys start and glance at him sharply. Harry didn't appear to notice. "I can accomplish this, sir, you don't need to worry about that. But I need the linchpin families' permission. Contrary to what some people might think, I do care about the opinions of my own species. I will do nothing without your permission."

Augustus tapped his fingers on the table. Put like that, it seemed the greatest obstacle was that Harry wouldn't be able to do this, that something would go wrong when he tried to replace the linchpins with the sacrificed magic in the goblins' web. It was a large chance. On the other hand, Augustus didn't know enough about such procedures to determine that something would go wrong, and to refuse because he didn't trust Harry enough would be an insult.

He could see similar emotions at play on the faces of the witches and wizards beside him. Many of them owned several small estates that were linchpins. Come to think of it, Augustus couldn't think of one linchpin-owning family that was missing. Some of them would have stayed because Starrise was Harry's ally, but not all of them. Augustus wondered if that was good fortune, or conspiracy, or the combination of both that seemed to attend Harry.

Harry waited, looking calm and content and fearless. Laura Gloryflower spoke a few minutes later. "For my part, I accept, and will yield the Gloryflower linchpins to the change."

Harry smiled at her. "Thank you, ma'am." He glanced down the table, and waited some more.

One by one, other, minor families, some of their members looking at Augustus, gave their permission. Augustus waited in magnificent silence. He saw no reason to rush. He would look the more gracious for giving his permission after waiting so long.

At last, it came down to him and Flora Dawnborn. Augustus listened to her assent, and then jerked his head sharply sideways. His staff had vibrated in his hand, and now he could see a ghostly mist of gold and white forming above the end of it. He caught his breath.

Alba, sister, are you telling me the name of your murderer at last? Since his sister had died before the enchantments on the staff were complete, Augustus had had little hope of discovering one of the murderers until he was in his presence. But time and proximity had done their work at last. He could see an image of his sister's face as it had looked in the year of her death forming above the staff, looking fretfully back and forth.

Then a hand of white light sprang from the image. Augustus followed the sweep of its fingers, feeling a deep, clear, strange inevitability overtake him.

The hand pointed straight at Adalrico Bulstrode.

Augustus felt the inevitability yield to savage gladness. The oath he had sworn not to use magic except in self-defense was gone from his mind. What mattered was that he finally, finally knew who one of his sister's murderers was.

In a loud, deep voice, he began the incantation of the Caerimonia Inrevocabilis, the highest and sternest of the justice rituals. It would take Adalrico's life, and his own, in payment. Augustus did not care. Other concerns melted and dropped away from him. He was no longer a part of the living world in any case, to worry about them. Harry heard the chant begin. Later, he could feel thankful that he was already looking towards Augustus's section of the table. He saw the man rise to his feet, holding out his white oak staff banded with gold, his eyes focused on Adalrico.

Harry rose to his feet, his hand held out. "Augustus," he said. "Mr. Starrise."

Augustus gave no sign that he'd heard him. In fact, his chant was picking up speed, and Harry recognized it, now. There was no way he could allow that ritual to be completed, both because it would kill and because this was such a delicate time and place. A Light wizard killing both a Dark wizard and himself might be the boulder that shattered the alliance.

Harry shouted the word, so that everyone could hear him. "Silencio!"

Augustus's voice ceased in an instant. The gathering power of the ritual wavered for a moment, then fell off and drained away. Harry stood in the center of a spreading pool of silence, as though his spell had been aimed at more people than just that one, and felt Snape place a hand on his shoulder, Draco rise and touch his arm.

“Why, Mr. Starrise,” Harry asked, when he was certain he had everyone’s attention, “would you be trying to use a justice ritual on Mr. Bulstrode, a man I am certain has done you no harm, and against the oath you took that forbids offensive use of magic here?” A subtle gesture of his hand disrupted the silencing spell so Augustus could answer, though Harry stood ready to renew it in an instant if he tried to take up the justice ritual again.

Augustus didn’t try. His face was beatific, and he answered readily. “No harm? Is that what he told you, Harry? No, no. It is not so.” He laughed, and the laughter was not sane. “He was one of the Death Eaters who captured and tortured my sister Alba, so badly that when the Aurors rescued her, she hanged herself. I am claiming vengeance. It took me fourteen years to find him, but here he is at last. There is no law in the world that can keep me from laying my heart and Alba’s to rest.” He smiled at Harry. “I am sorry to abandon your alliance just as it is forming, my Lord. I would have liked to see what happened in its wake. But this is a higher duty, a greater. I am going to kill the murderer of my sister.”

“You have no proof,” said Harry softly, though he could feel his heart beating erratically. He had not yet dared to look at Adalrico.

“My sister helped me with the enchantments on my staff,” said Augustus. “She did not live to complete them, and thus it took them years of preparation and hours in the company of the murderer before she could locate him. But now she has. I trust Alba’s spirit, my Lord. And it makes sense, truly. Adalrico Bulstrode has long had a reputation as the most cruelly inventive of the Death Eaters. I should have suspected him before this.” He sighed, his voice longing. “But I did not want to condemn an innocent man to death.”

Harry took a deep breath and turned to face Adalrico. “Is this true, Mr. Bulstrode?” he asked.

One glance into Adalrico’s face told him it was. Adalrico was still, silent, his mouth clamped shut and the lines of his skin, crow’s feet and laughter lines and all, white. He stared at Augustus as if he were a creature come out of nightmare.

Then he met Harry's eyes, and his face relaxed. "You know what the verdict was from the Wizengamot, Harry," he said softly. "I was under the Imperius Curse, and not myself at the time, so I cannot be held responsible for what I did at Voldemort's behest. And I cannot be tried twice for the same crime," he added, just in case anyone had missed the point of his mentioning the Wizengamot.

"That does not matter," said Augustus. Now he didn't sound human, as if he were some masked spirit of justice come riding out of story. "I still claim justice. I know what he did. I shall have justice."

Harry looked at Adalrico, and could think of nothing to say. He knew, if no one else there did, that Adalrico had been a willing Death Eater, as much in control of his own actions as Lucius was. And now he had no idea which was the greatest allegiance: to truth, to justice, to the family alliance he had sworn with the Bulstrodes, or to the fact that he'd tried to move on, put his allies' crimes in the past, and accept that they had changed and become different people.

"I want to know who the other Death Eaters who helped him were, mind," Augustus's voice said, warm and distant. "I would like to know that. That might be worth staying alive for."

Harry cocked his head at Adalrico, who answered in a clipped voice, "They died in Azkaban. All of them."

"I suppose I can accept that," said Augustus. "Since I am about to have justice on you, and you have not only lived, but never served a penance for your crimes."

"I will not allow you to use the Caerimonia Inrevocabilis," said Harry, certain of this, at least. "It breaks all the rules I have asked you to abide by, not only the oath you swore before the alliance meeting, but also the rules that prevent you from attacking someone else in the alliance."

Augustus bowed to him and took his staff in his hands, moving it in a pattern Harry didn't recognize. A moment later, he felt a bond he hadn't known was there loosen, and Augustus said in a clear voice, "I formally resign from the alliance that I entered into with Harry, once called Potter. Let magic witness that this was done willingly on my part, and because of no fault on his.”

Harry ground his teeth. “Then you must leave Woodhouse,” he said. “I cannot permit—“

“Woodhouse is a place within the wizarding world, and it belongs to you as much as it belongs to anyone right now,” Augustus interrupted contemplatively. “But there is a place outside the wizarding world, outside law, outside anything but honor.” He faced Adalrico, and his voice gained depth like a stream flooded with snowmelt. “I call Adalrico Bulstrode to that place, in the name of Merlin, in the name of sea and stone and silver and gold. To that place, only honor will guide us, and from it, only blood will release us. If he refuses this call, may the consequences fall upon his head.”

Harry didn’t recognize that ritual, but Adalrico obviously did. His hands clenched in front of him, and then he said, “Far be it from me to refuse this call. I come through in honor, and will depart in blood. In the name of bronze and iron and fire and wind, in the name of Merlin, I answer Augustus Starrise.”

Augustus gave a wide, genuine smile, and inclined his head. “Tomorrow, then, Bulstrode,” he said softly, and turned away, striding rapidly from the table, with his cloak fluttering behind him.

Harry turned to Adalrico. “What does that mean?” he asked, without pause.

It was Elfrida who answered him, voice soft. “It means that my husband is called to a duel of honor,” she said. She cradled Marian against her with one arm, and her eyes were wide. “If he had refused it, his children would have become Squibs, and every Bulstrode born from now until the end of time would be a Squib, likewise. The duel is to the death.”

Harry gave a shudder. Adalrico was a savage, skilled fighter, and the inventiveness and cruelty that Augustus had accused him of would function to keep him alive. On the other hand, Augustus Starrise was a trained war wizard, and especially good at duels, from what Harry had heard, and ridden by vengeance.

And, tomorrow, one of them would die.

Harry closed his eyes.

Chapter Seventy-Four: The High Cost of Vengeance

Millicent sat in silence with her father. Adalrico had asked Elfrida to take Marian outside and walk with her for a little while, although still within the protective wards of their tent. There was no telling whether Starrise might not try to strike at his enemy's family before the duel. He'd have to use someone else to do it, but from what her father had said, Millicent thought that would be like him.

Adalrico had sent her mother outside five minutes ago, and still he hadn't said anything. Millicent did her best to remain still, holding her breath and willing her heart to beat more slowly. All the while, she wondered why she was so affected. She had not expected her father to die of old age. He could easily have perished in one of the battles that Harry wanted him to fight, or at the hand of a Death Eater assassin who would start taking out Harry's most valued allies. She should have expected something like this from around every corner, instead of feeling as if it had struck from overhead like a lightning bolt.

"Millicent."

At last, he's getting to it. Millicent sat up and fastened her eyes on her father's face. Adalrico said nothing else for a long moment, but his fingers were moving now, tapping on his legs while he gazed into their bonfire with a faint frown on his face. It was more movement than he'd shown since sending Elfrida and Marian out. Millicent waited, as patient as she could make herself.

"I want you to remember," said Adalrico, "our motto."

"Duramus," Millicent whispered. We endure. And the Bulstrodes did, lasting out the crises that diminished the power and fortune of many other pureblood families. They had never wanted to achieve the dizzy heights of ambition that the Malfoys aimed for. They wanted to remain alive and comfortable—rich, of course, and with people paying them respect, but without enemies staring them in the eye.

"If I die tomorrow," said Adalrico, "you will become the head of our family, Millicent. I want you to hold firm to our motto in public. No tears. I want your face to be as hard as stone."

Millicent nodded. "Do you have other instructions for me, father, in the event of your death?" she asked. Her tongue scarcely moved in her mouth, feeling as if it, in turn, were made of stone.

"You may accept the hand of Pierre Delacour," said Adalrico judiciously. "I have studied his family. Rich enough, and while they've interbred with both Muggles and Veela, they've not been obnoxious about it. They always come back to pureblood wizards and witches in the end. I give you my blessing for him."

Millicent nodded. "And for my mother and sister?" she whispered.

"Use some of our money to make sure Marian gets private tutoring." Adalrico made a large movement for the first time since he'd arrived back in the tent, bending down and lifting the goblet of wine that had sat beside his stool. "I don't want her attending Hogwarts, until and unless the school is actually better ten years from now. She'd be taught things there that a young magical heir shouldn't have to learn. I didn't think I had any choice with you, Millicent, or I would have sent you somewhere else, too." He met her eyes directly for a moment. "Will you forgive me?"

Millicent choked back the stupid, ridiculous, stupid tears that wanted to rise up her throat. "There's nothing to forgive," she whispered. "I'm glad I attend Hogwarts. How would we have met Harry and learned about him otherwise?"

Adalrico gave a faint smile. "I imagine we would still have heard of him from Mrs. Malfoy. She's a rather insistent dancer. But—well, I won't make you regret the way things have gone, daughter. I'm glad that you like your life the way it is." He put the goblet down again, and held out his hand to her. His skin briefly turned the color of quartz. "Will you clasp hands with me, daughter, for old times' sake?"

Millicent nodded. Her own skin turned transparent and glittering when she concentrated, and she moved her fist forward and through her father's. For a moment, she felt his flesh and muscle as if it were her own, the rush of foreign blood through her veins, the pulling of skin over unfamiliar tendons. From the look on her father's face, he was feeling the same thing.

"Based in stone," he whispered, "through the stone we commune, and like stone we endure. Duramus."

Millicent nodded again. She could say nothing without choking on tears that were unworthy of her, as a magical heir and the future head of the Bulstrode family in the event of her father's death. She sat tall and proud instead as Adalrico leaned forward and placed his shining fist on her brow.

"Call your mother in, please, Millicent," he said, leaning back on the stool. The light left his hand.

She rose to fetch Elfrida and Marian, and when that was done, she stood outside the tent and looked up at the stars for a long time.

"Uncle. You wanted to speak with me?"

Augustus looked up with a small, hard smile. He supposed he shouldn't take such joy in the fact that his possible death compelled his wild nephew to listen to him, but he wouldn't lie to himself the night before such a duel. Tybalt was only listening to him because Augustus might not be here to listen to tomorrow, and they both knew it.

"Yes." Augustus gestured for Tybalt to take a seat on the chair he'd Transfigured from a hump of grass, secretly pleased to see that his nephew really hadn't brought his Muggleborn partner. Tybalt wasn't entirely lost to family honor after all, then. That would make the things Augustus had to tell him easier. "I have something to tell you."

Tybalt sat down and stared up at him. Augustus stood still and stared back. He loved and treasured his nephew Pharos, his heir. He was the one who would carry on the Starrise family legacy, and he would do it with a grace that Augustus knew to be beyond him, himself.

That was why he would never say aloud that Tybalt was the one who more reminded him of his sister Alba. It was partly his face, of course, those wide eyes and that pale hair, but it was also in the gestures he made, his grip on his wand and his method of turning on one heel.

“I’ve found one of the murderers of your mother,” said Augustus at last, when some moments had passed in silence. “I would have thought you’d be pleased.”

Tybalt shook his head. “I did my mourning for Mother a long time ago,” he said, his words impatient—always so impatient, Augustus thought, as though wizards did not have decades to achieve what they wanted to do. But then, he’d been impatient, too, to find the murderers and complete his justice quest. “I haven’t let her death taint my life. And I never realized how deep the venom had run in you, Uncle, or I would have tried to purge it a long time ago.”

Augustus snorted. “Would you have, now? I was under the impression that you did not care about this family, Tybalt, with the way that you can toss aside our traditions as if they were dandelion down.”

“I don’t care about it in the same way,” said Tybalt, voice sharpening. “But yes, I do still care, Uncle. And above all, Mother is dead. Has been dead for years. She doesn’t have any options anymore; she can’t change. You’re alive. You can change. And you’ve chosen to do something that will not only lose a vates I love and follow a large political advantage, but which will probably cost you your life.”

“Are you sure about that?” Augustus touched his white staff, and heard his sister breathing words of love and praise into his ear. He’d heard them ever since she was able to point at Bulstrode. It was impossible to describe the contentment he felt. The gaping wound of his life had closed at last. “I am a trained duelist. Yes, Bulstrode’s a fighter, but not trained in the way I am, or he’d wear the bells.”

“He is a fighter,” said Tybalt. “Not a duelist. I know where the advantage lies in battle, Uncle. I’ve seen battle now, in case you forgot.” His eyes were large and dark, and Augustus realized that, yes, he had forgotten that Tybalt had fought a battle in the very valley where they stood now. “I wish you had not done this. I know that you have no choice but to follow through with it, now. But I wish you hadn't done it."

Augustus shook his head in wonder. Any anger he had felt burning had faded, by now. This was the last night he expected to spend alive, if he was honest. It would be good to go back to his sister, to see Alba again, to talk to her about her sons and the things that had happened when she was alive, those thirty years when he had really lived. Augustus didn't know what the afterlife would actually look like, but he knew what it would sound like. There would be conversations and conversations and conversations, endless talks. Alba had been with him to know the anecdotes he most wanted to tell her, but she would add her perspective to them, a perspective that Augustus had missed like a limb. Possibly Tybalt didn't understand that because he tended to think of her as Augustus's sister, not his twin. That made the difference.

This was his last night, and so he could ask the question that he had wanted to know the answer to since Tybalt had abandoned his family for a non-pureblood. "Why don't you feel more strongly about this, Tybalt? She is your mother."

Tybalt rose to his feet and began to pace back and forth. Augustus watched in silence. He wouldn't order him back to his chair, not when it seemed that Tybalt needed to be on his feet to give his answer.

"She's an encumbrance," said Tybalt at last. "Yes, she was my mother, but neither you nor Pharos ever treated her like that. You treated her like a Muggle saint—" Augustus frowned slightly, but let his comments on the appropriateness of Tybalt studying Muggle religions go "—like someone whose memory had to be watered in case it ever faded. And so I started resenting her. She wasn't someone I could just love and remember. She was someone I had to love. And it took away your time and love from me."

"That, at least, is not true," said Augustus, feeling his wonder deepen. "Pharos would not feel that way."

"That's because he did what you wanted," said Tybalt, raising his eyes to his uncle's face again. "How much of your love for him, Uncle, is the fact that he loved and fawned on the memory of Alba with you, and how much the fact that he's actually better-suited to lead our family?"

"I do not think you will ever understand, Tybalt." Augustus sighed. Well, I should have known the rift between us was too deep to be crossed or bridged. That's what I get for being optimistic. "As for something else you said, yes, you're right. I have already sent Pharos an owl telling him not to give the linchpin to Harry."

Tybalt jerked. "Why not?" he whispered.

"Can you ask?" Augustus raised his eyebrows. "He had a murderer in his company. If I die, then that murderer will still be alive, and I can't see Harry rejecting him. A torturer, a rapist—Harry had to have at least suspected he'd done those things, since he was a Death Eater, and he accepted him anyway." Augustus shook his head. "I knew it in the abstract, and now it has come home for me. It will come home even harder for Pharos, if I die. And if I live, then I shall think myself honor-bound to work against Harry. He won't deliver criminals to justice when he knows they're criminals, Tybalt. What do you think will happen if he finds more of them during this war? He won't punish them, either. Someone will have to."

Tybalt straightened as if under the weight of a heavy burden. "Why did you join the alliance in the first place, Uncle?"

Augustus cocked his head. "Because I thought I might find one of your mother's murderers here, or directions to him," he said. "And I have. And because I thought there was a slight chance that this was the right thing to do. I see it isn't, now. And Pharos sees the same thing."

"You'll try to break Harry's cause whether you live or die," Tybalt whispered.

"I believe I just said that."

Tybalt looked at him in silence for a long moment. Then he said, "Uncle, you've never taken me seriously since I was Sorted into Gryffindor. Something about foolish courage and rash behavior, I think you said in the first letter you sent me after it.” Augustus nodded, remembering the letter as well as Tybalt did. “Well, I have my own ideals, no matter how wild you think I am. And in this alliance, I’ve found someone I actually want to follow. What makes you imagine that I’ll permit this damage to him?”

Augustus laughed. “Tybalt, there is nothing you can do. I changed my will so that Pharos is my heir.”

“Oh, I know that,” said Tybalt, his eyes in shadow. “And you won’t change the means of inheriting the linchpin.”

“Of course not.”

Tybalt nodded. “That’s all I wanted to know.” He turned away. “I would wish you a clear mind, but it’s a useless wish,” he added over his shoulder.

And those are the last words we’ll ever exchange, Augustus thought in some sadness. But I know Tybalt. I was a fool to suspect anything different. And he’s a fool to think I take him seriously. Your son has become a wild boy, Alba, a feckless, reckless child who never grew up. He may threaten me, but there’s nothing he’ll be able to do when matters come pounding down to the end. He wasn’t made for the kind of politics that we play.

He turned away and went back to listening to the voice of his sister whispering thanks and congratulations and welcome to her world.

“Harry.”

Harry rose to his feet in surprise. A man he hadn’t expected to see until tomorrow, if then, was standing in the entrance to Snape’s tent. Snape at once rose behind him, his wand out. He’d already become an expert at compensating for his weak right leg by letting his left take most of his weight, Harry noted absently.

“Mr. Bulstrode,” he murmured, giving a shallow bow. “Is something the matter? Can I do something for you?” Given what he’d heard about the duel, and what Snape had told him after they came to sit in private, he knew there was no chance that Adalrico had come to tell him the duel was off.

“Actually, you can,” said Adalrico. “There’s a story I want to tell you. Or an explanation. Yes, call it that.” He glanced at Snape. “I would prefer to do it alone, if you don’t mind, Harry.”

Harry nodded at Snape. Snape studied them with silent dark eyes, then said, “Remember Cardiff, Adalrico.”

With those odd words, which Harry suspected must refer to something that had happened between them in their Death Eater days, Snape limped out of the tent. Harry wondered what he would do. Perhaps watch the moon and stars. Perhaps listen for the sound of a shout, or any other sign that Harry needed him. Harry didn’t think he would eavesdrop. He trusted his guardian too much now to suspect that.

“Please, sit down,” Harry said, Transfiguring one of their stools into a more comfortable, padded chair. Adalrico took it, moving slowly and stiffly. Harry eyed him anxiously as he sat back down. Adalrico noticed, and smiled.

“It’s not a wound,” he said. “I’ve just spent time talking to my wife and daughters, and that fills my mind enough to make my body heavy.” He sighed and bent his dark eyes on the fire. Harry studied his face and said nothing. What was there to say? It was cruel that Adalrico had to fight this duel or lose his daughters’ magical ability to a curse. It was cruel that he might die in the doing, even if he saved his daughters’ magic.

And it was cruel, wasn’t it, what he did to Alba Starrise? You notice that he didn’t deny it.

With his head filled with such boiling thoughts about cruelty and crime and blame, it took Harry a moment to realize that Adalrico was speaking.

“There were five of us,” Adalrico told the flames. “We’d captured her in a series of raids that the Dark Lord ordered us to make while he prepared for some grand strike. As it turned out, that strike was sending the Lestranges after the Longbottoms and going, himself, after you.” He glanced up at Harry briefly. “We never expected him not to come back. I think he was building up to a celebration when he returned after destroying the latest threat to his power.”

I do not want to hear this. But what does wanting have to do with it? Harry gave a shallow nod to show he was listening.

“We tortured Alba in ordinary ways, at first,” said Adalrico distantly, no longer looking at Harry. “Pain curses and Crucio. She screamed, and then she went quiet and would no longer give us the satisfaction, which was opposite to the way most people went about it. I don’t know if I remember her so well because she was the last person I ever did that to, or because she was unusual and beautiful like some white deer out of a story, but I can see her still: biting her lip, her eyes wide, her hair splayed around her head. When I met Tybalt Starrise, it gave me a shock. He looks like that most of the time.”

Harry said nothing.

Adalrico half-lidded his eyes and took a deep breath. “Then we—one of the others put on a glamour of her brother, and raped her. She screamed then, just once, at the beginning of it, like something was breaking within her. Dolohov cast a spell to make her own hands join in, crawling up and down her body.” Abruptly, his face darkened. “At least, I thought it was Dolohov. I know now that Dolohov died the year before, and it was Evan Rosier under a glamour of him. Which—explains a lot, really.”

Harry said nothing. He tried not to think of a Light witch at Evan Rosier’s mercy, and failed.

“I was the one who suggested that she ought to be made to rape someone herself,” said Adalrico quietly, staring at his hands. “And I was the one who found a child who resembled her elder son.”

Harry jerked to his feet. “Why are you telling me this?” he demanded. “Did you want me to ask you why you did it?”

“Actually, I did.” Adalrico lifted his head. “This is the last lesson I can give you if I die tomorrow, Harry. The reasons I did it, and what happens in war—what is going to happen at least among the Dark Lord’s servants, if not your own. Everything happened to me in a dark place. Nothing mattered anymore except what the Dark Lord said mattered. And it became imperative to believe that, because if we’d been wrong, the path behind us was littered with too much blood and flesh to justify what we’d done.” He took another deep breath. “I had to think that way, when the Dark Lord fell and I emerged from the dark place. I would have committed suicide if not for Elfrida. I reconciled myself to living like a normal person again, and to the fact that that I’d done those things, but it took me seven years.”

“And you think the same thing will happen now,” said Harry. He found it hard to look at Adalrico. “I know that. Knew that. I listened to stories of the First War when I was still a child, Adalrico. I know atrocities happened, and I know they will now. If nothing else, Voldemort hates me too much not to try and hurt me.”

“That’s not exactly what I meant,” said Adalrico carefully. “When the war ended, then the only way I could survive was to face what I’d done. But while it lasted, the only way I could survive was to breathe in the perfume of that poisoned garden and believe it fully. I believe that you’ll die if you try to live in the war like you’d live in a normal time, Harry. You can’t. War marks everyone’s souls. War takes everyone’s souls, at least while they’re fighting it. Afterwards, that’s the time for healing. Reconcile yourself to that, Harry, and you’ll do better.”

“It’s not going to take mine,” said Harry. He had not known that his voice could be that low, or that passionate. “I promise you, Adalrico. I promise you it never will. I will live through this.”

“Of course you have to survive, Harry—“

“Not survive,” said Harry, leaning forward so that he could see the other man’s eyes. “Live. I’m not going to close myself off from the war. I’m not going to become a shell, or stop feeling. I’m going to walk through this with my eyes open. I’m going to take every loss personally. I'm going to let the war rip my soul to shreds all it wants, but never steal it."

Adalrico gave a convulsive movement. Then he said, "Then I have died knowing your cause will fail, Harry, and so has my instruction." His voice was hemlock-bitter.

"No," said Harry. "You'll die or live tomorrow knowing that I'm a different person than you are, Adalrico." He cocked his head, feeling his lips stretched in a smile that had nothing of humor in it. "But you have reminded me that I should make an important speech tomorrow. Thank you for that."

"Harry, you cannot mean this," said Adalrico. "You will kill my family if you try to fight like that."

Harry shook his head slowly. "No more surely than I would have if I became a copy of Voldemort, or shut myself down for the duration of the war and did not grieve for their deaths," he said. "I've had to learn the hard way that I can't influence everything, can't do everything. I'll do what I can to protect your family, Adalrico. On that, you have my word. I will do anything in my power—except become what you became."

"But that is how one fights a war, Harry." Adalrico blinked at him.

"That is how Voldemort fights a war," said Harry.

Adalrico stared at him for some time more, his eyes wide and troubled. Harry stared back. At last, Adalrico glanced away from him and rose to his feet, shaking his head.

"I don't know how you do that," he muttered. "I come here seeking peace on what could be the last night of my life, and you manage to make me feel unsettled, and troubled, and as if I want to stay alive to see the end of your mad plans."

Good. Then maybe you'll fight harder tomorrow, Harry thought. "Good night, Adalrico," was all he said aloud.

Adalrico departed. Snape came back in at once. "What did he want?" he demanded.

"To tell me about Alba Starrise," said Harry, and raised the flames a bit higher. He imagined he could see a writhing, screaming, raped woman if he looked at the fire long enough. He wondered for a moment if he should tell Augustus that Evan Rosier, at least, was still alive and free of Azkaban. Then he imagined Rosier's pleasure in destroying Augustus, and he knew exactly why Adalrico hadn't done it. He was trying to halt the vengeance here, to insure that it didn't slop over onto others. Harry doubted it was to protect Rosier. He was trying, as hard as it was to imagine, to protect Augustus, or, if he died, the Starrise heirs who might otherwise feel a compulsion to avenge their mother, and would only die.

And if that is not a sign that he has changed from the man he was, I don't know what is.

"Why must you be everyone's confessor?" Snape asked, his voice ragged.

Harry looked up at him in surprise. "I'm sorry," he said after a moment. "I don't know why I didn't think that you'd be affected by the duel, too. Adalrico is your friend, isn't he? Or was."

"I was thinking of you," said Snape.

Harry blinked, then smiled. "I can bear it," he said, facing the fire again. "But I do have some things to say tomorrow."

The dawn came cold and clear, in a pearly gray sky. Harry stood at the entrance of Snape's tent and breathed in the nipping air. Adalrico and Augustus had apparently decided to duel at nine-o'clock, and it was eight now. That left him an hour to say what he wanted to say.

"This is not the wisest move," said Snape at his shoulder.

"So you've said," Harry murmured, not looking at him.

Snape grunted, and fell silent.

Harry began to walk in the direction of the stone table. He saw a few people glance at him curiously, but most didn't look until it was obvious where he was going. A lot of people were staring at him by the time he leaped onto the tabletop and turned to face them, once again casting the spell that would allow his voice to reach their ears without shouting.

"There will be a duel today," he began. "A duel to the death, between Augustus Starrise and Adalrico Bulstrode."

Muffled snorts came to him. Most people would already have known that, of course. Harry raised his eyebrows higher, in a reprimanding expression he'd learned from Snape, or perhaps from Draco; it was hard to remember. This was just the beginning, just the preface, to give them an idea of what he was talking about.

"It is a duel that I do not intend to stop or affect," said Harry. "It is beyond my reach for affecting. I do wish to make it clear that this is an example of the rituals I was speaking of on the first day of this meeting, the ones that enshrine vengeance at the cost of forgiveness, that say pride and honor are more important than life." He snorted, and knew the sound would carry on the spell's wind as readily as the words. "I don't agree," he added. "If Starrise had consulted me before he tried to call the duel on Mr. Bulstrode, I would have advised him not to do it."

"He killed my sister."

Harry had wondered how long it would take Augustus to show up. He turned towards him, and nodded.

"Or was one of those responsible for her death, at least," he said. "As I understand it, she committed suicide when she was rescued."

"And you think that makes him less responsible?" Augustus was in fine form today, every line of his face wrinkled in aristocratic disdain.

"Of course not," said Harry. "But she's dead, Mr. Starrise. And you've wasted your life on a hunt for her murderers that might not have borne any fruit. They could all have been dead, for what you knew. Or fighting beside Voldemort still, and someone else might have killed them.” Or alive, and so mad that it is plain suicide for a Light wizard to go up against them. “Perhaps you would have faced them, and slain them, and never known it. It’s sheer chance that you’re facing one of them in a duel today. Forgive me, but I don’t think that sheer chance is worth the loss of a life.” He didn’t have to pour contempt into his voice. It was already all there.

“You are lost to honor if you believe otherwise,” Augustus breathed. He was staring at Harry as if seeing him for the first time.

“I already said that I considered some things more important than honor,” said Harry, tossing his fringe out of his eyes and frowning at him. “And that’s something everyone still in the alliance, or thinking about joining it, should know,” he added, turning his eyes on those who watched him. “I don’t think vengeance is an excuse. I don’t care how many rituals justify it. As you’ve seen with this duel, I may sometimes be unable to do anything but despise it. But if I can affect its progression—if I hear that someone who fights with me plans to use torture as a means of vengeance, or a ritual, like this, that puts honor ahead of life—then I will cut that person out of the alliance at once.”

“Is that not trampling on our free wills?” Lucius Malfoy said that, his eyes the color of the sky.

Harry smiled coolly at him. “Of course not. I won’t kill anyone who does this, after all, or drain their magic. But I can and will make them politically powerless, unable to have a say in the formation of the wizarding world. For some people, Mr. Malfoy, that fate is worse than death.” He held Lucius’s eyes, and saw him get the point.

“How unlike a Lord, Harry,” said Augustus, “to restrain himself when he might do more. Cut them out of the alliance? How prosaic and limited a punishment.” His voice was relaxed, a contemptuous drawl.

“I am not a Lord,” said Harry, speaking slowly and clearly. “Apparently, Mr. Starrise, you didn’t understand that the first dozen times I told you, so here is a thirteenth. I want limits. I want checks and balances. I want the free wills of my allies to be unbounded—except where they step on the free wills of others. You’ve cleverly arranged matters so that I can’t punish you for interfering with Mr. Bulstrode’s free will. Where I can stop others from doing that, I will. All I can do in this situation is resent you terribly for wasting your life and potentially wasting another.” He met Augustus’s eyes and held them. “That is the difference between us.”

“He tortured my sister,” said Augustus. His face was dark now. “He raped her.”

Made her rape someone else, actually, Harry thought. He nodded. “He did,” he said. “And during the First War, the Aurors were granted permission to use the Unforgivable Curses, at least for a short time. Has anyone ever demanded justice for those innocent people who were tortured or compelled or killed in the process of searching out Death Eaters? Wouldn’t they be laughed at if they tried? But they would have as much basis as you do for demanding justice for your sister.”

“That was war,” said Augustus. “As much force was used as was needed. But this—this was different. This was torture.”

“And if an Auror used the Cruciatus Curse on an innocent person?” Harry widened his eyes. “That wasn’t torture, Mr. Starrise? Explain the difference to me, please.”

“You will never understand,” said Augustus, appearing to swell, “because you are not of the Light.”

Harry laughed. It was a sharp sound, and he saw it make people flinch like the crack of a whip. “Nor will I be,” he said. “I am loyal to neither the principles of Dark nor of Light, because there are always times when that loyalty becomes slavish. I will choose from day to day, Mr. Starrise, and make sure that those choices march with my own principles. It’s a considerably more frightening existence than a blind decision for Dark or Light, so I can see why not many wizards choose it. But it is what I am. Perhaps you should have questioned that more closely before you entered the alliance.”

He met the eyes of the people in front of him, and saw stunned expressions on some faces, and understanding ones on others. Perhaps they finally understand now why I'm not a bloody fucking Lord.

He sprang from the tabletop and turned towards Augustus with a sarcastic bow. "I believe that you have a duel with Mr. Bulstrode in five minutes," he said. "Far be it from me to keep you from it."

Lucius tapped his wand against his hip as he watched Adalrico and Starrise move towards the center of the large clear space of grass where they would be dueling. His mind could step back from the drama of the fight to see how Harry's words applied to him, as it always could.

Harry had said he would tolerate no torture done in vengeance.

That meant he could never be allowed to find out what Lucius had done to Lily and James Potter, lest it meant that the Malfoys would not have their chance at political power. Harry might even break off the joining with Draco. Lucius was not entirely sure of that, how strong his love for Draco was in comparison to his principles, but it was a possibility.

Lucius had taken steps he thought were sufficient at the time to insure Harry would never find out. But his contacts at the Ministry had since informed him that Fiona Mallory, the Auror who'd taken the fall for his vengeance, had been sacked for her actions. She was living somewhere in London, doing Merlin knew what.

Perhaps it is time to make sure that one of those things is not confessing my part in the torment of Harry's parents.

Lucius nodded sharply before he turned to watch the duel. Something to attend to when this was done with, then.

Augustus shook off the last of his irritation as he walked to the center of the grass. Harry was right—at least, if he really believed the rubbish he had been spouting. He should not have joined the alliance. Harry was not the right leader for someone of Augustus Starrise's principles if he could not even see that of course vengeance in a situation like this was justice.

He turned to face Adalrico Bulstrode, who had walked out to stand opposite him. The air began to shimmer with the colors of gold and silver and bronze and iron, the four metals they had called upon to witness the duel. The shimmer spread out around them, forming a hazy, round wall of light. Neither of them would be able to cross that barrier until one of them was dead, and no one from outside could interfere. Augustus had called Bulstrode to a place beyond the reach of the wizarding world, and here it was.

Augustus took a deep breath. The air was sharp around him, the colors carving lines into his eyes and his brain. This was the end of life, the end of days, the end of the aching and the hurting.

Bulstrode stared at him, dark-eyed and dark-haired, heavy as the black stone that his ancestors had chosen as their sigil. Augustus wondered if his sister had seen him like that in her last moments on earth.

He felt an answering spark from his staff that seemed to say she had, though, Augustus thought, without the fear that showed in his eyes now.

He held his staff out in front of him, and bowed to his opponent. The duel's code said he had to. Bulstrode bowed stiffly back, clearly uncomfortable with the gestures of honor. Augustus smiled. He was no duelist. He was no duelist, and the morning around them was gray and green and brown with spring, and any moment now, Alba would be avenged.

Both of them knew the moment to begin. The wall of light told them, the morning told them, the tension between them—between executioner and criminal, Augustus thought, between Light wizard and Dark wizard—told them.

Bulstrode flicked his wand, and, of course, a Dark Arts defense spell came spilling out. "Defensor vindictae!"

Black mist filled the dueling ring, a fist opening in the middle of it. Augustus knew the fist would seize him and crush him if he wasn't careful. He also knew it would never have the chance to touch him.

"Finite Incantatem," he said, loudly and calmly, and the mist dissipated. He was already into his next spell, a step ahead of Bulstrode, who had thought he would have a moment more behind his Dark shield. Augustus heard his own voice incanting, and the stumbling words of his opponent.

"Aspectus ignis!"

"Ardesco!"

Augustus concentrated on the fire that Bulstrode had tried to light within him, and murmured Finite Incantatem over and over, drawing on the power that he'd stored in the staff. The fire went out, and he looked up, expecting to see Bulstrode stumbling. After all, the Fire Sight spell tended to do that, effectively blinding an opponent by making him see the heat that burned inside every object.

But Bulstrode had closed his eyes, and was fighting blind. He shouted the next spell with a note of triumph in his voice that Augustus didn't understand, unless it was delight in using the Darkest spell he could think of. "Cogo!"

The Compression Curse struck Augustus before he was ready—he had always underestimated how fast that one moved—and he felt pain crumpling his shoulders, shoving his spine into his buttocks, trying to make him bow his head so that it could crumple him. But they did not know Augustus Starrise, neither the original creator of this spell nor Adalrico Bulstrode. He would never bow his head. He bore up under it, and even cast a nonverbal Shield Charm to protect himself from the next spell, and only then reached out to the power in the staff again to end the curse.

Bulstrode was at work, too. The glow of Shield Charms moved around him when Augustus next looked, and a black spark he wasn't familiar with. Bulstrode thrust a fist forward with a wordless cry, and ebony fire galloped from his hand, heading straight for Augustus.

It ate through the Shield Charm as if it wasn't there, and struck his left hand, not the one that gripped the staff. Augustus looked down at the sudden lack of feeling. His arm had turned to stone from the fingers to the elbow.

There was a moment when he might have panicked. He forced the panic away. This is for Alba.

He threw himself sideways from the next rush of black fire, knowing it must be one of the Bulstrode magical gifts. Most Light families let others know what they could do, speaking in honesty, walking in the daylight. Dark families kept them secret so their enemies wouldn't know exactly what they might do in battle. Paranoid bastards.

And these are the kinds of people Harry would ally himself with. I was right. This alliance was wrong for me.

Dragging the stone limb, he concentrated on himself, and cast Exsurgo. Strength raced through him like a river in flood, like the Light in the ritual he'd used on Midwinter—and he didn't have to feel sorry about that, because they'd been doing it to battle the Dark, not to aid Harry—and gave him the ability to stand up straight and renew the Fire Sight spell. Bulstrode had just opened his eyes, but he slammed them shut again, with what Augustus thought was a little whimper.

Augustus knew he could still win. It was a matter of finding a Light spell that would eat through Bulstrode's strong shields and kill him. He knew the other man was stronger than he was, magically, but that didn't matter right now, when he was also blinded and reduced to relying on his family gifts to grant him an advantage.

Alba's voice whispered restlessly in his head. You can do it, brother. Remember the spell that you used when the Death Eaters tried to raid our house in the First War.

Augustus smiled. Yes, that would do.

“Lux aeterna!” he cried, throwing his hand and what he could move of his left arm wide, and pouring all his will down the staff, as if it were a river forced through a narrow course.

Light exploded around him, a burning sunrise, a killing radiance. He knew it would first blind Bulstrode and then hollow him out and then consume him with fire. It was fatal only to wizards who used Dark Arts, and Bulstrode had surely used enough of them to fall victim to it.

It is right that he die of the Light, Augustus thought, and opened his eyes, and watched eagerly. He could see through the radiance, though no one who used Dark Arts would be able to.

He saw the Light stalk towards Bulstrode. He saw him fall before it like a sacrifice on a pyre. Augustus opened his mouth to laugh.

And Bulstrode whispered back, “Obscuritas aeterna.”

He should not have been able to remember the counterspell at such a time. He should not have been able to concentrate on it when he was blinded and in such a position that he could only react defensively, Augustus thought. But darkness rose around him, and spread forward, and met the Light in mid-flight. Darkness and Light coiled and whipped and became a black-and-gold maelstrom that it hurt Augustus to look upon. Then they faded and were gone.

Bulstrode unleashed another stream of the black fire, and Augustus’s right leg was suddenly heavy and useless.

That was when he knew he was going to die.

Madness stirred in him. He could not die and allow Alba’s murderer and rapist to go unpunished. He could bear death, he could bear how long his justice quest had taken him, but never that.

So he pulled his magic into himself—all of his magic, including that stored in his staff. He concentrated deep, and heard the voice of the tutor talking to him and Alba, telling them legends, telling them old stories. Perhaps the particular story that came to him did so because of the round table that Harry had constructed; he did not know. Perhaps it was his sister's inspiration. But, either way, it was perfect.

He dropped his shields. He left himself utterly vulnerable to that black fire. And before it came again, he whispered, "Ulcer regis piscatori!"

The spell wrenched itself out of him. Augustus could feel his insides convulsing as he gave up his being to the curse, his magic and his purpose in life. His sister was with him in that moment, moving with him, speaking the words she had been unable to speak in life because they had taken her wand from her before they began torturing her, of course they had.

Augustus knew the curse had flown and hit Bulstrode. He gave a deep sigh, contentment consuming him before the fire turned him into a stone statue. It was done. He had at least taken vengeance for Alba before his death, and Pharos would know what to do in his absence.

And then he was with Alba, and everything was well again.

Harry didn't at first realize what had happened to Adalrico, because he was busy staring at Augustus, turned to a bizarre mixed figure of stone and flesh. The black fire had hit his head, killing him, but his torso, his right arm, and his left leg were still alive. Harry gave a shudder and turned away. The duel had been swift, but still he felt the waste of life lying in his body like a stone limb of his own.

"Harry!"

He turned back swiftly. The barrier around Augustus and Adalrico had vanished with the ending of the duel, and Millicent was kneeling next to her father. It was her voice that had cried out, so angry and fearful and lost that Harry hadn't recognized it at first. He strode forward and knelt next to her.

"What is it?" he asked, and then saw the seeping wound on Adalrico's heel and heard his soft, pained breaths.

"I tried to heal it," said Millicent, her fingers closing around her wand and then letting it go again. "I did. But I can't. What is it? What curse is this, Harry? It's hurting him." She gazed up at him as if he could make everything better.

Harry swallowed. He couldn't make everything better, and this was one of those things. "I'm sorry, Millicent," he said softly. "It's the Fisher King Curse. It inflicts a wound that doesn't heal. The only person who can cure it is the person who cast it." He led her gaze to Augustus.

"But that—that doesn't make sense," Millicent whispered. "I mean, you're a Lord-level wizard. You should be able to reverse it."

Harry shook his head. "This is one of those times where pure power doesn't do anything," he said, and gently moved his hand over Adalrico's face, fearing him blinded. It was just the Fire Sight spell, though; the pain in his ankle was distracting him from ending it. Harry ended it, and nodded to Adalrico as his eyes flicked open. "It's like someone gone insane from the Cruciatus Curse, Millicent. I can't bring back Neville's parents, no matter how powerful I am. And I can't heal this. It doesn't kill, but it is part of the laws of magic that only the caster can reverse it. And I wasn't the caster. I'm sorry," he added, feeling the words inadequate in the face of Millicent's stare.

"He's right, daughter," Adalrico said, his voice exhausted. "In the end, he wanted to cost me some pain more than he wanted to live. I felt his shields drop when I attacked. He poured everything he had into this curse, knowing I would kill him a moment later." He pressed Harry's hand hard enough to hurt. "I do not blame you. Leave us for a moment, Harry. I have to speak to Millicent."

Harry nodded, and stood, backing away as Elfrida hurried up to her husband and daughter with Marian in her arms. "I'm glad you're alive, sir," he murmured.

"So am I," said Adalrico, in a voice that was already learning to beat back the pain. "I still have a chance to change."

Harry had to turn away then, partly from the truth of the words and partly so Elfrida could have some privacy as she knelt beside her husband and embraced him. He had to breathe in sharply several times, before he shook his head and met Draco and Snape's gazes with a tiny nod. He was all right.

He was even more confirmed in his prejudices against vengeance, though.

The cost is too high. Always too high. I'll do what I must to win the war and what I can to alleviate the pain of others, but vengeance is not something I can commit, not a wound I can inflict on my soul. No more. No longer.

Intermission: After the Duel

“No, to the side. Now try me.”

“Expelliarmus!”

Millicent caught her breath as she watched her father lunge out of the way of her spell, and land heavily in the dirt under their tent. Adalrico had insisted on removing the charms that protected them from the rough, wet ground, so that he could get used to walking on different kinds of surfaces with his wounded ankle. Now he stood up, grimacing, and flexed his foot. The bandages around it were already unraveling, but he tightened them again with a muttered charm and faced her.

“Well, what are you waiting for?” he demanded. “You should have attacked me while I was down, daughter. None of this fair play nonsense, if you please, or I shall think you’ve been spending too long around Gryffindors.”

With a breathless laugh, Millicent obliged, and dueled further with her father, helping him to test the limits the wound had put on his life. Elfrida sat in a corner of the tent with Marian, and held her, and smiled like the stars.

Millicent had come to accept that the Fisher King Curse couldn’t be healed, mostly because Adalrico himself seemed so accepting. The wound was permanent. It wouldn’t heal, and if Adalrico removed the skin where it had taken root, or even his whole foot, it would only move up his leg and fester there. The important thing was to keep it clean and wrapped so it wouldn’t stink, drink plenty of Blood-Replenishing Potion from now on, and learn to know what movements he could make without pain and which he couldn’t.

It was a small price, considering he might have paid with his life, though Millicent still found herself unsatisfied. She would have liked vengeance against Starrise. But Adalrico had seen the thoughts written on her face and shaken his head at her.

“Do not, daughter,” he’d said softly. “You heard what Harry said. He means it. No seeking vengeance against Starrise.”

“They’re not part of the alliance anymore,” said Millicent. Harry had come to their tent an hour ago, to see how Adalrico was, and to share the owl he’d received from Pharos Starrise. Apparently, in the event of his uncle’s death, Augustus had instructed him not to ally with Harry, and to keep the linchpin from him by any means possible. “We could attack them.” She’d murmured those words directly after Harry had left, and still her father shook his head, that stubborn, dark expression fastened into place.

“Pharos Starrise is not part of the alliance any more, but Tybalt Starrise still is,” said Adalrico. “Attack his brother, and we would be obeying the letter of Harry’s words while disobeying the spirit. I won’t have that said of us ever again, Millicent. Once, I followed a Lord I had to be ashamed to own when I wasn’t doing exactly what he wanted. Now, I follow a leader I can be proud of, and that means doing what he asks of me, even when it’s hard.”

Millicent had nodded, reluctantly, and then they’d returned to their dueling practice. Now Adalrico stood, bowed to her, and then limped across to her mother, who lifted her face to be kissed.

Millicent slipped out of the tent as she had the night before, but this time, her gaze fixed on the moon and stars was much happier than it had been. She had also been alone then, and she wasn’t now. Catching a faint movement off to the side, she whirled around and lifted her wand.

Pierre Delacour moved a step forwards, raising his hands with a slight smirk. “My lady,” he said. “I can approach you without triggering your defensive reflexes, no?”

“You can,” said Millicent, lowering her wand and studying him carefully. “But I did not think you would ever wish to approach me again, after what you have heard about my father.”

“My lady, your father survived a duel,” said Pierre. “I am not sure why this strange country is so without honor, but in mine, we can put aside wounds when the duel is done. That is the way of it. That is what all duels were meant to do in the past, to satisfy honor.” He claimed her hand and brushed his lips over her knuckles. “And I find myself more than satisfied in the beauty of the winner’s daughter.”

Millicent knew he was flattering her—she wasn’t beautiful—but that he was willing to flatter her said a great deal. She laid a hand on the side of his face and said, “My father did grant me permission to marry you if he’d died in the duel.”

“Did he?” Pierre cocked his head, eyes intent on her face.

“He did,” Millicent confirmed. “Therefore, it’s not entirely inappropriate if I do this.” She leaned forward and kissed him on the lips.

Pierre stiffened in surprise for just a moment, then kissed her back, and stepped away with a soft smile of appreciation. “Thank you, my lady,” he murmured. “If you were a shy and fainting maiden—”

“Then you would not have approached me at all,” Millicent retorted, and nodded towards the entrance of the Bulstrode tent. “Shall we go inside and see what my father has to say about this, since he’s still alive?”

“That doesn’t make sense?” Laura Gloryflower sounded concerned, her eyebrows rising. “But it is supposed to make sense, vates. I assure you, all the northern families but Starrise are agreed on this.”

Harry forced himself to relax and sit still on his stool. Laura had shown up with such splendor—not only attired in formal robes adorned with her family crest, but with an artificial golden cat at her side—that he felt as if he should have received her in grander surroundings. Now, he could admit that staying in the Black tent might have been a good idea. “I suppose it does make sense,” he said. “I just didn’t expect it, ma’am. I thought for certain you would follow Starrise in denying me the linchpins. I had seen that many of the northern families did whatever he told them.”

Laura shrugged. “That was Augustus. Pharos has been in the shadow of his uncle for so long that very few of us have had the chance to know him for himself. I know him better than most, and I don't like what I see. Pharos is a follower, not a leader. That was the core of the conflict between Tybalt and Augustus, you know," she added. "Both were leaders, and Tybalt could not endure the kind of confinement Pharos accepted. But Starrise will pay for it now. Augustus has the heir he wanted, but Pharos is already looking for the guidance that he misses.

"The other part of it, Harry, is that this was a duel. If we broke apart from you now, or denied what we promised you before the duel began simply because a Dark wizard won, then we are saying such rituals are worthless to us. A duel matters—but only if the person we think should have the victory wins?" Laura snorted and shook her head. "Any true Light wizard is worth more than that, Harry, I would hope. I'm sure Augustus didn't intend to, but he did you a favor. You were bound to accept the result, and that binds us to accept it, too."

Harry blinked and ran his hand through his hair. "Then I have all the linchpins except Starrise," he said. "I—thank you, Mrs. Gloryflower. I still didn't expect it, though it's starting to sound as if I should have."

Laura's lips wrinkled in a small smile. "Perhaps when you come to understand Light wizards better, Harry, you will learn to expect such things," she murmured. She stood and considered him for a moment, then added, "There are some of your Light allies who are a bit concerned that your guardian, your future joined partner, the person whose heir you are, and most of your closest allies are all Dark wizards."

"And my brother's Declared for Light," said Harry firmly. "And I count the Weasleys and many other Light children in Hogwarts as friends. And I need the support of the Light families to take out the linchpins. I appreciate the concern, Mrs. Gloryflower, and thank you for telling me of it. But I don't intend to change matters in my personal life to suit my allies' whim."

Laura laughed in delight, and the cat beside her sat up and clapped its paws with a soft ringing sound. "I appreciate the honesty, Harry," she said. "And I can sway most of the others to seeing things your way, I'm sure."

“You’re their leader now, aren’t you?” Harry asked. “Now that Augustus is dead, they’re looking to you.”

Laura dipped her head. “Harry, whatever gave you that idea?”

He just looked at her, and she laughed again. “I am the most determined of them,” she said. “And that has always counted for a great deal in our world, more than magical strength; Augustus was not as powerful a wizard as Gloriana Griffinsnest, for example, but he had more of an idea of what to do with his power.” She paused for a moment, then added contemplatively, “And I think it will benefit your alliance, Harry. After all, I wish the rights of werewolves to be extended, too, now that my niece is one. I will try to persuade the others to see things the same way.”

“Thank you,” said Harry softly. Laura nodded.

“There is one more thing I wanted to tell you, a gift that only I can give you,” said Laura. “I understand that you may be joining battle soon.”

Harry nodded, his mind flashing to Midsummer and what he would try to do there. Some pieces of the plan were already in place—for example, the centaurs’ participation and the fact that he would have to find some way to cleanse the tainted magic in the stone—but others were floating, awaiting confirmation of certain reports.

“Allow me to offer you some artificial animals,” said Laura. “My family is small enough that our fighting alone would not turn the tide of battle, but some of our golden or jeweled creations might.” She smiled down at the cat beside her, and touched the realistic-looking tufts of golden fur that grew from between the ears. “What kind would most help you? Horses? Unicorns? Cats? Dogs?”

If I’m right, then we’ll need to move swiftly on the battlefield, and attacking from above and underneath wouldn’t be a bad idea, either. “Horses,” Harry said firmly. “And anything you have that flies or burrows underground.”

Laura laughed again. "Then we can get rid of a prototype that one of my ancestors created and which has been gathering dust ever since," she said. "I will send you their specifications in a few weeks' time, Harry. Until then." She inclined her head and stepped out of the tent, the cat padding beside her.

Harry stretched his arms above his head and yawned. Snape had gone off for a private discussion with Regulus, and told Harry not to wait up. In fact, Harry was fairly sure that Snape had thought he would go to bed by now. But Harry had had to visit the Bulstrodes, read Pharos's letter, and have discussions with a few of his allies, including Laura, which had filled him with tentative determination. Most of them weren't going to be torn apart from him by this duel—

If—and that reminder always lingered in the back of their voices—Harry really did enforce the standards he'd spoken of. If he allowed his Dark allies to get away with things that he wouldn't allow his Light allies, then bad things would happen.

He was just turning for bed when the tent entrance rustled. John Smythe-Blyton was standing there when Harry faced it again, and he spoke at once in a hushed, excited voice.

"Tybalt can't be seen coming near you right now," he whispered. "It would be disrespectful to his uncle's memory, since the new head of the family has decided that he wants nothing to do with you."

Harry nodded, having expected that.

"But Tybalt wants you to know that he's still loyal to you," said John. His dark eyes shone in the firelight. Harry wondered if it was defying the family that had so despised him, or just the sneaking around and delivering of secret messages, that made him so excited. "He's going to do what he can to restore the linchpin to your control. And he says it's a good thing now that you didn't persuade Augustus to change the means of inheritance." He laughed, quietly, and then dipped his head to Harry and ducked out of the tent.

Harry paused, thinking about that. The linchpins were linked to the earth, yes, but also to a family. If he had not rejected his last name, then Lux Aeterna and the house at Godric's Hollow would have passed to him when James was stripped of his magic, because he was the elder son and of Potter blood. With the Black legacy, though, Regulus had had to choose the person he wanted to leave the inheritance to, and Sirius had been formally disowned and then reinstated with the help of Dumbledore's spell. There was no sharing of the property in common.

That was the major difference Harry could think of. He wasn't sure how it would help Tybalt keep the linchpin, though.

He shook his head, and sought his bed. He was tired, and if the events of the evening had strengthened him, the events of the morning had embittered him. He knew he would see the flesh-and-stone statue that Augustus had become in his dreams.

"You should tell him."

Regulus stood in the entrance of the Black tent, looking into the sky. Snape concealed a snort in his hand. He knew what Regulus was doing: watching the stars, the way those of his family tended to do in times of great crisis. Or maybe that was just Regulus. Certainly Snape remembered seeing him do it in their Death Eater days.

"You're a fine one to talk, Severus," his friend said, without looking over his shoulder. "Since you kept so many things from Harry for his own good, that you'd be turning his parents in not least among them."

Snape scowled and said nothing. That had been for Harry's own good, so that he wouldn't stop Snape and try to keep his parents and Dumbledore free. Regulus's secret was based on shame, from what he'd said, and shame was nothing Harry could not forgive.

"Besides," Regulus added then, "I'm going to tell him in a few days."

Snape fought to keep his jaw shut. At last he said, "And you're still not going to tell me, I suppose?"

Regulus's shoulders hunched. "...no. Please don't ask me, Severus. Telling you why would involve telling you the secret."

Snape bowed coldly and swept out of the tent, cursing his bad leg that wouldn't let him make as dramatic an exit as he liked; his robes swirled once and then dropped like a wounded bat behind him. He made his way back to his own tent, now and then studying the sky. He couldn't read whatever message Regulus had seen written in the stars, though, no matter how long he looked.

It was better looking than admitting he was jealous of Harry for receiving Regulus's confidence.

And it was better than the imaginary vision of a bottomless pit he could see opening under his feet. This alliance had not ended on the settled note Snape had thought it would. They all seemed to be hurtling forward faster than he would like, a fall that might end on Midsummer Day, or never.

Chapter Seventy-Five: Regulus's Shame

"Ouch!"

Harry shook his head and tried not to laugh as Draco went sliding off his bed, hitting his temple on top of the mental hurt he'd taken. He slid off his own and extended a hand, only to be stopped by the boundary of the rune circle Draco had drawn to keep his body safe while he was possessing Harry. "Are you all right?" he asked, when Draco picked himself up off the carpet and glared at him.

"You didn't say that you were going to do that," Draco snapped, shaking out his robes. He felt the side of his head and winced, and part of Harry's amusement melted.

"I am sorry," he said, and then visions of what worse wounds Draco could take on Midsummer Day touched him. "But if you can't ride out a Legilimency attack while you're possessing someone else, then I think this plan isn't going to work."

Draco looked up at once. "And who else would help you, you idiot?" he muttered, his fingers still on the lump on the side of his head. "Unless you have a centaur who can possess people waiting in the wings..."

Harry shook his head. "I didn't mean it that way, Draco. But you know that everything has to work for this plan to succeed. If you can't possess me while I use Legilimency on you, then that's not a bad reflection on you, but I'll have to find some other way to accomplish what I want. Because you're right. I have no one else who can play the role that you do in the battle."

Draco glanced up quickly. "That sounds as if you mean more than just a person who can possess people, Harry."

"I do." Draco had been like this since the meeting on the equinox and the announcement of their joining. At certain moments, he would demand evidence that he was important to Harry, and for more reasons than just battle tactics. Harry held his eyes, not smiling. "I need you there when this battle begins, Draco, for moral support and because I can't imagine pulling off something like this without you. I'm hoping to defang Voldemort and destroy most of the Death Eaters and show the wizarding world that the magical creatures can fight beside us and free the northern goblins all on the same day. If you weren't there, I would fail, simply because I wouldn't trust my own strength."

Smirking, satisfied, Draco nodded and stood. "Then I'll work on this some more," he said. "Just let me retrieve my wand and heal this wound first."

Harry nodded, and waited. He could wait, he told himself. It was only the beginning of April; they still had almost three whole months before Midsummer arrived and there was no more time to practice. He had no reason to feel as if impatience were gripping him by the throat and driving spurs into his sides.

But he did. And when he and Draco were finished here, then he had something else to study.

Zacharias Smith had never been so insulted in his life. Really, who did Harry think he was, asking a question like that?

Well, he thinks he's a vates and incipient Lord, and he's probably right, the voice of his training answered him, and Zacharias had to admit he was correct. But he still did not have to be so insulting.

"Of course I can ride, and of course I can ride more than brooms," he told Harry stiffly. "And no, before you ask, I have some experience with ordinary horses, too, not just winged ones. My family raised me properly, Harry. Light wizarding families once did a great deal of their fighting from horseback, you know."

He stifled the temptation to ask why Harry was smiling like that. Besides, in a moment the smile went away, and Harry nodded gravely. "Who are the other good riders in the school? Do you know?"

Zacharias sniffed. "Of course, Harry. The Smiths weren't the only pureblood families who patronized the institutions I attended before Hogwarts, you know. I know the best riders in Ravenclaw and Hufflepuff, and I can make a good guess about the Gryffindors—at least, if they’ve kept up their skills.” He glanced around, but though there were more than a few people lingering in the latest abandoned classroom where they’d held the dueling club, there were no other Slytherins. That meant he was free to add, “And you can ask about your own House. I had little contact with Dark families as I was growing up. My mother didn’t think it proper.”

“Your mother sounds a formidable woman,” Harry mused.

“She is,” said Zacharias unrepentantly. His mother had largely raised him; while his father was the one who’d taught him skills like riding a broom and some of his earliest spells, his mother had passed along the Smith family traditions to him, and taken him to attend sessions of the Wizengamot, and sent him to be instructed in riding and other necessary means of claiming his title. “I’ll tell her you said so. She’ll take it as a great compliment.”

Harry nodded. “So you’d be willing to go forth into battle on Midsummer Day, then? Riding?”

Zacharias felt a great surge of satisfaction. He would never be so rude as to show it—one thing pureblood Light heirs did not do was complain about petty things—but he had resented the fact that the Slytherins and his Dark allies received so much attention from Harry. He had attended the alliance meeting, of course, but Harry had paid him almost no personal attention. He supposed Harry felt sure of the Smiths’ support, while he needed to spend some more time on securing those uncertain allies who still wavered, but he had fumed about it all the same. “Being felt sure of” had felt an awful lot like “being taken for granted.”

And now here was personal attention, and he hadn’t even had to complain to receive it. Harry had or was going to have horses for the battle, and he had, quite sensibly, thought that Zacharias, as a pureblood Light wizard, would know how to ride. He wasn’t going to insist on leading the riders himself, which Zacharias was privately grateful for. Harry might be unsurpassed on a broom, maybe even on a dragon, but he’d shown no sign of skill on horseback.

That Harry was asking for help soothed another fear that Zacharias's mother had voiced to him: that this was a leader who did not know how to delegate. Obviously, he was learning.

"I would be honored," said Zacharias, when he realized that some moments had passed and he hadn't given an answer to Harry's question. "And I'll start approaching some of the other good riders. I know that Chang would be willing to give up her life, at least, and as she owes you a life debt, that's quite proper, but others will need to ask permission of their parents."

Harry nodded. "I know it sounds strange," he said, "sending children to battle against a Dark Lord and his Death Eaters. And if their parents are good riders who would rather go into battle instead, then I'll be happy to have them. But others—I don't know if I have enough time to bring other people I trust into this alliance, get them to trust me, and then insure that they can ride well enough to go forth into battle."

"I am not a child, Harry, at least," said Zacharias stiffly. "Remember that my family keeps the old age of majority, at fifteen."

Harry actually swept him a little bow. "I did forget. My apologies."

Zacharias relaxed. "The horses are a new addition to your plans, aren't they?" At Harry's nod, he added, "I can ask my mother if she'd be willing to participate, though I'm almost sure she will be."

"Thank you," Harry said, and then he grinned, and then he was gone. Zacharias felt relaxed and elated for a long time after he left. When Harry wasn't on the brink of losing his temper and thrashing someone else to death, then he did make an inspiring sight. Zacharias would be happy to ride for him.

He got a firecall from his mother that evening. Miriam Smith was more than willing to go into battle, if her son called her.

Zacharias went to bed thinking that all was right with the world, since his day had also included a kiss from Hermione, and his confounding her with a pureblood ritual she didn't know.

Harry turned the sheathed knife over in his hand thoughtfully. He had started looking through the gifts he had received—from Lucius in the truce-dance and from his allies for Christmas and his birthday—and had found one that might be perfect for his plans.

He drew the knife from the sheath on a sudden whim, and held it up to the light that came from the lamp on his bedside table. The blade glittered at him, a sharp golden contrast to the dark hilt. Adalrico had given the blade to him for the Christmas in which Harry and Lucius had concluded their truce-dance, and the words he had spoken about it still rang in Harry's mind.

One of my ancestors fell in love with a Lady of the Light. But she would not have him, which is not surprising, since he was Declared Dark and had aided the Dark Lord that Lady defeated. He created this knife to symbolize what he could not have. The hilt is forged of the same rock that makes up Blackstone's walls. The knife blade is sunlight that he captured on a Midsummer evening—the last ray as the sun sank beneath the horizon on the day of longest light.

Harry half-wished he had remembered this blade last year. Then he could have used, it perhaps, to fend off the loss of his hand.

Or could he have? Voldemort's power at the moment of sunset on Midsummer last year had been absolute. He might only have bound Harry as he already had and then taken the knife. Harry shuddered to think of it in Voldemort's hands. Perhaps it wouldn't have aided him—Adalrico had said that the knife's Light blade was unhappy in the hands of a Dark family like the Bulstrodes, so it would probably have been even unhappier with the actual Dark Lord—but he could have corrupted it, broken it, found a use for it. Harry was now confident that Voldemort could find a use for everything, even those objects he ought to most despise. He'd break them down into their component parts and soil them, drain them for their magic, if he couldn't do anything else.

Now, though, it would probably be the perfect tool to aid him for a moment on Midsummer that Harry was rather nervous about.

He tossed the knife in the air and tried to catch it, cursing mildly as it spun through his fingers and onto the floor. He slid it back into its sheath and laid it across his lap, then muttered, "Here goes nothing," as he took out the stone from his robe pocket that contained the tainted magic.

It felt warm to his hand, and the tainted magic chose to manifest as a whisper in his head. Now it sounded like Voldemort's voice, now like Dumbledore's. Just now, it had adopted a warm, grandfatherly tone.

You could free me, you know. I would obey your will from now on, and only yours. I promise. I am tired of being cooped up in here. I want to be free. I would let you use me as you willed. Imagine yourself, more powerful than your mentor, more powerful than your magical ancestor.

Harry shook his head. He wondered if the magic's lack of imagination in tempting him was due to the Lords it had come from, or the fact that it just didn't understand him. It should have spoken about the good he could do, if it wanted him to free it. Power for its own sake repelled Harry. What in the world would he do with it? It was what he could use magic for that mattered to him.

He lay back on his bed, cradling the stone in his hand and staring at it. The knife shifted position, and he rolled over so that it slid onto the bed and couldn't stab him. He would not have a better chance than this for cleansing the magic, he thought. Blaise had had an argument with Ginny and was currently sulking in the library, and Draco was serving a detention with McGonagall for cheek. Just because he was Harry's boyfriend didn't give him the right to Transfigure teapots into tabby cats biting their own arses, as he'd found out.

Harry closed his eyes. He had thought of a way to do this that might work, if only by example. The phoenix web Lily and Dumbledore had placed in his mind had been supposed to strain impurities out of his magic. Harry doubted that had worked the way they thought, but phoenix fire was a symbol of purity. Perhaps he could use his own fire to burn out the soiled magic and leave behind the clean material.

Perhaps.

Harry took a deep breath and called the phoenix fire, concentrating on the shape of the flame. When he opened his eyes, he was looking through a haze of blue. Luckily, he'd already fire-proofed his bed and his curtains—easy enough to do without Draco and Blaise noticing, since Harry always cast his own cleaning charms on his bed anyway, refusing to let the house elves do the work.

He held up the stone in front of his face, wondering if it was his imagination that its warmth had increased since he called the phoenix fire. Then he passed the fire through the stone.

The shock was sharp, grinding, twisting, as if the knife had managed to stab him after all, and had gone straight into his belly. Harry gasped and curled up around himself, but continued forcing the flame into the rock. It felt as if he were burning the bones of the earth, or slowly changing them from stone to wood. Should it be this hard to burn something?

The impurities were catching fire. But as they did, they tried to recoil, flee for their existence, and they took the only escape they could, rushing up through Harry's hand and his arm. It made the snake venom he'd taken from Snape after the Chamber of Secrets seem like a pleasant experience.

Burn! Harry thought, concentrating as hard as he could, bending all his will to that single task. You can't find refuge in me, because I'm burning!

The blue flame sprang higher, and Harry was grateful he'd thought to add the fire-proofing charms to his bed's ceiling, too. Then he lost himself inside a world of pain.

He had expected resistance, not pain, but since he'd begun, he didn't want to stop. He didn't know when he'd have the hours alone to face this again, and now that he knew it was going to hurt, the anticipation would be worse the next time. He poured all his will forward, pushing through curtain after curtain of dirt and disgusting stickiness, oil and morbid heat, rotting flesh and rotting wood. He could do this. He needed the magic for his plans on Midsummer. That meant he had to burn it clean.

Duty and responsibility pushed him through what he could not have endured for his own sake. And Harry could sense the clean magic slopping free from the stain, and settling quietly into the stone. The purity of it, the sharp imagined scent, lifted up his heart. He could do this. He could do this. He gritted his teeth and pushed the fire more and more, burning the inner defenses. He thought he was about halfway through. Who knew? Once he was halfway through, and had consumed the thick core of slime at the center of the stone, perhaps it would become easier. Or perhaps the greatest push would be saved for the end.

He heard a distant voice shouting, but didn't recognize it. And anyway, he was in no danger of dying, just of pain, and he doubted that anyone could break through the phoenix fire to stop him. He went on pushing, though his arms shook with the effort, and he could feel the pain throbbing in his shoulders. The impurities were shoving further into his body with each minute that passed. He always burned them, and he was sure that he would consume them before they could consume him.

One of his own sheets abruptly wrapped around him, plunging him into darkness, and in the shock, Harry lost his hold on the stone. It fell from his hand. He gasped, then, as the agony in his arms hit him without the ecstasy of the burning to compensate. He rolled over, running his hand up and down the shaking muscles of his left arm.

"Idiot," Draco's voice was saying beyond the blanket, and Snape snarled, a wordless sound of agreement. "Where should we take him?" Draco asked, and Snape murmured something Harry couldn't hear. "No, you're right, Pomfrey probably couldn't handle it," Draco said reluctantly, and then Harry was picked up and carried.

He struggled for a moment. He knew his fire wouldn't hurt the person holding him—Snape, he thought—because of the charms on the blanket, but he resented this. He'd been doing all right. He could get down and walk, and he wanted to make sure the stone and the knife were safe—

And then the pain coiled down from his shoulders and into his chest, now that Harry was no longer concentrating on burning the impurities out of himself. He closed his eyes and called the fire again, intent on cleansing his body, inside and out.

Brief, hot oblivion took him.

“—don’t know what to do to keep this from happening.” That was a voice that it took Harry some time to identify. Then he opened his eyes in startlement, only to see thick cloth directly above him. Peter?

“I’m going to talk to him.” That was Regulus’s voice, sounding exhausted, but determined through the exhaustion. “I don’t have a choice, anyway, and it’s obvious that Severus hasn’t managed to talk him out of this yet, nor my little cousin.”

“I’d like to talk to him myself.”

“All right, then.”

The thick cloth got tugged aside. Harry realized it had been a sheet, and that he was lying in an unfamiliar bed, in the middle of a room that slanted slightly, and seemed made of metal. A faint resonance of magic walked up and down his nerves like fingers, and he realized he must be in Silver-Mirror. Only the pool of fire and the pool of wind, combined with the portraits, could make him feel this way. He sat up, and glanced at the chairs on either side of his bed.

Regulus sat on his right, Peter on his left. Peter smiled at the sight of him, but the expression was harder than Harry remembered seeing on his face since the first night when Peter had introduced himself. Harry stared for a moment. He had the impression that he was seeing the Death Eater side of Peter for the first time. He often saw it in Lucius and Snape, and he had thought it would appear the same in Peter. It didn’t; this was not coldness, but hard, bright, ruthless determination, the resolve to keep going and endure no matter what happened.

He glanced at Regulus, and was alarmed to see that he looked haggard, and was holding his left arm at a short distance from his body. "Why haven't you gone into the picture yet?" he demanded, then coughed. His throat felt hot and dry, as if a scream had been burning inside it.

Regulus waved his wand, and a goblet soared over to Harry. He found that it contained water, which tasted of a faint sweetness. He sniffed a few times, but it didn't have a Calming Draught in it. And really, he thought as he put the goblet down and looked at the two men again, he should know them better than that.

"What happened?" he asked.

"Draco came back after his detention and found you burning," said Peter quietly. "He fetched Snape. He couldn't make you listen to him, but he did get the stone out of your hand and wrap you in the blankets, since he noticed those weren't burning. And then he brought you here."

"Why here?"

"This house is dedicated to fire as well as wind, Harry," said Regulus, stirring from his contemplation of his own arm. "The golden pool was able to wake you from your trance. You'd gone so far into your own phoenix fire that you were in danger of never coming back."

"I didn't know that was possible," said Harry, flinching a bit.

"It is," said Peter. "I suspected it, when I first realized what had happened after Fawkes sacrificed himself. There are old, old legends of people who witnessed a phoenix's rebirth being struck dead by the wonder of it, or mesmerized to the point that they never paid attention to anything else. We know those aren't true from having phoenixes live among us, but you have a phoenix's gifts within you. When we put you in the golden pool, it drew the fire to the surface, and forced it to mingle with its own flames. That freed you from the trance."

Harry wondered for a moment if that meant his own fire was gone now. But a gleam of blue along his arms reassured him.

“What you did, Harry,” Regulus said, his voice empty and distant and sad, “was an extraordinarily stupid and selfish thing.”

Harry suppressed his own immediate impulse to snap back. “I didn’t know what was going to happen,” he said quietly, when he had his breathing and his voice under control. “I didn’t even know it would hurt. I thought I could burn the impurities out of the magic in the stone, and all would be well. Phoenix fire purifies.”

“And why didn’t you tell anyone that you intended to do this?” Regulus cocked his head at Harry, his gray eyes gone almost black. “At least Draco and Snape could have been on hand to make sure that you didn’t hurt, or to stop you when the pain began.”

Harry shook his head. “Because I didn’t think it was dangerous.”

“That doesn’t excuse concealing it,” said Peter, frowning. “Even if you thought it needed to be done alone—and I can see why having other people around would be a distraction—then you could have told Draco about it. Or Snape. I’m sure they would have respected you and left you alone if that’s what you wanted, but at least they wouldn’t have been entirely alarmed when they found you on fire.”

Harry bowed his head. “I don’t know,” he said quietly. The decision he’d made seemed cloudy to him now, covered with its own scrim of dirt, like his vision immediately after rescuing Snape from the Chamber of Secrets. “I suppose because I thought they might not leave me alone, that they’d try to stop me.”

“Did you have to do this now?” Regulus asked.

“The time until Midsummer is dwindling,” said Harry. “I thought so, yes.” He met Regulus’s eyes. “Were you waiting for something like this? I thought you were going to go into the picture just a few days after the alliance meeting.”

Regulus sighed and bowed his head. “There are things I needed to tell you,” he whispered. “And it took me until now to work up my courage.” He looked at Peter. “Would you leave, please?”

Peter stood, but his gaze, all compassion when he looked at Regulus, hardened again when he swept it back to Harry. "I still want to talk to you about not having a proper sense of strategy," he said, and walked rapidly up the slanting floor and out of the room. Harry blinked. Is he holding his left arm too? No, just a trick of the way he was moving.

"Harry. There's something I need to tell you."

Regulus's tone was enough to make Harry lose interest in Peter's departure at once. He turned around and waited, locking his arms around his legs in a defensive gesture he hadn't made in a while. He peered at Regulus over the tops of his knees.

Regulus smiled faintly. "You look like Sirius when you do that." Then he closed his eyes, and began to speak without much transition.

"The pictures here in Silver-Mirror lead to different places, Harry, I told you that. I didn't tell you that I went into one of them when I was sixteen. I don't remember the motivation. Raging curiosity, I suppose, or maybe loneliness. Sirius had had his confrontation with our parents by then and run away, and I was still trying to get used to being the only child of my mother and father as well as their formal heir; they'd disowned Sirius the moment they could see straight.

"I chose a painting you may have noticed the last time you were here, one with a crystalline blue door high in a mountain."

Harry concentrated, and did remember seeing such a picture. He nodded.

Regulus opened his eyes. "I wouldn't have been able to tell you this just a few months ago," he said. "For that reason among many others, I'm glad that you've decided to accept the Black legacy, Harry.

"Most of the notes about that picture just said that anyone opening the door would learn something interesting. I opened the door. I can't remember what I expected to find there, either. Maybe the secret to a riddle, maybe all the answers to the next Transfiguration exam; I was pants at Transfiguration.

“The door gave me a vision of a golden locket marked with the crest of Salazar Slytherin.”

Harry gasped, despite his determination to stay silent and let Regulus tell the story. He recognized the description. That had been the ornament hanging around the neck of the partially transformed Sirius when Harry and Connor had faced him at the end of their third year. It had allowed a bit of Voldemort to possess Sirius, in some way. Harry still hadn't figured out how, and to be honest, he had no desire to. Sirius had fallen victim to the locket because he'd put it on. Harry never intended to be that impetuous.

“Yes,” said Regulus softly. “That one. I didn't know what it meant, at first. The vision showed me that it was hidden in a cave, and what I had to do to get at it. I didn't understand why I would want to. It was protected by Ineri and a—a nasty potion. Why? It wasn't a treasure of our family, so no honor would require me to recover it, and unless we fell on incredibly hard times, I couldn't imagine needing the locket for money. It was something interesting, but only in purely abstract terms.

“I understood better, later. There was a—nasty evening—” Regulus swallowed “—during which I became better acquainted with the Dark Lord, and learned things he probably wouldn't have wanted me to see. But to accomplish the ritual he wished to work, he had no choice but to trust me, and avoid using compulsion or possession or Obliviate, anything that would have threatened my mind or my memory of the event. I suppose he thought the risk small enough. After all, why should I connect the vision of a locket important to him with anything in particular?

“He hadn't known I'd seen that locket before. And if I was a good little Death Eater, I should have told him at once. But I held it secret, first thinking that it could be more useful if I waited, and then deciding that I had to make some attempt to gain that locket, if it was important to him. By then, I hated him.”

Harry was secretly impressed by the flex of Regulus's hands, the shine in his gray eyes. He didn't say anything else about the depth of his hatred. He didn't have to.

"I knew what I had to do to retrieve it, but it was an enormous risk. And there was the fact that retrieving it required me to—kill someone." Regulus pulled at a lock of his thick dark hair. "For a long time, I had nothing that could push me into doing that. I wasn't courageous like Sirius, or I would have gone to Gryffindor. So I hesitated, and waited, and thought that maybe something would happen to make me hate the Dark Lord less than I did.

"Then came Cardiff—"

"Will you please tell me what happened at Cardiff?" Harry surprised himself by asking. "Snape mentioned it to Adalrico Bulstrode, too."

Regulus made a careful motion of his head. "Sorry, Harry. I swore an Unbreakable Vow with Severus and Adalrico. None of us can talk about it unless all three of us agree to do so. And you'll have more luck dragging the secrets of Severus's childhood out of him. But what happened at Cardiff decided me. I had to go and get that fucking locket."

Harry settled back, knowing that he could hardly demand the secret when he'd kept his own, but simultaneously burning and eaten alive with curiosity.

"I suppose you'll laugh, given everything," said Regulus, and his voice had grown thick and heavy with reluctance. "But, by that time, I'd changed my mind about the killing and torture the Death Eaters did. I had my conscience back. I didn't speak out against it—I wasn't that brave—but I avoided it. Severus helped cover for me. I didn't know why at the time. Now I do. He had his own conscience back by then, and was spying for Dumbledore.

"To get past the guards on the locket, I took a Muggle along to the cave, and made him drink the potion, a horrible, horrible thing. He died from it, and it took him hours." Regulus bowed his head, his shoulders shaking. "I knew better by then, I believed it was wrong, and I did it anyway. That was what I didn't want to tell you, Harry. I sacrificed someone else's life for my own goals. I knew the locket was important to Voldemort, a trophy or a weapon, and I was determined to destroy it because it was the only one of his powerful weapons I knew the exact location of. But I didn't know how it was important, any more than Dumbledore knew exactly how forcing you into the guardian role would enable your brother to defeat the Dark Lord. So I committed the same error he did. You can blame me, hate me if you want. I wouldn't blame you."

Harry sat still for a long moment. "Who was the Muggle?" he asked at last.

Regulus shook his head, not looking up. "Just someone random I snatched off the street," he said. "I didn't even ask for his name."

Harry bowed his head to rest on his knees. "Well, blaming you won't bring him back to life," he said slowly. "And—it's not that I like it, Regulus, and if you did something like that right now I'd be horrified. But I still think it's not on the scale of what Dumbledore did. He sent Peter to Azkaban for twelve years, not even because of what Peter had done, but just to make sure that his tracks were covered. He set the phoenix web on me for nine years, and he never intended for it to be discovered or come off; I have Tom Riddle's possession to thank for the fact that I found it out at all. He molded Connor and my mother, and even my father to a certain extent—and Sirius, of course—to do exactly as he said, to obey and follow his every word. He Obliviated Remus when he made his first rebellion against that. He tortured the people at the Ministry with Capto Horrifer. And those are just the first of his crimes springing to mind. You made a sacrifice, once, and you hated yourself for it. He made them time and again, and he told himself all the while that he was doing right."

"Does that really make it better?" demanded Regulus. From the sound of his voice, Harry had found the edge of a deep pit of self-loathing. "Just because it was one person? And when I didn't even know what the damn thing did? And when it wound up costing my brother his freedom, his sanity, his life?"

Harry cocked his head. "You couldn't have known that would happen to Sirius, Regulus," he said softly. "You can't take on that much responsibility. And I suppose I have to take into account that I like you much better than Dumbledore—" that won him a quick, impossible-to-stifle smile "—and that this crime is old, while I lived through the consequences of many of Dumbledore's. That might be clouding my judgment. But I still think your sacrifice is not something you needed to be ashamed of and hide for this long. I won't think substantially different of you for it. I know the details of Adalrico's torture of Alba Starrise now, and I can accept that he's not the same man he was when he did that. I know one more detail of your Death Eater days, that's all. Though I'd still like to know what happened at Cardiff," he couldn't help adding.

"Ah, Harry," Regulus whispered. "That's the reason I said that your inflicting yourself with phoenix fire was selfish. I don't know what I would do, who I'd rely on, if I lost you." He lunged forward abruptly and caught Harry in a deep hug.

Harry hugged him back, a little stunned, understanding for the first time the depth of emotion that must have made Regulus keep silent about the Muggle's death for so long. He truly had been afraid that Harry would judge him, cast him aside with no chance for absolution. His body shook with relief now, and Harry held him close, running his hand gently down his back.

"Will you go into the picture to heal yourself?" he asked, when Regulus sniffed and drew back from him.

Regulus nodded, with a faint smile. "Yes. I expect to be gone for a while, Harry." He hesitated one more time, then said, "There's no harm in telling you this, now. I'm going to try to figure out what the locket was, exactly. From my viewing of your memories, the diary you destroyed in the Chamber of Secrets was something like it, of the same kind. Voldemort values them highly. I want to know what they are, what it means if we find and destroy them. So I'm going into two pictures, one to heal myself and another that might give me the answer to that question about the weapons."

Harry narrowed his eyes. "You could have done that without telling me the secret of the locket," he said. "What prompted you to confess, Regulus?"

Regulus retained the same faint smile. "You know me too well, Harry," he said. "That second picture is known by some in my family as the execution picture. It's killed people before. The world it leads to offers great treasures of knowledge, but only for a very high price."

"You thought you might die, and you didn't want to die with that weighing on your soul."

Regulus caught his eye. "Yes. And if I died, I wanted you to know why I died, Harry. I don't go to seek these answers lightly. I think they're important. And only the current owner of the Black legacy or his heir can enter the execution picture, and of course you can't go into it, since you're needed here."

Harry swallowed his protest. At least Regulus had told him. And he understood, now, a little better, why Regulus had so badly wanted Harry to be his heir. He now had someone to take care of his houses and the other parts of his legacy if he didn't return.

"All right," he whispered. "I agree."

Regulus smiled more broadly this time. "Thank you, Harry. When I'm out of this world, the houses will consider you their rightful owner, by the way, and you'll appear as Harry Black on the Ministry papers. But that's just an expression; you don't have to take my surname. When I come back, the Black name and the formal ownership will return to me."

Harry heard the plea in his voice, but held firm under the temptation to give in. Just as it was Regulus's choice to risk his life this way, it was Harry's choice to remain free of a family name for the moment. "All right," he said. "Thank you again for telling me."

Regulus hugged him, then, and held him tightly. Harry hugged him back, though he pulled away when he noticed the heat of the infected Dark Mark through the robe.

“Well, go away and heal yourself, then,” he said.

“Thank you, Harry,” Regulus said. “The last two years of my life have been the richest I’ve lived, thanks to you. I wanted you to know that.” He bowed, and then swept out of the room while Harry still sat blinking.

He didn’t notice how many minutes passed before Peter re-entered, carrying the stone filled with the tainted magic and the Midsummer knife. “He’s gone,” said Peter quietly, taking the chair he’d taken before. “He told me good-bye already, when he realized it was time to go.” He put the stone and the knife on the bed, and then leaned forward, his eyes fixed on Harry’s face. “And now we need to talk about strategy.”

“You said that,” Harry muttered. He picked up the stone. He could feel it filled with both pure magic and the taint. The coaxing, whispering voice of the magic in his head was not as strong now, but more deadly, more venomous, and Harry sensed that when he tried to drain the poison again, it would be more concentrated. “I didn’t know what you meant.”

“Well, now you should,” said Peter. “You can’t sacrifice yourself for a short-term advantage, Harry.”

Stung, Harry jerked his eyes up. “The Midsummer plan isn’t like that. It—“

“Might still fail,” said Peter, turning so that he faced Harry in profile, studying him with just one eye, like a carrion bird. “If you hang all your hopes on it, it’s likelier than ever to, because you’ll pour all your concern into it and neglect basic defense. I think you should remember, Harry, that you need to live beyond Midsummer, and your dying there, even to rid the world of Voldemort, is not an acceptable price.”

Harry frowned at him. "You really don't think that my death might be required to kill him?" he asked.

Peter snorted at him. "You forget that you're talking to someone who knows the full prophecy, Harry. It says nothing about that. And even if it comes true three times and chooses a different pair of candidates to fulfill the roles of elder and younger each time, it still doesn't say anything about death. I plan for you to remain alive. I want you to think that way, too."

"I do. I'm making plans for after the war. I'm entering a three-year courting ritual with Draco."

"Those are both wonderful signs," said Peter. "But you still might stumble because of your focus on the short-term. What happens after Midsummer? What's your next plan for fighting him?"

"I don't know," Harry admitted. "I suppose I might have to concentrate on the weapons that Regulus was talking about, but I don't know if he'll have returned by then." He closed his hand into a fist around the stone. "I don't know if he'll ever return, or when I should count him as dead."

"Two years," said Peter softly. "That's the longest any Black heir remained in the execution picture."

Harry nodded, his throat dry.

"So, you see," Peter went on, his voice implacable, "you'll have to think in the long term, Harry, and be flexible enough to have several plans going at once. Don't halt your vates work while you struggle to defeat Voldemort, and so on. Trust me." For a moment, a smile Harry had never seen before, part sneer and part twisted grin, slid across his face. "I learned to think in the long run while I was in Azkaban. If I'd thought solely of surviving one day and then surviving another, I would have killed myself. So I worked on the phoenix web, and imagined what I would do when I got out, if that ever did happen. I expected my friends to rescue me at first, when Dumbledore was so honored that no one would care about anything he did to secure the world from the Dark Lord, and then I had to adjust my thinking patterns when they never even came to visit me.” A snarl showed in his voice for a moment, then faded. “So. Adjust your own thinking. Don’t think that the pain you endure has to be alone, or that all of it is an acceptable price for what you might achieve because of it. Delegate. Get help. Tell us what you plan to do.” He caught Harry’s eye. “Remus told me that you’re reaching out to the werewolves. Think of how long they’ve been suffering, Harry, and think that you might be their best hope. Think of what might happen if you die.”

Harry winced. “Isn’t that just forcing myself back into thinking as a sacrifice, though?” he asked. “Of living for other people?”

“Now you’re thinking.” Peter flashed his teeth in a bright, rat-like smile. “Not necessarily, Harry, because I don’t want you to stop living for yourself at the same time. But don’t stop living, please.” His hand came down on Harry’s arm. “I have selfish reasons for asking that, and I have reasons for Regulus’s sake, too. Imagine what would happen if he came back and found you dead.”

Harry shuddered and bowed his head. “All right,” he said. “I’ve started asking for help, but I’ll expand it to asking for help with the phoenix fire, too.”

“Good, Harry.” Peter touched his hand, and then stood up. “Now, I said I’d looked up legends on phoenixes. Why don’t we go to the Black library—excuse me, Your Heirship, your library—“

“Shut up,” Harry muttered, but without much force.

“And start seeing how one controls phoenix fire?” Peter finished cheerfully. “One old legend about phoenixes seems to apply to you. Others might as well.”

It did, Harry had to admit, sound like a better idea than lying around in bed and worrying. He got up and followed Peter to go do some serious study.

Chapter Seventy-Six: Fenrir Greyback's Legacy

Draco was practicing how to move like a shadow.

He'd thought, after the brief surge of hot panic when he'd decided Harry was dying, and then the whispered conference between Regulus and Snape that announced Harry would have to remain at the Black house for a few days, that he'd want to do nothing but sit and brood about his boyfriend. But he'd got bored of that more quickly than he used to do. Draco had leaned back against his pillow, looking so baffled that Blaise evidently had a need to comment on it.

"Manticore got your tongue, Malfoy?" he asked, peering through his bed curtains. Draco refrained from commenting on the mark on his cheek, which looked vaguely as if someone had slapped him. It would make good blackmail material later. Besides, he wanted someone to pay attention to him.

"No," he'd sighed, folding his arms and putting them behind his head. "Just—I used to be able to brood on the wrongs done to me for hours. And now I can't. What's wrong with me?"

Blaise shook his head. "Harry's not here to make you into a little orbiting planet?"

"I notice your lioness isn't here either, though her handprint is," Draco had snarked, good intentions forgotten, and Blaise had scowled at him and ducked back inside his bed. But his remark had made Draco seriously consider whether it was Harry's absence that made him feel differently.

In the end, he'd decided that, no, it wasn't. Since his confirmation as Malfoy magical heir, he'd tried to keep busier, and now it had reached the point where sitting around and brooding on the wrongs done to him felt like a waste. At least his father created plans to avenge those wrongs. If Draco couldn't do that, said this new sensibility of his, he didn't deserve to brood at all.

So he joined the rune circle around his bed together again, and lay back, and closed his eyes, leaping into Blaise's mind—but not to take over his body. He wanted to see if he could skirt his thoughts like a shadow, move about inside them without Blaise noticing and panicking. That wasn't something he could practice with Harry, even if he'd wanted to; Harry was too sensitive to any change in his mind after all the Legilimency and Occlumency he'd learned and the numerous restructurings he'd done.

He found it was possible to lie like a stone in a river beneath the chattering surface of Blaise's thoughts, his presence nothing more than a gentle ripple of inquiry every now and then. He could access memories if he really wanted them, or, sometimes, tug Blaise's head to look in one direction rather than another. He did that a few times for amusement value, so that Blaise read part of the left page of his Astronomy text over and over, and then rose on smoky wings, padding out of Blaise's head and towards the common room.

He no longer felt the same panic he had when he tumbled free of another person's body. He had learned to relax and open senses he hadn't known he had when he was so focused on possessing a body instead of thoughts. Now Draco let himself follow a pulling line, centered on a sixth-year girl studying by the fire. He settled into her body, and let himself get used to the unfamiliar sensations of breasts, soft genitals, strange chemicals circulating in her bloodstream.

He wondered if he could make her scratch her nose, and what would be the best way to do it. Taking control of her hand and lifting it would alert her that something was wrong at once. But maybe he could make it itch?

Draco thought of her nose becoming red and raw and irritated, twitching the thoughts through her brain, mixing them in with the regular ones. A moment later, the girl gave a grunt of annoyance, reached up her hand, and scratched her nose. Draco ran through her mind like a shadow and on to the next one.

He practiced on most of the Slytherins and grew confident before he allowed himself to venture out of the common room. He turned down the dungeon corridor, and a powerful mind yanked him into another body.

Snape.

Snape was marking Potions essays, a frown on his face as he dashed off sneering remark after sneering remark. His mind constructed the words with such flowing efficiency that Draco couldn't trace the thoughts to their beginning. He settled very carefully into the depths of Snape's mind.

He's a Legilimens. I probably can't possess him without his sensing me. But it would be a wonderful opportunity to practice...

Draco stayed still as Snape went on marking, observing the complicated structure of his mind. Quicksilver pools glittered everywhere that he looked, most of them hiding jagged dark shapes—emotions that Snape didn't want to deal with, Draco surmised, from Harry's description. From this position, Draco could also see layered trap after layered trap, meant to catch and turn the probing of an enemy. And what traps were there that he wasn't seeing? It was a good thing that he'd resisted the temptation to possess him.

But still. It was such a wonderful chance to practice. And Snape might know something was wrong, but not what. He was more likely to think the Dark Lord than he was to think Draco. This was the first time that Draco had ever managed to possess someone without eye contact, after all.

That thought startled and momentarily elated him—his mistake, he guessed later. Those emotions were so foreign to Snape's mind that his thoughts bore down on them at once, trying to guess their source.

Draco found himself whirled around, caught in one of the traps, threaded between its glittering teeth. Snape examined him for a moment, and then he laughed. Draco, spinning, disoriented, couldn't tell if the laughter was in the physical world or the mental one; he only knew it made the trap ring like a banged kettle, and sent him bouncing from wall to wall.

“Draco. I should have known.” Snape’s voice drained and bled cold. “Think before you invade my mind again. If you intend to possess a Legilimens, you will need to be more subtle than that.”

He threw Draco out, as if he were a horse bucking, and Draco found himself drifting aimlessly in midair for a moment. He started to feel for a thread that would bring him to the next mind, and then he was speeding along a corridor, drawn relentlessly by another one. He wondered if he had remained in Snape’s mind so long that only one person was in the common room.

He understood when he found himself settling into Harry as he strode up the stairs to their bedroom. His gift knew this mind, and had brought him back to a familiar place.

Harry sensed him at once, but unprotestingly carried him up the stairs and walked close enough to his bed that Draco could fly to his body. He opened his eyes, rubbed at them, and rolled over to look at Harry.

“You’re back,” he said.

“So pleased you noticed.” Harry sat on his bed and stretched for a moment, then yawned. His face was exhausted, Draco saw, but it bore no trace of burns.

“That was a stupid thing you did,” said Draco, and Harry looked at him with a faint nod.

“Yes, I know,” he said. Draco kept his mouth clamped shut, because otherwise his jaw would dangle, and Malfoys shouldn’t allow themselves to be that startled. “I should have had someone else with me when it began,” said Harry. “Or I should have stopped when I realized that it hurt. I didn’t think it was supposed to hurt. Of course, I didn’t know much of anything about the phoenix fire.” He scooted up the bed until he lay back on the pillow. “That’s cured now.”

Still trying to deal with the fact that Harry had admitted something risky he’d done was a mistake, Draco could only say, “Pardon?”

"I researched phoenix fire in the Black library with Peter," Harry said, and then stifled another yawn. "For hours. I think I'll see the words behind my eyes when I go to sleep." He shut his eyes as if he would go to sleep then and there, and Draco leaned across the gap between their beds. His hand slammed into a barrier, though, and he realized the rune circle protecting his body was still up. He rose and impatiently smudged it away, then poked Harry.

"You don't get to tell me that and then just rest," he pointed out, when Harry opened his eyes again.

"Sorry." Harry gave him a sleepy smile. Draco caught his breath for a moment, then shook his head and fixed Harry with a stern look. "Peter thought that some of the old legends about phoenixes, the human-created ones, might apply to someone human who had phoenix fire and a—voice." Harry grimaced. Draco was about to ask what was wrong, but Harry was plowing on. "It seems they do. I can get mesmerized by my own fire if I'm not careful. And there used to be a tale that you could capture a phoenix chick by luring it with the smell of sweet flowers. Peter tried some on me. It has no effect when the fire doesn't burn, but when it does—" Harry shook his head and snorted. "I'll have to be in one of your rune circles if I want to burn in front of Voldemort, given that he has the Thorn Bitch with him, and she has plenty of flowers."

"Then you aren't planning on using your phoenix fire in battle?" Draco asked.

Harry shook his head again. "I don't think it would be useful. Even Fawkes didn't often burn his opponents, remember? He struck at their eyes, most of the time, or tried small, concentrated blasts of fire. And the way he died was as a sacrifice, consuming himself in his flames, yielding his own immortality. He died as a gateway for the Light, so that it could enter the heart of the Dark storm; it couldn't have done it otherwise." Harry stopped talking and stared into the remote distance for a moment. But though grief salted his voice, it had vanished when he went briskly on. "It would be dangerous to use as a weapon unless I had some idea of how to avoid being mesmerized when the battle is done. As long as I consumed the impurities from the tainted magic in my body, I could keep my mind on the task. The moment I tried to just call the fire for its own sake, I lost my mind.”

“So Snape and I might actually have done you more harm by interrupting you?” Draco had wondered about that since the time, three nights ago, when he’d come back and found Harry rolling on the bed, burning and screaming.

“Oh.” Harry looked startled. “No, I don’t think so. It did hurt, and Peter said that the fire-pool in Silver-Mirror had to do some healing of its own for me.” He held up his left arm and watched it shake for a moment. “I’ve absorbed two different kinds of venom through this in the last month,” he muttered. “Peter says not to do it any more.”

“That’s good advice,” Draco said quietly.

“Yes, I know.” Harry cocked his head. “And what about you? How did you manage to possess me without making eye contact?”

Draco laughed and began to describe his adventures, though he neglected to talk about his possession of Blaise with Blaise right there. He didn’t see a need to describe his resounding failure with Snape, either, though by the glitter in Harry’s eyes, he knew there was something missing. But he didn’t pursue it, and Draco didn’t pursue the mishap with the phoenix fire, since Harry had admitted he was wrong. They slid back more easily into companionship than Draco would have expected.

Maybe something really has changed, now that he’s accepted my courting ritual, Draco thought, and admired the shine of Harry’s eyes when he smiled, and counted the days in his head until Walpurgis. Harry expected the post owl that came winging in to him at breakfast. He and Scrimgeour had exchanged numerous letters on the matter of werewolves in the past few months, since Harry had made the oath to fight for werewolves’ rights, and the Minister was a few days overdue with the next one.

He didn’t expect what it said, though.

April 5th, 1996

Dear Harry:

You will know that the full moon was the past three nights. It seems that a rogue werewolf calling himself Evergreen bit a member of the Wizengamot on the second one. The Wizengamot is meeting today to set stricter limits on the rights of werewolves. I am sorry, but there is nothing I can do to stop this when the Wizengamot has a personal cause for outrage. And it is feared that Evergreen may be acting out of a larger political agenda. There were a few points in the past when werewolves tried to make people in power amenable to their viewpoints by biting them. It has worked because the victims decided to hide the curse, and allowed their biters to blackmail them.

Elder Gillyflower has decided to reveal the curse she is now infected with. That means that the Wizengamot is buzzing with outrage on her behalf, and fear that this might happen to them next, and determination not to allow any werewolf to achieve his ends based on intimidation. It is likely that the stricter limits will include mandatory confinement on the nights of the full moon for all werewolves, and from there it is only a small step to putting them in Tullianum permanently, with penalties for those who refuse to admit their curse. Amelia is already speaking of authorizing Aurors to kill free-running werewolves on those nights. She is shaken and upset by what happened to Elder Gillyflower, an old friend of hers, but other members of the Wizengamot will not be less extreme in their sentiments.

I am sorry, Harry. But there is no way to oppose this right now. Werewolves are not allowed to speak to the Wizengamot in their own defense, either during trials or in situations like this, when laws debating them are being passed—one of Fudge's provisions that I never dreamed would cause so much trouble.

Regretfully,

Rufus Scrimgeour,

Minister of Magic.

Harry was shaking by the time he finished the letter, and he crumpled it viciously in one hand as he stood. Scrimgeour hadn't mentioned what time the Wizengamot was meeting—probably in an attempt to discourage Harry from interfering—and he might already be too late. But if not, then Harry knew whom he wanted to call upon.

Draco grabbed his arm. "Harry! Where are you going?"

Harry tossed the letter to him and sprinted out of the Great Hall. He knew Snape would be following. He didn't care. At the moment, nothing was more important than having a modicum of privacy so he could use the communication spell that Charles Rosier-Henlin had taught him.

He spoke Laura Gloryflower's name, and heard the soft chime of phoenix song. A moment later, Laura's voice sounded in his ears, and Harry said, "A werewolf bit a member of the Wizengamot two nights ago. They're meeting today to try and push stricter limits on them, which will probably mean confinement in Tullianum on full moon nights—or permanently. Can you help me?"

"Of course," said Laura at once. "Delilah will not object to others knowing she is a werewolf if it is for a cause like this one. I think the hiding is rather wearing on her, to tell you the truth. She is a trained war witch, and was made to walk in the sunlight and reveal her secrets to all, even as the bells in her hair proclaim her skill. I will be at the Ministry in an hour, Harry."

Harry nodded, then remembered she couldn't see him, and said, "Thank you, Mrs. Gloryflower. I know this is sudden, but I don't see much chance to stop them if we don't move now."

"I am prepared," said Laura, and her voice deepened into a growl. "And I do have favors in the Ministry I may call in, Harry. Ordinarily, I save them for the idle telling of gossip, but this is more important. They are not going to hurt my niece." She was snarling like a lioness by the time she cut off the communication spell.

Harry turned around, and saw Snape next to him. "When are you going to the Ministry?" Snape asked quietly.

"As soon as you're ready," said Harry. "And Remus. I want you both to be there, even though I'll have to go into the courtroom without you, sir."

Snape cocked his head. "And why is that?"

"They have to see me as an adult, flanked by people committed to the cause of werewolf freedom, and you're my guardian, sir," Harry pointed out. "As long as you're there, it'll be easier for them to think of me as a child. I don't want to leave you behind, but I can't have you overshadowing me."

Snape inclined his head, various emotions beating just under the calm surface of his face. Harry was fairly sure that one of them was pride, and even surer with the next comment he made. "I can hardly complain about the development of your political instincts," Snape observed.

Rufus would not say that he was afraid. Never that. A sitting Minister could afford to be cautious, worried, eager, preoccupied, but not afraid. Otherwise he would become like Fudge, terrified of his own shadow, sure that something lurked in every corner to finish him off. So Rufus would not say that he was afraid, but he could say that he was not looking forward to entering the small holding cell in front of him. This bothered him in a way that even entering Lily Potter's cell to see how much she had suffered from Captio Horrificus did not.

He looked at Percy Weasley, finally, and nodded. "A lesson for you," he said. Percy's eyes burned with apprehension as Rufus stepped forward and rapped firmly on the door of the cell, deliberately knocking high. Aurors tended to put their wards all over the lower three-quarters, and clustered especially thickly around the lock.

The door opened at once to the signal, and Rufus caught a glimpse of the pale functionary from the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures. "He's bad, sir," he said briefly, before he turned back to deal with their furiously struggling prisoner.

Rufus stepped into the room. It was claustrophobically small. That was meant to intimidate those who waited here to see the Wizengamot.

It only served to make their captive this time madder.

He whirled and snarled and snapped in his chains, for all the world like a wolf caught in a trap—which was what he was, Rufus reminded himself. His enormous strength meant it took three Regulation flunkies, all big, burly men, to keep him from breaking free. His amber eyes burned, and he took great and obvious delight in champing his teeth near the faces of his captors, to make them flinch and duck. They didn't think he could pass along the infection in human form, but it was the day after the full moon, and they were mindful that two of their own had nearly died in trying to capture this one werewolf.

That was the news that Rufus hadn't put in the letter to Harry. The Department was horribly embarrassed about it; both men would heal, and neither had been infected. Elder Gillyflower had been, and she was the reason the Wizengamot was meeting today to decide Evergreen's fate.

It bothered Rufus that he wouldn't give any name other than Evergreen. His age bothered him, too. When he could look away from the lupine eyes and the teeth, which appeared longer and sharper than any ordinary human teeth even though they probably weren't, he was very aware that this werewolf was a sixteen-year-old boy. Foul-mouthed, of course, and wearing, before they gave him a prisoner's robes, ragged clothes that indicated he had nothing much in the world, but, still. Sixteen years old.

And, just to make things even more complicated than they already were, he was a Muggle, infected by some rogue werewolf five years ago, and living with one of the London packs since then. That much he had admitted. Rufus knew it would start at least part of the Wizengamot, Fudge's leftover cronies, baying about the need to Obliviate Evergreen when they were done trying him—never mind that he already knew magic existed. Then they would get onto cracking down on Muggle "incursions" into the wizarding world, by which they meant Muggleborns' families knowing about magic, and they would drag Rufus into a political battle he was not ready to fight.

Evergreen could help him, if he appeared more sane and reasonable. But he wanted to drag people around the room by his chains instead, and stare at everyone with burning hatred.

And Rufus could feel his own fear, long-conditioned, squirming in him. He didn't want to be in the same room with a lycanthrope. He stiffened his shoulders and snapped, "Evergreen."

The boy stopped struggling with a suddenness no human could have imitated. He turned his head towards Rufus and stared. Sure enough, burning hatred shone in his amber eyes.

"You won't be able to speak when we're in the courtroom," Rufus said. "Someone will cast a Silencio on you—that's a silencing spell—"

"I know what it is," said Evergreen, every few words chopped off. Rufus wasn't sure if it was a speech impediment, or if it just came from his heavy panting, itself born of his constant struggles. "I've lived with wizards for the past five years."

"You know," said Rufus, seeing a chance that hadn't been visible before, because of the boy's self-absorption, "you could get out of your punishment, or get it lessened, if you gave us a little information."

"What kind of information?" Evergreen let his tongue loll out of the corner of his mouth. Rufus wished he wouldn't.

"Where your pack is located," said Rufus. "How many werewolves it consists of. Who they are." That last was especially important, because werewolves weren't supposed to have wands. In the wizarding world itself, as in the case of Remus Lupin, it could be ignored as long as the werewolves didn't use Unforgivables or Dark Arts. But using magic in front of Muggles...Rufus could feel his skin crawling more than it had when he realized the problems Evergreen represented. The last thing they needed was Muggles learning of their world when there was a war on. “Whether the attack on Elder Gillyflower was part of a larger plan or not.”

Evergreen barked at him. Rufus realized only a moment later that it was meant to be a laugh. “I’m not telling you anything,” said Evergreen. “Pack loyalty forbids it, even if you had treated me nicely.” He gave a sharp, sly jerk sideways, and nearly rolled two of the men holding his chains off their feet. Evergreen lowered his head and studied them with his dark fringe falling into his eyes, as if waiting for a moment of weakness.

Rufus ground his teeth and wished they could simply use Stupefy—easier all around, and less messy—but werewolves were highly resistant to magic the day after a full moon, even Muggle werewolves. The Stupefy spells might hold, or they might wear off in the middle of the debate. The chains at least let them confine the werewolf, and without magic of his own, he wouldn’t be able to get out of them easily.

“Listen, Evergreen,” he said softly, trying to make his voice persuasive, trying to remind himself of what Harry had told him last year, that werewolves and the other magical creatures were also people whom he represented, “you must know that most of my colleagues would like nothing so much as to condemn you to Tullianum. But if we know more of the particulars of your situation, then we don’t need to do that. I don’t know what you mean by pack loyalty, but—”

“Of course you don’t.” Evergreen’s face had taken on the implacably bored look that adolescents did so well. “That’s because you’re outsiders.” He said it with the same kind of condescension that Rufus had heard from the lips of numerous people when talking about Muggles and Muggleborns. “Loki wouldn’t expect you to understand.”

Rufus narrowed his eyes. He’d heard of Loki before. Maybe he was a real person, and maybe he wasn’t; so many werewolves in London claimed to be in contact with him that Rufus was inclined to believe the latter. But if Evergreen had seen him, or knew who the person hiding behind the name was, then he could be an even more valuable source of information than Rufus had thought.

"Listen," he said. "We're offering you the same chance we would offer most prisoners, the same chance we offered Death Eaters during the First War. If you give us information, we'll protect you."

Evergreen sneered at him. "And I told you, we're not interested."

Rufus knew what it meant when a werewolf started using the plural. He wouldn't say anything else. With a brief, frustrated gesture he couldn't entirely suppress, he turned out of the room, limping past Percy.

"Did you think he'd turn them over, sir?" Percy asked his back as they walked up the corridor towards the Wizengamot's courtroom.

"I hoped so." Rufus rubbed his forehead with one hand. It seemed that something he'd feared like a bad dream a dozen years ago had become all too real. Muggle and wizard werewolves had formed mixed communities on the edge of the magical world, and there would inevitably be crossover, leaking, bleeding in. Evergreen might still have Muggle friends. And he was so young that he would want to brag, to show off or hint at secrets, knowledge he had access to that they didn't. He might even introduce some of them to wizards, for all that Rufus knew.

And from there, it was only a matter of time until Muggles who would react badly to magic heard of it, or until wizarding authorities did, and pushed Rufus into actions he didn't want to take but wouldn't be able to justify not taking.

Or, worst of all, it might give support to the Death Eaters' beliefs, and push other people into joining them, if they thought that Muggles were invading their world.

Rufus shook his head. I shouldn't have told Harry about this incident. If Evergreen was a wizard, or if he didn't come from one of the mixed packs, or if he hadn't bitten an Elder...and the timing of this couldn't have been worse, either.

He did pause, then. Yes, all of those factors were working together at once to make this situation as complicated as possible. And that whispered to his Slytherin brain that this was deliberate, planned.

But how could that be? If pack loyalty was everything that Evergreen was hinting that it was, then his pack should have hidden him. Instead, the hunters had reported that there hadn't been any other werewolves anywhere near Evergreen, and he had run wild through the streets of London, as if he didn't care about seeking a safe haunt.

Either it was an incredibly clumsy plan, which the smooth execution would argue against, or the werewolves wanted something that Rufus couldn't fathom.

Or it isn't a plan at all, and you're seeing shadows of plans where there's only desperation, he reminded himself, and then he was at the door of the Wizengamot courtroom and the Aurors were letting him through.

His mood darkened when he realized that Harry was standing in the middle of the sunken courtroom floor, with Laura Gloryflower and Remus Lupin beside him, as well as a young witch who looked Gloryflower, but whom Rufus didn't know personally. The young woman gazed up at him as he walked to his place in the balcony seats, and he caught a glimpse of amber eyes.

Fuck. He's going to bloody force the issue, isn't he? And on the worst case possible.

Rufus sat down solidly as the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures guards brought in Evergreen. Whatever happened next, there was no one right choice to make, and his course wasn't clear for the first time since he'd become Minister.

Harry had discussed what they should do with Laura before they'd even entered the Wizengamot courtroom. A helpful Gloryflower contact had revealed the time of the meeting, and when they'd shown up, the Aurors on the courtroom doors had argued with them for a few inconclusive moments before giving up, because, Harry thought, of his magic and Gloryflower's political power combined. They would let them in and let the Wizengamot deal with them.

Remus and Delilah couldn't speak aloud here, as werewolves weren't allowed to defend themselves before the Wizengamot. That left the words up to Laura and Harry. Harry had decided that he would add his support only if and when it became necessary. Let Laura lead this particular charge. If nothing else, her support would have the advantage of surprise, since so few people knew that her niece was a werewolf.

Thus he stood silent as Elder Sapiention leaned forward and said, "Well, with the Minister, we are all gathered. And, Mr. Pott—that is, Harry, I'm sure we're all interested in learning why you're here."

"You should be questioning my presence, not his," said Laura in a voice that seemed to pick up extra echoes from the room around them, as if other angry people were there and shouting in chorus. "After all, he is vates, and sworn to the protection and freedom of magical creatures. But I am Laura Gloryflower, head of a northern Light family. Why am I here?"

"Yes, very well," said Sapiention, sounding a bit put out. "Why are you here, Mrs. Gloryflower?"

"Because my niece, Delilah Gloryflower, is a werewolf," said Laura, nodding to the young woman standing silent behind her. It hadn't surprised Harry to see the way she and Remus had leaned towards each other; Remus had told him, without really explaining what it meant, that he, Hawthorn, and the remaining Light werewolves were becoming a pack. They had the common bond of all being victims of Fenrir Greyback, if nothing else. "And unlike the majority of the wizarding world, I will not cast her out and turn my back on her because of something that was not her fault. I will guard her, and part of that guarding is making sure that persecution does not fall on her. I had considered the anti-werewolf laws up to this point as livable. I am not sure anymore. After all, I am not the one who must labor under them. And this new policy of possibly confining all werewolves, even the most law-abiding, in Tullianum on nights of the full moon is not acceptable."

"It's very sad, of course, that your niece was a victim," said Sapientian, stiffly. Harry knew it wasn't his imagination that he was looking at Delilah with distaste now, and flinching when she turned her head, as if he expected her to turn into a beast and lunge up the wall at him. "But there's nothing that we can do about it, Mrs. Gloryflower. Our people, the common people of the wizarding world, must be protected."

"Do you realize what you are saying?" Laura asked, her voice rising in passion. "Do you realize that anyone, any of your 'common people,' could become a victim? It happened to Elder Gillyflower. The problem will not be solved by turning your back on the victims unfortunate enough to contract the disease. And that is what it is, Elder: a disease, a curse. Not a crime, and not a sin."

"But where and when it spreads, we must protect others against it." That was Amelia Bones, leaning forward now, her hands clenched around the edges of the balcony railing. Harry could see her face tighten in rage and pain. He remembered, for a moment, what Scrimgeour had said in his letter about Elder Gillyflower being her personal friend, and felt a surge of sympathy. Then he remembered that Gillyflower was undoubtedly rich enough to afford the Wolfsbane Potion, and that Bones would condemn others who couldn't to existences even more wretched than they already were, and his sympathy withered. "It was spread on purpose by this monster you see before you. It can be no coincidence that he bit an Elder of the Wizengamot, though so far he refuses to respond to questioning."

Harry turned to look at the werewolf they'd brought in in chains. He was very young, perhaps only a year older than Harry himself, and the way he stood, the way he vibrated, told Harry he was either a Squib or a Muggle. His eyes were bright, and his tongue lolled from his mouth in a gesture Harry had learned to recognize as laughter in Hawthorn and Remus. He met Harry's gaze, and he winked. Then he bowed, making his chains rattle and his handlers jerk nervously on them.

Another Elder spoke then, voice harsh with suspicion. "You would not know the reasons behind this attack, vates?" She sneered the last word.

"No," said Harry, though he went on staring at the young werewolf. "I don't know this man." But he seems to know me, or of me.

"Please be honest, Harry." That was Scrimgeour, and he was tense, weary, looking for some way out of this. "Do you really not know him?"

"I've never heard the name Evergreen," said Harry, concentrating and trying to remember if he could have seen this boy in any other context. But he had to shake his head, in the end. He would have remembered someone with such a low level of magic. In the alliance gathering and at Gollrish Y Thie, Calibrid had stood out to him incredibly. "I don't know him."

Evergreen spoke then; they probably hadn't thought he would dare, and so hadn't Silenced him. "But I know you, vates, as you can probably surmise. Greetings from Loki."

He was hit with several spells then, at least one of which managed to bind his mouth shut. And still he laughed, his eyes sparkling at Harry even if he couldn't speak.

Harry took a deep breath and faced the Wizengamot again, motioning with his head to Laura. Increasing suspicion of Evergreen and himself wouldn't help their cause. He wanted Laura to plead it.

She took up the signal and responded magnificently. "You don't understand what I will give to help keep my niece out of prison," she said, her voice clear and unwavering. "And to insure that she can hold a paying job, for that matter, and retain custody of any children she might have in future, and own her own property. I will not let you confine her in Tullianum when she has committed no crime."

"It's not certain that we're going to decide that, Mrs. Gloryflower," said Scrimgeour, obviously trying to smooth things over.

"Isn't it?" Laura asked with a scornful toss of her head, echoing Harry's thoughts precisely. "My apologies, then, Minister. The faces of your colleagues certainly look as if they're set and decided."

“As we should be,” said Amelia Bones. “We must do something about those who would hurt our children, our friends, the helpless and the old. You should know that, ma’am,” she dared to tell Laura. “You are a mother, and dedicated to it. Would you like a werewolf to bite one of your children?”

Laura’s mouth parted, and Harry could see fangs growing. She restrained herself from transforming with an obvious effort. “One has,” she said. “And I have lived with it, and in fact defended her fiercely to those who would question her soul. Delilah is a stronger person for this. She did not become a monster, and she did not, in any sense of the word, deserve it.”

Amelia looked back at her, just as angry, just as stubborn. “I’m sorry, Mrs. Gloryflower,” she said. “But I’ve lost a friend now, and the rest of her life was changed because of what was either a werewolf’s monstrous killing instincts or a sick, disgusting political ploy.” She turned and faced Scrimgeour. “Please call for a vote, Minister. Mrs. Gloryflower and Mr. Pott—the vates have no right to be here. We’ve let them have their illegal say for long enough.”

“We can witness the vote, can’t we?” Laura asked, her voice so proper that Harry knew she was angry just from that. “That is a matter of public record, or would be if anyone knew this meeting was being held.”

Scrimgeour interrupted before any of the Elders could speak. “It is permitted, yes. After that, Mrs. Gloryflower, Harry, I will have to ask you to leave.”

Harry folded his arms, and wished he could force words past the furious lump in his throat. But they hadn’t convinced them, even though Laura’s face said she would keep fighting, and he could not use his magic to compel the Wizengamot to obedience, and he would not use it to make them fear him. He had to stand there and listen as three-quarters of the Wizengamot voted to confine all registered werewolves to Tullianum on full moon nights, unless they could make arrangements for confinement themselves. No one said what would happen to unregistered werewolves or those found running free on those nights, but Harry could guess. The only possible consolation was that Scrimgeour abstained from voting.

Remus said nothing. Delilah said nothing. Evergreen shifted once, and when Harry heard the clink and rattle of his chains, he turned his head to find the young man's eyes on his, clear and penetrating.

Why is he happy about this? What does he want? Harry continued to hold his gaze as the Wizengamot voted to hold Evergreen until he either agreed to take Veritaserum or confessed to what he'd been planning on his own. Amelia Bones's justification for the decision was that they didn't want to misuse Veritaserum and "overstep the bounds of our authority." Harry bit his lip to keep from laughing, aloud and savagely, at that statement.

Aurors entered the courtroom to escort them to the door when the proceedings were done with. Evergreen gave Harry another bow, and watched him out of sight, shaking the chains once or twice just to fuck with his handlers' minds, Harry was sure.

What does he want? How can I sympathize with a werewolf who did bite someone else on purpose, like Greyback? But how can I do anything else, when I see the way he's treated, as if he were worse than a Death Eater? Even Bellatrix got more of a trial than that!

Harry caught his breath and forced his thoughts away from questions he couldn't answer without more information, onto more productive, if grimmer, ones. Well, that failed, but that just means that I'll have to do something else, something more unmistakable, to show everyone how much I mean this oath. And I am going to win in the end. I'm more determined than they are. They're driven by fear, and I'm driven by conviction.

Remus walked behind Harry, smelling his confusion and frustration, and half-wished he could tell Harry what the plan was, what Loki was doing. But, of course, he couldn't, because Loki had specifically asked him not to, and loyalty between packs—and to the man who had helped Remus more than once when he was younger—forbade him to spill the secrets to anyone who wasn't a werewolf anyway.

Besides, Harry would hate the truth. Loki's werewolves were upsetting the applecart on purpose. They'd chosen the most difficult candidate to send to trial, the one most likely to stir debate. Evergreen would be doing other things than sitting quietly in Tullianum, and in such a way as to make it impossible either to dismiss werewolves as innocent victims or shove them aside and treat them like depraved criminals. They were equal to wizards, and they deserved to be treated so.

And Harry was part of the plan. By pushing forward, Loki would force the vates to stop sitting on the fence. Come down and join them—and he would, Remus knew, because of the oath he'd sworn and because of where his sympathies lay—and then werewolves would gain their rights more quickly than they would if they waited for Harry to make up his own mind. He might not ever do it. He was still a wizard, and couldn't understand the discrimination werewolves faced. He might be content with slow progress from the wizarding side, as long as it was progress.

To Remus, the discrimination was perfectly understandable, and it rasped against him like a polecat's scent in his nostrils. And he understood the frustration that would drive Loki to send Evergreen after Elder Gillyflower, too, and the loyalty that would let Evergreen go happily to Tullianum and not rely on his pack to rescue him. Werewolves like Fenrir Greyback, serving a cause that would ultimately not benefit his kind, were contemptible. Loki was putting the cause of the packs first, and that was why so many were faithful to him.

So Remus put up his head and paced down the hall behind Harry, sorry for some of the consequences of the plan, but exulting in the idea that someday he might be able to look other wizards in the eye, and speak his piece, and know that they would have to listen to him.

Chapter Seventy-Seven: For Such Is the World

Snape ate his breakfast slowly. It was the first morning of Easter holidays, and most of the students had abandoned the school yesterday. Even the Potter brat—Snape continued to call him that despite his improvements in dueling, because the boy had neither changed his last name nor his impudent behavior in Potions—had gone with the Weasleys, to the same heavily warded location he'd shared with them during the summer. Harry had stayed, and Draco had stayed because Harry had stayed, and of course several of the professors were still there.

Yes. They are.

Snape laid down his fork and leaned forward to stare at Lupin, who was likewise eating slowly, and reading the Daily Prophet with a faint smile on his face. The front-page story, Snape knew, concerned the werewolf who had bitten the Wizengamot Elder. Apparently, he'd started talking last night, but it was nothing anyone wanted to hear. He was lecturing his captors about life in the werewolf packs, and asking, "with a mischievous glint in his eye," as the paper put it, whether most wizarding parents knew just where their adolescent children spent the evenings.

And Lupin was reading it, and smiling.

Snape wondered that the rest of them couldn't see it. But then, McGonagall had her mind on the school wards, and Flitwick had a relationship with Lupin that consisted mostly of Flitwick talking and Lupin nodding. And the other Professors were obsessed with their own concerns, except Hooch, who tended to stare at and then glance away from Lupin quickly when she didn't think anyone was watching. So Snape supposed that the others didn't notice how strange it was for the werewolf to be happy that another one of the monsters had been arrested.

"Something amusing, Lupin?"

Lupin looked up with that mild shine in his eyes that Snape hated. It said that he accepted all that life threw at him and understood that it wasn't other wizards' fault for being prejudiced, but the world's fault for being made that way. Snape had loathed it more since Lupin became Head of Gryffindor House, because now it was a mask, and not reality. Lupin had accepted far more of his own temper and his own strength since he'd been at the Seers' Sanctuary. He used the mask to make people think he was gentle. He wasn't.

Not anymore. And Snape wondered if that was part of the reason for the smile on his lips, which now he'd tucked neatly away.

"Not at all," said Lupin seriously. "They're thinking about confining us in Tullianum on the nights of the full moon, Snape, at least according to this article." He tapped the words on the front page. "And you know that they decided to do that yesterday, at a meeting we were actually able to see." His lips curved into a disturbing smile. "How would you feel, if they decided that everyone with the Dark Mark had to spend three nights in Tullianum a month, purely to insure good behavior?"

Snape didn't respond for a long moment, sipping his tea. Then he said, "I do not consider myself and others with the Dark Mark part of a set, Lupin. I was under the impression that you do consider yourself allies with other werewolves."

There. There was the beast, in the flash of Lupin's amber eyes as they turned on him. Snape sat and stared at him. He felt the old fear well up; he had nearly died on the claws of that beast when he was sixteen. He could have become infected. Neither Dumbledore nor McGonagall, of course, would ever believe him when he talked about werewolves being dangerous, thinking it was only prejudice that guided him. It wasn't prejudice, it was bloody good sense.

And if it hadn't been Dumbledore's precious Black involved in that prank, they probably would have been expelled. And Lupin certainly wouldn't have been allowed to attend Hogwarts.

"I do," Lupin was saying, apparently recovering from his surprise. "You heard that at Harry's alliance meeting, Severus." He picked at his food for a moment. Snape narrowed his eyes, and watched the way he snapped his jaws. That could have come from the fact that the full moon was only two nights past, of course, but Lupin didn't ordinarily eat that way even now. It seemed to come from his allying himself more firmly with werewolves. Snape gave a faint nod, feeling the realization sink home in him and link with other observations he'd made about Lupin in the past few days, and then the werewolf met his eyes and held them.

"I don't think it's right, what they're doing," Lupin breathed, gaze intent. "But there's one good thing that might come out of it. If the Ministry goes fast and far enough, there's going to be a reaction. People will only take so much, Severus. We've already lost the right to work to keep ourselves alive, to have our own families and homes, to have wands, though they often ignore that last one. They'll tighten the restrictions now. They've taken our freedom. What else is left? Not much. Life. If the Ministry declares a return to the Werewolf Hunts they used to have in the eighteenth century, then yes, I think that's cause for amusement. They have no idea what the bloody fuck they're doing, what force they're about to unleash."

Snape felt a moment of startled discomfort. He couldn't remember the last time he'd heard Lupin curse. But he watched Lupin's eyes go back to the paper, and saw that faint smile appear again, and his mind turned in a new direction, away from one werewolf's peculiarities and towards what those peculiarities might mean.

He felt himself freeze, not losing movement, but losing superfluous thoughts. His mind pivoted for a long moment, turning, gathering, spinning information. Snape waited. He had felt this before, usually in the moments when he crouched at the Dark Lord's feet as a spy and considered what he had to say to survive. The cold in his mind stripped away all the irrelevancies and told him what would keep him alive—or, in this case, not him but someone dear to him.

"You are forcing Harry towards this," he said lowly. "He is trying to stop something that violent from happening, and you are pressuring him deliberately towards it."

Lupin jerked his head up like a wolf scenting the hounds, but he spoke calmly enough. "I am? Don't be silly, Severus. Of course I'm not. I assure you, I don't know the werewolf who did this, and I do wish the Ministry would simply back off and talk with us like reasonable people. But that's not going to happen. You didn't feel the atmosphere in that courtroom yesterday. I did. If we simply lie back and do nothing, the Ministry will start killing us, and the fear in other wizards' hearts will prompt them to accept it. Our situation is the most desperate of all the magical creatures' right now."

"And it did not occur to you to tell Harry about that?" Snape asked, his voice soft. Lupin could think it was disbelief making it soft if he wished; that was his prerogative. "It did not occur to you that he would fight, heart and soul, for you without your having to begin a bloody revolution?"

"He has no objections to revolution," said Lupin, his voice gone colder. "We heard that at the alliance meeting."

"Not this kind of revolution." Snape felt his wandless magic peer out from behind his eyes with the force of his anger, and strove to push it back down. This was—too dangerous for him to use it. "He must respect the free wills of wizards as well as of magical creatures, Lupin. Have you forgotten that?"

"And we have a need for him that none of the others did." Lupin's voice had lowered again, and was passionate enough to sound like a growl. "You forget, Severus. The others are bound, but they are spared further harm. Their webs extend so far and no farther, because most of the wizards don't even know about the webs. We are the ones being pushed against, and we are the ones who stand to lose our rights one by one. And who knows if he will ever break our webs and free us? That would involve acting against the free will of the wolf. Harry may have sworn to our cause from his vates principles, but the need we have of him extends beyond that, to the powerful wizard and the Black heir. And that is power that Harry has been reluctant to use in the past."

Snape stared at him in silence for a long moment. Then he said, "You are acting like humans in this."

Lupin gave a sharp nod. "Humans armed with the only weapon we have. I don't like it, I don't like us having to do this—"

“What is ‘this?’” It had occurred to Snape that he knew none of the details of the plan, even if he knew the motivation.

Lupin shook his head. “Pack loyalty forbids me telling you, Severus.”

Snape leaned back in his chair and narrowed his eyes. “And so I am proved right once again,” he said, deliberately making his voice as sarcastic as possible. He had to make Lupin intrigued enough to keep looking at him, so that his Legilimency probe would go home and strike at the mind behind those eyes.

“What do you mean?” Lupin leaned a little nearer.

Snape spoke smoothly, even as he sent his mind knifing forward. He could insult James Potter and his friends in his sleep. “That the Marauders are a pack of worthless cowards, braggarts, and bullies, Lupin, who would betray anyone for the sake of getting what they want. I had been willing to reconsider you in light of what you have done, and tried to do, for Harry. I see now that the only one of you worth anything is the rat.”

It worked. He was back in his own mind, holding the information he desired, and Lupin was rising from the table, looking completely unaware that something was wrong, his teeth bared in a vicious snarl. McGonagall turned and looked at them sternly. Lupin ignored her, and Snape did not dare take his eyes off him. His hand was on his wand under the table, his magic trembling at the edge of his control.

“You cannot understand,” Lupin whispered. “You will never understand, Snape. I tried to deny and excuse what I was for far too long. In the Sanctuary, I learned to acknowledge it. And I learned that no one is going to do anything for us unless we do it for ourselves. I love Harry, but he will hesitate on this too long. He’ll give more weight to the free will of wizards than of werewolves. And while he’s trying to find some way to satisfy both sides, they’ll start killing us. Even if we hadn’t done anything to force the issue, it would have come to this sooner or later. I love Harry, but I don’t live for him, the way that you apparently do.”

He turned and walked rapidly towards the doors of the Great Hall. Snape sipped his tea and watched him go, ignoring Harry's anxious glance from the Slytherin table. Harry would come to see him in a short time, no doubt, and hear all about it.

The Headmistress was a bit more insistent.

"Severus? Did you start an argument with Remus, again?"

Snape glanced at McGonagall with a faint smirk. "Always blaming the Slytherin, Minerva?"

McGonagall visibly reined herself in. She did approximate a neutral tone a few moments later. "I was merely observing the fact that you have a temper, Severus, and Remus does not."

Oh, doesn't he? Severus smiled at her, and saw her frown. "I suggest you talk to Remus about it," he said, standing. "I would be interested to see what he says." He caught Harry's eye briefly, then turned towards his own quarters. He had marking that he could do until Harry arrived.

Before he could get out of the Great Hall, the post owls came in carrying the package for Harry.

Harry noticed the post owls immediately; it was hard not to, when five of them were clutched about and laboring with an enormous package. The package came to the Slytherin table, the way he had been secretly suspecting it would since he saw it. The day a mysterious delivery entered the Great Hall and was not for him would probably be the day the war was over.

The post owls looked like ordinary birds, he noted as they set down their burden gently in front of him, not from Gringotts or any pureblood wizarding family. However, when Harry tried to fetch food from the table to feed them, they spread their wings and wheeled away at once, heading for the windows. Harry blinked and looked at the package, wrapped in red and black paper, wondering if they were upset or merely tired.

Then Argutus, coiled on his shoulder, lifted his head and flicked his tongue. "There is something organic in there," he said.

Harry warily cast one of the spells he'd seen Narcissa using on the Room of Requirement, and nodded. Yes, there was flesh and blood in the package, but he couldn't tell what it was. The spell wasn't sophisticated enough to sense the difference between, say, a venomous snake and a non-venomous one.

"Let me, Harry."

Harry moved out of the way so that Draco could cast some dispelling magic on the package. No traps were revealed. Nothing moved, either, even when Draco incanted a curse Harry didn't know, and explained that it was meant to sting a hiding person or creature intolerably. Draco tried most of the countercurses he knew, and they struck the package harmlessly.

Harry leaned closer, and let Argutus have another sniff of the package, as well as sniffing himself. No smell came to either of them except a faint, dry, dusty one. He shook his head. If there was an animal in there, Argutus should be able to tell me what kind it was. Flesh and blood, so it can't be a plant. What the hell is it?

He badly wanted to open the package and find out, but he wasn't about to without some more preparation. He Levitated it, and nodded to Snape, who had halted behind his chair. "Do you have potions that can melt the box without touching the contents, sir?"

"I may have, depending on what the contents are," said Snape, and led them out of the Great Hall. Harry could feel eyes on him from the few remaining students, mostly members of the dueling club. He met a few of them and shook his head. He didn't have any more idea what was in the package than what the cause of the argument between Snape and Remus had been.

They entered Snape's office, and Snape busied himself taking out a Dissolving Potion. He cast several spells of his own spells on the box first, but wasn't able to tell what was inside. He then instructed them to move out of the way as he poured the potion on the box. Harry had to hold an increasingly curious Argutus back, or the Omen snake would have slithered down his arm and towards the box, determined to be the first one to get a look inside.

The box began to smoke as the potion struck it, and then it billowed up into purple fumes, flowing back to the vial when Snape motioned for it to do so. That left the object inside the package untouched. Harry swallowed when he saw what it was. It was no wonder they'd not been able to smell anything more than dust; the preservation spells used on it were the same ones used on library books.

Someone had cut off Firenze's head and sent it to him. It sat, horribly real, in the middle of the floor, with gobs of black, dried blood still clinging to the neck. Firenze's eyes were open. Harry couldn't tell what expression he'd died with. It might have been shock, or only mild surprise.

"That's not—" Draco said, and stopped. Harry shot a sideways glance at him and found him looking pale. Well, while he might have heard stories about this, he wouldn't ever have seen something like it. Harry slid an arm around Draco's shoulders to give him support, and felt the other boy lean against him. "That's not real, is it?" Draco whispered. "Someone didn't really cut off a centaur's head and send it to you?"

"Centaur?" asked Snape sharply. He'd been staring at Firenze; now he looked around at them.

Harry nodded. "Firenze was one of the centaurs I freed from their web in the Forbidden Forest. He was—he was going to go negotiate with the giants for me." He swallowed. "I didn't know that giants would work preservation spells and send the head back when a negotiation failed," he said quietly.

"They would not." Snape pointed his wand at the head. "Acclaro nuntium!"

The head wavered like smoke for a moment, and Harry prepared to protect his nose, since he thought the preservation spells would dissipate and they would be assaulted by the smell of rotting flesh. Instead, Firenze's features simply rearranged themselves, and now

Harry could see the message on the face in impossibly tiny and clear letters that must have been cut by magic.

Snape leaned near enough to read them, his wand still out. “Potter,” he said, his voice empty of emotion. “Your centaur was too late. I thought it would be amusing to send you this, as a little memento mori. Regards, Igor Karkaroff.”

Harry caught his breath, and swallowed. Emotions collided in him like charging horses, so thick that he could barely decide what to feel first. Sorrow that Firenze had died? Rage at Karkaroff for desecrating his body like this? Fear that the giants were now fighting on Voldemort’s side? Disgust that the Death Eater had chosen to send such a vile message?

“Karkaroff sent many messages like that during the war, but usually to victims’ families,” said Snape, his face expressionless. “My pardons, Harry. I would have warned you beforehand about what to expect, but it has been years since I have seen a package like that one.”

“It’s—all right.” Harry squeezed Draco’s shoulder one more time, and stepped away from Snape, forcing his mind to function. “Voldemort has the giants now. We’ll need to be more careful, plan more carefully, than ever.” He studied Firenze’s head for a moment. “Will the preservation spells suddenly leave off?”

“They should not.” Snape’s mouth twisted. “Igor always took good care of his—presents.”

Harry nodded, and then gently lifted Firenze’s head from its place. “I have to tell the centaurs,” he explained, more to Draco’s horrified gaze than to Snape’s. “They deserve to know that one of their own died trying to help me.” Now he could feel sorrow; tears stung his eyes as he stared down at Firenze’s head and remembered how the centaur had been alive on New Year’s Eve. The skin felt as warm under his fingers as if that were still the case. Karkaroff couldn’t have cast his preservation spells more than a few minutes after he’d killed Firenze. “And they deserve to know who did it.”

“Harry.”

He looked up at Snape, who was standing with no expression at all on his face. That was all right. Harry knew that didn't always mean he felt nothing; sometimes he was simply trying to control his own struggling emotions. “Yes?” he asked.

“You should know,” said Snape softly, “that Lupin is part of a plan with other werewolf packs. The arrest of the young werewolf who bit the Wizengamot Elder was calculated. He'll be staying in prison, but acquiring various objects and spreading various bits of information to show wizards that werewolves are different and more dangerous than we think they are. And more bites are planned, as well as the opening of the wizarding world to the Muggle one through the border communities. A leader named Loki, who lives in London, has arranged this. They're trying to speed along something they believe would have happened anyway—the Wizengamot turning to the open hunting and killing of werewolves—to force you to help them.”

Harry felt his insides freeze in a way that hadn't happened even when he saw Firenze's head. “Remus is part of this, you said?” he whispered. “How do you know?”

“I used Legilimency on him this morning at the breakfast table,” said Snape. “I know only as much as he does, which isn't much. He didn't want to know everything. Apparently he thinks his betrayal of you is lessened that way.” Snape sneered, but it seemed almost reflexive; his dark eyes were watching Harry intently. “Lupin all but admitted the motivation to me at breakfast, this morning. The werewolves want to live in wizarding society, Harry, since they don't trust you to break their webs. They think you will not act against or kill the wolves inside them, when those wolves don't want to die. They're planning to use you as a driving force to secure themselves rights as soon as possible. They think no one else will fight for them.”

Harry felt light-headed. He leaned on the wall for a moment, and found himself running his fingers across the letters carved on Firenze's face; the weight of the head rested in the crook of his arm. Then the weight was gone, and he was turned to the side and resting his face in Draco's shoulder.

“Gryffindors,” said Draco as he held him, one poisonous word, and that was all.

But it crystallized what Harry was feeling, and set him back into the world with a thump. He pushed at Draco until his boyfriend let him go in puzzlement, and stepped back, and looked up at Snape.

“They’re right,” he said quietly.

Snape narrowed his eyes at him. “What do you mean?”

Harry sighed. “They’re right that I have to help them. They’re not exactly right that no one else will fight for them, but I’m the only one who’s sworn an oath to do so. Old oath, remember? Turns my blood to molten silver if I don’t help?” He smiled slightly at Snape. “So their plan worked in that respect. I have to use my political power to fight for them. And their situation is different than most other magical creatures’. Dobby wanted to be free and journey wherever he liked, and I had to give that to him. The centaurs wanted to go on living in the Forbidden Forest and help me with the war effort, even with—” His gaze went to the head Draco had set aside. “Even with things like that. The werewolves want to be part of the only society where they can really survive. If that’s their will, then I need to help them achieve it.”

Snape was scowling as if someone had tricked him into swallowing a cauldron full of Calming Draught. “Even though Lupin is a traitor?” he all but spat.

Harry winced. “I didn’t know how much he cared about his people,” he said quietly. “But he deserves the right to his own life, doesn’t he, his own concerns? He’s not just my ally, not just my parents’ friend.” He glanced sideways at Draco. “I couldn’t ask Draco to give up being a Malfoy just because he loves me.”

“This is a bit different, Harry,” said Draco, all but radiating fury. “My being a Malfoy doesn’t involve my betraying you.”

"I know." Harry turned back to Snape. "Thank you for finding out about this, sir. Now that I know this Loki is trying to manipulate me, and that the werewolves are willing to bite people to achieve their goals, I know better how to act. But I can't abandon them all just because Remus betrayed me and some of them have stupid ideas. I can't tar them all with the same brush."

"You do realize," said Snape, his voice going deadly soft, "that some of your allies might think you were lying if you do not do what you promised you would, and make Remus politically powerless for acting against your principles?"

Harry closed his eyes and nodded. "Yes, I know," he said. "And that's—something I'll need to handle. First, though, I'll need to find out how deep it goes, whether any of the other werewolves in the alliance know about it, and whether Remus is willing to just give up associating with me. After all, sir," he added, opening his eyes and focusing on Snape, "if this is supposed to be completely in the daylight, I'd also have to tell him how I knew. Would I have to turn you out of the alliance for using Legilimency on him?"

"Do not be ridiculous, Harry."

"But it's something I have to think about," said Harry, as calmly as he could with the knowledge that Firenze had died for him and Remus had betrayed him weighing on his mind. "The ethics of it are delicate. I'm hoping that Remus will be happy with the political help I am willing to give, and will understand when I outline the kinds I won't. If not, then yes, I'll make sure that he can't interfere with the alliance. But I haven't even talked to him. I have no idea what he'll say."

"Isn't it enough that he tried to manipulate you?" Draco's arms draped over his shoulders again. "I would be angry just given that."

"So am I," said Harry, touching his cheek in reassurance. "But I won't shove him into the same category as Dumbledore, either, not until I have answers."

"Will you go to him now?" Snape asked. "I wish to be with you when you do."

“No.” Harry gathered up Firenze’s head again. “Now I have to call Millicent back to school, since she’s my official representative to the centaurs, and make sure that she’s free to go with me when I deliver this.”

“It’s wasteful,” Millicent said for the fourth time since Harry had summoned her and she’d agreed to Floo to Hogwarts. Her voice was disgusted.

Harry nodded as they walked along the main path of the Forbidden Forest, towards one of the clearings where he often met the centaurs. “I have no idea what Karkaroff hoped to accomplish with it, really,” he said quietly. “Now we know that the giants are fighting on Voldemort’s side, when he could have kept that a horrible secret. And Karkaroff has to know that this is hardly going to make me back off from the war and sit in a corner tearing my hair.”

“Most Death Eaters do extravagant wasteful things all the time,” said Millicent. “So long as they’re grotesque or cause mayhem, they really don’t care.”

“How’s your father?”

Millicent gave him a grim little smile, to say that she appreciated the ironic springboard Harry had used into the subject. “Well enough,” she said. “My mother’s found a spell that mostly conceals the smell of the wound. I hope it continues working. Talk about another extravagant, wasteful gesture. The Fisher King Curse really does smell terrible.”

Harry nodded. Then he paused, as he became aware of hoofbeats traveling parallel to him through the underbrush. He was surprised at how long it had taken the centaurs to approach, really. Maybe they had been unable to imagine why he would walk through the woods with Firenze’s head in his arms.

Magorian appeared, shaking his tail and staring steadily at Harry for a moment before he turned to Millicent. “Greetings, stone-bearer,” he said. “What news do you have for us?”

Millicent dipped her head. "Greetings, leader," she said. "I am sad to say that Firenze will run no more. A Death Eater named Karkaroff who was also sent to negotiate with the giants cut his head off and returned it to Harry this morning."

Magorian nodded slowly. Harry looked up at him, and watched the shadow of his dark head crowned by branches thick with budding leaves. That's what Firenze was supposed to look like, he thought, even though Magorian's coat was considerably darker than the other centaur's had been, and he was taller. If he had stayed here, he would be alive still.

Harry swallowed several times. It was hard to remind himself, even though he had determined to think of it that way, that Firenze had chosen his fate of his own free will, that he had wanted to help Harry with trying to secure allies. Neither he nor Harry could have known that Karkaroff was with the giants and would do this.

"Vates?" Magorian made it a demand and a plea at once.

Harry looked up at him again. "I am sorry," he whispered. "For your loss, and for the fact that Firenze was free for such a short time before his death." He looked down into the face cut with Karkaroff's obscene letters. "I would bring him back if I can. But I cannot. All I can do is bring his head home, and tell you that I would have given anything for this to be different." He knelt, gently lowering the head to the earth.

For a moment, it sat there like some strange plant rooting in the soil. Then Magorian stooped and picked it up, his strong arms making the burden seem a slight weight. "Thank you, vates," he said. "It has been centuries since wizards in general have wished any fate for us other than the one our web dictated. Your sorrow is sincere, and Firenze chose his path, and did not know where it would end. It is enough." He reared, and a strange cry, half- neigh and half-whistle, exploded from his mouth.

Harry started as a pair of centaurs he'd never seen before, short and wizened with white coats and hair, emerged abruptly from the trees on either side of the path. They linked their arms with Magorian's, and turned to guide him and the head away into the Forest.

"Your aid has been welcome, vates," said Magorian over his shoulder. "But we must ask that you excuse us for our funeral rites. No human has witnessed them, and no human ever will. Be assured that we still intend to aid you in this war. We have suffered a loss along with you now."

Harry nodded, and stood there watching until they plunged out of sight. It took a much shorter time than it would have in winter, since the trees and thickening flowers swallowed them quickly. One last flirt of one of the white centaurs' tails, and they were gone.

Millicent put a hand on his arm. "Are you well, Harry?"

Harry turned around and gave her a faint smile. "Fine. Just thinking about what I'll have to do next." That was confront Remus, and it gave him a sickening churning sensation in his stomach. He closed his eyes, took a deep breath, and said, "Thank you for coming at such short notice."

"You may always call on the Bulstrodes," said Millicent, with unexpected conviction. "You've certainly done enough for us." She paused, and then added, "Besides, we've invested so much of ourselves in the alliance already. We deserve something out of it, I think."

Harry laughed, it was that unexpected, and felt his heart lighten a little, Remus or no Remus.

Harry took a deep breath and rapped on the door to Remus's quarters. He'd put this off as long as he could, first telling McGonagall what had been in the package he'd received, and then going over some of the plans for Midsummer with her, and then reading in one of the books he'd retrieved from the Black library about phoenix fire, and then persuading Snape and Draco that he could face Remus on his own and he didn't think Remus would attack him, or, Merlin forbid, bite him.

Remus opened the door at once. From the look on his face, he'd been expecting Harry, though not alone.

"I figured out that Severus must have read my thoughts from the sneer on his face at lunch," he said, before Harry could speak. "Come in, Harry. There are certain things that we both need to understand."

Harry couldn't help the slight bristling those words provoked along his spine, though he reminded himself that, even if Remus was arrogant and had been stupid, that was still no reason to think all werewolves were. He stepped inside, and Remus shut the door and turned to face him.

He also let the masks slip from his expression. Harry found himself looking at a man he almost didn't know, a man who had been pursuing some grand passion while Harry pursued his.

And he never told me?

Did I ever ask?

Harry felt a momentary deep sadness shift through him, a frustration that he couldn't understand everything about the people who mattered to him and couldn't help them in their every endeavor. He had already been forced to prioritize wizards, he thought. He had said that Draco and Snape were more important to him than others. Would he be forced to prioritize causes, too? Would he think that helping Remus was less important than accomplishing other goals?

It looked as if he would have to, and even as he faced the choice head-on, Harry hated it. No one had said he had to like this part.

"Sit down," said Remus courteously, and Harry took one of the three chairs in the room, watching Remus narrowly all the while. Remus practically shone with nervous energy. He sat down himself, but only for a moment. Then he sprang up and walked about, his hand skimming the walls.

"Why?" Harry asked his back.

Remus tensed, and then turned around. "Because my year in the Sanctuary taught me to trust myself," he said. "I did try to keep my anger under control, but I was no longer afraid of releasing it. And I did try to act both for werewolves and for you as long as I could, but now the point's come where we part paths, Harry, and for that I am truly sorry."

The man Harry remembered was looking out of his amber eyes, gentle and mild with remorse. Harry sat on his resentment. It appeared that Remus was going to explain logically. Harry thought he was wrong, but, no doubt, Remus thought that about him. If he did have good reasons for his actions, Harry would be happy to hear them.

"Why?" he repeated.

"Because it's never going to get better if we don't do something," Remus said, a snarl growing in the back of his voice. "I've watched the newspapers over the past several months, Harry. There have been other front page stories, but hidden in the back of the Daily Prophet is often something about werewolves: letters from wizards saying they don't trust us, speculations about whether Wolfsbane Potion actually works, interviews with people from the Department for the Regulation and Control of Magical Creatures saying they had to hunt down such and such a rogue werewolf in a certain part of London, when it was probably someone's dog. And I've gone back and read some of the older stories, too, the ones that first proposed anti-werewolf laws and the records of the ones passed.

"They've only been pushing against us, Harry, never allowing us breathing space. They took away our right to speak in court first, our voices. Then they removed our ability to have custody of children. Because, of course, we're an evil influence." He spat the words, and snapped his teeth after them. "Then they took away our ability to work. That old law about werewolves not having wands was brought up again, and started being enforced. And since then, they've been chipping away at all we have left, our freedom and our lives.

"Sure, the lucky ones of us can afford Wolfsbane Potion, but the price of that is rising, too."

Harry blinked. He honestly hadn't noticed. "It is?"

Remus snorted and glanced at him. "Of course. Since the suppliers of the ingredients have figured out that the demand is growing, they've raised the price. And demiguise hair is particularly expensive, because there are people agitating for us to leave the peaceful, innocent demiguises alone." Remus folded his arms around his middle and closed his eyes. "I used to laugh over the fact that so many people love animals like unicorns and demiguises, while they don't care that much about beasts they think are ugly. It doesn't seem that funny, now that they've decided werewolves are among the ugly ones."

"You could have come to me," Harry said. "I would have done something."

"What?" Remus opened his eyes and stared at him bleakly. "What could you have done? The demiguises are magical creatures too, Harry, so it's not as though we can ask you to champion our interests over theirs. And you won't use your magic to compel people into lowering the price of ingredients. And my wolf—" Remus flinched, and Harry suspected that the mere mention of the word had called the hateful, blood-filled voice to the surface of his mind. "My wolf is intelligent," Remus said softly. "You know that. All the werewolf webs are. Are you going to kill them, Harry? Are you going to bind them? You'll slice all the other webs, but they aren't living creatures in their own right. These are, and they're self-aware."

Harry clenched his hand. "None of that explains why you're spreading the web to other people," he said.

"Because it's the only weapon we have," said Remus. "They won't listen to us, they don't think we're beautiful, they don't even pity us most of the time. The only thing we can do is make them fear us. No, that might not bring the change we want, but waiting quietly won't, either. The last three decades have proven that. And I think—and most of the werewolves in southern England think—that the time is coming when we must act or die."

"It was still wrong." Harry leaned forward and stared intently into Remus's eyes. "I do consider that a betrayal, Remus."

"And you are too bound among other concerns to see things the way we do," Remus said. He never looked away from Harry. "It's admirable, Harry, the way that you try to balance all these concerns, but it won't work in this situation. Our enemies aren't going to change their minds. They fear us too much; they would even if Loki hadn't decided to move. And you won't oppose them." Bitterness flecked Remus's voice. "You won't oppose them, and you won't oppose them, until they clamp the collars around our necks. And even then you'll only wring your hands—sorry, hand—and say that you had to change their minds by persuasion, not force."

"So you decided to force me to use force?" Harry asked.

Remus inclined his head. "We can at least set the pace of our own destruction, if destruction it's going to be," he said. "And I don't think it will be, not now. If we provoke the Ministry into moving carelessly, then you'll defend us. We've watched you, Harry, closely. The only time you use your magic without remorse, without flinching, is when someone else's life, rather than will, is in danger. Protect us, get involved in the debate on our side, and then you'll go ahead with putting our interests first. It's the only way."

"Has it ever occurred to you that I'm less likely to do that now that you've chosen to go about things this way?" Harry rose to his feet, feeling his magic stir around him like wings. "That I wouldn't appreciate manipulation? That I might be so disgusted at the fact that you've chosen to bite other people, and play to the stereotypes most wizards have of you, that I would turn my back on your cause?"

"Honestly, no," said Remus. "We know you too well, Harry. When they come for us, we know that you'll be there—if only to stop the conflict from exploding into a bloody war. You'll defend the innocent. True, you might let the werewolves who bite others perish. But you'll protect those who can't protect themselves, and there are more of those than there are wizards, because we're less powerful than they are." His eyes shone.

Harry nodded at the wand that lay on the table near Remus's hand. "You're a wizard, too, Remus."

Remus slowly bared his teeth. "Am I, Harry? Am I? Tell that to the Wizengamot. Technically, you know, I'm not even supposed to have the wand, or this job, and as long as I were starving to death in peace and silence, like a good little puppy, they wouldn't care what happened to me, wand or not."

"So you'll let them define you?" Harry shook his head, and behind him, his magic made his chair vibrate in frustration. "You are, with the biting and the violence. I thought better of you than that, Remus."

"That's all philosophy, Harry." Remus waved a dismissive hand. "We've tried that, and tried that, and that doesn't work. We've made the decision, or the werewolves who follow Loki have made the decision. And his are the wolves who are going to be taking the risks, letting themselves be arrested."

"Does Mrs. Parkinson know about this?" Harry asked.

Remus shook his head. "No. Nor Delilah or Claudia, before you can ask. They're becoming part of my pack, but none of them are London werewolves, or know many of the traditions of a pack yet. I didn't tell them, because I didn't want to chance them making an uncomfortable choice."

"Or revealing the plan to me before Loki was ready to move," Harry said.

Remus nodded.

"Why are you telling me the plan now?" Harry asked. "Surely you wanted to keep it secret?"

"Because you know some of the reasons already," said Remus. "And when I realized Severus had read my thoughts, I spoke to Loki. He gave me permission to do this. He was never that happy about keeping the secret from you. He did think of approaching you, until he realized that you wouldn't kill the webs, and that you had too many conflicting interests to help us without a little push. Your oath was a blessing.”

“What sort of person is Loki? It sounds like he’s sacrificing his wolves,” Harry said, wondering if that was the right tack to take. Perhaps the sacrificial angle was the way to wake Remus up. He had rejected Dumbledore when he had finally been able to see how much his sacrifices cost.

“Willing sacrifices, Harry,” Remus said. “The same thing you did to lift the centaurs’ web. A pack is—a pack. All the people helping Loki know his mind exactly, and they all agreed to do it. Those who didn’t have retreated into their own packs, and have been kept ignorant of what he chose. They’ll be benefited by it ultimately, though.”

“Has it even occurred to him that he could end up spending hundreds of lives and changing nothing?”

Remus smiled slightly. “Of course it has. But there’s a reason he chose the name Loki, Harry. He’s a chaos-rider. He’s like Draco, actually: an expert in shaping a wild situation to his advantage. He acts and reacts faster than most of his opponents can. He’s confident that he can snatch victory out of this volcano.”

Harry stared at Remus for a long moment. Remus looked back, and it became obvious to Harry that he wasn’t about to change his mind, wasn’t about to look back down his path and see that it was wrong, wasn’t about to see the tidal wave of blood that could drown them all.

“I’m going to cut you out of the alliance,” Harry said softly.

“I know,” Remus said.

“I resent this,” said Harry. He realized he was shaking. “I’m disappointed in you.”

“I know,” Remus repeated.

"You know that trying to compel me is the worst course you could have chosen?" Harry asked. "When I'm a vates, and respect free will above all?"

"But you aren't our vates, because you can't benefit us as a vates," Remus said, his voice and face both very gentle. He even looked aside from Harry a little, as if he thought the eye contact too challenging. "I said that already, Harry. You'll never break our webs. Will you?"

Harry gave an irritated shrug. "I hadn't thought about it," he whispered. Could he bring himself to kill another species, which was essentially what the werewolf webs were? The best solution would be to transfer them elsewhere, but if they didn't want to go, what would he do then?

"And you have too many other considerations waiting for you on your path," said Remus. "It's all right. We understand that, Harry. That's why we chose to step back and act outside of the vates requirements. It's no use approaching you like the centaurs or the unicorns did, anyway."

What a bloody fucking mess, Harry thought tiredly. "The betrayal does feel personal," he told Remus, and saw his eyes shut this time.

"For that, I am sorrier than you can know," Remus whispered. "But we value different things, Harry."

Harry stepped out of the room and shut the door behind him. The next day, he scanned the Daily Prophet grimly when it came to the table, determined to see what secrets might be hiding among the stories he'd ignored. He paused on a story about the rising price of demiguise hair, and read about a group that, as Remus had said, was agitating to protect demiguises and prevent their hair from being shipped out of China and Japan at all. He also paused on one of the objects in "Cheshire's Curiosities Column," more shaken than he had expected it to be.

And for our final mysterious account today, we present the story of one Fiona Mallory, 37, a former Auror, found in a trance in her

London flat. Investigating personnel from the Department of Magical Accidents and Catastrophes state that the trance is apparently the result of an illegal Dark magic object, but have been unable to locate the object, and so unable to wake her. Mallory's breathing is calm, her eyes fixed, and her body preserved as though by Still-Beetle. If anyone has any information on what object may have caused Miss Mallory's unusual state, they are encouraged to contact the Department of Magical Accidents and Catastrophes at once.

Harry put down the paper and rubbed the gooseflesh that appeared on his arms. Had Mallory been the victim of someone wanting to punish her for her torture of Lily and James? Why not just kill her, though, if that was the case? Or perhaps she'd stolen a Dark Arts object when she was sacked from the Ministry, and been careless in how she used it?

He closed his eyes and sat back. The world seemed to be tumbling out of control around him, and he badly needed some kind of firm footing back under him. He couldn't trust Remus, Connor wasn't here right now, Draco would be glad to help but didn't know much more than Harry himself did, if as much, McGonagall was busy with the need to re-ward the school, and Snape—

I don't know if I can trust Snape yet, not fully.

Well, that was something, wasn't it? And he had some time to handle it, the two weeks of Easter holiday.

Harry's eyes snapped open. He knew Vera was still staying in the school, though he had only spoken with her three times since the New Year. Apparently, her gift hadn't yet overcome her and forced her to go back to the Sanctuary. He would ask Snape if he would be willing to speak to her. If not, then he would ask Snape to talk with him in private.

I need to be able to trust Snape. He's an adult, he has contacts and means of gathering information that I don't, and he sees angles and shadows I don't. I would never have suspected that Remus was involved in this stupid werewolf situation if he hadn't told me. But even then, I was angry at his using Legilimency on Remus, and I had to wonder if his dislike of him was part of the reason he read his mind at all.

It's time to have out the things we didn't talk about after I rescued him from the Chamber of Secrets. I want my guardian back completely. And it's the best step I can take now, for his mental health, and mine, and the war.

Chapter Seventy-Eight: Snape, Harry, and Their Issues

“Sir?”

Snape looked up sharply. Harry was peering at him around the corner of his office door, his face set politely but implacably, as if he were going to drag Snape off and make him reconcile with the werewolf. He carefully put down the Potions text he'd been reviewing to remind him of the uses of dragon's blood and turned around to stare at his ward.

“What do you have in your head this time?” he asked bluntly. When I know that he's going to have me doing something mad anyway, I should know what it is as soon as possible, so that I can protect both of us from the consequences of his stupidity.

“That I'm really fucking tired of not being able to trust you,” said Harry cheerfully, and stepped into the office, pulling the door shut behind him. Snape experienced a spasm of alarm for the volatile Potions ingredients around the walls, but Harry didn't pay any attention to them, instead staring intently at Snape's face. “That I'm really fucking tired of you not being able to trust me, even to do something as basic as take care of myself or test my own magic without a guard sitting by just in case I light something on fire.”

“You did light yourself on fire last time,” said Snape darkly. He was not about to let Harry forget that.

“Yes, but I didn't mean to,” Harry said, and then paused and shook his head before resuming the same slightly manic cheerfulness. “And I didn't come here to talk to you about this, not yet. I wanted to ask if you would go to Vera, the Seer, and let her look at our souls as she speaks to us.”

Snape choked. Then he said, “The werewolf has hexed you. It can't be Imperio, because you can throw that off. Hold eye contact, Harry, so that I can make sure it isn't something else that affects the mind. Perhaps it only affects the mouth, and you are silently berating yourself for saying such a ridiculous thing. There are potions that turn all one's words to nonsense—“

"Is it really that ridiculous a suggestion?" Harry sounded both exasperated and offended. "This is why we need her. You still think that no one else would want to see your soul."

"I know what my soul looks like." Snape scowled at Harry, a scowl he knew was truly horrible; it had frightened Lupin this morning, when he met the werewolf coming out of the Headmistress's office. McGonagall had apparently told Lupin that he must leave the school, that she would not trust him to act as Head of Gryffindor House any more. Lupin had been angry enough that his eyes were glowing amber, and yet he had shrunk when he saw Snape. "I see no reason to have anyone else poking and prying about in it. Imagine a swamp of pitch at high midnight, Harry, and you will have my soul."

"You know that's not true," said Harry patiently, "or you would never care about anyone else but yourself. You've changed, and I think it's time to see how much. Will you come with me to Vera or not?"

Snape snarled between his teeth. "Not willingly."

Harry eyed him for a moment, then nodded. "All right. Come and talk to me in your quarters, then." He glanced at the Potions ingredients on the walls for the first time. "I wouldn't want to corrupt any of your experiments, or damage future ones, with the amounts of magic I'll probably be leaking."

"What will we talk about?" Snape asked. He became aware that he was clutching the Potions text like a shield as he stood, but he couldn't bring himself to care. Harry knew this would make him vulnerable. Harry had seen him more vulnerable, when the pain in his leg was a screaming thing and not a gnawing, persistent ache.

"Why we can't trust each other," said Harry, looking fully into his eyes. "Why I'm still upset at you for taking the information about my parents and Dumbledore to the Ministry. Why you don't trust me to stay by myself for an hour without bursting into flame. That kind of thing."

Snape looked steadily at him. Harry showed no sign of backing down or glancing away. Snape was not sure what had brought this on—the conversation with the werewolf, which Harry hadn't sketched to him in more than details, should not have—but it was apparent that they were going to have this conversation now or later. And putting it off until later might result in Harry showing up at his door with the Seer next time, and letting her look at Snape's soul before Snape could stop it.

"Very well," said Snape, hoping his voice sounded ungracious and neither hopeful nor angry. "My rooms." He swept out of the office, letting Harry have a full-on view of his set back, and not his pale face or tightly clutching hands.

Harry let Snape choose his seat when they entered his rooms. Harry had been the one to abruptly show up and demand that they do this. It was only fair that he should choose the ground.

Snape decided to sit on the couch in front of the fire, perhaps so he could feel the comforting warmth at his back, perhaps so that Harry would have to sit in the smaller and more vulnerable chair. Harry didn't really mind. What mattered to him most was that they were finally going to talk about this, and, Vera or no Vera, they weren't leaving until they'd built up a new foundation of trust or repaired the damaged one.

"Sir," said Harry, when he was seated. "What do you want to talk about first?"

Snape stared at him in silence for a long time. Then he said, "Why don't you tell me the major reason that you still don't trust me? I had thought you did, Harry, after the Chamber."

Harry sighed and rubbed his eyes with his hand. "I thought it at least repaired enough that we didn't need to do this," he admitted. "Then I realized, yesterday, that I assumed automatically that you'd used Legilimency on Remus because you hate him, not because you thought it would help or protect me."

"That is wrong." Snape's voice had gone flat.

"I know." Harry lowered his hand to his lap and gave Snape an apologetic look. "But it's one of those things you need to talk about. Is there anyone else whose mind you would have read so willingly, sir? That's alive, I mean? I could see you reading Sirius's mind, or Dumbledore's, if you could get past his own Legilimency. But would you read the Headmistress, or Flitwick, on the off-chance that they were hiding something unpleasant in their thoughts?"

"This was more than an off-chance."

Harry waited, but Snape didn't elaborate. It seemed that he would have to do all the work, at least for this part of the conversation. Well, he had expected no less. He wanted his guardian back, and his guardian was quite content to squat in the hole he'd dug for himself like a toad. Harry would pull the toad out.

"Would you have asked permission from the Headmistress, first, before you read her thoughts?" he asked. "From Professor Flitwick? From Professor Sprout?"

Snape stared straight at him, this time without a scowl, without any expression at all. Harry waited. Snape often used silence to unnerve students and make them confess their crimes before they were ready. But it could be used on him, too, and Harry knew his conviction—at this point—to be greater than Snape's. He waited, and Snape cracked.

"There is no one else who would be so dangerous!" he snarled at last. "There is no one else who has a curse that he can spread to anyone in the school with a single bite! And Minerva agrees with me, Harry. She dismissed Lupin this morning, and told me that she could not have a Head of Gryffindor who was dedicated to something else more than he was dedicated to the safety of the school."

Harry winced. He had known that McGonagall would do something like that, but he had not expected it so soon. He drew in a deep breath, and reminded himself that Remus would be all right. He'd set that Gringotts account up for him, after all, and Remus could live out of it.

But it's more than that. It's the symbolism of things. McGonagall just dismissed the one werewolf who's ever been welcome at Hogwarts. He now has no job. Even if he wasn't being paid in anything other than food and clothes and Wolfsbane Potion, the fact that he could live around and with other wizards is an important signal that some of us are accepting of werewolves.

Harry told himself that that wasn't the issue right now; his conversation with Snape was, and Snape had likely only brought this up at all to distract him. Harry recognized the gambit. He'd used it himself countless times, especially when he wanted Narcissa Malfoy to stop worrying about him; he had only to bring up Draco, and she was involved in considering what her beloved baby boy wanted and needed, with fewer concerns about Harry himself. Harry kept a determinedly pleasant expression on his face. "So you admit that you would not have mind-read anyone else except Remus without at least asking first."

"It has nothing to do with him being a Marauder," said Snape quickly, his face gone dark. "It has everything to do with him being a danger to you. You forget, I treated Dumbledore the same way."

"And Dumbledore was a Gryffindor and a friend of the Marauders," said Harry, with a nod, "the one who kept them in school when they should have been expelled for hurting you."

Snape started to answer, and then paused, staring at him.

Harry figured out the cause of that stare a moment later. "Of course I don't think that what they did to you was right!" he snapped. "Honestly, sir, you've grown so used to being alone with your grievances that I think you've forgotten other people can sympathize with them. I would have done what I could to make sure that Sirius and James paid for that. There's only the little matter of my not having been born at the time, you see."

Snape recovered himself at the sarcasm. "Dumbledore was a menace," he said, "at least where Slytherin students were concerned. And, in the last years, he was a menace to you. And so was Lupin."

“Then you could have gone to the Headmistress, and told her what you knew without benefit of Legilimency,” said Harry. “Besides, I think we were discussing something else, sir. Do you really think that no one would ever agree that your almost dying or becoming infected by a werewolf was wrong?”

“Precious few people have ever been in sympathy with it.” Snape stared down his nose at him as if Harry were Connor instead of himself. “Dumbledore and Minerva both refused to even consider expulsion for Black or Potter. Minerva took House points and gave detention, and that is all. And Dumbledore told me that I should try to understand what would have led them to play that prank, that I should try to make more friends and be kinder.” Bitterness choked his voices like ashes in a chimney.

“Then I understand why you hated them so much,” said Harry. “But do you really think the Headmistress hasn’t changed in the twenty years since, sir?”

“It is not her I am concerned about.” Snape flicked a hand in dismissal. “I am concerned with the fact that Lupin was a danger to you.”

“Because he was a Marauder.”

“Because he was a danger to you.” Snape stared at him pointedly. “Have you forgotten, Harry, that he suspected what was happening to you for a long time before he tried to do something about it? And even then, what he did was attack Black the moment he was free, not comfort you or apologize to you. The beast inside him wanted flesh. If he understands human emotions such as compassion, there is precious little evidence of it. Simply because he was mild, everyone assumed he was kind. I think that is false.”

“You go too far,” said Harry softly, narrowing his eyes. He almost wished he could have brought Snape to his conversation with Remus yesterday after all, even though he would have had to put Snape under a Silencing Charm to get anything productive said. “Remus was genuinely upset about having to betray me yesterday—“

“He did not have to betray you, Harry.” Snape’s voice now sounded like rain pounding on gravel. “He is weak, and always has been. He has only decided that he should give in to the beast now, instead of hiding from it. That is the only difference—”

“He chose,” said Harry. “I hate what he chose. I disagree with it. I hate that he thinks biting other people is all right. But you—you’re making it sound as if he was compelled to pick the path of rage and murder because he isn’t human.”

“He is not!”

Harry blinked a few times. The only sound for the next few moments was Snape’s harsh breath, rasping in and out of his lungs as if he had run a race. Harry sat, and thought, as best as he could in front of a prejudice he hadn’t even been suspecting he’d dig up.

“Well,” he said at last. “That explains a lot.”

Snape turned away from him, moving one hand absently through his hair. His bad leg trembled, and Harry felt a momentary twinge of sadness, that that wound would probably indicate Snape’s vulnerability for a long time—and not just by limiting his movement, the way it did now.

“Sir—”

“It is true,” said Snape lowly, never looking up. “Werewolves are not human, Harry. They are slaves of the beasts inside.” Harry might have believed him if not for the tremor underlying his voice. Snape wasn’t saying this in an effort to convince Harry about Remus. He was saying this because—

“Merlin,” Harry breathed. “You’re afraid of him. You’re afraid of all of them, and you haven’t wanted anyone to know.”

Snape’s gaze snapped to him. Harry saw anger and terror mixing there like crunching shards of glass. Snape’s façade had been utterly destroyed. Harry shook his head in silence, and asked his next question before he could think better of it.

“How in the world did you survive spying? You would have had to work beside Fenrir Greyback.”

Snape rebuilt his mask in a few places, though his voice still shook when he spoke. “Greyback followed Voldemort’s orders and did not bite fellow Death Eaters in human form. I trusted him to be terrified of the Dark Lord. If he’d touched me, he would have been deprived of the pleasure of future kills. And I could easily request to hunt elsewhere on full moon nights. The Dark Lord was—aware of what had happened to me because of Lupin. He even approved of my beliefs, because while he used werewolves, he considered them tainted. They are beasts to him. He may use Muggleborns, too, but that does not mean he will not kill and enslave them in the end.”

Harry nodded, understanding his mentor better than he had now. Snape hated feeling helpless. If he had a true and genuine fear, it would not be surprising that he concealed it for his life and never acknowledged that it was terror driving him. And, of course, while Dumbledore was alive, he would have had to hide his distaste if he wanted to work under a Headmaster who didn’t think werewolves were monsters.

But McGonagall’s already shown she’s different. Now, it’s a belief that’s going to cause him problems if he works with me.

“It must have cost you much to go into the Woodhouse battle on a full moon night,” he said.

Snape shook his head slightly. “The werewolves were in a different part of the valley, and under Wolfsbane. And by the time we realized it was an ambush and that we could actually be facing werewolves there, I believe that Greyback and his consort were already dead.” He sat silent for a moment, and then added, “And with you there, Harry, I could turn my terror into rage for your safety. I’ve always been good at transmuting fear into anger, in any case.”

“I know.” Harry took a deep breath. “But, sir, now you’ll have to find a different set of tactics. I’m going to be working beside werewolves often as I try to find a solution for their problems, and that means you'll be brought into contact with people you fear and hate often. I want you to know that I do sympathize with what happened to you because of James and Sirius, but I think that your prejudice against werewolves is wrong, stupid, and counterproductive."

"They are beasts," said Snape. "I say nothing, Harry, about it being their fault that they were bitten. The werewolves like Greyback are rare. I know that. But it changes them, the bite. Just as someone under the Imperius Curse may cause a great deal of damage that is not directly their fault, they will bring blood and ruin down if you work with them."

Harry sighed. "You don't think you can overcome this?"

Snape stared at him haughtily. "I don't see why I should have to. My attitude is the more reasonable and sensible one."

"You will have to because of me," Harry told him. "I can assign you elsewhere, the way Voldemort did, but I know you won't always want that, because of your desire to be at my side protecting me. Sooner or later, you'll have to deal with a situation where you're fighting beside me and werewolves are fighting beside me, in wolf form, even. Can you take that?"

Snape shut his eyes and said nothing for a long moment. Then he said, "I will try."

"Thank you," said Harry softly. He was still a bit shaken in the wake of Snape's deep hatred and deep fear. He had not sensed a trace of that in Snape for so long. Of course, Snape was a master Occlumens, skilled at feeling only those emotions he wanted to feel—and it was possible that he had shown signs of it, and Harry had dismissed them as merely hatred for a Marauder, a companion of James Potter. Harry was desperately glad to have discovered this weakness now, rather than in the middle of battle.

Of course, he thought, as Snape opened his eyes and turned to face him, that means that he's going to strike back, try to equalize the secrets that are shared and spread around today.

"I have answered your questions," Snape said, voice almost normal. "And I want you to answer one of mine."

Harry inclined his head.

"Why are you still so angry at me for filing child abuse charges against your parents and Dumbledore?" Snape asked quietly.

Harry felt himself freeze up for a moment. But Snape had shown incredible courage in admitting his own fear; could he show less? He lifted his head and said, "I don't entirely disagree with what you did, now that I've had some months to think about it. I can see factors that I couldn't when I was closer to the situation. I agree that Dumbledore should have gone to trial for what happened to Peter, at the least. And Connor could have filed charges against Lily for quiet abuse. That's one of the few regrets I have in killing Dumbledore, you know?" he added. "That he did not come to trial. I think Peter did deserve to have everyone know he was cleared directly, instead of indirectly through his testimony in my trial."

"And James?" Snape kept his voice neutral on the name, which Harry was sure must have taken a deal of effort.

Harry winced. Then he plunged forward, and said, "I—I tend to think that the child abuse charges you filed against him were still mostly a means of revenge, sir. I know you said that they weren't. But without those charges of neglect, there was really nothing to arrest him for. You could have secured Dumbledore and Lily from doing any more damage to me, or anyone else, by telling the Minister of the crimes they'd committed against other people. You chose that route instead, and I often think it was merely to include James in the smearing."

He looked up to see Snape watching him in silence. It seemed to be puzzled silence. Harry was vaguely surprised. He would have expected his guardian to at once begin denying that he'd done anything against James in the name of revenge; he'd said so before.

Then Snape said, "You still don't think your child abuse should ever have been exposed, do you?" His voice was soft and amazed.

Harry bit his lip. Then he said, "I know you did it to protect me. And I agree that they deserved justice for their crimes. But I would have preferred if we could have done something in private that would have protected me and given them justice for their crimes. I agree that you would have had to take charge of it. I really wasn't thinking straight at that point." He produced a smile, hoping Snape would smile back. He didn't. Harry pushed forward. "I didn't want anyone to know I had been abused. I agree everything else had to happen, now, though, as I said, I'm still suspicious about your motives for including James. But the exposure of that particular crime didn't need to happen."

"Why not, Harry?"

"I just—I didn't want it to."

"Why not, Harry?"

Harry sat back and closed his eyes. He was concentrating on holding his magic so that it wouldn't make his chair explode. "Because."

"Why not, Harry?"

"Because WHO CARES?"

Harry shouted that last, and then dropped back into his chair, panting. Snape said nothing at all, and whether it was to fill up the silence or for some other reason, Harry found himself pouring out words.

"I just—I could have healed in private. The people who needed to know about it, Draco and you and Connor and the Malfoys, knew about it. We could have done something with my parents and Dumbledore to punish them for that crime in private, and then dragged them up before the public for everything else. Then there wouldn't be newspaper articles about me, and stupid, stupid interrogations with Madam Shiverwood, and people trying to use my gift for sacrifice against me. Everyone who needed to know already knew. And I can accept concern from you and Draco on that score—you love me, you know me personally—and I can accept Connor's anger, since he didn't know about it for a long time and I was trying to pretend, at that point, that at least James wasn't guilty. But everyone else—I want them to go away. It's all going to go smash in the end if they don't look away. They have to see the principles I'm pushing forward, not me. They have to be willing to fight this war because of the idea that magical creatures deserve to be free and because they want to struggle against Voldemort, not because I'm the one leading them. It's like the difference between this—" he waved his severed left wrist "—as a symbol and as a source of concern for them. It's all right if they care about it because they think that Voldemort or his Death Eaters might inflict such horrible crimes on them. It's not all right if they think of it as something I suffered and want me to get another hand because of that.

"And it's the same thing with the trial. They could know that Dumbledore and Lily and James did evil things. They didn't have to know that those things were abuse of me. I don't want them to care too much. I can tolerate them looking at me as a symbol, as a leader, as a speaker, as a political player. Not as a victim."

He stopped speaking, and sat, empty and drained, for a long moment. Snape's voice flowed into the silence like water.

"Is that the reason you refuse to get another hand, Harry?"

Harry lifted his head and blinked at his guardian. "Yes," he said quietly. "Getting another one would be an admission that I think of myself as crippled, or that I deserve to be pitied. I don't want that."

"You think you have to be strong enough to bear any adversity?"

Harry frowned. "In public, yes." Isn't that obvious? "In private, I can relax around you and Draco, and admit things I wouldn't admit otherwise. But show me one leader who limps into battle with wounds bleeding all over him and asks for pity, and I'll show you someone who's going to die on the morrow—or in three seconds, if Voldemort is involved."

"I think you would find that not many people share your opinion," said Snape softly. "Wanting to be two-handed is not a pitiable thing, Harry, only a normal one."

“And one that makes me too human to them,” Harry countered. “I’m only practicing politics, sir, and you said Friday that you were happy to see my political instincts growing. Isn’t this another instance of it? Presenting a strong front in public, no matter what I feel like in private?”

Snape controlled his exasperation and his fondness, both. Harry wouldn’t respond well to either right now.

And at least it explains a good deal about him. I wonder, though, if he will want to hear that there will always be some people who follow him because of who he is, not what he preaches, and that his moments of weakness can be inspiring, because of how he bears up under them?

It didn’t matter if he liked it or not. Snape would be remiss to keep it from him while they were being honest. “If someone chooses to admire you for yourself, Harry,” he said, “that is something you cannot force him out of.”

“Who said anything about forcing?” Harry tossed his head like a nervous horse, a gesture Snape thought he might have picked up from Regulus. “I’m only trying to make sure that it doesn’t become a plague.”

Affection leaked into Snape’s voice before he could stop himself. “You are allowed to think about yourself, Harry. If you want a second hand, you are allowed to try to break the spells Bellatrix may have left on your wrist and replace it, rather than refuse it because you think all your attention has to go into the war and how you appear to other people.”

“I don’t think that,” Harry countered immediately. “After all, sir, I’m talking to you for a personal reason. I want to be able to trust you again.”

“So that I can also trust you,” said Snape. “So that you can also have someone who backs you in the war.”

Harry scowled at him.

“Will you think about getting yourself another hand?” Snape asked. “Not because of how it might look to others, but because you want one? If nothing else, it would be good practice for your courting ritual,” he added delicately, wondering why Draco had not told Harry this. Perhaps he had assumed Harry knew, or wanted it to be a surprise. “You are supposed to be thinking of your partner and yourself then, not the wider world.”

“I had guessed that,” said Harry. “And what makes you think that I want another hand?”

Snape raised his eyebrow.

Harry sighed. “Yes, all right, fine,” he said, in a voice that was not quite a snap. “But I don’t miss it as much as I would have expected. The pain has caused me more trouble, since Voldemort likes to use the memory of it to taunt me, and it was the one that Dumbledore used to capture me in Capto Horrifer.”

“Will you think about it?” Snape asked. He was perfectly aware that Harry had agreed only that he might want his left hand back, not to thinking about getting his left hand back. Harry could use conversational tricks like that in his sleep, but could rarely get past him.

Harry gave him a single glance like broken glass. “Yes, I will,” he said. “And if we’re into thinking about sensitive subjects, will you think about never using compulsion on Draco again?”

Masterfully turned, Harry, Snape had to admit, as he found himself once more on the defensive. “I did it in the first place because I wished Draco to have some interests independent of you,” he said carefully. “I knew the book would put a compulsion on him. I did not think it would be as damaging as it turned out to be, and certainly I did not think he would be able to brew that potion as fast as he did and summon his ancestor’s ghost on Halloween. I underestimated Draco’s skill in Potions.”

“None of that excuses you lying directly to me,” said Harry, eyes furious. At least they didn’t hold the same blank, dead rage that Snape had seen last Midsummer night, when Harry tried to choke him to death with magic. “And you can’t claim that you were protecting me this time. Why did you do it?”

“I think you know the answer to that one,” said Snape quietly. It would involve admitting to fear again if he said it, and he thought he had done enough of that in this conversation.

“I want to hear you say it again.”

“I feared that you would not trust me if you heard that I had used compulsion, no matter what the purpose,” said Snape. The words stung his lips as they slid across them, but at least, this time, Snape had had the choice to say them, and hadn’t had the confession forced from him the way his terror of werewolves had been. “And you needed an adult to trust at that point, Harry. It does come back to protecting you, no matter what you think.”

Harry raised his head and studied him in silence for a moment. Then he said, “You need to trust me more, sir. I hated you for the compulsion, of course I did, but more for the lie. If you’d just told me from the beginning that you wanted Draco to concentrate on something besides me and that the instrument you chose was ultimately too risky, I could have accepted that, because it would have been a mistake, not a calculated deception. You think I’m going to turn away from loving you at any moment, and that’s not true.”

Snape closed his eyes. He didn’t think that, of course he didn’t think that, it was too soppy to be a thing he would think—

But it was true. Why else hadn’t he told Harry about his Death Eater days, or shared how he knew so many of the wizards and witches who had been part of that first, failed meeting? Because he was afraid of Harry flinching away from him in disgust once he discovered some of the things Snape had done, both before and after he turned spy for the Light.

“Can you trust me that much?” Harry asked softly.

"I will try," said Snape. He knew it would be hard. He would be struggling against his own nature, after all, and the bitter lessons he'd learned so young that they never stuck him as cynical any more, simply the truth of the world. Everything he loved was snatched away. Everything he knew as good turned out to be an empty mask stretched over corruption. It had happened with his expectations about Hogwarts as a child, and the Death Eaters, and Dumbledore as the embodiment of Light. Someday, Snape knew, he would wake and find that Harry had gone, too, estranged from him forever by his own corruption.

A hand touched him, tilting his chin up and opening his eyes. Snape found himself looking directly into Harry's face.

And Harry had dropped the Occlumency barriers behind his eyes that usually contained his emotions, and opened the quicksilver pools.

Snape found himself swept into a mass of affection and love and admiration as strong as a riptide. Trust was a lesser current in it; as Harry had said, his ability to trust Snape had rather diminished since he brought the Potters and Dumbledore to trial. But it was still there, and Harry went on determinedly showing him the truth, strung between memories from the Chamber of Secrets all the way back to first year, that he loved Snape, valued him, and could trust him again fully, even if he did not now. He wouldn't let Snape throw that away just because of his own insecurities.

It was intolerable that he not respond to that, and with a gesture of equal respect and honor. So Snape opened his own Occlumency pools. Harry had time for a startled gasp before he tumbled into the emotions that swam there.

Fear. That was everywhere, Harry saw. Snape was afraid of losing him, afraid of finding out that he had driven Harry away forever, afraid that an enemy would catch and kill Harry one of these days when one of them wasn't quick enough, afraid that Harry would let threats get close to him because he loved people and forgave them too much. Fear, bordering on terror.

Rage. That danced past as a curtain of fire, not blue and gold like phoenix fire, but a red so deep it was almost black, and thus, Harry thought, almost the deep green of the Slytherin colors. Snape hated most of the world that would threaten Harry. Oh, he might have valued Harry at first because of vengeance on James Potter and Dumbledore, there was no doubt of that, but it had changed since then. Now he hated Remus as a threat, Voldemort as a threat, the political players in the Ministry as a threat, and was quite prepared to hate Lucius Malfoy as a threat if he showed himself so. That mingled with the fear, and explained, Harry thought dazedly, why Snape was apparently incapable of letting him investigate his own phoenix fire alone.

Love. That drove Snape, too, but it wove through the rage and the terror in sparkling threads, and so Snape could easily pretend it was something else. The world took away love, butchered it and slit its throat. He saw it happen with Harry as well as everyone else. Why should he believe that he would be safe if he showed it?

Harry found himself laughing helplessly as he fell back into his body. He closed his eyes and buried his face in Snape's neck for a moment, embracing him, as he carefully rearranged his own Occlumency pools. He was sure that Snape was doing the same thing. It would have hurt for him to keep them open as long as he had.

"You can't put me in an egg, you know," Harry whispered. "You can't keep me safe from every danger."

"I know," Snape said, voice muffled. "But you understand why I want to?"

"Better than I have." Harry was a little dazed, but he could feel an edge of emotion skimming across his mind. Merlin. Is that what it's like, having a parent? Is that what a parent is?

Then maybe I can be a son.

He was not entirely sure yet; the emotion was still tentative, darting and diving and dodging and playing games with him. But he was hopeful, now. If Snape's emotions were some of what a parent might feel, then Harry thought his own emotions, which complemented them, might be what a son would feel.

Maybe. Oh, maybe.

He sat back at last, and opened his eyes, staring directly into Snape's, but not opening himself to Legilimency this time. The moment for that was past. He had given Snape reason to trust him. Time to see if it would work. "Can you trust me?" he asked quietly. "Not to abandon you because of some imagined sin, and to protect myself as well as you try to?"

Snape inclined his head just a hair. "I can," he said. "I know that you could not—would not wish to back away, or harm me, because of—what I saw."

Harry nodded, satisfied.

"And you?" Snape tilted his head in challenge, an old sneer flickering around the corners of his mouth. "Will you trust me not to worry unreasonably, and to do what I think is in the best interests of your safety, not out of old grudges or malice?"

"I think so," said Harry. "Yes. I can." He stared at Snape a moment more. He had to admit, he'd been humbled by the extent of Snape's fear for his life. He knew Draco felt much the same way, but Draco was in love with him, and Harry could accept that because he experienced the same extremes of rage and distress when Draco got threatened. He also wanted to protect Snape, but his fear wasn't exactly corresponding, because he trusted Snape to (mostly) protect himself. "Sir—you care more for me, and better for me, than my parents ever did," he said.

Snape's arms slid around him so abruptly, and squeezed so tightly, that Harry lost his breath. He leaned his head against Snape's chest for a moment, though, and accepted the embrace, then returned it.

“That,” Snape whispered, directly into his ear, “is a precious gift.”

Harry closed his eyes and said nothing. Another tentative emotion had come to skim across his mind, stronger than hope and more uplifting than humility: exaltation.

Oh, Merlin, I’ve got one person I can trust no matter what. I have someone to go to if everything, the werewolves and Draco and the battle on Midsummer and the revolution after it, gets to be too much. This is brilliant.

Chapter Seventy-Nine: Violent Dawns and Renewed Wards

Harry shaded his eyes with his hand, and carefully considered the golden light making its way from the east. He stood on top of the North Tower, which gave him the best view of the sunrise in Hogwarts, to see if what he'd noticed yesterday and the day before was really true.

Yes, he decided after a moment. The gold spilled across the sky in a distinct shape, flaming in the midst of all the clouds and gentler tracteries of pink and blue and orange. Harry supposed someone could have cast a spell to create the shape, but three mornings in a row seemed excessive, especially since the shape looked like it reached across half Scotland at the least.

The shape was a gryphon's wing.

Well, the wild Dark announced its presence with violent storms, Harry thought, stepping back from the edge of the Tower. I suppose it's not a surprise that the Light announces its presence with violent dawns. That comforted him, somewhat. It confirmed that there was a storm of Light coming, and Midsummer Day was, if not actually proclaimed by the prophecy, still the best guess for when it would arrive, since that was the day when the Light was most powerful. And it would definitely come to Hogwarts; the prophecy had said so.

Harry snorted, then. Snape would have something to say about him putting so much trust in Divination.

He turned to go back below—he wouldn't want to panic Draco by having his boyfriend wake up and find him gone—and started when he realized a cloaked figure was standing behind him. "Professor Lestrangle," he said with a small nod. "Is something wrong?"

Acies drifted past him and leaned on the Tower battlement, staring at the eastern sky. At least, Harry thought she was, since her head was turned in that direction. Since the hood covered her face completely, though, she could have been looking at something else and he would never have known.

Harry watched her thoughtfully. The revelation of her true identity at the spring equinox meeting hadn't caused the stir Harry thought it would. Most parents seemed to have accepted that, since she had taught their children well so far, she would go on teaching them well. Or perhaps they were simply afraid to object to a witch who could summon dragons from New Zealand.

"Harry."

Harry cocked his head. He had heard Acies sound like that only once before, when she came to tell him about the third prophecy. "Yes, ma'am?"

"Can you hear the singing?"

Harry closed his eyes and listened, focusing his magic towards the sky. He supposed there was a frenzied symphony playing on the edge of consciousness, but that was not a surprise, with Walpurgis coming up in a few weeks, and the wild Dark's music circling closer to the earth as a consequence. For the first time, though, he made an effort to push his hearing beyond that, to take in some other kind of melody, if it existed. Perhaps it was audible only to ears that were stained with dragon.

No. Wait. He thought he could hear a song so joyous and savage that it cut into his ears like shards of glass. The only one he had ever heard to resemble it was the melody playing as he'd freed the Runespoors. Dark creatures, they'd been bound with a song of Light they couldn't undo, the music that the turning of the moon and the sun and the stars played. Harry remembered that song as soothing, though, not this cascade of sapphire notes that slipped out of his head the moment he heard them.

"Yes," he breathed.

"I do not know if I can help you during the Midsummer battle," Acies whispered, her voice the most choked Harry had ever heard it. "The songs come closer. The Light will sing on Midsummer. And the Dark will be singing beyond that, to counter its ancient enemy. Both of them will focus on Hogwarts, because there are two powerful wizards here. And I—the human and dragon have equal weight in my mind now, since I summoned the Antipodean Opaleye.”

Harry caught his breath. “You said that if you came too near to the great music, then you feared you’d change,” he said. “That the dragon would take over, the Singer responding to the songs.”

Acies nodded. “I am sorry. I had hoped to summon a dragon to aid you in the battle, but now, I fear—” She shuddered and swayed and made a small, helpless sound, and Harry found that he pitied her, for the first time. She had always seemed so inhuman before that it was hard to pity her, to feel anything but sorrow and compassion for her as grand as she was.

“I understand,” said Harry. “If you summoned a dragon to aid me, that would tip the balance, and your own dragon would emerge.”

“It would,” said Acies softly. “And I am not ready to stop being human. Not yet.”

Harry gently touched her robe. He wasn’t sure if he’d made contact with her spine, though he thought he had. “Please don’t trouble yourself about it, Acies,” he said softly. “The help you’ve given me so far has been more than welcome. And I don’t want anyone to sacrifice themselves to my battle, my need.”

“Thank you,” Acies whispered without sound, and stood still as Harry took himself off the Tower and towards the Slytherin common room. Draco was probably awake by now, and muttering about how anyone normal would use the Easter holiday to sleep in, not go watching violent dawns from the tops of towers.

Harry was halfway back to the dungeons when he heard a low, vaguely familiar voice say from the hallway ahead, “Point Me Harry vates.”

Harry dropped into a crouch. He wasn’t sure how someone hostile could have got in past McGonagall’s reconstructed wards, but better safe than sorry—and she hadn’t finished the work completely, not yet. He spun smoothly around the corner, his hand already uplifted to bring down scorching whips of magic if they were needed, or a Body-Bind if they weren't.

The person looking for him laughed and lowered his wand. "Good, Harry," he said with a brief nod. "Prepared, eh? Good, good. Constant vigilance!"

Harry blinked and dropped his hand. "Auror Moody? Is something wrong at the Ministry?" He couldn't imagine any other reason for Moody to be here. He wasn't the kind of person one would choose to send on peaceful or diplomatic missions.

"Something wrong at the Ministry?" Moody's face darkened like one of the clouds that had failed to show up in the sky this morning. "I'll say there is. Spineless cowardice, rampant corruption, use of Dark magic as if it were going out of fashion tomorrow." He shook his head. "Besides," he added, voice taking on a sly cadence, "your information's a little outdated, boy. You're calling me by a title that I don't have any more."

Harry stared at him. "You stopped being an Auror?" He supposed it wasn't much of a surprise. Moody had been retired when Mulciber captured him and used his hair to pose as the Defense teacher, and Moody might only have reentered the Ministry out of personal irritation. Since he'd been one of the original members of the Order of the Phoenix, maybe his disgust with Dumbledore had, in turn, overcome his irritation with Dark wizards. "Why?"

"Because of the Ministry," Moody grunted. "And a Minister who won't see what's in front of his face when curs bite people. And a better position waiting for me." He paused and fixed Harry with his normal eye; his magical one kept roving the corridor, looking, Harry supposed, for gaps and breaks in the stone, or traces of Dark magic. "If you'll have me, of course."

Harry blinked. "You—you came to join me." At least he managed to not make it a question.

Moody cackled. "I did," he said. "You're prepared, boy, but you could be better-prepared. I heard about a dueling club you had. It needs teaching in techniques you wouldn't know, because you've never had Auror training. And, of course, there's the lovely little fact that Dark wizards surround you all the time. Your side needs a little of the Light."

Harry laughed despite himself. "Can you get along with those Dark wizards?" he asked, remembering then that Moody had been responsible for capturing many of the Death Eaters.

"I got along with their cowardly cousins every day in the Ministry."

Harry nodded, satisfied. "And you think your teaching can make the difference for the dueling club?" he asked.

"Put it this way, boy." When Moody grinned, his face did distinctly disturbing things. "I made Evan Rosier retreat three times. Ask him about the scar down the inside of his left arm some time when he's feeling chatty."

"Welcome, then." Harry held out his hand, and Moody clasped it.

"Good," he said, and looked thoughtfully at Harry's handless arm. "There are replacements for those, you know."

Not you, too. Snape mentioned his hand at least once a day, now. Harry supposed some nagging was a small price to put up with for having both his guardian back and a new, powerful fighter joining them, though.

"I can't do that right now," he explained, as they began to walk to breakfast. "Bellatrix Lestrange used a certain ritual I don't know to enchant the knife that cut my hand off..."

Rufus, for once, felt no better even when he'd had his morning tea.

Nursing the cup, he stared down at the paperwork in front of him. All he had to do was sign it, and that was the end of it. It would confirm the Wizengamot's decision to force all registered werewolves to spend the nights of the full moon in Tullianum. The moment he signed it, the Department for the Control and Regulation of Magical Creatures would begin creating Portkeys that would take their recipients straight to cells in Tullianum on the appointed nights. The Department of Magical Law Enforcement would make sure that the Portkeys got to their destinations.

Only on the appointed nights, of course. Rufus had provoked his first shouting match with Amelia Bones in three years by asking if she was sure that the Portkeys would work then and only then, and wouldn't accidentally trap the werewolves beforehand. The fact that she couldn't look him in the eye while she reassured him was really what made him feel sick to his stomach.

Why did I ever think that being Minister in a wartime situation was easy? The history he'd read certainly made it sound as though the Ministry in Grindelwald's time had an easier time of it. It did what needed to be done, cleanly and without pause, and if it made mistakes, well, that was natural, and if it used more force than was strictly necessary, well, everyone understood; it was wartime. Rufus had always thought he was made to come into power in a time like that. He understood necessity. He should be able to swallow anything that Amelia Bones and the other Heads of Departments handed him, so long as it wasn't idiocy that would lead only to someone else's personal advancement and wouldn't benefit the war.

Why am I balking now?

Someone rapped on the door of his office. Grateful to whoever it was for the interruption—Percy was attending Auror Training at the moment, and wasn't available to serve as one—Rufus pushed aside the paperwork and looked up. "Enter."

Auror Wilmot slid inside, his head cocked and a strong sense of agitation brewing in him. Well, Rufus couldn't blame him for that. Nearly everyone had been on edge since Elder Gillyflower got bitten.

"The reports you asked for, sir," he said, laying a pile of new paperwork gently on the edge of the desk. "Everyone involved in breaking up that illegal potions-brewing ring is done with theirs now."

"Good," said Rufus, with genuine relief, reaching over and flipping through the parchment. It was more of the same, and that made it comforting, familiar. Every two years or so, someone thought he could brew potions illegal on British soil but legal in most other wizarding communities, and evade the “prudish” Ministry while he did it. Usually, the trouble came from France or Ireland, but this brewer had been Basque, and it had taken them quite a bit longer to catch him.

He paused as he caught sight of a list of ingredients on the first page. “Demiguise hair?” he asked.

“Yes, sir,” said Wilmot. “Apparently he thought the time had come for Britain to get its first taste of Morning After Potion.”

Rufus snorted. The Morning After Potion erased all details of embarrassing sexual encounters from one’s memory. It also gave the drinkers chronic heart conditions after two uses, and frequently caused explosions when it was brewing. “More like thirtieth,” he said absently, but went on staring at the list of ingredients. Demiguise hair, fairy wings, powdered bicorn horn...why do these sound familiar?

And then he knew, of course. Rufus stood up, eyes fastened on the list of ingredients. Wilmot jumped to attention, one hand on his wand.

“Sir?”

Rufus took a deep breath and studied the Auror carefully. He thought he could trust Wilmot to keep this quiet. He was, of course, part of the vast network of favors that guided the Ministry and which Rufus did his best to ignore, but he had no ties that would make blurting this secret out an irresistible temptation. At least, Rufus thought he didn’t. There did seem to be some people with blackmail material on Wilmot that he’d never been able to discover.

“Edmund,” he said, “I want you to move the confiscated Potions ingredients from the Auror offices to mine. Can you do that?” He could hardly stride into the Auror offices to do it himself.

Wilmot blinked. “Of course, sir.” He hesitated, then added, “May I ask why?”

Rufus nodded firmly. "I have a cousin who—would be interested in them." And he did, although he hadn't seen Robert in years. Robert was an accomplished Potions brewer, always whining about the scut work he had to do to keep himself from starving. Rufus thought the problem with his cousin was more that Robert couldn't resist a challenge, and would brew complicated but inexpensive potions just to see if he could. "He's been wanting to try his hand at making—a potion that uses these ingredients for years now. And I thought, well, there's no reason that he couldn't try with these, since we know they weren't stolen, just bought on the black market."

Wilmot stared at him some more. Rufus saw the connection spring into place in his mind. Wilmot wasn't blind, or stupid. He knew that the Wolfsbane Potion used all those ingredients.

"And what would happen to the potion once he made it?" Wilmot's voice was gently strangled.

"Well, he's mostly interested in making the potion," said Rufus thoughtfully. "That's more important to him than credit, or even money. I was thinking that, once he's done with it, it could be moved away from his house and distributed to people who might need it. Quietly, of course. After all, it wouldn't do for the Minister to be seen handing it out in the street."

He nodded as he thought about it. Yes, it was the right thing to do. The main problem was that any public move he made right now could be criticized wildly, by either the British people or the werewolves—who were his people, too, at least if he followed Harry's line of reasoning. But giving Wolfsbane away without linking himself directly to its production could make a difference to the temperament of some werewolves and spare him from that criticism. He could at least act privately, if not publicly.

He scrutinized Wilmot now, wondering if he would approve or disapprove of the plan. If his disapproval was plain, then Rufus would arrange matters differently. There were other people who would help, though none as unobtrusive; Tonks, for example, was more often considered the Minister's "pet" because she guarded him so often.

But Wilmot stared at him as if he were seeing a vision of the Light. Rufus raised his eyebrows. Well. That is different from the way other people have looked at me today. He forced away the pang that came at the thought of accepting Alastor Moody's resignation, and stared back.

"Will you do this for me, Edmund?" he asked.

Wilmot gave himself a little shake. "Of course, Minister," he said. "I will do it gladly." He stared for a moment more, and then added, "You're a different man than I thought you were, sir."

He opened the door and departed, leaving Rufus to sit behind his desk and feel a little better than before. He hesitated a long moment, and then scrawled a denial on the proposal to create Portkeys for the purpose of transporting werewolves.

It would mean another shouting match with Amelia. At the moment, he felt more than equal to that.

Remus closed his eyes, and breathed.

He couldn't remember the last time he'd breathed like this—no, wait, of course he could. It had been the last time he was near the presence of so many other werewolves, which would have been the summer four years ago. The summer three years ago had been spent testing the Wolfsbane and preparing to teach at Hogwarts, the summer two years ago had been spent at Lux Aeterna grieving for Sirius and trying to learn James, and last summer had been spent at the Sanctuary. And now the summer was almost come around again, and it looked like he'd be spending it—

Here.

Remus set his trunk to drift behind him and waited patiently. He stood in the rain, on a street that looked as if it had dirt rubbed into the sides of the buildings, but he didn't care. At least there were no cars here, and no Muggles around. Muggles tended to move, slowly but surely, out of areas that werewolves inhabited. They might not even realize they were doing it, they certainly wouldn't admit to what the prickling fear running up and down their spines meant, and they often actually believed that their kind still inhabited these particular areas of London.

But they were gone from this one. It had been the home of Loki's pack for over twenty years, and the wolf was deep in every wall, every doorway, every stone. Something in the back of Muggles' brains knew what that meant, even if they didn't admit it aloud, and kept them away.

"Remus."

Remus turned with a faint smile to nod at the girl who'd found him. She'd been born Muggle, but had actually been bitten before she was a year old and managed to survive. She didn't pay any attention to his floating trunk, instead eying him minutely, sniffing for any trace of tracking spells or other magic that could hurt the pack. Remus waited until she looked up at his face, made a brief, flickering moment of eye contact that was enough to welcome and not enough to challenge him, and then said, "Hullo, Camellia."

"Hullo yourself," Camellia retorted, shaking her long dark hair as she glanced from side to side. "Loki didn't expect to see you here for another few months at least. Thought the blind wizards would wait that long before throwing you out."

"Well. They didn't." And Remus could understand why, even though he thought they were doing the wrong thing, and had even tried to explain that. Minerva had told him that she didn't trust him near children when he considered werewolves and their political agenda more important. Remus knew the truth, though. A werewolf learned early on to smell fear, and she was afraid. She feared he might bite them, and especially, that he might bite Harry, that part of Loki's plan might be having the vates become a werewolf and be more bound to help them than ever.

That was a groundless fear, but Remus couldn't explain why it was groundless without explaining pack magic, and the existence of that would startle and unnerve Minerva far more than the existence of werewolves wanting equal rights to wizards.

“Come along,” Camellia told him, and started loping up the street, her baggy clothes swaying around her. “The others are waiting.”

Remus followed her, continuing to breathe deeply, deeply, in. The air wasn't scented with musk, at least not in most places; after all, it was nearly five nights since the full moon, and the reek of transformed werewolves faded quickly into the rain. But it was wild, haunted with a different kind of magic, haunted with a companionship that ranged beyond bodies. The area around him was, mostly, a comfortless gray that Remus might have found depressing just a year ago. As it was, he found it cheering now, the kind of color a werewolf would see when transformed.

All of this might have been different, he thought absently, as Camellia guided him up a set of steps and into the hollowed-out space of what seemed like an abandoned house on the outside, but hummed with light and warmth and magic on the inside, if he hadn't written a letter to Loki while he was at the Sanctuary. The Seers had encouraged him to do so, as part of coming to terms with his past. Remus really hadn't expected an answer.

But Loki had given him one, a long letter full of news about the London packs and how the Ministry was pushing them to death. And Remus had written back, and Loki had written him, and gradually, Remus's startlement had melted. He'd been wary of Loki as recently as November, when the other werewolf's plans were still strange and new to him. But months of reasonable explanations had convinced him that Loki was right. Remus only wished that he'd been able to convince Harry, and that they hadn't had to part ways over this.

He stepped into the house, which was enormous, both on the ground floor and in the number of stories it had. Men and women sprawled on the rugs looked up at him lazily; Camellia's entrance had already warned them someone was coming. Remus felt his face soften further at the sight of people casually entwined, necks resting on each other's, bodies draped over each other's backs. Two children were wrestling in a corner of the room, but they were new members of the pack and probably still establishing their place in the hierarchy. Remus remembered the first time he'd entered this room when he was fourteen, the shock he'd had at meeting pair after pair of amber eyes. Now, the last of the tension he'd been harboring since Hogwarts dissipated completely.

"Remus."

Remus turned and dropped to the floor as Loki moved towards him from a corner of the room. Loki stopped in front of him and bent, too, rubbing his cheek against Remus's with a soft yip of greeting. Remus looked up at him. Loki looked the same as he ever did: white-blond hair to rival a Malfoy's, amber eyes, a seamed and laughing face. His mate, who called herself Gudrun, peered over his shoulder, and then snorted.

"What's Remus doing down there, Loki?" She punched her mate hard enough to stagger him. "Let him stand up, for Merlin's sake."

Loki moved back with a slight chuckle, and Remus gratefully stood. "Sorry," Loki murmured. "I get lost in remembering, sometimes, when I look into someone's eyes."

Remus nodded, understanding completely. The connection Loki had with other werewolves as a pack leader ran more deeply than theirs with him, allowing him to see into their minds and be enveloped in their magical auras. He did tend to be distracted when he didn't have to be sharp-eyed about a plan or an upcoming hunt.

"I have information for you," Remus told him.

"I'll fetch tea," said Gudrun, and moved away to do that. Around them, the room relaxed and went back to its quiet companionship. Loki put his hand on Remus's shoulder.

"The vates?" he asked.

"Refusing to understand," said Remus sadly. Loki hadn't assigned him to convince Harry, but he'd wanted to, wanted to make him understand that with their packs dying, they had no alternative but this. "At least, so far."

Loki cocked his head, eyes blazing wildly bright, making him look fierce and dangerous, though he continued to stand still. “Well,” he murmured, “I have an idea for something that might convince him.”

Eagerly, Remus followed him to a corner to make his report, to hear his plan, and to breathe in the contained power that hung around Loki like a second scent. Being around the other werewolf, more than in this place or with the pack itself, made him feel at home.

Someone was testing her wards again. And by the image that the surveillance spells on the outside of her house were sending to her mind, Henrietta Bulstrode knew exactly who it was.

She considered her options, tapping her fingers against the book she’d been reading. She could stay here and ignore the testing, and eventually he’d leave. He’d tried again and again in the past few days, and all Henrietta had to do was tighten her magic—with ordinary slowness, as if she were merely doing maintenance, affecting never to notice him—and ignore it. If she did go out, then she could only use Dark Arts to defend herself, as per the vows she’d given to Harry.

Of course, with this one, there was really never any doubt that she’d need to defend herself. And reading up on Transfiguration, repairing the holes that still gaped in her education, had little to recommend it next to such a—challenge.

Henrietta stood and Apparated along the lines of the wards, appearing just outside them. No crack sounded when she did that, and so her visitor, standing on the rainswept grass as he incanted spell after spell at her defenses, remained unaware of her presence for a moment.

Only a moment, though. Then Evan Rosier turned around and gave her a fierce, feral smile. Henrietta gave back a faint shudder, one that didn’t contain fear. This is a wonderful way to get the blood moving.

“I suppose Harry warned you?” Rosier asked, swinging his wand in a lazy arc. “About needing to watch your back?”

“Of course he did,” said Henrietta. “I’m surprised at you, though, Evan, seeking me out like this. I thought you’d be subtler than that.”

There was no warning. One moment, Rosier stood there, relaxed as a great hunting cat in the sun, smiling at her; the next, he was swinging his wand forward, and a pain curse was erupting from the end of it, a vicious red line that would cause incurable burns if it touched her.

Henrietta arched an eyebrow as she reached out to her home. I thought he would have more imagination than that, as well as more subtlety.

She'd constructed a rune circle that ran all the way around her home, outside the wards. The runes were buried innocently in the ground, scribed on turned-over rocks or the undersides of leaves. Henrietta really wasn't surprised Rosier had missed them. He could have watched her build the whole thing, and it would only have seemed as if she were doing a particularly enthusiastic bout of gardening.

The circle came to life, and lines of light, made of images of the transcribed runes, rose from all sides of it. They collided with the red curse Rosier had chosen and turned it into a flight of diamond dust and purple butterflies. Henrietta admitted the butterflies for a moment, then turned to smile at Rosier.

"Do you remember them, Evan?" she asked, deliberately making her voice breathy. "How prettily they fluttered around us as we fucked?"

His eyes darkened. Henrietta watched him, and smiled, and smiled. She still remembered the earth under her elbows as she fucked him, all against his will, knowing he could kill her at any moment if her spells faltered and not caring. He hadn't wanted to fuck her, and he hadn't wanted to hear the extra spells she whispered as she rode him, not because she had to but just because she could. She'd raped him in the midst of a flight of purple butterflies.

His smile was gone, just as it had been that evening. He wasn't used to other people getting the better of him. He was speaking another Dark Arts curse now, probably not realizing that the rune circle would defeat anything he could dream up, even his "special" spells, and so he didn't make any move to counter Henrietta's silent Abscindo vestitus.

His robes and trousers parted neatly around the waist, and tumbled down around his ankles. Henrietta leaned nearer, and laughed quietly to see the purple scar on the inside of his thigh. "Still carrying my love bite, Evan? I never realized you cared so much."

He struck then, and struck and struck, gone into the madness that always lurked behind his smile. Henrietta bounced curse after curse. His creativity was impressive, but they meant little against her rune circle, which was brute strength crushing every one of those "creative" spells. He screamed at her, too, without words, and Henrietta didn't let that move her.

He vanished at last. Henrietta Apparated back inside her house and returned to reading about Transfiguration.

She needed to know as much about it as she could, since she intended to apply for the post of Transfiguration Professor at Hogwarts next year. She would have applied for Defense Against the Dark Arts if she thought she would be accepted, but she doubted McGonagall would let her teach that, even if Lestrage was gone by then. The Transfiguration post, however, was effectively empty as the Headmistress struggled to cover it from her new office. This was the best way for Henrietta to be close so that she could protect Harry.

"I think this will do," said Harry, oblivious to how loud he sounded with the Silencing spell protecting his ears from the mysterious creature's song.

Draco winced from the volume, but had to admit Harry was right. They'd found a room on the second floor of Number Twelve Grimmauld Place that would be perfect for Draco to carve his rune circle in: a wooden floor, no pests to eat up or smudge his careful work, and traces of old preservation spells that came to life when they felt the new ones being cast and would add an extra layer of protection to the circle. Draco knelt down and began to carve the first rune, one of binding.

Harry glanced aside from him, up the stairs towards the door where Narcissa had told Draco the creature was trapped. Draco kept an eye on him, even though his mother was also here, gathering up artifacts from downstairs that might be useful, or might be nuisances if they were left in the house, and Pettigrew was standing guard by the door upstairs. Harry wouldn't really be able to let the beast out.

Except that, of course, he still wanted to. And if he decided he should, then none of the three of them were going to be able to stop him.

Draco forced the thoughts out of his mind with a sigh, and made himself concentrate on the runes. Mother had assured him that the creature's song was a subtle compulsion, but not irresistible, and Draco didn't have to worry about it anyway, since it was much more interested in Harry and the meal of his magic. His part was getting all the runes exactly right.

And, of course, sneaking one of the Black artifacts out of the house without Harry noticing in time for the Walpurgis Night ritual.

Really. Don't think about that. Carve.

Draco turned his mind into concentrated ice, and did that. The runes took shape under his knife, not twisted this time; he had practiced the ones that had gone wrong in the Room of Requirement until he could have done them standing on his head with the carving knife in his teeth. They had to be perfect, since they were part of the plan that Harry had created to trap Voldemort on Midsummer Day, and they were going to be.

How mad is this plan?

Draco forced that thought away, too, in case it disturbed his calculated serenity, and went right on cutting. Harry sat by his side the entire time, now and then swaying and casting a glance upstairs. Draco touched his arm each time, and each time Harry turned obediently back and paid attention to the circle, though since he hadn't taken Ancient Runes it didn't mean much to him.

Finally, after more than two hours of cutting and checking and double-checking, it was done. Draco sat back on his heels and looked at Harry. "What do you think?" he mouthed, in an exaggerated fashion, so that Harry could read his lips.

"It looks unbroken," said Harry, and smiled at him. Draco set himself against the force of that smile; he thought he didn't flush, only nodded and smiled back, but Harry was turning away in any case, and probably wouldn't have seen it. "I'm sure it'll work, Draco. I have faith in you."

Draco's nerve broke. He reached out and caught Harry's left wrist, turning him back. Harry arched his brows, and Draco mouthed another question. "Are you sure we need to do this?"

Harry's face softened, and he leaned nearer to touch Draco's cheek and then kiss him gently on the side of the mouth. "Yes," he said. "I know it seems complicated as hell, but it's the only way to absolutely defang him and make sure he isn't a danger for a time. I don't think we can kill him yet, but the wizarding world has other problems to deal with right now. We don't need Voldemort over the summer."

Draco felt a surge of warmth in his stomach. Though of course Harry was doing this to free the northern goblins and to defeat the Dark Lord and to defend the school and for all the other right and honorable reasons, there was still a shadow of a suspicion in there that Harry had done it to give them both a quieter summer.

And Draco liked that. He liked that rather a lot.

A movement near the door of the room caught his eye, and he looked up to see his mother standing there with a silver object in her hand. She tipped it enough so that he could see what it was, and Draco felt the warmth turn into delight. It was perfect for his courting ritual with Harry. He nodded.

Harry turned to see what he was looking at, but by then, Narcissa had vanished.

"What was that all about?" Harry asked suspiciously.

Draco shook his head innocently, smiling when Harry's glare sharpened. Then he held up both of his hands, fingers spread wide, in a signal that Harry understood perfectly well. He was the one to look away then, while Draco grinned.

Ten days until Walpurgis.

Minerva sat back, sipped at her tea for a moment, and let the peace warm its way into her bones.

From the top of the North Tower to the tunnels under Hogwarts that the Founders knew and had told her about, the school was hers. It hummed with the wards she'd woven slowly over the last two weeks of the Easter holiday, defensive spells based in strength and courage and stubbornness and determination not to be like Albus. These wards would not falter if she did. They were bound to the permanent magic of the school, much as the Room of Requirement and the Founders' anchor-stones were. They wouldn't let her spy on her students' and professors' movements even if she wanted to. They were focused on defense, on identifying hostile presences and caging them, on making sure that any student injured in an accident or a fight got immediate transportation to the hospital wing, on minimalizing the danger of magic as much as possible while increasing the wonder of it.

"Pleased with yourself?"

Minerva opened one eye. Godric stood in a corner of the office, obviously having arranged himself so he wouldn't float through the stone floor, a bright grin on his face as he watched her.

"I am." Minerva rubbed her face with one hand and yawned. "The children come back tomorrow, and they'll be safer and more secure than they've been in—decades, probably." She didn't know if Albus really had begun altering the wards the moment he became Headmaster, but it wouldn't surprise her.

"You should be proud," said Godric softly. "You are a credit to the House of Gryffindor, Minerva."

She opened both eyes at that, and frowned at him. "Is there something wrong, Godric?"

He smiled and glanced to the side. Minerva watched as a shape slowly coalesced there: brown-eyed, brown-haired, wearing a shapeless robe, and nervous as Neville Longbottom in a Potions practical. It was Helga Hufflepuff, come to meet her face-to-face at last.

"Only that you've impressed Helga," said Godric. "She distrusted Albus before the rest of us, and nearly wrenched herself free from the school rather than serve an unworthy Headmaster. But you've convinced her that not all members of my House are proud idiots unable to see beyond the ends of their lives. Congratulations." He bowed to both of them. "I'll leave you two to get acquainted."

He vanished. Helga and Minerva watched each other warily for a moment, until Minerva cleared her throat.

"I was wondering if you could come up with certain defenses for the Forbidden Forest," she said. "We have an enemy skilled in Herbology now, but the trees are full of ancient magic of their own that makes establishing wards around them difficult."

"I know," said Helga, in a low, lovely voice, and floated towards her desk. "I have some ideas."

Minerva relaxed again, and picked up her teacup. I may actually be worthy of not only Gryffindor's legacy, but the Headmistress position after all. Here is to hope.

Chapter Eighty: Calling Up the Wild Magic

Harry rubbed irritably at his ears. It was all very well for the wild Dark to run around singing, but when he started hearing the song even in the middle of Arithmancy, then something had to be done.

“Mr.—Harry? Are you all right?”

Harry managed to give Vector a pained smile. “Yes, Professor.” He bent over his work again, trying to disregard the glances that other students were giving him. He could hardly blame them. After all, if something was wrong with him, then Voldemort might be about to attack the school, or an immense beast might appear out of nowhere and crash into it. Harry wondered how many of them considered him a ward, blaring before a danger actually reached them to give them time to hide.

A flare of irritation surged through him, and a white dove appeared out of nowhere above his head and fled towards the window, wings clattering. When it couldn't find exit there, it wheeled around and then flew up towards the ceiling. It perched there and began to coo. Professor Vector stared at it, and then at him. The other students said nothing, their hunched shoulders more eloquent than their mouths could be.

“Harry,” said the professor at last, voice clipped. “Do attempt to control yourself.”

“I will,” Harry whispered, feeling his ears burn. “It's Walpurgis.” He turned a sharp glance on Draco when he realized that Draco was snickering behind his hand and not even trying to hide it. Draco gave him an innocent look, shaking his head.

“A dove, Harry?” he whispered. “And you can't do anything better than that, then? At least a dragon wouldn't raise doubts about what sweet and innocent dreams you have at night.”

“Shut it,” Harry muttered, and went back to his calculations. The dove uttered a few more experimental coos before tucking its head under its wing and going to sleep. Harry reminded himself to capture it after Arithmancy so he could release it outside.

His magic was creating birds and scents and miniature lightning storms any time he experienced a strong emotion, and it was still five days until Walpurgis. Harry dreaded to see what he would be doing by the time the last day of April actually arrived.

Draco tapped the book with his finger and leaned over it one last time. The words it contained were practically etched with acid into his brain by now, but there might be one thing he'd forgotten, one requirement of the ritual that he'd let lapse from his mind because it wasn't as interesting as the others. So he read it again.

The formal courting ritual takes three years in total. It is best to begin on Walpurgis Night, for then not only is the wild magic close to the earth to see the lovers and give them its blessing, but emotions otherwise buried may also rise. Walpurgis calls to the magic in the blood and bone, and wizards and witches sing back to the sky. Even Light wizards are restless on that night, sensing the ancient communion that pertained to all before some turned their back on the spaces between the stars and proclaimed they would follow only the starlight.

Draco raised his eyebrows, as he always did. That was the only point on which he really distrusted this book. It claimed that all wizards had once been Dark and the Light came later. Draco didn't think so. Some people had always been afraid, which meant there must always have been Light wizards in the world. He rolled over on an elbow and continued reading, unafraid that Harry would find him. Harry was off brewing potions with Snape. They did that more often now that they'd finally settled the stupid argument between them.

On such a night, those who do not know each other, the newly introduced lover and beloved, may be more amenable to the marriage or joining than otherwise. Their parents should introduce them, and then leave them alone. A coupling on this night between new lovers would not be wise, but those performing the ritual will not wish to bed each other in any case.

“That’s what you think,” Draco muttered. Of course, the ritual had been intended to match partners in arranged marriages and joinings, initially. It made sense that two people suddenly forced together wouldn’t be that interested in leaping into bed.

The purpose of all the smaller rituals that are part of this courting—save the thirteenth and last, which is the actual marriage or joining, and should take place on the Walpurgis three years after the beginning of the ritual—is to create intense experiences that the partners may share together. This is the true purpose of the absence of parents, siblings, and other traditional guards for a young man or woman of marriageable age. If they participate, the ritual will go subtly awry, and attempt to include them in the partnering. Save in the case of Flora, Pomona, and Tertius Guile, such joinings are not usually successful.

Draco gave a shiver of distaste at the thought of getting Connor pulled into the ritual, or anyone else who might follow them in curiosity to see what was happening. He would definitely make sure that he and Harry were alone before he started the ritual after the dancing.

The lover will need to present his beloved with a gift important to the lover’s maternal bloodline, symbolizing the birth of a new and momentous link. This gift must be secured while the beloved is nearby, but not seen beforehand. The beloved will need to accept it and speak the required words that allow the ritual to proceed, “In blood we begin this marriage/joining, on earth, in the sight of the dark spaces between the stars.”

Draco nodded. He’d memorized the words, and he could easily prompt Harry, who knew nothing about them yet—Harry had not demanded to know any details of the rituals—to say them.

The rest of the details of the ritual were as he remembered them. Draco gently put the book aside and lay back on the bed, fighting the urge to laugh giddily and wrap his arms around himself.

Three days until Walpurgis Night.

Harry sat straight up in bed, and blinked at nothing. The dream tattered through his head, not having the clarity of a vision come from Voldemort, but not fading the way that most of his ordinary dreams did, either.

In it, a shining black wyvern with silver wings had threatened him. It had stalked him through a dark green clearing, and tried to sting him several times with its scorpion tail. Harry had avoided each strike, and said the most nonsensical things to the wyvern in turn, scolding it, as if it were a pet that he needed to hold back from hurting either him or itself. The wyvern had shrieked like a kettle in irritation each time he did so.

“Well, that was different,” he said aloud.

“What was different?” Draco’s voice just outside his bed-curtains made him start, Argutus blink and hiss sleepily, and the Many snake lift her head from the blankets, ready to bite anyone who threatened Harry. Harry swallowed and told himself that startlement was not the same thing as fear.

“A dream that was, for once, just an ordinary dream,” he said, keeping his voice low, and opened the curtains. Draco stood there with his wand in his hand and Lumos glinting on the end of it. Harry rolled his eyes. “Come in, for Merlin’s sake, before we wake Blaise up.” Blaise had tended to look particularly martyred in the past week whenever he was deprived of sleep, though that could be because he and Ginny were still having an ongoing argument, and he lay awake at night thinking up retorts.

Draco crawled into the bed with him, and let the curtains fall closed. He reached out to stroke Argutus’s head, and Argutus hissed happily. “His hands are always warmer than yours,” he told Harry.

“That’s nice,” said Harry absently, and turned back to Draco. “What’s the matter? Did you have a nightmare?”

Draco gave him an odd look. “No. Why do you ask?”

“Because you were standing outside the curtains as if you were waiting for me to wake up,” said Harry. “A bad dream might cause that, but I don’t know what else.”

“Because I heard you talking in your sleep, of course.” Draco abruptly grinned and leaned closer to him. “I thought I’d come over here and make sure that you weren’t moaning anyone else’s name but mine.”

Harry felt his cheeks flush, and knew from Draco’s satisfied look that he’d seen it. He didn’t really understand that part of their relationship yet, Harry had to admit. If anyone had asked him, he would have said that Draco would want a partner who could keep up with him in witty flirtation, rather than, as Harry did, only achieving it in certain moments. He had done it at the alliance meeting, but only by taking Draco utterly off-guard with the public announcement of their courting ritual. Instead, Draco seemed to enjoy provoking any reaction he could out of Harry, whether that was stuttering or flushing or a poleaxed stare.

Well, if I am not equal to him in that, I can try to be. And perhaps he’s not as obsessed with it as I think he is. He has never said anything to indicate that he wishes I’d be wittier.

“No, no one’s name but yours,” said Harry, and lowered his voice as he said it, to see what would happen. Draco blinked at him, his expression bearing a distinct hint of That’s not fair. Harry cocked his head at him and leaned in closer. “Or were you making sure of that, instead? I’ve seen you reading all those books lately that you’ve been refusing to show me the titles of. Have you been studying incantations for certain kinds of dreams, Draco?”

“Of course not!” Draco exclaimed, as if he thought the accusation was serious. “Those are books about the ritual, Harry, and I just want to make sure that I’m doing everything right and that I’m surprising you. That’s all.”

“Hmmm.” Harry told his impending panic, present mostly because he was sure to mess this up, to bummer off. “And what kinds of surprises do you have for me, Draco?” He let his eyes flicker down Draco’s body, and abruptly Draco was the one looking poleaxed. Harry grinned at him, unable to maintain the front for much longer. I can see why he likes doing this. This is fun—when it goes right.

“Um,” said Draco, and looked at him some more. Then he said, “I think I’ll go back to bed now,” and opened the curtains, though he looked as if he wished that Harry would invite him to stay.

“I think that’s a good idea,” Harry agreed solemnly. “After all, we wouldn’t want to wake Blaise up with all our nocturnal activities.”

Draco blinked. Then he said, “Flirting isn’t a necessary part of the ritual, Harry.”

Does he really think that I’d only do this because of that? Yes, he does, from that expression. Harry sighed and reached out, letting his hand glance along the side of Draco’s cheek. “I know it’s not,” he whispered. “I’m doing this because I want to, Draco, and for no other reason.” He raised his eyebrows. “Do you really think that you could force me into doing something I didn’t want?”

“No, but your training—“

“My training has nothing to do with this part of it,” said Harry. “Go to sleep, Draco. After all, you’ll need all your strength tomorrow night.”

He watched in satisfaction as that made Draco stumble a little on his way back to the bed. Well it might. This was the first time Harry had ever tried to flirt seriously, and that he was choosing to do it the night before the courting ritual began would make it all the more significant to Draco.

Well, good. I want it to be significant.

Harry slid back under the blankets and closed his eyes, to the delight of both Argutus and the Many snake.

One day until Walpurgis.

Harry tensed when he received the Daily Prophet the next morning. The headline on the front page concerned “shock tactics” that a werewolf group had used to try and force people to pay attention to them: vandalism on several shops in Diagon Alley, and enchantment of objects in each shop to chant slogans supporting werewolves' rights. The story contained a quote from "former Minister of Magic Cornelius Fudge" on how awful the vandalism was, though, from the descriptions that Skeeter had chosen, Harry thought it sounded minor.

But that's not an excuse, is it? Harry thought, as he handed the paper over to Draco and began eating his sausages, with Argutus's earnest help. No, it's not. Biting people might be their worst tactic, but they wouldn't limit themselves to causing chaos and damage on the full moon nights alone. Of course not.

What they're doing is dangerous and irresponsible. How long before it escalates from night raids and vandalism and minor spells to an all-out curse war? The werewolves might not even start that, Aurors might, but it would still result in dead people. And the moon is full again in two days.

He started to push his plate away from him, but Argutus was hanging off his shoulder, a bond that connected him to the plate, and objected with hisses loud enough to make several students look over at the Slytherin table. Harry flushed and let the Omen snake take a few bites from his fingers. Argutus immediately started crooning that he was the best friend a snake could have, and wrapped his tail securely around Harry's throat while he feasted. He'd grown long enough now that he flowed over Harry's shoulders like some kind of mirrored drapery, and though he still preferred to ride with some part of himself touching Harry's left wrist, he couldn't expect a loop of his tail around it to support his weight any longer.

"What's the matter?"

Harry, surprised, turned his head. He would have expected Draco, if anyone, to comment on his reaction to the article, but it was Pansy, her head cocked to watch him. Harry couldn't see her face in the confines of her hood. That was all right. He'd finally got used to Pansy as a black-wrapped presence, he thought, with the robes billowing and drifting around her as the dead played with them, and the scent of rotting flesh growing stronger every day. And of course she could talk aloud to him now, since today was Walpurgis.

"I don't know what the best course is, with the werewolves," he whispered to her. "If I knew who they were, I might be able to stop them, but I only have the name of a leader, not a location or a description."

Pansy paused for so long that Harry wondered if she'd retreated into communion with the dead, or found what he said boring. Then she said, "Is it your responsibility to stop this, Harry? They've chosen their fate."

"I would like to stop it, at least," said Harry. "They're dragging innocents into a second war, and they're dividing the attention of the Aurors and the Department of Magical Law Enforcement, which should be focused on stopping the Death Eaters as much as possible. Add to that the fact that they only got so bold in the first place because I made that oath to help them, and, yes. I think at least part of it is my responsibility."

Pansy inclined her head. "And what do you think their ultimate plan is?"

Harry shook his head. "I have no idea whatsoever. Remus told me what they want and the general outline of what they've decided on, but not the details of how they plan to achieve it."

"Do you think you'd know the werewolves who did this to Diagon Alley, to look at them?"

"Not unless I could use Veritaserum," said Harry.

"Then stop fretting," Pansy ordered him softly. "No one else expects you to stop this, Harry. They'll look to the Minister and Madam Bones and blame them. You should enjoy Walpurgis. The wild Dark and the dead both wish you well, you know, and your courting begins tonight."

Harry blinked at her. "The wild Dark wishes me well?" he asked stupidly. "How do you know that?"

He had the impression that Pansy smiled, though only the tilt of her head said so. It was becoming hard to remember how her gestures had looked without the robes, he thought, and that idea pierced him with a pang of sadness. “I know because it’s decided to talk to the dead this year, to ruffle them like wind blowing through the leaves of the trees, and the dead pass that restlessness on to me, Harry.”

“But I fought it at Midwinter,” said Harry. He had expected to have to spend Walpurgis Night with an eye on the heavens, waiting for an irritated black lightning bolt to come down at him.

“And that was Midwinter,” Pansy whispered. “Harry, honestly, do you think the wild Dark is consistent? It’s both like a great, spoiled child, and like the magnificence the Light showed on Midwinter, and right now it’s decided to be magnificent. And it approves of you, even. It likes the way that you stood up to it. This is the time of year when it’s happiest, and it wants you to be happy, too.”

“All—right,” said Harry slowly, trying to get used to the idea.

Someone claimed his hand, and he turned to see Draco smiling at him.

“You deserve to be happy, Harry,” he said fiercely, “and to think about something other than the fate of the world for one day. Now eat your breakfast, and then I have something planned for us.”

Harry raised his eyebrow, and started on his eggs, since Draco was watching, and Argutus had finished the sausages. Meanwhile, Draco kept up such a flow of chatter that Harry lost the specifics of the werewolves’ story under it.

He had his doubts about how good an idea this was, though. The last time he had stepped back from the world and absorbed himself in his own happiness, after his parents’ trial, Bellatrix Lestrange had taken over Durmstrang.

Harry did not expect that Draco’s surprise would involve skipping Defense Against the Dark Arts. Draco firmly took his hand when Harry turned towards Acies’s classroom, though, and steered him up another corridor instead. Harry stumbled, and looked at Draco with a frown.

“Don’t you have History of Magic now?” he whispered.

Draco snorted, never looking away from the corridor he’d been dragging Harry up, his eyes intently studying the stones ahead of him, as if he intended to take Harry to a place inside the walls. “As if Binns is going to notice that I’m gone, Harry.”

Harry shook his head. “Well, Professor Lestrangle will definitely notice that I’m missing,” he whispered.

“Why are you whispering?” Draco lifted his eyebrows at him. “No one else is here. I’ve cast an aversion charm on the hallway. Ah!” He reached out and flicked his wand against the stones, and the wall softly rumbled and slid aside to reveal a small room Harry couldn’t remember seeing before, even on the Marauder’s Map.

The room was—ordinary, a bare stone box with four walls, and yet not ordinary. Harry cocked his head uneasily in several directions, trying to identify the source of the magic. It circled the chamber like the patrolling current of power in Woodhouse, but this was not a single, smooth, uninterrupted flow. Instead, it darted about like flashes of lightning, and evaded his eye. Harry thought it was place magic, though.

“Draco, what—“

“Shhh, Harry.” Draco hissed the words directly into his ear, as if he’d forgotten his own words about no intruders coming into the hallway. “Will you trust me for a moment? Let me show you what this is?”

“I’d trust you for a lifetime, Draco, and you know it,” said Harry. There went another flicker of magic, and he jumped. “I just want to know what this place is.”

“A room that my mother and father used when they were courting,” Draco said, and leaned his cheek against Harry’s. Harry realized in startlement that his arms were linked around his waist, and that they stood much closer together than Harry usually felt comfortable with. The magic of the room had distracted him so much that he hadn't noticed. "Just watch. Please?"

The tone in the last word made Harry realize how long it had been since he and Draco had shared a moment like this. He was always worrying about something else, and surely Draco must find it wearing. He took a deep breath and forced himself to relax with a tiny nod.

The moment he did, the magic of the room seemed to notice them. Harry heard a deep sound, which might have been a purr or an amused chuckle, and then the air in front of them opened. Harry blinked as it bloomed with color, the tiny jabs of magic darting out from the walls to create an image of deep red, gold, silver, and green. The colors played around each other, refusing to assume solid form.

"I don't see how this is of use to courting couples," he muttered.

"Patience, Harry," Draco murmured back. "You'll see in a moment. And aren't they beautiful enough in and of themselves?"

Harry had to admit they were. Some of the colors were similar to ones he'd seen in the skies while he watched the Light's violent dawns, but they were all deeper, more jewel-toned. He let himself watch them and think of nothing else, and was surprised, when he next attended to it, by how relaxed his breathing had become. He leaned back against Draco, enjoying the warmth and pressure on his shoulders, neck, and spine.

The colors abruptly stopped brewing and scrambling, and then snapped into focus, forming an image so perfect that Harry caught his breath.

He saw himself—well, it had to be himself, because of the lightning bolt scar on his forehead and the messy black hair, even though he looked about ten years older—leaning back in a stone chair, his head against the supporting post of what looked to be a canopy made entirely of jade. The chair was molded to his body, as if it'd grown there. Older-Harry had his eyes closed, and Harry assumed he was asleep. The ground around him was patterned stone, traced with glowing blue; it might have been marble, but had a glossy sheen that didn't resemble that rock.

Beyond the canopy post were plants that Harry didn't recognize, though the greenery and their enormous red flowers were lush enough to bring tears to his eyes. Something sang lazily through the bushes, song wandering and dipping as if it had all the time in the world to reach a conclusion, or didn't ever want to come to an end. And sunlight, sunlight, sunlight poured through the open sides of the—building? house?—he sat in, making the unfamiliar robes he wore shine like sunlight back. Harry could almost feel its warmth from here.

An older version of Draco paced into the image from the left, and paused, staring at the sleeping Older-Harry as if he were a vision. Harry blinked and stared in turn. He had always assumed that Draco would look like Lucius when he grew; they had hair and eyes the same shade, after all, and it made sense that Draco would shed some of his childish gestures over time. Instead, Draco looked more like Narcissa, as if grace were written in every fiber of his being. He himself wore deep red robes tinged with gold, and Harry wondered what they signified in that place, since he doubted Draco would wear Gryffindor colors unless he could be sure of no one associating them with Gryffindor.

Draco touched the sleeping Harry's shoulder and whispered something. Older-Harry must not have been asleep after all, because he reached his arms up, without opening his eyes, and wrapped them around Older-Draco's neck. He pulled him down and engaged him in a kiss that was neither gentle nor fierce, but had an air of permanence as great as the stone around them. Older-Draco closed his eyes and leaned into it, and around them the sunlight slanted and the hidden creature sang and sang and sang.

Harry closed his eyes to block any unfortunate tears, and opened them to find the colors had melted, swirling, back into the walls, and the room had returned to its lightning jabs of magic, apparently content to ignore them again.

“What—what was that?” Harry whispered.

Draco swallowed several times behind him, then cleared his throat, as if he had been too choked up to concentrate for a moment. “That was a possible future, Harry,” he said. “A future where we could be happy. The room sees them and shows them to the courting couples who come in—or to other people, too. I’ve heard generals used it to show possible outcomes of war strategies “

“But there’s no guarantee that’ll happen,” Harry said, and shut his eyes once more.

He felt the rustle of soft hair beside his cheek as Draco shook his head. “No. When my parents used it, they saw my father as Minister of Magic and my mother raising twin daughters.” Draco snorted. “You can see how that turned out.”

“Well, it’ll be our responsibility to make what we can of that joy real, then,” Harry said firmly, and turned, mimicking the gesture of the older version of himself as best as he could, wrapping his arms around Draco’s neck and kissing him.

Draco wasn’t prepared for the sudden shift in weight, and he stumbled, landing with his back against the wall. He didn’t hesitate to return the kiss after that, though, and while it wasn’t quite the kiss the older versions of themselves had shared—those two men had known each other for so much longer—it was good enough, Harry thought, to be going on with. He stepped away from Draco and opened his eyes.

Draco was panting slightly, shifting around as though he didn’t know where to put his hands. He locked his eyes on Harry’s.

“Thank you,” Harry said quietly.

“Any time you want to repeat that,” Draco responded, “feel absolutely free. No need to ask permission.”

Harry laughed softly, and the sound seemed to mingle in his mind with the sound of remembered song.

Draco had to admit, he was eager to see what a relatively normal Walpurgis Night looked like, without the accompaniment of Voldemort trying to chain the wild Dark and Harry having to fight him. He studied the faces of those students gathered around Millicent as she held aloft the dark green stone that would transport them to the largest collection of Dark magic in Britain that night, but could see nothing save a kind of calm excitement. Harry was the exception, of course, but Harry was always the exception. He had a listening look on his face. Now and then he stirred and glanced about. Draco asked him once what he was hearing, and Harry smiled absently at him.

“A horn,” he said.

Well, that doesn’t make sense. But Draco didn’t say so. Harry had relaxed for the rest of the day after their morning encounter with the courting room, and as the night drew closer and closer, Draco had been able to remember that tonight was the first of his joining to Harry. That contented him for all his boyfriend’s odd behavior.

Now, as the silver trceries on the dark green stone began to rise and spin around them like falling stars, Draco thought the only thing he had to regret was the absence of his parents. Lucius had refused flatly to attend Walpurgis, with the first cold tone in his voice that Draco had heard for months, and Narcissa had told him she thought it would be best if she didn’t, either. They would appear for the beginning of the ritual afterwards, when they would “introduce” Draco to Harry, but then leave again. The dancing and the other, wilder parts of the night were not for them.

But Professor Snape was coming with them—of course—and he watched with narrowed, suspicious eyes as the magic of the stone spun them through nothingness, and then deposited them. Draco looked around in curiosity. Last year, they had landed in a flower-covered field.

This time, they stood in the middle of a deep wood. Draco shivered a bit. The trees around them felt almost too alive, insisting on acknowledgment and recognition of their status as living beings. Their dark green leaves, the color of the stone Millicent still held, rustled and whispered and dipped. Draco thought that normal until he realized there was no wind to toss them.

Then silver light struck through the trees, nearly blinding him. Draco raised his head and saw the moon soaring lazily overhead. It was not quite full yet, but even so, its light shouldn't have been that brilliant, Draco thought. This was more like the kind of moonlight Draco had imagined when his mother read bedtime stories to him, limning everything with a tracery more delicate and perfect than frost, turning the sky a deep blue in comparison to it.

Well, for that matter, is this wood a real wood? Draco had his doubts. For one thing, now that he was looking more closely at the trees, he could see that their bark was also dark green, though a paler color than their leaves. He didn't think any living trees looked like that.

And then he realized it didn't matter.

Joy had been stealing up on him for the past few minutes, and it overwhelmed him at the same moment as laughter broke from the other students around him. Even Snape loosed a chuckle, and then looked horrified at himself. Draco tilted his head up blindly, seeking the sky. He thought he knew what this was. He'd ridden some of the same immense emotions when Harry freed the wild Dark from Voldemort's control last year.

But now the wild Dark didn't have anything to worry about, and it poured down on them from the heavens with savage happiness.

Draco found himself trotting through the woods, and then running. He had no idea how he was managing to avoid the trees; he would never have run that fast at night normally, let alone in a strange place. But the moonlight and the trees spoke to him, and he ran, as if he were a werewolf. The air was thick with scents—not flowers, Draco thought, though he didn't know what they came from if so. Birds, maybe. Birds flashed past them overhead, and ringing notes came down, sharp answers to their laughter.

Draco wondered for a moment if he should get control of himself, and then wondered why. His father wasn't here to see him. The other people around him were too involved in their own joy to sneer at him for his. Blaise was actually pirouetting in a circle and humming under his breath. Draco turned forward and let himself run, delighting in the way his body responded as if he'd been doing this all his life.

They arrived so suddenly in a glade that Draco stumbled, trying to get used to the suddenly clear ground. The glade was entirely empty, as if the trees had been razed from it long ago, except for two things. One was a stream of water—silver, of course—which seemed to flow from a tree root on one side of the clearing and vanish into one on the other. The other was a white deer, just jerking its head up with a snort from the stream.

Draco froze as the deer's golden eyes swept over him. Old, confused tales of white hinds and white stags jumbled in his head, and he didn't know how to breathe or what to believe. This deer had golden antlers, presumably marking it as a stag, but they were higher and heavier than Draco thought they should be, and curved inward, making the dark space between them into a gaping void.

The deer curved away from them in the next moment, and Draco found himself following, along with all the others.

It was impossible prey to chase, and impossible to leave off chasing, because the wild Dark drove them. Every time Draco thought he was about to stumble and fall, he would look up and catch a glimpse of a ghostly coat as the deer ran ahead, or golden antlers blazing in the night like meteors, and find a new surge of strength. He didn't know what would happen if he did catch the deer. He only knew that he wanted to run until that happened, that the creature seemed to have imprinted itself on his heart.

He had to slow at last, though, stumbling and gasping. Most of the others around him were doing the same thing; they used the breath they had left to laugh. Draco glanced around at them, and then frowned.

Harry was missing.

When he saw the white stag, Harry realized why he'd been hearing a hunting horn at odd moments all day. He was meant to follow it, and capture it, though what would happen after the capture he didn't know.

He ran on after the others had stopped, following that glimpse of white and gold. He could only compare the experience to the way he'd traveled the Forbidden Forest in third year, when Adalrico had just told him that Draco was in danger from what turned out to be a Black magical artifact. Roots parted around his feet like shadows. Trees slid past him, wavering. The ground itself seemed to support him and urge him back into the air. Harry felt wind cooling his brow when he started to sweat, easing the ache in his muscles.

He was in the presence of magic wilder and stranger than he had felt on any other Walpurgis Night, and he was not sure why. But his own magic answered it, coiling off his body, and the emotion he felt was not fear, but nearly pure happiness.

And determination. He was going to catch that deer.

He halted in another glade, as abruptly as he'd entered the one where the white stag had been drinking. The stag had stopped running and was waiting for him, head up, cocked to the side as if the golden antlers were no heavier than light.

Harry swallowed. He wondered if it would charge him, and attempt to kick him with those enormous hooves or bury those deadly antlers in his heart.

Instead, the stag came gravely forward and stopped in front of him. Harry stared into the golden eyes.

Strange, that they're golden. Shouldn't they be dark green or silver? Those are the colors that shine most often tonight.

The stag stamped a silver hoof, seeming irritated that Harry didn't understand. Then the golden eyes widened, and Harry found himself swept away within them, into a pinwheeling corridor of light and grace.

He understood in moments, then. The wild Dark did ordinarily favor the shades of dark green and silver on Walpurgis Night, but it was giving him gold and white tonight, as a gift, a thanks, an apology, a token, for facing it on Midwinter night.

Harry understood in that moment that the wild Dark held no grudges. It could not have done so; that was against its nature. It had struck back at Voldemort less for trying to hold it captive than because his trying to hold it captive had stung it, sent its power recoiling, and given it a good excuse. Or perhaps that was what it said to him now, and it had believed a different thing four months ago.

Harry put out his hand. He felt the stag's cool nose touch it, breathing a breath like hoarfrost over it, and found himself out of the golden eyes again, standing on his own two feet before it.

The deer breathed again, and trceries of dark green and silver coalesced on Harry's fingers and palm. He stared at them, dumbfounded. He recognized the insubstantial magic—flowers, birds, light—that Hawthorn had tossed into the air on the first Walpurgis Night he'd attended. She had tossed them up and invoked the wild Dark because she'd survived the Darkest magic that year, Fenrir Greyback's bite.

Harry supposed this meant that he'd survived the Darkest magic on this particular year. Midwinter, again.

Phoenix song stirred in him as if in response. Harry suppressed it. The song of a creature of Light wasn't appropriate right now.

He raised his eyes to the stag's face again. "Thank you," he said quietly.

The stag reared in a long sweep like a wave, and then turned and plunged into the woods. This time, Harry felt no urge to follow. The stag was beautiful precisely because it would never be caught, could not be taken alive. It could be killed, but then the hunter would find that the beauty had fled where he could not follow and left only a lifeless corpse under his hands. Harry suspected that the moment any white stag died, a new one came to life in the woods and began to run.

A bit bewildered, he shook his head and turned back to find the others, hearing Pansy's words in his head again. This is the time of year when it's happiest, and it wants you to be happy, too.

It certainly seemed to want that, Harry had to admit, staring at the mass of what looked like dark green leaves and silver petals in his hand.

Draco's breathing eased when Harry came back out of the woods, his hand clasped around a shining mass. He smiled at each of the people there, the grave, sweet smile Draco had once thought reserved for him alone. But he was so happy tonight that he didn't mind other people seeing it.

"This is Walpurgis Night," Harry said clearly, holding up his hand. "This is the night that the magic returns, the night when the magic renews, the night when the Dark cries out in its power. I claim the right to speak by virtue of having survived the Darkest magic of anyone here this year."

That caused most of the other people around them to lean forward and pay attention. No one disputed Harry's claim, Draco thought. Good. They had better not. If anyone else had survived Darker magic, it should have been a matter for Daily Prophet headlines.

"I am trying to understand both Dark and Light, and what they mean," Harry said softly, almost as if he were talking to himself. "And I tend to think all the fixed definitions we use—wildness, compulsion, free will, solitude, cooperation—are wrong, at some level. Or they interact with the wild Dark and the wild Light in ways that we've ignored."

"Living in a fixed world is easier, I know, but it's not real. I'm going to try not to ignore reality any more."

He looked at Draco as he spoke. Draco stared back, enchanted at the joy in Harry's face.

Harry cast his hand up, and the silver and green flurried from them, becoming a series of lightning bolts. "May we all be unbound!" he cried.

The green and silver lightning bolts swarmed over everyone there, encircling their wrists and their throats and their heads. Draco, staring in every direction, saw Blaise crowned as a king, Millicent with a torque around her throat, Hawthorn Parkinson with bracelets of wildness.

Harry smiled, and then the music came welling from nowhere, and the dancing began, and Draco did not have time to think of individual sights anymore, not when he was whirling with multiple partners, snatched apart and bound back together again by invisible magic, and the world had shattered and shivered into slivers of joy.

Chapter Eighty-One: Long and Sweet and Slow

Harry closed his eyes and leaned back on the faint slope at the far side of the glade. The dancing had exhausted him, he'd thought at first, but then he realized that it had only exhausted his impulse to dance. He didn't go through the dark doorway when it appeared. One moment of unbinding two years ago had been enough. His mind still swarmed with images that came from encountering the magic of Walpurgis, the memories of those dead witches and wizards who had had no magical heir to absorb their powers when they died. He smiled; one memory was of a wizard who had worked all his life to create a single golden rose that would never fade for the man he loved. And why not? That was as good a use of magic as any other, Harry thought.

"Harry."

Awareness surged all over Harry's body like the prickling brush of grass along his skin. He took a deep breath, and opened his eyes, and met Draco's.

Draco stood in front of him, face illuminated by the fire someone had lit behind him when the dancing was done. Harry almost flinched at his expression. He would have expected excitement from Draco, or high solemnity; they were about to enter a ritual that would take them three years, after all. But instead there was an intent look on his face, as if he were seeing and thinking only of Harry in that moment.

Harry swallowed. He knew that he would spend this ritual in private with Draco, sharing the same space and thinking thoughts that revolved only around himself and Draco. And that, strangely, was the part that scared him the most. Without the wide world to bury himself in, there was nothing for him to hide behind, and nothing to make him think of things that weren't personal. He would have to see just one person, who in turn would be seeing him. He would have to act in a way that most people found normal, and which Harry had never been able to achieve. Terror clawed at his throat, almost burying the anticipation.

Draco's face softened then. "It's all right, Harry," he said quietly, and extended a hand. "Come, now. Mother and Father just Apparated in. And Snape is taking the place of a father to introduce you to me, isn't that right?"

Harry nodded. That had been the one requirement Draco had to tell him about. In a traditional ritual, the parents would arrange matters without even taking their children to meet each other until it was time for the courting to begin. Since Harry had neither mother nor father to stand for him, Draco had to make sure he found someone. And Snape really was the best candidate.

"Then come on," Draco coaxed, keeping his hand extended.

Harry reminded himself that he had chosen this, and terror or not, he wanted what would come after this. The want strangled the terror, and permitted him to reach up and take Draco's hand.

Draco watched Harry's face as he guided him a bit apart from the gathering, to the secondary glade in the woods where Narcissa and Lucius were waiting for them. Draco had described the woods as precisely as he could to his father via the communication spell, and Lucius had recognized the place. Apparently this was a real forest after all, but so touched by the magic of Walpurgis Night as to be half-transformed.

Harry's eyes were wider than Draco had ever seen them, and they flicked from side to side as if trying to insure that no one followed them. Now and then a muscle in his cheek twitched, or his hand rose and rubbed across his face as if he were trying to hold great emotions in. That was all right with Draco. He would have been more worried if Harry had been the calm, composed statue he often was in dangerous situations. That would have implied that he considered this just another uncomfortable necessity to be got through, an oath he had to take to secure an ally.

This was so much more than that, and while Draco knew Harry's perceptions of it weren't the same as his, he wanted them to match more closely with his than they normally did. He hadn't touched Harry after that initial handclasp. The ritual said they weren't supposed to.

His fingers twitched with the urge to, though. And his mind rang with sweetness.

For once, they would be alone, without Harry's stupid brother to interrupt them, or Professor Snape to insist that Harry needed to rest, or any yearmates stumbling in to go to sleep. Harry wouldn't have an excuse to talk about anything but Draco and himself. That would be what was scaring him, of course, but Draco trusted him to have refused the ritual if he was too terrified to go through with it. He had to trust him that far, or they would never have an equal relationship. He would always be the shepherd, the parent, mistrusting Harry's decisions the way Snape tended to do.

They caught up with Snape at the edge of the glade. He frowned at Draco and stared hard at Harry, but Harry met his eyes calmly enough and said, "Thank you for doing this, sir."

That seemed to decide Snape. He nodded, once, and strode behind them. Draco eyed him and was impressed. Unless someone had known the professor of old and memorized the way he moved, it was hard to tell that he still limped.

They passed several small mounds and roots and holes in the ground that seemed to take forever in the dark; certainly they would have been smaller obstacles in daylight. The oddly brilliant light of the moon helped sustain them, though, as well as keeping them bathed in dark green and silver—Slytherin colors. Draco couldn't imagine a better omen in a joining where both partners were Slytherins. Yes, Walpurgis Night had definitely been the right time to begin this ritual, though the romantic in Draco had thought Harry's birthday might be the best choice at first.

Strength was flooding him as they walked. Draco couldn't tell if it was emotional or magical, and he didn't care. He lifted his head, and the moonlight made the hair on his arms and neck stand on end. The sky was dark blue, he realized, not dark green, introducing a third color into their world. That was all right. The dark blue didn't have any particular significance in terms of Houses, since it was deeper than the Ravenclaw shade of blue, but they could adopt it and give it a significance. Perhaps they would exchange dark blue stones with each other in the pivot ritual of Halloween next year.

From ahead came the glimmer of white; Draco knew that was shining from his mother's dark robes, hemmed with an edging as bright as diamond dust. She had shown them to him the day they went to Grimmauld Place over Easter holidays. Draco knew they symbolized new life, the rising generation, taking over from the old, since they imitated the colors of the night and the waxing moon. Of course, neither of his parents was old yet, but the symbolism was important.

Lucius was clad in plain black, though his hair, free and flowing to his shoulders, mimicked his wife's robe hem. He turned and nodded to Draco. He stood beside Narcissa at the top of a small slope, Draco saw, dipping down into a tiny bowl of grass. He and Harry could lie in it side by side and have just a little room to spare.

Well, good. Since neither of us is going to be leaving that bowl for the rest of the night, and we're not going to be playing Quidditch...

"Son," Lucius greeted him as he came nearer.

"Father," Draco returned. They were supposed to refer to each other by relationships for this part of the ritual, not names. He hoped Harry would remember that.

He moved over to stand between his parents. Harry walked to the opposite side of the bowl to stand with Snape at his right shoulder. Draco had thought he might look forlorn without a mother, but Harry just looked hesitant, a bit shy and eminently touchable.

Draco shook his head to stop thoughts like that, and locked his eyes with Harry's as his father performed the introductions, flawlessly.

"I, Lucius Malfoy, present my son for this joining, the first of thirteen, begun on Walpurgis Night," he murmured. "He was born on the fifth of June nearly sixteen years ago, and he has my consent for his ritual and his partner." For a moment, his hand pressed heavily on Draco's shoulder. "He is my magical heir."

"I, Narcissa Black," said his mother softly then, "present my son for this joining, the first of thirteen, begun on Walpurgis Night." Draco flashed a tiny glance at her, and was startled by the unearthly joy in her face. Of course, Narcissa had told him that her main goal was to see him as happy as possible, and that she trusted Harry would make him that happy, but it was one thing to hear it and another to see it. "I bore him in pain and received him in joy on the fifth of June nearly sixteen years ago. May another now receive him as I did." She bowed her head and stepped back.

Draco hoped that Snape would remember his part in the ritual, but he should have known better. After all, Snape could remember complicated Potions instructions off the top of his head. What had the potential to trip him up was the exact wording he had to use.

"I, Severus Snape," he said, voice grinding like a whetstone on a sword, "present my—my son for this joining, the first of thirteen, begun on Walpurgis Night." Draco wondered if Snape was aware of the expression on Harry's face as he stared up at him, but he doubted it; Snape was too caught up in struggling through his own emotions. "He was born on the thirty-first of July nearly sixteen years ago, and he has my consent for his ritual and his partner." Snape took a deep breath. "He is not my son by blood, but he is by love."

Harry closed his eyes for a moment. Draco waited. Even his parents waited, with no sign of impatience. Draco could feel Lucius's eyes on Snape. He wasn't sure he wanted to see what they held, though.

Then the moment was past, and Draco felt the magic, called and shaped by the ritual, pouring into its mold, taking over around them. Gentle hands tugged on his robes, urging him forward, down the side of the slope and into the grassy bowl. Draco walked easily enough, glancing down now and then to catch a glimpse of the pullers. Bright golden eyes winked and flashed and vanished again. Draco could feel his parents and Snape both turning away, fulfilling the ritual's instruction to leave them alone.

Harry stumbled a bit on his way down, but arrived at the same time Draco did. Draco put out his hands, letting them clasp Harry's single one and rest on his left wrist. Then he closed his eyes. He'd practiced this, both over the Easter holidays and as Walpurgis approached, but he still hadn't been entirely sure he could do it.

Accio, he commanded in his head, wandless and nonverbal, since he couldn't move his hands. Accio Arcturus's ring.

The magic in the ritual helped; Draco could feel it swirling lazily around the sides of the bowl, turning its attention towards him, and then diving into his pockets. A moment later, the ring bumped at Draco's side like an eager puppy. Draco took a deep breath that he hoped sounded like a sigh of anticipation and not a sigh of relief, and then shifted his fingers to clasp it. Harry stared at him as Draco took the ring in his right hand and held it up.

"This is a treasure of the Black bloodline, Harry," he murmured, "the ring that my Cousin Arcturus supposedly proposed to his wife with. It comes from my mother. Her blood flows in my veins, and she bore me, and with this night a new joining between us is born. Do you accept my gift?" He held the ring out towards Harry, wondering if he remember the words that Draco had wound up whispering to him earlier this afternoon.

Harry remembered. His face was pale, not even counting the moonlight, but he nodded and whispered, "In blood we begin this joining, on earth, in the sight of the dark spaces between the stars." He flexed his hand as much as he could, since it was resting under Draco's left one, and Draco maneuvered enough to fit the ring over Harry's finger without letting go of his hand. When it was in place, they both regarded it for a moment; Draco felt no need to hurry on to the next part of the joining, and of course Harry didn't know what they were supposed to do next.

The ring was plain silver, a relatively thin band. The stone it bore was a jacinth, a deep reddish-purple gem that resembled heart's blood. Supposedly, the moment Arcturus Black had given it to his wife was the one moment in his life when he had ever been serious.

And, technically of course, the ring was Harry's already, along with all the other Black treasures, so it joined them in yet another circle, yet another cycle. Draco found himself satisfied with that. In fact, the whole evening so far filled him with deep satisfaction. Things were happening the way they were supposed to, the way they should and always had, despite Harry's unconventional parents, despite Harry's power, despite the fact that Draco knew his father would have acquired a frozen look at the mere thought of a Malfoy and a Potter joining five years ago. Draco had never felt more pureblood, more united to a tradition that stretched back for centuries and did not falter, and he had never felt more content in being so.

He stepped back, took a deep breath, and lifted his eyes to Harry's face. "The gift is accepted," he said, beginning the next part of the ritual. "The ordinary has begun its transformation into the extraordinary. What we share this night is between the two of us, Harry."

When he spoke his partner's name, the magic of the ritual once more picked up. Tiny sparks appeared around them, then rose, shining like glints of light on water. They grew more and more prevalent as Draco watched, and evolved into a sheer curtain that shut them off from the outside world. In moments, there was only him, the grassy bowl, and Harry. The world ended in a white-golden haze.

"What do I say?" Harry hissed at him. Draco looked at him and saw that his face was almost white.

Perhaps I should have insisted that he take some interest in the ritual after all. But Draco had not wanted to insist. What mattered was that Harry wanted this, and the extent of his interest and desire wasn't for Draco to dictate.

"Harry," he said, again, and the light sparks danced as if they liked the sound. "From here on out, the experience and not the wording is what is important. My name, though. I'd like to hear that."

Harry gave a little shudder, as if this were the first time they had moved past calling each other by surnames, and murmured, "Draco."

The sparks twitched again, and then grew brighter and brighter, filling the glade with an odd mixture of daylight and moonlight. Draco nodded in satisfaction, and smiled a bit at the look of awe on Harry's face. He wondered if Harry even knew he looked like that when he encountered a new magical object or process.

“Thank you,” he said softly. “Now, shall we begin?”

“That wasn’t the beginning yet?” Harry shivered in spite of himself. He’d already felt more focused on Draco than he ever had. He wasn’t sure if it was magic or not, but when he tried to think about other things—the werewolf problem, Snape’s voice as he said those ritual words, the decidedly odd look Lucius had given him—his thoughts slid away from that and circled back to Draco. Surely it could not get deeper or more intense. He didn’t know what he would do if it did.

“Not the beginning, not quite yet,” said Draco softly. His words had already altered in timber and tone from what they’d been a moment ago, though his voice had been quiet then, too. Now, he sounded as if he were much closer to Harry, though of course that was impossible. “But now.”

He lifted his head and looked over Harry’s shoulder. Harry turned, wondering if someone had managed to walk through the barrier after all.

But it wasn’t a person; it was an object. Harry blinked as he watched it resolve into a harp, the same color as the light that surrounded them. It hung in midair, strings vibrating. Then they began to play, and Harry heard a delicate tune he didn’t recognize. It was beautiful, as everything about the ritual had been, but Harry wondered what he was supposed to do with it, how he was supposed to respond.

“Harry,” said Draco, and Harry turned back. Draco’s expression had changed again. Now he wore a look of deep calm, and he bowed and extended both his hands. “Would you dance with me?”

Harry closed his eyes and stood still for a long moment. He could do this. He didn’t need to worry about tripping over his own feet, or making a fool of himself. Only Draco was here to see him, and he wouldn’t laugh.

"I don't know the tune," said Harry, even though he was already stepping forward, settling his hand on Draco's shoulder. He wondered what to do with his other arm, until Draco clasped his left wrist in his right hand and stretched it away from his body.

"That's all right," Draco said, and a smile shadowed his face, playing around his lips, never quite forming. "I wanted this to happen since we never got to share a dance at the Yule Ball. The music will adapt itself to us, Harry. You don't need to worry about that." He actually closed his eyes as he began dancing, and Harry wondered if the intensity was overwhelming for him.

It was for Harry, though he and Draco weren't actually dancing all that close together. Their feet shuffled more or less in time, and the grass rustled under it with soft damp sounds, and the light shone steadily, letting them see where they were going. Harry felt dew soaking his shoes, climbing up through the edges of his robes. He smelled something wild and clean that was probably the scent of plants growing untended.

And he was aware of the muscles flexing under his hand, shifting and twitching with more motions than Harry had known they were capable of as Draco switched positions and turned, and, once or twice, whirled sharply. He could hear Draco's light, steady breathing, which seemed to grip Harry as much as his arms did. He could smell him, which wasn't something Harry had much experience with at all. He smelled—like a human, really. Harry couldn't describe it in poetic terms.

But they were close, and the warmth from Draco's body seeped out to him to contrast with the coolness of the dew, and after some time Harry became aware that Draco had opened his eyes and was watching him, still with his face set in those calm, peaceful lines.

Harry swallowed, but didn't look away. He hadn't realized that Draco was capable of looking like this, not only calm but happy. He didn't look as though he needed to rush off somewhere and do something else. He wasn't worrying about homework, or that Harry's life was in danger. When he cocked his head, it was because he wanted to and not because he was listening for the sounds of enemies.

Draco had gray eyes and a sharp face, Harry had always known that, but now he didn't have to look quickly and then look away again. Now he could stare, and he fell into the staring, into how Draco's chin and cheeks hooked together, into how his blond hair slid halfway down his brow when he turned his head, how his eyes had a direct stare when he focused them the way—

The way he was doing now.

Harry wouldn't have cared if Draco was beautiful if the soul inside hadn't attracted him; after all, Bellatrix Black Lestrange had been beautiful in her time, and Harry could imagine a beautiful Lucius killing without a pause. Lily had raised him not to care that much about physical beauty. He was never going to have a lover or a spouse anyway, not with all the time he had to devote to Connor, so who cared if he appreciated what the people around him looked like? What mattered with political allies was how he could persuade them and what it took to make them stay persuaded.

But this was the boy who had refused to leave him alone for the entirety of first year, even when Harry came up with what he thought were clever and creative solutions to drive him far, far away. This was the friend who had declared himself Harry's friend again at the beginning of second year, after Harry had spent several weeks ignoring him. This was the comrade-in-arms who had followed him down into the Chamber of Secrets, even though he hated Connor and had every reason to be terrified of Riddle, because he didn't want Harry to go alone. This was the thinker who had studied unconscious compulsion to see if Harry had influenced him unduly with his power, concluded that he might have but he could never know the full extent of it, and decided to stay Harry's friend anyway. This was the stubborn, insistent terrier who'd picked up the pieces just as he promised he would when Harry came to Malfoy Manor after taking his mother's magic, and tried his very hardest to accompany Harry to the Shrieking Shack, then sulked when he realized he couldn't share directly in what had happened there.

This was the wizard impatient for power who'd made a potentially horrible mistake in summoning an ancestral ghost on Halloween, of all nights, and been lucky that she simply chose to give him empathy instead of kill him. This was the Malfoy who had swallowed being an empath and chosen to learn and live with it. This was the sulky boy who had decided that not telling Harry he was in love with him for months was a good idea, and who had then fought incredibly hard to convince Harry it was all right when he learned the truth on his own. This was the almost Gryffindorish Slytherin who had kissed him first and then refused to either panic or apologize, because neither would have fit what happened between them.

This was the pureblood wizard who had sworn vengeance on Bellatrix Lestrange and Voldemort for their actions against Harry, and then eagerly embraced his possession ability to do what damage he could to them. This was the idiot who'd thought that putting monitoring spells on Harry and yelling at him when he got into danger was also a good idea. This was the patient, self-controlled son of Lucius who had managed to force himself to wait for physical contact with Harry until he was ready for it. This was the chaos-rider who had faced his father rather suddenly and won just as sudden a victory. This was the son of Narcissa, whom Harry saw in the grace of his motion and the grace of his mind—more her son than Lucius's, in the end, Harry thought, more Black than Malfoy, though without, hopefully, the tendency to go mad and not tell people important secrets that could lead to the saving of lives.

This was Draco.

Draco's breath was coming short by the time Harry started concentrating on him as the person he was at that moment and not all the people he had been, and Harry tilted his own head. "Are you all right?" he asked. "Do you want to sit down?" His own limbs felt light enough, since the dancing hadn't been strenuous work, but he had to admit he had no idea how long they'd been doing this.

"I—think it would be a good idea," said Draco, and half-collapsed back on the sloping bank of the little dell. At once the harp stopped playing and floated back into the light. Harry assumed it floated back into the light, at least. He heard the music end, but he didn't want to look away from Draco.

Why?

Because I don't want to.

He reached out his hand and cupped Draco's cheek, tilting his head to the side. Draco went with the motion. His eyes were wide and curious, the calmness fading from his face.

Harry leaned forward, closing his own eyes to see what would happen, and kissed Draco with steady determination. Draco didn't hesitate before kissing back, but Harry hadn't expected him to.

Draco did try to shift positions, but Harry nudged him with his left arm, and Draco remained where he was. Harry was comfortable like this, with both of their heads at the same height and himself the one touching Draco. It had been the other way around so often. Harry had known, intellectually and for a long time, that that would have to change.

Now he thought he was finally ready emotionally for it to happen. He wanted to touch Draco.

He kept his hand still on Draco's face, but gently nudged at Draco's lips with his tongue to get them to open. When they did, Harry catalogued how Draco's cheek felt, flexing underneath his palm, the softness and warmth of his mouth, the fact that kissing him like this made sweetness fill his own head until he could barely think and a sharp feeling wake up at the base of his spine.

He opened his eyes, and met Draco's stunned, half-drowning gray ones. He had gone from curious to completely surprised.

Well, good, Harry thought. I should be able to surprise him once in a while, and not just because of the danger I rush into.

He pulled away from the kiss and murmured, "Can I touch you? Anywhere I want? Is there anywhere that you wouldn't feel comfortable with?"

“Merlin, Harry, no,” said Draco, and leaned forward, his legs drawing together and his arms folding on top of them to support his head as Harry began to run his hand over Draco’s shoulders. “I—whatever you want. Please.” Harry wasn’t entirely sure he was supposed to hear the words that followed after that. “I’ve been waiting for this for so long.”

Harry nodded, though Draco didn’t seem to see the gesture, and shuffled around on his knees to stroke Draco’s shoulders. Draco didn’t seem to know whether to melt into the caress or stay where he was and passive. Harry did see the skin at the corners of his eyes crinkle as he squeezed them shut.

Harry trailed his fingers down Draco’s shoulder blades and over his spine, light, quick motions to learn a back he thought he should already know well by now. He did it several times before he realized that something was wrong. He frowned and cocked his head, trying to figure out what it was, then nodded.

His magic calmly Vanished Draco’s robes and shirt. Draco started at that and made a small sound that—Harry paused. “Did you just squeak?” he asked incredulously.

Draco turned enough to look at him through hazy, but decidedly indignant, gray eyes. “I did not squeak. I couldn’t have.”

“And why not?” Harry murmured, reaching out and pressing his hand flat against Draco’s back.

“Because Malfoys don’t—ah, Harry.” That word was half a groan, and Draco dropped his head forward again.

“You’re half Black,” said Harry. “Maybe Blacks do.” He had to shift, a bit, because his own arousal was distracting him. He tried to stifle numerous contradictory urges, and settled on the one to move his hand in what was partly a caress and partly a tickling motion. Draco gasped and squirmed.

“Sensitive skin?” Harry whispered, rearing up on his knees and leaning down to whisper in Draco’s ear. Draco shivered, and Harry nodded. "Sensitive ears, too, I see." He bent his head further, not letting himself think of anything but reverence and the fog in his head, the one emotion for Draco and the other for himself, and kissed the side of Draco's neck. Draco jumped as though someone had pinched his arse, and then uttered a low sound that had no name, but was distinctly one of pleasure. Harry grinned against his skin. "Maybe that's the kind of noise Malfoys make," he said.

Draco made a complicated rolling motion that ended up with Harry in his arms and half-sprawled on the slope of the glade. Draco stared into his eyes, and whispered, "Do you have the slightest idea what you're doing to me?"

"Yes," Harry said quietly, which, by the look on Draco's face now, wasn't the answer he'd expected. "I do. And I want to keep doing it, unless you don't want me to."

Draco closed his eyes and took a breath that made it seem as if he were trying to breathe water. "I—I can't just yet, Harry," he whispered. "There's your training to think of, and the ritual, and—" He stopped.

"Draco," said Harry, surprised at him. "It's all right to admit that you're nervous, too, you know."

Draco blinked, then smiled. "I should have known you would pick up on that," he muttered. "All right. Can—can I touch you back, Harry? It doesn't seem fair that I've had so much of the intensity so far, and you've had precious little."

"You're underestimating how good it feels to touch you," said Harry, while anticipation ran through him like a shudder of sunlight. "But yes. Please." He shifted into a more comfortable position, sitting rather than lying, and waited.

Draco took a moment to look at Harry in silence. Harry watched him back, green eyes gentle, face more relaxed than Draco had ever seen it. And he gave an impatient little wriggle when Draco went on staring at him.

"You said you would," he muttered.

Draco felt his mouth widen in what could have been either a smile or a smirk. 'Yes, I did,' he said softly, and then leaned forward so that he could slide his hands directly beneath Harry's robes, rounding the sides of his waist and skimming up to his chest. He didn't try to remove Harry's clothes. He wanted the sensation of touching him under the cloth, his movements sharply restricted, at least as much as Harry had wanted the sense of touching him without barriers.

Whenever his fingers prodded or pushed something that made Harry give any sort of sound or motion, Draco paused and repeated it, then repeated it again, until he was sure he would know the place again when he had Harry finally in bed. A map gradually formed under his fingers, and even when he closed his eyes, he found he imagined it more as sensations of softness, warmth, small dips and hollows, rather than getting a visual image. That was all right. He would be proud and pleased to know Harry with more than one sense, and he already knew what he looked like.

Harry's breaths were fast and soft as Draco touched him, faster as the touching went on. He'd let his head loll to the side and his eyes shut. Probably he'd done it to make his enjoyment of the sensations more intense, but it also showed how utterly vulnerable he was, and how much he didn't care about that. He trusted Draco with a part of himself that no one else ever got to see. Draco felt two lazy spirals of fire turn in him at the thought of that, one in his chest and one in his groin. And no one else ever will get to see it.

Finally, he pulled his hands out from beneath Harry's robe and slid them up to his neck and face. Just as Harry's eyes opened, he pulled him into another kiss, while his fingers drifted down the side of his neck. He'd noticed one place that always made Harry shiver absently when his robe collar or an insect brushed it. If he could just find it again...

A faint shudder from Harry, and Draco knew he'd found it. He sat back, breaking the kiss so suddenly that Harry had no time to react, and then dropped his head and fastened his mouth on the place.

Harry let out a sharp, shocked cry of pleasure. Draco opened his mouth a bit, and used his tongue and teeth, in absurdly light touches that nevertheless made Harry jerk and twist around, grabbing him.

“Draco, Merlin, enough!” he said. His eyes were brilliant green, flaring like Draco had only seen them flare in the Woodhouse battle, right after he’d killed Fenrir Greyback and Draco had killed his consort. “Come here, damn it.”

He tackled him, and for a moment they rolled confusedly down the tiny hill, winding up again at the bottom of the glade. Harry waited until they stopped moving before he insistently kissed Draco, his mouth fastening on his in a half-biting motion that Draco wouldn’t have expected.

Draco wrapped his arms around Harry and kissed back, riding out the fierce contact, until it melted into one like they’d shared in the courting room. Even that, Draco thought, was only a shadow of the one their future images had shared, and he felt a different kind of warmth in his chest at the thought that they still had something to grow towards. Wonderful as this was, it wouldn’t be the same forever.

Harry lifted his head after a moment, and smiled down at him. His mouth was sloppy, his hair sloppier, his face so flushed that he looked as if he’d swallowed a vial of Pepperup Potion, and he obviously didn’t care.

“Did you know,” he said, “that you make me really, really, really happy?”

Draco swallowed, and told himself that neither Blacks nor Malfoys had license to cry right now. But he did give a grin that hurt his face and probably made him look quite as ridiculous as if he’d cried.

Harry stooped over him and kissed him one more time, then sat up. “Come on,” he said, and snapped his fingers. Draco’s robes and shirt appeared again, draped over the place on the bank where they’d sat to touch each other. “The ritual is over.”

Draco smiled. Yes, it was; the melting of the light wall around them would have signified that if nothing else. But Harry had no question in his voice. He was simply self-confident enough to feel that they'd been taken out of the world and were now coming back, and not to question his judgment. This, despite the fact that he hadn't studied the ritual, and a year ago he wouldn't have dared to assume something like that without Draco telling him so.

The most wonderful thing about him, Draco thought, watching as Harry stood looking up at the moon for a moment while he put his clothes back on, is that I don't think he'll ever be done. Next year's ritual will be different, and not just because it's further along in the courting. He'll be different. He never stays the same. What was his mother thinking, believing she could chain him in one shape for the rest of his life?

Harry turned and caught him staring. He gave him an easy smile and stretched out a hand, pulling Draco to his feet in one smooth motion.

"Come on," he murmured. "I can feel Snape's magic back in the place where we danced. He's waiting for us."

He moved his hand to Draco's shoulder for a moment and squeezed, then turned and walked out of the glade. The silver ring on his finger glinted as the moonlight caught it.

Draco closed his eyes and let the intensity run out of him like pure water out of a cup. For a moment, he lingered in the space the ritual had created, amid deep green grass and bright silver moonlight and dark blue sky, while happiness filled him like a herd of galloping unicorns.

Then he opened his eyes and hastened after his partner.

Chapter Eighty-Two: Of Man and Wolf

Harry sat down at the Slytherin table, and wondered how long it would take everyone to notice. Millicent was first, it turned out, as Harry reached for the pumpkin juice and the lights in the Great Hall made silver light dance off his finger. Her hand shot out and gripped his wrist, holding it still.

Harry grinned and let her examine his ring. It was a bit annoying, not being able to reach for something else while his hand was held like this, but he was enjoying the expression of sheer shock and disbelief on Millicent's face.

"That's a jacinth, Harry, isn't it?" she asked at last, never taking her eyes from the red-purple stone.

"It is," Harry said agreeably, and wriggled his fingers. Millicent let his hand go, and he fetched the jug of pumpkin juice and poured some into his glass, while all the while her gaze tried to drill holes in the side of his head. "Meant to symbolize heart's blood, at least in this particular shade. I know a jacinth might come in other colors, and I can't remember what those mean."

"You actually do—" Millicent stopped for a moment as though she had to reconsider what she was saying, and then murmured, "You really do mean to complete this joining ritual with Draco, then?"

Harry blinked. That wasn't the reaction he'd expected her to have. "Yes, of course I do," he said. "Unless you tell me that you and Draco have been secretly arranged to be married from birth?"

"If we had been," Draco said, dropping into place on the other side of him, "I would have killed her and hidden her body by now. Then it would be off to the Manor to Obliviate my parents. Really, Harry, don't you know any of the traditional steps to getting yourself free of an unwanted marriage?"

Millicent laughed, but it looked almost as if she were doing it in spite of herself. Her gaze was calculating as it shifted back and forth between Harry and Draco. "It's not that," she said. "Nothing like that.

It's just—it has to be the three-year ritual, since you started it on Walpurgis Night."

"Very good, Bulstrode," Draco drawled, helping himself to kippers. Harry wondered if he was the only one who noticed the tension in Draco's shoulders, and underlying the light voice. "I suppose the next incredible fact you'll tell me is that this day used to be called Beltane."

"You don't understand, Draco," said Millicent, and then swept a bow to him that had no trace of mockery in it. "I'm very happy for you both. I think it's a wonderful idea. I'm going to suggest it to Pierre, in fact, though I think we'll want to wait a few years before we begin even that."

"Pierre?" Harry asked.

"Yes, Pierre Delacour." Millicent flashed him a smug smile. "He attended your little meeting on the equinox. It seems that he's impressed by strength."

"Well, congratulations then," said Harry. He wondered if he should be more put off by the idea of Millicent deciding to marry someone she'd evidently just met, but then shrugged. If Millicent was happy, why should the idea concern him? Just because it wasn't something he'd do didn't mean it was wrong. "But what is it that you're so surprised about, if you don't care who Draco joins with or who I do?"

"I didn't think you would have the strength of mind to do this, Harry, especially so soon," said Millicent quietly. "To fight a war, to make allies, and maybe even to make a political marriage or joining—I thought all of those were in your power. But not this."

"I—thank you," said Harry, wondering if he ought to be complimented or insulted. Then again, Millicent was the one who had caught him cutting his own arm to practice healing spells. Perhaps he should simply be grateful that she had kept her promise not to tell anyone about that, and not surprised that she would think his training still strong. "And, well, it is."

“Congratulations,” Millicent repeated solemnly, and turned back to her breakfast.

Blaise noticed next, yawning and stretching so much that his eyes were scrunched shut when he sat down. Then he opened them, caught sight of Harry’s ring, and appeared to jump a foot in the air.

“It’s true, then?” he asked when he came down, as if he hadn’t just shown surprise that still had Draco snickering. His large dark eyes studied Harry as if he expected his face to peel off and reveal one of the Weasley twins beneath. “You really are getting joined, and to a Malfoy?”

“The only one available, yes,” said Harry, and exchanged an amused look with Draco. “I rather think Lucius and Narcissa would be angry with me if I hinted I was joining with one of them.”

“Not what I meant,” said Blaise, and went on studying them, eyes so narrow that Draco finally spoke.

“And what did you mean, Blaise?”

The other boy blinked, as though awakening from a dream. “Nothing in particular,” he said, and began pouring pumpkin juice as if saving the world from Voldemort depended on how much juice he could get into a glass. Harry chewed around his sausages now—Argutus had liked sunbathing in the entrance hall too much to join him this morning—and watched him. He supposed Blaise was trying to decide where he stood. His mother was Harry’s formal ally now, an oath sworn while they’d been at the equinox gathering. Blaise had not joined in the oath, and neither had he come onto the stage with his mother when Harry introduced her to his potential allies.

I don’t really think he’d join Voldemort. But he’s known me from the beginning, and he’s not in love with me like Draco is, and he doesn’t have the personality of a follower like Greg and Vince do. I’m not surprised that he has trouble deciding how to relate to me.

Somehow, perhaps because other people were paying closer attention to the Slytherin table than Harry had thought or because

Millicent hadn't bothered to keep her voice quiet, the news spread. Harry had several people congratulate him before the end of breakfast, including Cho, Ginny—who pretended Blaise didn't exist—and Zacharias. Zacharias, of course, nodded sagely and said, "I suppose it's the next best thing."

"What is?" Harry asked, amused, sure he could enjoy what was coming, even if Draco didn't.

"That you're getting joined to a Dark wizard. We could have used you on the Light side." Zacharias cocked his head and eyed Harry. "If you were a bit more intelligent, Harry, we might have made a go of it."

"Sod off, Smith," said Draco, with unexpected viciousness. Harry rolled his eyes and nudged Draco's shoulder with his. Zacharias was being pompous because that was the way he was, and whether Draco was jealous or angry at the implied insult to Harry, he should know that Zacharias wouldn't change his mind for either circumstance.

"As you wish, Malfoy," said Zacharias. "And I wish you luck in trying to control him. You should have realized by now that Harry does whatever he wants, and he's as much Light as Dark." He nodded to Harry and then trotted off towards the other side of the Great Hall to fetch Hermione.

"What did he mean by that?" Draco demanded.

"I think he thought that you were angry at the implication that I'd join with a Light wizard," Harry murmured, and bit into his eggs. He had to admit that they tasted a little better than they used to, when his main impression of them was "slippery." Perhaps avoiding porridge and trying food that had more flavor was working to overcome his training after all. "Not at anything else that he might have said."

"I wasn't," said Draco. "Not at all. I'm angry because that isn't supposed to happen."

"What isn't?" Harry eyed Draco curiously. He didn't know much about the history of the ritual, or how other people were supposed to receive the joined couple once their joining had been announced.

Perhaps Zacharias really had just delivered a stinging insult under the cover of a few innocent words.

“He’s not supposed to joke about that,” said Draco. “This ritual is a solemn one, and I’m doing everything right. He has no right to imply that this is just a joining like others.”

Harry cleared his throat to hide his amusement. So it’s his Malfoy pride that’s stung. I should have known. “Draco, of course we can’t expect anyone else to take it as seriously as we do. They’re not the ones getting joined.”

“So you do take it seriously, then?” Draco turned on him like a whirlwind.

Harry blinked, but he could see what Draco needed, even if he wasn’t entirely sure why he needed it. He leaned forward and kissed him gently. Draco didn’t melt against him, but he did relax enough to listen when Harry pulled away again.

“More seriously than anything else I’ve ever done,” said Harry. And that was true. With other things he’d done, including securing allies and fighting in battles, he’d known he could do them because he’d trained for them. A certain amount of ease, even carelessness, was part of his manner around them. But outside the confines of the ritual, being Draco’s known partner would be a constant challenge. He still didn’t know how to act normal; he missed numerous small cues, and he tended to interpret others’ emotions differently than Draco would. So he had to pay attention to this, take it seriously, in order to survive it and make it pleasant.

Draco’s face flushed slightly, and he nodded. “Thank you, Harry,” he said. “I really shouldn’t have doubted you.”

Harry patted his shoulder. “Finish your breakfast,” he said. “You should eat all of it, really. After all, OWLS are coming up. Kippers improve the memory.”

“They do not,” said Draco, but nevertheless started eating his kippers.

Harry returned to his own breakfast, aware of the pressure of eyes from all sides. There would be people like Zacharias and Blaise thinking of their joining in a political light, Harry knew, as well as those who sincerely wished them well. There would even be those who murmured that he ought to have considered joining to someone from a dedicated Light family, just to balance the pressure of the Dark allies around him. Yes, that was an unreasonable demand to make of a normal person, but Harry wasn't a normal person, and Lords and Lord-level wizards had to watch what they did.

Harry didn't care. They were perfectly free to stare and mutter all they liked, so long as none of it entailed their trying to actually separate him from Draco. He would write to Laura Gloryflower and ask her what she thought he should do to balance the Dark around him with a bit of Light. Moody had arrived, but he had such a reputation that most of the northern Light families, and his other, more tentative allies, wouldn't be satisfied with just that.

The next day breathed tension, and Harry really couldn't blame anyone. It was the second of May, normally not in anyone's pantheon of special days. It was a day closer to Midsummer, but the number of people who knew about that was very carefully small; Harry had talked to his allies, of course, and to some of the older students in the dueling club whom he trusted to be able to help him, but he wasn't about to start spreading the plan around like rain yet.

But it was the first night of the full moon, the first full moon since Elder Gillyflower was bitten. Most people were on edge for a werewolf attack. The Daily Prophet contained another interview with the captive werewolf Evergreen. The Wizengamot was still trying to get answers out of him instead of just sending him to Tullianum, because of his age. He spoke vague prophetic hints, and smiled. It was driving everyone mad, evidently, even Rita Skeeter.

Harry almost expected to get a letter. He had just hoped it would be from Remus, and that it would contain a promise of there being no attacks tonight, no reason to make Harry fear the full moon as if he were a werewolf himself. But it wasn't from Remus. The handwriting was unfamiliar, spiky, elegant, and Harry could hear the fear that the writer was trying so desperately to hide.

May 2nd, 1996

Dear Harry:

I have left this until the last minute because I still believed I would be able to get help elsewhere. Now I learn that I cannot. I thought I had true friends, given their outrage over what had happened to me, and now I learn they are less true as the moon approaches.. I—am not pleased about that, and not pleased about writing you, either, but you are the only source of Wolfsbane I know.

I have heard that you will brew the potion for anyone who asks. I do not ask that you give it to me for free. I can pay. My friends have been unaccountably slow to strip her property from the newest registered werewolf, the only kindness they have shown me. They say that I can survive confinement in Tullianum without it, but I have been studying. I know that the first full moon is often the hardest, that ten percent of all new werewolves lose their minds then and bite themselves to death if they do not have Wolfsbane.

And, of course, neither Amelia Bones nor anyone else who is willing to pass laws to avenge me will actually be seen distributing the potion to me, in case it leads to “unfortunate images.”

I am begging you, and I do not like begging. I will come to Hogwarts this afternoon—in secret, so that you do not have to fear the political repercussions from your werewolf friends for giving me the potion. If you have a vial of Wolfsbane on hand, please meet me near the lake when classes end. You may bring whatever guards you like with you, to protect you and assure you that I am trustworthy. If you do not have the potion, then I will accept Amelia’s invitation to Tullianum tonight and let whatever is coming come.

Sincerely,

Emily Gillyflower,

Former Wizengamot Elder, now Werewolf.

Harry let out a harsh breath as he finished the letter, and shook his head. He did have some Wolfsbane he'd brewed and not used, because Remus now had the money to afford his own—and he had insisted on buying it elsewhere last month. He could oblige the Elder. What made him angry wasn't even her haughty tone, mixed with broken pleading, but the fact that she'd been put in this position in the first place.

How is she really different from Hawthorn, whom Greyback bit because she wouldn't oblige him in his attempts to resurrect Voldemort? How can I say that Evergreen is different from Fenrir, or Loki different from Voldemort?

Of course, his mind and his common sense wouldn't let him think like that. Loki did seem to have a cause he believed in wholeheartedly and absolutely, while Harry thought Voldemort's cause was himself, whatever nonsense he spouted about pureblood superiority. And, of course, Hawthorn's bite had been meant to remain secret, a shameful thing, while the werewolves seemed to have been prepared either to blackmail Gillyflower or to roll with things if she told the Wizengamot she was bitten. But it didn't excuse making other people victims, taking away their wills.

"Harry."

Harry blinked and slowly opened his eyes. He started to realize that he was seeing the world through a blue curtain of phoenix fire. The bench beneath him was smoldering, but slowly, as if the wood wanted to savor such a wonderful experience as burning in the sweet flames. Draco had a hand outstretched to him, his eyes calm and his breathing a bit fast.

"Well, that's one of the keys to phoenix fire, then," Harry muttered as he forced the flames back inside his skin. "Righteous anger. It's probably what Fawkes was feeling when he died."

Draco nodded, and murmured Finite Incantatem at the bench, ending its burning. Then he shook his head at Harry. "You're a mess," he said. "And you need new clothes, these are all covered with ash. Let's go back to the common room, and you can tell me all about it."

Harry cast a quick Tempus charm. They should have just enough time to do that if they hurried, he thought, and he could still get to Defense Against the Dark Arts. "All right," he said shortly, standing.

Draco turned to him the moment they were out of the room, and raised an eyebrow. Harry looked down at the parchment. The outer edges had crisped, taking a few letters off some words, but the majority was still readable. He held it out to Draco, and watched him read it, with a faint frown.

"I suppose it sounds genuine," said Draco, reluctantly. "After all, if it was a trap, she would have probably asked you to come alone. But I still think we should have Professor Snape with us, and Moody. Hopefully it'll be just an exchange, and you can give her the Wolfsbane, and she'll leave. If not, we'll be ready."

Harry nodded. "That's what I thought. I can't ignore this if it is genuine; she could use her bitterness to speak about how I'm ignoring werewolves after I promised to fight for their rights. But I'm not taking the chance that it's a trap the way that the vision of my aunt and cousin was."

Draco gave him a harsh kiss, which left Harry blinking. "Good," said Draco fiercely. "I don't want you in any avoidable danger again, Harry. I know you can take care of yourself, but I can't stand the damage to my heart. Really, do you want me to die of fear before I'm sixteen years old?"

The weight he gave the words made the retort Harry could have used slip his mind. "You're going to be sixteen on June fifth," he said slowly.

"How kind of you to remember!" Draco tilted his head as he steered Harry firmly into the Slytherin common room; Harry had a tendency to forget walking when he was caught up in a point. "Are you going to remember that my father's a truce-dance ally to you for an encore? Of course, now you can't, since I just gave the game away."

"Shut it," said Harry. "You're confirmed as the Malfoy magical heir now. Lucius would have let people know. So that means that you should be holding the actual festival to celebrate the confirmation on your birthday.”

“Yes.” Draco pushed Harry towards his trunk, seeming determined to watch as Harry changed his ash-smeared robes. Harry talked to keep himself from thinking about it.

“That’s a Wednesday, though,” he said, quickly adding days. “Would I be right in assuming that you’ll hold the festival the weekend before?”

“You would.” Draco’s eyes, when Harry looked at him, were slit with amusement.

“And you’re going to need my presence there, aren’t you?” Harry finished in resignation, grimacing a bit. “The joined partner of the Malfoy magical heir can hardly be absent.”

Draco grinned faintly. “I was wondering when you would get to that part,” he said. “Yes, Harry, you’ll have to take part, but we have a month. I can give you all the etiquette lessons you’ll need, and tell you who’s most likely to attend. My father has most of the invitations accepted by now. There probably won’t be as many guests as there usually are, since traditionally part of the festival is to present a magical heir as a candidate for a marriage or joining, and there’s no need for that now. And some of them will be people you know, like Millicent and Pansy.”

Harry felt a surge of renewed confidence. If Pansy attended, then people might not spend the whole night staring at him after all. “Were you planning on telling me this at some point?” he asked.

“I wanted to see if you would figure it out on your own.” Draco was unrepentant. “If you hadn’t done it by Saturday, then yes, I would have told you.”

“Prat,” Harry said.

“That’s why you love me,” said Draco. “I’ll talk to Professor Snape about Elder Gillyflower, Harry. He may even have a few suggestions for guards that I don’t. At least we’re meeting inside the wards, so we know that no one can Apparate in, grab you, and then Apparate out again.”

Harry nodded absently, and made sure, again, that he had his book for Defense Against the Dark Arts. Acies wouldn't scold him for missing the class on Tuesday, he knew, but he still didn't like to disappoint her.

Snape could feel every bit of his skin bristling as he strode beside Harry on his way to the lake. Part of that was due to the presence of Moody, on Harry's other side, but Snape had worked beside the man in the Order of the Phoenix for some years and learned to tolerate him. No, most of it was due to the fact that they were going to meet a woman who was a werewolf.

Snape refused to allow his breath to come short. He had also refused Harry's offer, made in private, to stay behind so that he didn't have to confront the source of his terror. He had hidden that fear for almost twenty years; not even Dumbledore knew what it had cost him to work beside Lupin. He was not about to betray himself now, and let Harry go into danger alone.

It was dangerous even if this was not a setup, as Snape was half-convinced this was. Werewolves changed when they received the bite, even as he had told Harry. And tonight the full moon would rise. Even Lupin, supposedly “tame,” had more than once gone a bit mad around that time. Emily Gillyflower might think she wanted the Wolfsbane now—and she had helpfully chosen a time that would both avoid letting Harry miss any classes and let her Apparate back home with the potion before moonrise—but she might change her mind as the afternoon traveled on.

McGonagall had checked the wards, and reassured Harry that the anti-Apparition ones were up, and that she had also received a letter from Elder Gillyflower, requesting formal permission to come onto school grounds. The new wards were working better than even the old ones had for years. Minerva had them spread through the Forbidden Forest, to warn her of anyone with hostile intentions approaching from that direction, and mantled thickly around the lake and the Quidditch Pitch—both open areas where someone might try to break through the wards and Apparate in. Snape was confident that she had done the best she could to see the school, and the children within it, safe.

Harry carried the vial of Wolfsbane Potion in his hand, and walked with his head up, his steps alert. Not alert enough for Snape, of course, but he was coming to understand that, while Harry appreciated his protectiveness, he would rarely indulge it. They had come, and Harry had three people who would defend him with their lives—Snape was sure of that with Moody, because he had seen the old Auror look at Harry as he used to look at Dumbledore. Without Harry's agreeing to stay behind walls and wards, it would have to be enough.

And there was a woman waiting for them at the lake, huddled into a cloak. Actually, it was as good as early May weather could often be persuaded to get; yesterday's sunlight had been a welcome exception. The sky was gray, but it was warm and not raining. But Elder Gillyflower acted as though the world hated her.

Perhaps she thinks that way since the bite, Snape thought, and constrained himself from pity as he had blocked fear off. Yes, she was a victim, but in a few hours she would be capable of making other people victims.

The woman raised her head when she saw Harry, and Snape saw her nostrils flare as she sniffed. Even new-made werewolves started using their new senses. Snape put his distaste in an Occlumency pool and watched as Harry walked briskly up to the woman. Her eyes were brown, which meant they would only slowly become amber enough to be noticed, Snape knew.

"Elder Emily Gillyflower?" Harry asked.

The woman nodded. She was thin and frail, looking as if she'd recently lost weight when the cloak shifted a little. She had long gray hair that she might once have bound up in pride, and now coiled in a messy braid on the back of her head. "Yes," she whispered. "I—you came. I didn't think you would."

"Of course I did," said Harry. He held out the potion. Gillyflower's eyes closed as she took it.

"Thank you," she said, and then spent a moment looking at Harry. "You know that I did nothing to deserve this?" she asked suddenly. Her voice was rapid. "I never cared particularly for werewolves, and I helped pass the laws that condemned them, but I never walked around saying that I wanted them all hunted down." She slammed her mouth shut then, as if she were afraid of rattling on too much and losing her composure.

Harry's eyes were full of compassion as he bowed, Snape saw. "I know, ma'am," he answered. "And I think it's admirable that you bared what they'd done to you instead of keeping it secret and letting them make a pawn of you with it."

Gillyflower's eyes closed as if in pain. "A pawn," she whispered. "Yes."

And then the Disillusionment Charms dropped.

They were Disillusionment Charms of a kind Snape had never encountered before, and that was the only excuse he could think of for his not sensing them, let alone Moody's not seeing through them. Two women revealed themselves as crouched in the grass at Elder Gillyflower's feet. They unfolded as they came at Snape and Moody, moving with graceful, limber speed that revealed well enough what they were. The girl facing Snape had ragged black hair, and amber eyes, and her teeth bared.

Terror choked him alive, and his wand didn't move fast enough. He heard a shout and a crack from the side as Moody cast a spell and had it fail. These were werewolves a few hours from the full moon. Most magic wasn't going to work on them.

Harry cried out, and Snape felt the first lash of his wandless magic. The werewolf who'd grabbed him spun around, presenting her shoulder broadside to the power. She wore wildness like an aura, and the magic struck and rolled off her. From that alone, Snape knew she must have been a werewolf since she was a child.

She would be in control of her body, in control of the werewolf's senses and strength and resistance to magic, in a way that no one come to lycanthropy as an adult could be. Snape tried to reason that out in his head, and use the reason to shock himself out of his fear.

He could not. There was hot breath near his neck, bared teeth, arms stronger than a human's holding him. And there was the woman saying in a low, controlled voice, "Tell the vates to stop calling his magic. Now. Or I will infect you."

Snape managed to raise his voice. "Harry," he said, and it was a horrible croak. "Harry, stop trying to rescue us, or she'll bite."

Harry didn't respond. Snape forced his eyes open, wondering if they'd taken him, too.

He saw Harry standing as still as still, staring at the werewolf who had sprung up behind him and grabbed Draco. This one was a man, a stranger, but wearing that same wildness as the other two. He was much taller than Draco, and his teeth were locked, oh so gently, in the skin of Draco's throat. He hadn't broken the skin. Not yet. His amber eyes watched Harry. On the other side of him, the second female werewolf had downed Moody, her jaws having bitten straight through his wooden leg. She crouched on his chest and showed her teeth an inch from his eye. Moody, veteran of a hundred battles, lay quietly, but Snape could read rage in that quietude.

Harry turned at a call from the direction of the Forbidden Forest. Snape faced it, and saw a group of people loping towards them. In the lead was a wizard, his face somewhere between forty and ageless, his hair shining as pale as Draco's.

"Harry vates," he said, and halted a reasonable distance away and bowed. "My name is Loki. I think you have heard of me."

Harry made a sound that was a reasonable imitation of a growl. Loki let his tongue loll out the side of his mouth in that laughing gesture werewolves had and Snape hated.

"You may well ask yourself how we got onto the grounds," he said. "And the answer is that we have no hostile intentions towards you, vates. We could pass the wards in the Forest."

"That will be changing." Harry spoke the words like rocks hurled against glass. Snape clung to the image of his face to keep from drowning in his own fear. He thought he could edge his hand towards his wand, just a bit, just a little, until the werewolf holding him snarled in warning, and all his bones seemed to dissolve.

"Undoubtedly," said Loki pleasantly. "But not for right now. We came to prove to you that we have no hostile intentions towards you, and that will remain true. We could hurt your loved ones right now. We could infect them, or kill them. You know this. Yet we haven't."

"How," Harry breathed, "does taking them hostage prove you're not hostile?"

"Well, it doesn't in and of itself, I'll admit that," said Loki. "But it does from moment to moment. We've taken them only so that you have to listen, Harry, not to make you afraid. You're not afraid, are you? You're angry?"

"You could say that."

And Harry burst into blue flames, just as he had at the breakfast table that morning. Loki cocked his head to the side and sniffed appreciatively, then panted again. "I have heard that you were part phoenix," he said. "And now I have seen it."

"What do you want?" Harry demanded. "You must realize that I'm hardly non-hostile towards you, right now." Snape could feel his wandless magic snarling and spinning around him, a fierce beast on a short leash. He tried to think about fearing that, instead of the teeth near his neck. He couldn't. It was impossible. He felt hurt and sick, and his breath came short now despite all his efforts to keep it deep. He was light-headed.

"We want to show you that we can't be ignored," said Loki. "And to prove to you that even with the opportunity for damage, we'll still hold back. And to show off some of the pack magic to you. How do you suppose we concealed three of our pack from you, Harry, and from your powerful Dark wizard mentor—" he bowed to Snape "—and from an Auror with an eye capable of seeing through Invisibility Cloaks?"

Harry was silent.

"Because I am here," said Loki. "And the magic of those werewolves who have been lycanthropes from children, as I have, when bonded into a true pack with a true pack leader, is not unlike the magic of a Lord or Lady with a group of companions focused tightly around them. Our minds feed into one another, and we strengthen the spells that we each perform. Those Disillusionment Charms were essentially ten charms piled on top of each other."

"You're saying that these are your Death Eaters, then." Harry used his voice like a whip.

"You are trying to make me angry, aren't you?" Loki asked mildly. "You won't succeed, Harry. No one has made me lose my temper in twenty years. I am not Fenrir Greyback. I serve no cause but that of werewolves."

"And I would have helped you," said Harry. "I swore an oath. But I did not say that I would help you immediately."

"Even in the face of such provocation?"

"The provocation was yours," Harry said, and Snape could be glad of the cold anger in his voice, even with two of the people he most loved held hostage behind him. "You bit an Elder of the Wizengamot."

Loki abruptly cocked his head and turned to look at Elder Gillyflower. "Oh, dear," he murmured. "Was she telling you tales, Harry? Saying that she'd never done anything to hurt us? That she's just a victim?" Snape saw that the Elder had closed her eyes again.

He had to close his own as the werewolf holding him snarled in apparently uncontrollable anger. He could survive this. He could. He would, because Harry needed him.

“That is not true,” said Loki. “Yes, we did bite her, and we compelled her by certain threats to come here today and not tell you of the packmates we sent with her. But she’s part of the group of witches and wizards that would most like to see us gone, Harry. She was feeling out a few other Elders of the Wizengamot, trying to gather enough support to make werewolf hunting legal again, and not just for Ministry Departments.” His voice deepened, but still there seemed to be amusement in it instead of all the other emotions Snape would have expected. “She murdered a packmate of mine two years ago. Claimed that he was breaking into her home to attack her. Yes, of course he was. That’s why they found him locked into a room of his own house, awaiting moonrise.”

Harry was silent for a long moment. Then he said, “I—heard nothing about this.”

“Of course you didn’t,” said Loki mildly. “Why would you have? There were sympathetic Aurors on the case, of course, but the moment they found out the victim was a werewolf, they hushed it up. This was in the days of Fudge, you understand, and Elder Gillyflower there was an important part of his support base. Of course they couldn’t have such a potentially embarrassing case staining her reputation. And he grew fur and howled on the full moon. So, who cared?”

“Why did you wait until now to seek vengeance, if this is true?” Harry asked.

“We waited,” said Loki, and snapped his teeth. “Scrimgeour is in power now. We thought he might be more sympathetic. My packmate’s family tried to get the case reopened. We thought Scrimgeour might dismiss Elder Gillyflower, since she was one of Fudge’s cronies. We thought you might do something, if you could be got to hear about this.

“And then we realized that, no, Scrimgeour didn’t intend to do anything—he was much more interested in cleaning up the Aurors than the Wizengamot—and you weren’t a political player. We had to retreat and wait for the right moment. The moment is here, now that you’re Black heir and made an oath to help us.” Loki paused and looked at Harry expectantly. "We choose our victims carefully," he added. "There will be no shortage of them, since so many people have wronged us, and it was not even seen as wrong at the time."

"How do I know this is true?" Harry asked.

Loki laughed. "My name is Fenrir—Loki," he said, the word apparently forced from him. "I've taken Veritaserum, Harry. I told you, we wanted you to understand. Everything, absolutely everything, that I have told you today is true. We simply won't be ignored any longer. Telling the truth isn't enough, but we thought it could help you listen, once we made you pay attention."

Snape studied the werewolf more closely, seizing another focus to be rid of his terror, and noticed his slightly glazed eyes and the way he stood very straight, keeping himself from listing to one side with an effort. Yes, he had taken Veritaserum.

"Who is your victim for this full moon?" Harry demanded.

"No one," said Loki. "This action was planned instead."

"And for the next?"

"A woman in the Department for the Control and Regulation of Magical Creatures," said Loki, his eyes never wavering from Harry's. "One of those Umbridge planted during her tenure. Her name's Melissa Rosewood. You will not believe what damage she has done to us, including having a bitten Muggle teenager die 'accidentally' in her care. But, of course, no one cares. You were outraged when harm happened to the Many snakes because of Umbridge's new edicts. You set Tybalt Starrise to digging her out. But you did not care about us."

"I never knew," said Harry.

"Ah," said Loki. "I thought so. This is merely making sure you look." He glanced at the werewolves holding Snape, Moody, and Draco. "Remember this, vates," he said. "We will give you time, now, time to do what you can. We have not even chosen a victim for July. After all,

I fully expect you to protect Melissa Rosewood when June's full moon comes. But if you do nothing to help us, then we will choose new victims."

"I could detain you now," said Harry. His magic was snarling and trembling around him still, Snape saw. "Why not? It would be the most useful course, and no one would blame me, not after the tactics you've used against me."

"You don't want to do that," said Loki softly.

"And why not?"

"Because my packmates will bite those you love if you do anything to harm or capture me, or indeed do anything but wait until I am safely away into the Forest." Loki's eyes flashed. "And because none of us have taken Wolfsbane."

Snape felt his calm wrenched away from him. His muscles tensed. He was going to struggle, wise idea or not. The werewolf holding him snarled again, though, and he found his muscles cramping out of terror, holding him still perforce.

"I see," said Harry after a long moment.

Loki nodded to him, his tongue lolling again. This time, what Snape noticed was the length and sharpness of the teeth the tongue lolled past. "Yes. We have enough time to go home and drink it before the moon rises—barely. But delay us at all, and you will have a pack of maddened werewolves on school grounds. Werewolves I can make invisible, mind, until they are close to their targets."

Harry closed his eyes and stood still. "Go, then."

"I am glad that you've seen sense. I hope you continue to see it," Loki said mildly, and then turned and began to lope away across the grass to the Forest, followed by his pack. Snape watched, since Harry didn't seem inclined to. They never stopped or looked aside. They melted into the trees within a few minutes.

Harry turned and looked at the three werewolves who'd lingered.

The woman holding Snape vanished. Snape stumbled, and then sat down hard. He glanced over, and saw that Elder Gillyflower, the woman on top of Moody, and the man holding Draco had also gone, as suddenly as if they'd Apparated. Harry stood with his eyes wide, his magic visible in the air around him as a bright aura, even through the blue phoenix flame that was slowly crisping his clothes. Then he shook his head in frustration, obviously unable to sense them. The phoenix fire at last died.

That pack magic is terrifying, Snape thought, in an effort to make himself forget that what he had really feared was hot breath in his ear and the suggestion of teeth against his neck.

He looked up to see Harry talking softly with Draco, one arm around his shoulders. Then he turned and hesitated. He wants to see what happened to me, Snape thought, but he is wary of making me look weak in front of Moody.

"I am well," he said quietly.

Harry's gaze was anxious, devouring, but he forced himself to take Snape's word for it, and nodded. Then he turned to Moody, repairing his wooden leg and fixing it back into place. The old Auror was swearing foully enough to cause air pollution, Snape thought.

He looked back at the grass where the werewolves had stood. Only faint depressions in it showed they had ever been there.

Snape took a deep breath, and his fear turned a corner and became black and boiling hatred.

They shall not touch me again, he thought. Never again. And they shall not touch Harry. I will find a way to stop this.

His wandless magic, no longer confined by fear, whirled around him and tore up the grass with invisible claws. Snape still nodded curtly to Harry's concerned gaze, but he indulged his magic with a few more twists and turns and bouts of destruction.

I shall find a way to stop them.

I hate them.

Harry closed his eyes and held himself still. He would explode in rage otherwise, and he couldn't afford that.

Yes, Snape could be angry. Harry had seen how angry he was on his return to the castle. He'd been forced to face his worst fear today, and more than that, he'd seen the creatures of that fear use him to manipulate Harry. It would be strange if he were not furious.

Yes, Draco could be angry, once he got over the fear. He was writing his father right now, and Harry couldn't find a word to say against that. He had never expected to have Lucius Malfoy's support in his fight for werewolves' rights anyway, and though it would be bad to have his active opposition, his truce-dance alliance with Harry would restrict what he could do.

Yes, Moody had been angry, and had furiously put the dueling club through its paces, but that could be a good thing, with Midsummer coming. And they hadn't been too exhausted to pass on good news. Ron had told Harry tonight that he'd written home about the dueling club under Moody, and his family had been impressed enough, either by the account or by the fact that an old Order member had joined Harry, that his brothers Bill and Charlie, both fairly powerful wizards, were now considering coming to Hogwarts to fight on Midsummer.

But Harry was a Lord-level wizard, and if he let go now, with his rage whispering words of blood and hatred inside him like a werewolf's web, then he stood a good chance of destroying the Slytherin common room.

He'd been fighting the anger ever since that afternoon. Blaise had taken one look when he and Draco returned from the dueling club and fled their bedroom. Draco hadn't spoken to Harry, but he lay on his bed and stared at him.

Harry counted his breaths, and tried to think past his fog of absolute dislike for Loki.

I can't let this make me hate all werewolves, or even all werewolves in that pack. They're doing what they think best. They have a reason for choosing their victims, even if it's not a reason I agree with. Loki could have had his pack bite Snape and Draco, it would have been easy, but he didn't. I think he did want to just get my attention and talk with me, and he doesn't really care if I hate him personally, so long as I'm looking more intensely at the Ministry's interactions with werewolves.

But I hate him.

Harry forced down the phoenix fire that wanted to blaze around him. He'd already ruined a good portion of the bench at the Slytherin table and two sets of robes today. He didn't want to set fire to anything else.

But remembering the mixture of loathing and terror that had run through him like fire and acid intertwined when he faced Loki made it difficult. He kept trying to put the emotions in Occlumency pools, and they kept slipping away from him. He kept thinking that he should be able to put aside personal likes and dislikes and just concentrate on the larger political issues, and he kept failing.

"That's enough of that," he heard someone say, and then Draco's arms slipped around him and held him tightly.

"Draco," Harry whispered, feeling the Darkest parts of his magic squeal in glee at the thought of tearing apart warm skin and flesh and muscle. "Don't."

"I'm not frightened of you, Harry," Draco whispered into his ear. "And you have the right to feel what you're feeling. How many times have we told you that?" His voice was half-teasing. "Do you need to go see Vera again?"

"No, I need to see Snape," Harry said. He'd been waiting because he needed to be able to play the role of comforter and sympathetic listener when he went to Snape's offices, and that meant getting past his own emotions. He hadn't expected them to refuse to go away.

"Not yet," said Draco. "Harry, you can hate them. I wish you hadn't sworn that oath, but you did. I wish you didn't have to help them, but you do—to an extent. That doesn't mean you can't hate their leader personally, and wish to kill him. You're too honorable to start hating Mrs. Parkinson because she has the same curse as that weakling Lupin and that beast Loki. You're going to work around this, and you're going to end this mess, one way or the other."

End it...

And Harry knew what he wanted to do. His breathing eased, and his hatred eased, too, because he could well imagine that the course of action he'd just decided on would be one Loki couldn't accept and yet couldn't argue against without betraying his packmates. The Darker parts of his magic, distracted now, chuckled at the thought of causing an enemy pain.

"Thanks, Draco," he whispered, drawing back with a kiss to Draco's cheek. "You just gave me an idea that made me feel a whole lot better."

Draco sat back and stared at him. "What?"

"I'm going to find a cure for lycanthropy," Harry said. "Not Wolfsbane, but something that actually gets rid of the web. That would put an end to not only the persecution of werewolves, but their ability to say that they have no other options but horrible treatment or violent revolution."

Draco frowned. "Can you do that? You told me the werewolves thought of the webs as living things you wouldn't kill."

"That is why it needs research," said Harry fiercely. "But I am going to figure out some way around this, as you put it, even if the webs are living creatures. This is—I can't just give up helping the werewolves, and I can't tolerate the vulnerability that Loki made me feel today. And it's a much better option than just pushing for the imprisonment of some werewolves, which would make the banshees in the Ministry think I'm on their side, and the punishment of those who hurt werewolves, which would make Loki think I support him. I'm on my own side."

Draco smiled at him. "Excellent." He gave his shoulder a little push. "You're always at your best when you have a plan. Now go talk to Snape, and then come back so I can give you etiquette lessons to prepare you for the festival."

"I mean it, you know," said Harry, and lingered a moment to touch his cheek. "You were the one who gave me the idea. You have more faith in me than I do in myself. I love you."

Draco blinked a moment, then said, "I hope so, since you're wearing a Black ring. And since I love you, too. Prat. Get going."

Harry grinned at him and trotted out of the room. Draco would be all right. Moody was already all right, veteran of a hundred situations that had damaged him much worse. Snape needed him now. Harry would write a letter to Scrimgeour, telling him about Melissa Rosewood, when that was done.

And after that, he would start helping the werewolves, whether they liked the way he did it or not.

Chapter Eighty-Three: Riddle Me This

Harry waited a week before he tried to approach Snape about the next part of his plan in the Midsummer battle. When he had visited Snape the night of Loki's attack, he'd been in a frightening rage. He'd said a few things that Harry would have thought unforgivable if this was any normal mood, and actually flung a potion that he found less than perfect across the room so that it slammed into the wall, breaking the glass vial and splattering potentially dangerous liquid everywhere. Luckily, his wandless magic had cleaned up the potion even as it fell.

Then, the next few days, Snape had come close to losing his temper when he saw Harry reading books about werewolves. Harry had quietly removed himself from his guardian's line of sight during those days. He couldn't tell if Snape was more upset over the fact that he'd felt such fear or the fact that Loki's pack had used him against Harry, but either way, more time needed to pass before he could come to terms with it, that was clear.

But a week was as long as Harry felt he could wait, and besides, he had received an important letter from Scrimgeour in the meantime. It thanked him for the information about Melissa Rosewood. She'd been arrested and questioned, which had the double effect of punishing her and keeping her safe from werewolf bites behind the thick walls of Tullianum. What Loki said seemed to have been true, beyond that. No new werewolf victims were reported after May's full moon, though of course the Ministry took credit for that, bragging that their new laws intimidated werewolves enough to stay inside on that night instead of running free.

Scrimgeour had actually denied the Wizengamot's notion of confining werewolves in Tullianum. That had caused quite a buzz in the Ministry, but the Daily Prophet was frustratingly short on details, and Scrimgeour hadn't mentioned them in his own letter to Harry, either.

He had confirmed a suspicion Harry had, though, and that was all that Harry needed for this particular plan.

“Sir?” Harry put his head around the door of Snape’s offices. “Are you busy?”

Snape turned sharply away from the cauldron he was working at. Harry saw the liquid inside the cauldron; it shimmered a silvery color and had an unfamiliar smell. Harry’s gut tightened with worry. He remembered how much trouble Snape’s Meleager Potion had caused last year. Generally, when Snape felt inspired to invent potions, the cause was vengeance.

“Sir,” he said again, this time with a different tone in his voice.

Snape closed his eyes for a long moment. Then he opened them and held Harry’s gaze. “I will not send this by owl to any werewolf alive, even Lupin,” he said. “You have my word on that, Harry.” He waved his wand at the cauldron, casting a spell that would hold the potion in its current state. “I am merely creating it in order to make myself feel better. That is all.”

Harry nodded, and forced himself to accept that. Though the potion was silver, the color of the one metal that could truly hurt werewolves, he had to believe him, because Snape had earned that much trust. Only when Harry heard about a werewolf dying of a mysterious disease or poison would he think Snape had actually done something with the potion.

“What did you wish to see me about?” Snape asked, using a forced lightness of tone to carry them past the subject.

Harry hid a grim smile. If Snape had only known, there was no need for that tone. He was going to forget all about his potion in just a moment.

“I need your help to make my mind into a trap for Voldemort,” said Harry casually, and laid his book and Scrimgeour’s letter carefully on the nearby table.

Snape said nothing for a long moment. When Harry looked up, he found those dark eyes pinning him, wide with disbelief. Snape seemed to realize he was showing emotions other than contempt, and the incredulity vanished in the next moment. He sneered, and said, "And you would come to me for help on this because—you are suffering from delusions and believe that I will actually permit such a thing to happen?"

"It's the best option," said Harry. "I've thought it through. I have to make Voldemort come to Hogwarts on Midsummer Day. Otherwise, he has no reason to do so. He won't try to trap the highest Light the way he did the wild Dark. It'll be watching for that, after the trick he played on it last year. I have to make the trap perfect. And to do that, I need to lure him with knowledge of the full prophecy."

"You will not actually reveal this." Snape's voice was as solid as iron.

"Not the real one, no," said Harry, with a faint smile in his direction. "I'm asking Acies to help me come up with a false one, one that includes just enough truth to make Voldemort believe that I'm the most likely candidate to defeat him, and to have that defeat—or his ultimate victory—come at Hogwarts on Midsummer Day. That'll pull him, sir. That corridor he was dreaming of, with the locked doors? The only ordinary dream of his that I ever shared? I saw a crest on one of the doors the last time I dreamed it, and wrote to Scrimgeour. He confirmed what I saw. That corridor is in the Department of Mysteries at the Ministry. They have a Hall of Prophecy. That's what Voldemort is after, I think, some knowledge of the prophecy that concerns us. He wants it. And he believes in it. If he believes that the prophecy says his stand or fall will happen here, on Midsummer, he'll come."

"And you must use your mind as a trap for that?" Snape leaned back against his desk. "Let the Opalline family be useful, for once. Let them pass the information to those who might pass it on to the Dark Lord."

"I did consider that," Harry said quietly. "I also considered leaking the news around someone who doesn't like me, and who could carry the story to the Daily Prophet. But aside from telling all and sundry that something important is happening at Hogwarts on that day—and Merlin knows, we'd get idiots wanting to watch and idiots wanting to help—Voldemort wouldn't just accept it. He'd break into my mind first thing, to confirm my knowledge of it. And when he realized I didn't believe in that as the real prophecy, he wouldn't, either."

"And you believe you can fool the Dark Lord." Snape's voice was soft enough that Harry couldn't tell which emotion was most prevalent in it. "The most skilled Legilimens alive."

"With your help," said Harry. "You fooled him for a year, didn't you? So either you're the most skilled Occlumens alive, or at least in Britain, or he's just not good enough to get through your defenses. That's why I need your aid, sir. I'll need shields to make him think I believe the false prophecy and that I don't want him in my mind and am fighting furiously to get him out, and shields to defend me from taking a second tearing the way I did with Tom Riddle."

"And how do you intend to attract his attention in the first place?" Snape asked. "Understand that your response should not include the words 'venture into the Dark Lord's mind' in any combination."

Harry grinned at him. "No, sir." He lifted the book he'd laid down so that Snape could see the title. Dreaming the Dark: Potions of the Night.

Snape looked at him levelly. "I would expect some fifteen-year-old students to use that book extensively, Harry," he said. "Not you."

Harry felt his ears turn hot, but he managed to shrug. "It's the modification of the potions I'm interested in," he said.

"Is it."

"Yes." Harry forced himself to straighten and meet his guardian's eyes. "Frankly, I don't need Draco dreaming about me any more than he already does." He flipped through the book. "But I want to modify one of the most common potions in here, so that I dream obsessively enough about the false prophecy to inspire Voldemort to cross the barrier. And when he does, we'll be ready." He met Snape's eyes and waited.

Snape said nothing, and still said nothing, and still said nothing. Harry hid a smile. Snape always did seem to underestimate Harry's patience, not realizing that Harry had had all the patience drummed into him that he could ever wish for by his childhood. He waited, and at last Snape broke.

"You realize this will take an enormous amount of work," Snape said at last. "The modified potion, the Occlumency shields buried in your mind, and a link from your mind to mine, so that I can be awake and ready to bolster your shields in a moment, whenever the Dark Lord chooses to come through the connection."

"I do know that, sir," said Harry softly.

Snape paced back and forth for a moment, his robes trailing behind him, and said, "Much as I hate to admit it, you are right, Harry. I see no other way to lure the Dark Lord into this trap on Midsummer without telling everyone what we are doing." His grimace went from resigned to stern in a moment, and he shot a sharp look at Harry. "But I will prepare every step with you. There will be nothing that you do without my permission and my knowledge."

Harry bowed his head. "That's what I was hoping for, sir. I know that you're a much more accomplished Occlumens than I am, and the last time I had him running loose through my head, he hurt me badly." He shuddered to think of how his mind had felt after his battle with Tom Riddle in second year. "I am only choosing my thoughts for the battlefield because I have no other choice. And now I can tell Draco," he added, feeling himself brighten. "I didn't want to yet, because he'd try to persuade me out of it. When he hears that you've agreed, then he'll be more ready to trust me."

"Why does Draco need to be a part of it?" Snape asked, frowning.

"He doesn't need to, not in the way that you do, sir," Harry said, picking up the book and Scrimgeour's letter. "But I'd like him linked to my mind, so that he can get a closer look at Voldemort's mind and how it works. After all, he'll need to possess him come Midsummer."

"That is the part, of all in this mad plan of yours, that I am the most uneasy about," Snape murmured.

Harry laughed, though he didn't feel much like doing so. "There's a reason that we only told Narcissa about that part, and not Lucius. Draco's mother can accept that he's an adult now, and can make his own decisions like this. Lucius would think he had to protect his heir first and foremost."

"He may be right," Snape said. "Draco may not be ready."

"We won't know for certain if we don't let him practice," said Harry. "And this is the best chance that he'll ever have to practice. I don't think Voldemort will stand tamely around and respond to pleas to let Draco possess him, sir."

Snape said nothing, staring at the wall. Harry had no idea what those dark eyes were seeing; there were plenty of horrible memories that could be candidates, after all. Then Snape nodded abruptly and swirled towards him, moving in a cocoon of robes.

"I will require you to speak one more time with Draco," he said, "to make sure he understands every implication of what he is doing. Then I will aid you in shaping your mind into the kind of trap this requires."

"Thank you, sir," said Harry quietly, and took his leave. Draco was a bit irritated Harry felt the need to ask him if he was sure, until he realized that it was Snape who'd told Harry to ask the question. Then what he mostly felt was nervous relief.

"Snape agreed to help you in this, then?" he asked. Harry, sitting on his own bed across from Draco, nodded.

"He said that you'll be in danger, and of course he's right." Harry leaned forward, staring at him intently. Draco tried not to show how giddy he felt to be the center of Harry's attention, even if Harry wasn't doing it for a romantic reason. "So he wants to make sure you understand we're facing the Dark Lord in my mind, through a series of Occlumency traps, and that you risk possession yourself, or pain from the battle, or even just his notice and enmity, which is painful enough.” Harry’s hand rubbed absently at the stump of his left wrist. “Do you agree?”

“Of course I do,” said Draco. “It’s the only reason I think your luring him into your mind is a good idea at all, Harry, because I’ll be there and Snape will.”

Harry nodded. “I’m grateful to you both,” he said. “Snape thinks it will take a week to build up the traps in my mind to the point where they stand a good chance of fooling Voldemort. In the meantime, I’m going to brew the potions that will emphasize my dreams, and—“

“Practice etiquette lessons with me,” Draco finished gleefully. “After all, the fifth of June is coming up even faster than Midsummer, Harry.”

Harry blinked, opened his mouth, and then closed it again and shook his head. “Honestly, I forgot,” he said.

Draco stifled irritation. Of course he forgot. Making an impression on purebloods has always been a matter of study for him, not something to take pride in. He covered his feelings with a smile and held out his arm. “There is the way we’ll enter the festival, for example,” he said. “It’s the appropriate gesture for our ages, our sexes, the ritual we’re using, and—“

And then he stopped, and realized that Harry was not the only one who stood a chance of being embarrassed at a festival like this. His embarrassments might be more private, but they would happen.

“What, Draco?” Harry had chosen now to use his hardest stare, it seemed, as if he would pry the answers out of Draco’s head.

“Um,” said Draco, and looked away. “The fact that you have a Muggleborn parent, and I’m pureblood.”

“It implies that you’re doing me a favor by joining with me, doesn’t it?” Harry asked.

Draco sighed. "Yes, it does."

Harry said nothing. When Draco looked back at him, he was shrugging and leaping off the bed. "Well, then," he said, and held out his hand, fingers folded back in almost the right position. It was the one that would be standard for a younger wizard being escorted by an older wizard. "This one?"

"Not quite," said Draco, and busied himself with folding Harry's fingers into the proper position to indicate age and gender, then laying the hand on his arm in such a position that his ring would blaze and announce the ritual. He paused before he moved Harry's hand to his forearm, which would give the signal of their respective blood statuses, and eyed Harry carefully. "You really don't mind?"

Harry gave him a patient look. "I don't mind in that I know I can't change people's beliefs overnight, Draco," he said. "I mind in that I think it's stupid, and I won't act like a lapdog around other wizards just because they're pureblood and I'm not. I appreciate it in that someone else might think my adhering to tradition means that I consider myself inferior, and that I'll do whatever you say just because you're pureblood." Harry smiled, a twisted grin that Draco could get used to seeing more often. "And that will be an advantage, if anyone falls into that trap."

Draco chuckled. "You do realize that all the people at the festival but you will be pureblood?" he asked.

"I wouldn't have expected your father to invite anyone else," said Harry, eyes calm.

Draco took a deep breath. "I—some of them you haven't met before, though it includes the families of some of your allies, and the Bulstrodes and the Parkinsons, of course."

"Get to the point, Draco."

Draco paused. "They won't know what to think of you," he said bluntly. "You're powerful, but you're a halfblood. You won't Declare, but you're willingly binding yourself to a Dark family and entering a room full of Dark wizards and witches. You have a prophecy declaring that you'll defeat Voldemort, but you're crippled." He looked at Harry's lone hand. "Not everyone is as intelligent as my father, Harry. Some of them will despise you for that alone."

"And I know that," said Harry, sounding mildly impatient now. "I realized long ago that I couldn't control everything another person might think about me, Draco. I can adjust impressions and guide my own behavior, but there could be someone in the crowd with individual notions of what that means which would never even occur to me, and certainly aren't the ones I would wish to promote. The mistake people like your father make is in thinking the façade they present is what everyone else really sees and believes in. It isn't. In fact, that just lends those people who can pretend to believe in the façade an advantage over those presenting it."

Draco frowned at him.

"What?" Harry asked.

"You don't act Slytherin all that often," Draco murmured. "And yet, you're perfectly capable of it."

"I don't see a reason to," Harry said simply. "When it's necessary, then I'll do it. But the rest of the time, I would much rather act like me, and either have others accept me as I am, or conduct bargains and trades on the set of principles that everyone understands." He cocked his head. "There's a reason I haven't Declared, Draco. I'm not committing myself to just one sort of magic, true, because that would be limiting, but I'm not committing myself to one set of methods, either."

Draco felt a bit of his worry ease. Harry was going to do just fine at his festival.

"Now," he said, "when we've entered, then we'll turn to the right and make a crossing of the whole room, so everyone can see you. Be sure to smile—mysteriously. We don't want everyone able to guess what you're feeling on the night when we first appear in public as a future joined couple. And then—"

He stirred, slowly, feeling as though he were awakening from a much deeper sleep than was actually the case. He could feel the images playing in his head, stemming from Harry's mind.

The boy would not stop dreaming.

It was especially tantalizing because Lord Voldemort could feel that the dreams were about a prophecy. He could not catch the words, but he could catch glimpses of light, and the boy's nervous anxiety and excitement. He had only recently figured out the whole of the prophecy, it seemed, and was now hoarding it to himself, trusting Lord Voldemort not to figure it out in time.

But he would. Oh, he would. He was not a hunter for nothing.

He had not touched the long grass that shrouded his connection to the boy's mind since his blinding. He hated the boy too much. He would destroy him if he stepped into his mind. And that could not be, not yet. These things must be done properly. If the boy was a scooped-out hollow shell, and yet still alive, then he might manifest some strange and unknown power.

Lord Voldemort understood much, but not enough, of what had happened in Godric's Hollow the night he had gone hunting the boy. He knew he had made the boy his magical heir. He knew that the rebounded Killing Curse had come from Harry, and not his brother. He knew Harry's Avada Kedavra had struck him in the moment that he was casting his second Killing Curse at Harry's brother; a moment sooner or later, and the twin would have been either unmarked or dead.

But there had to be more to the matter, more than a magical accident, even a bizarre one. Hunters like Lord Voldemort were not taken down by magical accidents. It did not happen.

It was the turn of a prophecy, and he did not know the whole prophecy. He had not, at first, thought it important that he should. He had known that someone born at the end of July was his enemy. That was sufficient, and certain events had proven correctly that Harry was his chosen foe. But when he woke next to the cup last year after Harry had wounded him and sent him fleeing for his life from the graveyard, he realized, grimly, that there was more to it than that. A chosen foe should not have been able to wound him so badly in a situation where there were no magical accidents to save his life. He should have read the whole prophecy from Harry's mind when he had the chance.

He had not. And now Harry was thinking of the prophecy, and not attending to their connection through his scar, doubtless thinking that Lord Voldemort was too frightened of him to return.

That is not true.

He had a snake to serve as his eyes now. He had Indigena Yaxley researching Falco Parkinson and breeding plants that would dig underground and through solid stone and wards for him. He had his Death Eaters bringing in new recruits every day. He was Lord Voldemort, old and strong, strong, strong!

He parted the long grass that protected the Occlumency connection and stepped through into the maze of Harry's mind.

Snape jerked awake as the mental bond went taut like a bowstring. He closed his eyes and reached along it, and felt Harry whispering to him, under the cover of the first and strongest shield they had built, He's here, sir.

And he was. Snape knew the presence of the Dark Lord in his own mind from three years' worth of it, two of loyalty and one of spying. He had never noticed how foul it was until after he had turned to the Light, and it had only grown fouler since the Dark Lord returned—a consequence, Snape thought, of unicorn blood and the resurrection ritual he had used. He might think he was being subtle, but to one who knew what to look for, his presence was like a fist in the gut.

Dreaming? He asked that of Harry, his attention fixed on his former Lord as he stalked slowly along the pathways of Harry's mind. The dream was playing insistently, and featured triumphant images of Harry landing on sun-soaked grass, waving his hands—for in the dream he had two—and shouting to everyone that Voldemort was dead.

Yes. They had practiced this, too, Snape sliding careful, thin shields between Harry's dreaming and his conscious brain, enabling him to talk to Snape and Draco along the bonds Snape had established without making it seem as if he were awake—because he wasn't, really.

Good. Snape could feel the gathering power of Voldemort's Legilimency, and knew he would strike out in a moment, trying to rip the truth from Harry. He would see no need to disguise his presence. He would want Harry to fear, to know that his enemy knew his plans and wither in the agony of it. Is Draco ready?

Here, Professor. Draco's voice resounded in the mental "air" between them, deep and steady and determined.

Good. Snape braced himself as the first strike came down. Draco had never seen anything like it.

Oh, he'd been in Harry's mind before, but he hadn't seen it like this, a swirling steel skeleton covered with leaves. There were no webs in sight, unless one counted the Occlumency shields Snape had created. They were everywhere, making the mental world glittering and sharp-edged—though only if one knew they existed. Draco was sure the Dark Lord didn't see the traps, or he would never have come ahead.

The view was so mixed, even so, with every glint of light a trap, every shadow a place where Harry's real thoughts hid, every "open" and "true" image a deceit for Voldemort to think he was grasping a closely-guarded secret. Draco shivered a bit, and then reminded himself that the traps were not intended for him. They were meant to snare Voldemort.

And now he could feel the Dark Lord's mind.

Draco did not think he would have felt drawn to this power, even if he were meeting Voldemort in solid form—he had felt nothing but panic and horror and rage when the Dark Lord took Harry prisoner in the graveyard on Midwinter—but he could see why some purebloods might have followed him. There was a certain edge to that magic that was missing even from Harry's. He had grown powerful again since Harry struck at him in the Chamber of Secrets, and he would do anything to his enemies, a claim Harry couldn't make. Draco supposed a certain kind of wizard might feel that kissing the hem of the Dark Lord's robes and murmuring fawning, sycophantic phrases was worth the feeling that that power could be turned on one's enemies.

It still appalled him to think that his father had once been one of those wizards, though.

The Dark Lord abruptly stopped walking; Draco's eye translated it that way, anyway, although he knew that imagination made up vision, here, and it was far more likely that Voldemort had probably just stopped spreading his Legilimency through Harry's mind. Draco heard laughter, and then a strike came out and down, a sharp blade of thought meant to scrape Harry, send him reeling in pain, and bring memories of the prophecy to the surface.

Draco took a deep breath—or so he imagined—and then jumped along the bond that tied his mind to Harry's.

There was a sense of reeling, dizzy motion from him, too, and he felt Voldemort cry out in fury as he slammed into his mind. This was not at all like possessing Dumbledore. They had both been Lord-level wizards taken by surprise.

But Voldemort had been Dark far longer, and he had no compunction against hurting his opponents. Draco screamed, he was sure he did, as the pressure came down on him and tried to tear him apart. Pain ripped him from his hold on the Dark Lord's thoughts and sent him backwards.

And then Voldemort spoke directly to him, and Draco wondered how Harry stood having that voice in his head.

You dare? You dare to possess me?

Draco felt Voldemort following him, surging along the bond, trying to gain access to his own thoughts. He couldn't allow that, and he built up what protections he could, slipping and diving and dodging as he had with Dumbledore, hoping Harry would "wake up" soon.

And then he did.

Harry waited. It was hard, feeling the foulness creep through and contaminate his mind, knowing that Voldemort would probably hurt either him or Draco, but it was necessary. This wouldn't look completely innocent to his enemy when or if he noticed the bonds that connected Snape and Draco to Harry's mind. Therefore, the second best option was to make it look like a trap that had failed—as if they had tried to keep the knowledge of the false prophecy from Tom Riddle and hadn't been able to.

He moved, though, when he felt Draco's unsuccessful possession attempt and Voldemort following him.

He concentrated, and most of the Occlumency shields in his head pivoted, revealing to Voldemort just how many dark mirrors surrounded him. Or so it would seem. It was only Harry's own shields that moved. The stronger ones, which Snape had created for him, remained immobile.

Voldemort hissed, distracted, as Harry had hoped he would be. And this is what you set to hold me, he said. To baffle me. You are weaker than I thought.

He reached out, a thick tendril of Legilimency that Harry saw as tipped with barbs, seeking to hook up specific memories. Harry hoped Snape would have the sense to keep still, hold the shields in defensive postures, and let Harry take the damage. Even he couldn't face the Dark Lord like this, and if he appeared so suddenly from his hiding place, then Voldemort might suspect the truth.

Harry screamed in pain, as Voldemort wanted, and it did hurt quite a bit as that claw dug downward. He flurried memories in front of Voldemort like butterflies, one of the earliest protective techniques Snape had taught him. They were ripped aside like curtains, of course. Harry had known they would be.

Downward and downward he rolled, luring Voldemort on, pretending to be shocked and frightened that his traps didn't work. Voldemort roared in triumph and then performed a Legilimency technique that Harry hadn't heard of before, which summoned memories of a specific event towards him.

Harry screamed and let it happen. He would have to trust Snape's shields now. They were thickest around his memories of the true prophecies, both the one that supposedly predicted him as the defeater of the Dark Lord and the one that Acies had recited to him. Harry had to hope they were weighted heavily enough not to go flying to Voldemort.

He did try to snatch at one of them, of course, the carefully constructed image of the false prophecy, and Voldemort laughed and called it with a variation of the Summoning Charm, adding insult to injury.

Harry watched as the memory sprang to life, himself leaning close to Acies, as if she were the one who had told him the truth. She nodded to him, her eyes still hidden. Harry had hoped that would make it more mysterious to Voldemort. He did not dare show him that Peter knew the true prophecy.

"What your parents recited to you was not the truth, Harry," she whispered. "There is more to the words that guide your fate."

"More? Are you certain?" Harry's voice in the memory was startled, breathy—not the way he would have really reacted, had this happened, but perfectly in tune with Voldemort's reaction, since he thought prophecies were so important.

"More," said Acies, with a firm nod. "This is the prophecy." She settled back and began to recite.

Harry had gone to some trouble with this bit of doggerel, since he wanted it to be worthy of Trelawney. There was also the fact that Voldemort knew the first few lines of the true prophecy; Snape, in his spying on Dumbledore before he turned to the Light, had carried them to him. Mix truth with impressive-sounding nonsense, and Harry hoped it might pass.

"The one with the power to vanquish the Dark Lord approaches..." Acies intoned. "Born to those who have thrice defied him, born as the seventh month dies..."

That was as much as Voldemort had heard, and what came afterwards was pure fancy, pure invention. Harry didn't think Trelawney herself could have given it the pompous tone that Acies did.

"Born whole, he yet shall become divided," Acies whispered. "In heart and in body, in magic and in soul."

Harry was startled to feel a surge of fear from Voldemort when he heard those words. What is that all about? But he had to keep his startlement buried and his outrage uppermost, to fool Voldemort into thinking it mattered that he could see this memory, so he shoved the thought away.

"He must become divided, to defeat the Dark Lord," Acies said. "And he shall face the one who first divided him and gave his permission for the second dividing on the day of longest light, when the dawns shall blaze and the gryphon shall shine forth in the sky. The divisions of heart and soul shall happen there, and with all four complete, the one with the power to defeat the Dark Lord shall come down with the weapon of the eagle and tear him apart in front of the eagle's last roosting place. O guard him, O shield him, for he must be divided ere the world be made whole—and only on that day of light and division may he be divided, or killed in his half-wholeness."

Harry in the memory bowed his head and sighed. "Wow," he whispered.

Harry, crouched under his Occlumency shields, could feel Voldemort's mind working purposefully, and knew what conclusions he would be coming to. A storm of the Light was coming, and the Light's symbol was a gryphon. Ravenclaw's House symbol was an eagle, and it was common knowledge, or at least a common legend, that Rowena Ravenclaw had come back to Hogwarts to die. Everything would point towards the fatal day being this Midsummer, in front of Hogwarts, and Harry killing Voldemort with some weapon of Ravenclaw's.

And, of course, Voldemort had split Harry's magic in making Harry his magical heir, and divided his body in giving permission for Bellatrix to cut off his hand. But the wording of the prophecy suggested there was a chance to kill Harry before the other two divisions happened—though only on Midsummer.

Harry felt the moment when the Dark Lord made his decision, and laughed aloud. You have not kept this from me, he hissed in Harry's head, his voice vibrating like a snake. You will lose.

Harry let out a cry of loss and rage, but he wanted to sob with relief, though even that emotion got tucked away beneath Snape's shields at once. It had worked.

Voldemort laughed again, and vanished from Harry's head, sealing the Occlumency connection between them so that Harry couldn't follow.

Harry swam towards the surface of his mind at once, wanting to see how Draco felt.

Draco felt bloody horrible, that was how he felt.

He'd barely opened his eyes—he was lying on his own bed, since the Dark Lord's attack had come in the middle of the night, exactly as Harry predicted it would—when Professor Snape came into the room like wrath embodied and hissed at him, "Do you have any idea what you risked, you stupid boy?"

Draco found himself responding not as a comrade-in-arms, though Snape had treated him that way when they were planning this trap, but as a Slytherin student facing his Head of House. He lowered his eyes and ventured, "Sir, I was supposed to practice—"

Snape cast a Silencing Charm before Draco could finish, blocking their conversation from a curious, sleepy Blaise, who'd poked his head out of his own curtains. "Yes, you were supposed to practice possession," Snape whisper-hissed, "while the Dark Lord was occupied with the false prophecy, you stupid boy, and not before he had even started to fall into the trap! You could have revealed my own presence. You certainly made Harry move earlier than he had planned. And you could have been killed or possessed yourself."

Draco winced and shut his eyes. His head pounded furiously, as though someone had tried squeezing his brain through a funnel. "I'm sorry, sir," he murmured, and rested his head in his hands. "Can I get a headache potion?"

"I should withhold it from you," Snape hissed, "to teach you what happens to spoiled little boys who disobey." But his hands were already moving, pulling a vial from his pocket and holding it out to Draco. Draco downed it, and was relieved to feel the pain diminish, though only by half.

"The rest of the damage is mental," said Snape, and seized his chin, holding him roughly still. "A skilled Occlumens must fix it."

He dived into Draco's mind with what didn't feel like skill, rearranging his memories in what Draco supposed was the correct order, pulling and tugging at the edge of what felt like gaping holes, and once causing images of the house elves cleaning the Manor to flash in front of Draco's eyes. Draco supposed that was analogous to taking out the foulness that contact with Voldemort must have left.

Snape let go of his chin and looked away from him, and Draco sighed. His head still hurt, but it was the memory of the pain that hurt more, and how he had reacted to the notion that Voldemort was about to hurt Harry. He had lunged into danger like a brainless Gryffindor.

“Draco?”

He turned his head, and saw Harry climbing off the bed and coming towards him. Draco assumed a pathetic expression that he wouldn't have dared try with only Snape there, and heard his Head of House stifle a growl as Harry gently stroked Draco's hair and then took his chin in a far gentler grip than Snape had managed.

“All right?” Harry whispered.

“I will be,” Draco said, and then aired what had bothered him most, after the pain. “I couldn't possess him, Harry. I don't know how I can accomplish what we have to on Midsummer Day.”

“We'll go on training,” Harry promised. “We'll find a way, Draco. And if worst comes to worst, then I have another idea.”

“Why didn't you say so?” Draco demanded. He'd been sure that everything depended on his possessing Voldemort.

“Because I don't know if it will work,” said Harry, with a slight frown. “I don't know if you can possess objects, even ones that have at least a partial self-awareness. We'll practice, though.” He stepped back and looked up at Snape. “How did I do, sir?”

“Look me in the eye.”

Harry complied, and Draco watched Snape anxiously; Harry had planned to take some damage, of course, to convince Voldemort that he'd resisted the abduction of the prophecy memory as well as he could, but that didn't mean this was good. Snape studied Harry's eyes for a moment, then nodded, the smallest amount of relaxation appearing in his face. “The wounds are healable, Harry.”

“Good,” said Harry. “I'll get to healing them. If you'll end the bonds you and Draco have with me, sir?”

Snape cast a quick, efficient spell, and Draco sighed as the greater sense of connection he'd experienced to Harry in the past few days fell away. Then he lost the sigh as Harry flung his arms around him and embraced him.

“You were brilliant, Draco,” Harry murmured into his shoulder. “I think you convinced him that this was a trap that failed even more than I did. Thank you.”

Draco beamed, and quite carefully did not look at his Head of House, whom he was sure would not be as approving. “Thank you, Harry,” he said, and leaned into the embrace, soaking up the accolades of faith and belief that he no doubt deserved.

Lord Voldemort opened his eyes—or, rather, he linked his consciousness to the mind of his snake once more. The young flesh-serpent crawled over to his throne and stared up at his face, letting him see the joy that twisted it. It was an odd experience, looking at one’s own features, but he had quickly grown used to it. All attempts to bring back his own eyes had been in vain.

I have the prophecy. I know what will happen. And it is essential that it be prevented.

Even apart from the prophecy, Lord Voldemort would not permit someone else to divide his soul as he had done. That was his own sacred and protective art of immortality. But it was what would happen if he could not kill Harry in time. And he could do that on only one day and in only one place.

On Midsummer Day, I go to Hogwarts.

Chapter Eighty-Four: Midsummer Breathing Down Their Necks

“Then begin,” the woman from the Wizarding Examinations Authority said, and leaned back as if that were the conclusion of her task. Harry could see her eyes, however, alert and confident beneath half-lowered lids. She would be watching, and anyone who thought himself able to get away with cheating in the Potions Practical because of her sleepiness would be sadly mistaken.

Harry took a deep breath and began to mix the Draught of Peace. The powdered moonstone slipped between his fingers like sand, and he reminded himself that his hand had no reason to shake. He’d already asked for and received permission to use a Levitation Charm as a second hand. The proctor had added alarms to alert her if he used any magic that would speed the cooling of the potion or interfere with another student’s work, which Harry thought entirely fair.

He cleared his mind, carefully, of all thoughts of the future, all thoughts of the coming battle, all thoughts of whether he would even have a future in which the Potions OWL he earned might matter. He dropped straight into the sea of calm that let him brew his best potions. If he could maintain this state when he was mixing experimental ones, he thought as his magic skimmed the syrup of hellebore towards him so he could examine its consistency, then he might achieve more with them. But there, he was always enthusiastic, more eager to see the end result than in evaluating how best to get there, and he made frequent mistakes.

He started mixing the Draught of Peace, quietly certain that he would produce a good potion.

“They’re—beautiful.”

Harry grinned over his shoulder. He had never thought he would live to hear Zacharias Smith stunned.

“Aren’t they?” he asked happily, and bowed to the horse in the lead. It studied him for a moment, then dipped its head back and let him step nearer so that he could stroke its neck. Laura had told him that the Gloryflowers had created these horses on the model of hippogriffs, partially to stop an enemy simply seizing a riderless one in a battle and mounting it. They would not accept anyone who hadn't bowed in polite introduction beforehand.

The horses were all made of gold, or more precisely, Harry thought, gold-colored metal, stamping and shifting and snorting like the real thing. Their hooves, crafted of silver, rang softly on the floor of the Room of Requirement. Their nostrils flared, and they turned their heads rapidly towards new sounds, their ears flagging up and down like banners. Harry hadn't decided what their pale manes and tails were made of yet. Braided diamonds, it looked like, but couldn't be.

They didn't look exactly like real horses—for one thing, no real horses had necks that swan-like or legs that long and loping, built like a cheetah's, for speed—but they were close enough to make the riders whom Zacharias had gathered stare at them in clear longing. Harry stepped back with a little nod. "You're welcome to them," he said. "You'll need to bow and wait for them to bow back before you can ride them, though."

The first person to move forward wasn't one of the Light wizards Zacharias had found, though, but a sixth-year Slytherin prefect, Catrina Flint-Digsby, the one who had laughed when Marietta Edgecombe was still in the hospital wing. She walked straight to the horse Harry had already convinced to accept him, and bowed in turn, murmuring her name. The horse eyed her back. Harry held his breath. He didn't think Laura would have done anything against her magical animals accepting Dark riders, but since the Gloryflowers were a Light family, they might have introduced precautions into the model that they'd forgotten to tell Harry about.

The horse snorted in recognition a moment later, though, and let Catrina come near enough to stroke its neck. She beamed, and then clucked her tongue and asked, "Kneel for me?"

The horse dropped to its knees. Catrina flung an easy leg over its back, sitting in the saddle-like dip there with the posture of an experienced rider, and only then paused and said, "Where are the reins, Harry?"

Harry pointed. "Under the mane. They're attached to the horse itself. Bit already in the mouth, reins leading out from it. If you can't figure out the proper signals to give it, since it is different from a real horse, Laura Gloryflower assured me they respond to verbal commands."

Catrina nodded, looking a little less confident, and picked up the reins. When she slapped them against the horse's neck, it stood, and when she pulled them and used her legs and knees in signals incomprehensible to Harry, the golden creature began first to trot and then to canter in a circle around the Room of Requirement.

Harry smiled as he watched. The horse shone as it ran, and that was only in the muted lights of the Room's makeshift riding ring. He couldn't imagine how they would shine on Midsummer Day itself, when the storm of the Light would reach down to the Light's creatures.

"They don't get tired, and they don't get hungry," he told the other riders, who were pressing forward eagerly now. "And they'll do almost anything you can think of if you use the reins or give them a verbal command, including behavior that's not natural for horses."

"This is wonderful," said Cho, smiling at Harry around the neck of her own horse, which had accepted her with hardly a pause. "I never imagined I would have the chance to participate in a battle like this."

Harry smiled back at her, and tried to conceal his worry. Cho's parents had agreed to her being here, and she owed him a life debt anyway. All the riders were older, none below fifth year, and several were legal adults. All had chosen to stay and risk their lives.

Harry still wasn't entirely happy about having adolescents other than Draco fighting in the battle, though.

He managed to calm down as he thought of the three other creatures Laura had sent. One was more properly many small creatures, a hive of digging bugs that would patrol the grounds just beneath the surface of the soil, and, hopefully, stop any of Indigena Yaxley's plants that were trying to root in it. Harry had to take them out and introduce them to the plants that belonged in Hogwarts, soon, so that they wouldn't harm the ones that had a right to be there.

The other two were the “prototypes” Laura had mentioned to him. Harry could see why she hadn’t built many of them. They were disturbing. But they would get him and Draco to where they needed to go on Midsummer evening, and that was all he could ask for.

He had to turn around and snicker when Zacharias didn’t wait a sufficient period of time for his horse to accept him and almost got kicked, though. He had to.

“Begin.”

Harry eyed the snail in front of him and took a deep breath. He had plenty of practice with Vanishing things when he could just use his wandless magic; focus and will were the important components there. For the Transfiguration Practical, though, he had to use his wand, and he already knew he should have practiced more. The length of cypress felt unfamiliar and uncertain in his hand.

But he had practiced this in McGonagall’s class—though not as much he should have—and he knew he could do it. He pointed his wand at the snail and concentrated on intoning the Vanishing Spell. This was only the first part of the Transfiguration OWL. He could and would pass it, if only because the harder parts were coming up.

The snail Vanished obediently. The proctor nodded to him and wrote something down on his chart, then pushed a teacup in front of Harry. “Make this into a dove, Harry,” he said encouragingly. He was the first of those from the Wizarding Examinations Authority who didn’t look as if he’d bitten into a raw lemon when asked to call Harry by something other than a last name.

Harry took another deep breath. The days when he’d done this spell with McGonagall watching him and Hermione achieving success in the background—first in the class, of course—seemed very far away. But he remembered the incantation, and spoke it confidently enough. “Pocillum transformo columbae!”

The teacup shuddered and grew wings, the part of the change Harry had always found hardest, and the one on which he’d been concentrating the most. The rounded portion of the cup turned into a rounded body, and Harry held his breath as the handle became a delicate neck and head. The dove looked up at him and cooed as though asking whether it could have food.

The proctor picked it up and gently turned it around. Then he smiled sympathetically, and showed Harry that the body was still hollow on the underside, the dove missing its feet. This didn't seem to distress the dove at all, which kept cooing and looking around the Great Hall.

Harry felt his face flush in embarrassment. The proctor merely wrote down something on his list and turned around to retrieve a needle for Harry to Transfigure into a goldfish.

"I've tightened the wards," McGonagall told Harry, as she poured tea into cups for them both. "After some searching, Helga helped me find what I'd been missing. Loki could pass through the Forbidden Forest because he had no hostile intentions towards the school. He could have had hostile intentions towards an individual person within it, like you or Professor Snape, and the wards would not have kept him out. We made the wards too focused on Hogwarts as a collective entity." McGonagall sighed and sipped at her tea. "I am sorry this happened, Harry. You cannot know how sorry."

"It wasn't your fault," Harry said quietly, and then hesitated as he sat back with the teacup warming his hand. He hadn't asked her for details before, but now curiosity burned and ate at him. "Headmistress," he said finally, and McGonagall looked up from contemplating eternity in the depths of her teacup. "What exactly did Remus say to you, the day that he left?"

McGonagall's mouth tightened. "He argued that surely he deserved some trust, since I had known him for so long," she muttered, and Harry could see the glint of anger in her eyes. "He was a Gryffindor, one of my own students, and someone I chose to hire even though I knew the laws against werewolf employment. I'd defied the Ministry for him. How could I force him away now, when that would send an unfortunate message to both the Ministry and the werewolves?"

Harry frowned. He didn't like the arguments himself, but he could see why they would have persuaded McGonagall. "Why didn't they work?" he asked aloud, then realized he hadn't meant to ask the question that way. McGonagall waved him off when he tried to apologize, however.

"I asked him, in several ways, what he intended," said McGonagall. "Each time, he told me that he could not reveal anything of Loki's plans or his own, that it was involved in aspects of werewolf life no ordinary wizard could understand, and which he would desecrate if he tried to explain. He wanted me to trust him for trust alone. Finally, I asked him, bluntly, whether he would bite a student if Loki told him to, whether the students were actually safe with him here on full moon nights—not safe in the sense that he would not take Wolfsbane, but safe in the sense that he would not go prowling, fully in control of his actions, and bite someone who didn't want to be bitten."

Harry swallowed. "And what did he say?"

"He couldn't answer me." McGonagall smiled bitterly. "He mumbled something else about pack magic and werewolf life, but he would not guarantee me that my students were absolutely safe. I sacked him at once."

Harry felt a more bitter burn of betrayal than he had when Remus actually left. Once, Remus would have understood how deep a violation of free will that was, to bite someone who didn't want to be bitten. Even if he had accepted his curse now, he had suffered under it for a long time; Fenrir Greyback had bitten Remus because Remus's father had offended him. It had been a punishment for his family, and a horrible heaping of injustice on the head of a young boy who couldn't have influenced his father's actions one way or the other. Now Remus was proposing to do the same thing, and he would not even explain why.

Harry wondered what would have happened if Loki had ordered Remus to bite someone in the school. Would he have done it and still expected to retain his position as Head of Gryffindor House, because that was just "what had to be done?"

His cup abruptly shattered, and he looked down in surprise as hot tea dripped across his fingers, mingling with shards of porcelain. "Sorry," he murmured to McGonagall, and Vanished them.

"It's all right," said McGonagall. "I had a hard time refraining from Transfiguring him into a cushion and sending him to the Hufflepuff common room."

Harry smiled, but in his mind, he carefully checked Remus off any possible list of allies. He still loved him, but he could not trust him.

Binns is useless, Harry thought, frowning at his History of Magic written exam.

The old ghost drawled on and on about goblin rebellions, and almost nothing interesting. The questions on the exam, of course, concerned much more than goblin rebellions. There were questions on wizard-giant relationships, when the Ministry of Magic had first formed, who certain famous wizards and witches were, and details of the First War with Voldemort, to name just a few. Harry idly wondered if the people who'd written the exam had ever thought themselves ridiculous as they carefully scribed out "You-Know-Who."

Luckily, his own reading in history as a child let him know some of the questions, and with others, he had heard that brilliant if madly irrelevant details could often distract the examiners; they would accept a load of bollocks if it was an intelligent-sounding load of bollocks. He'd see what adding obscure ideas about giants would do to distract them from the dates.

With a will, he set to work.

Harry eyed the letter he'd received with trepidation. He'd put off reading it until everything else he could possibly do was done. And even now, he didn't like the fact that it bore the seal of Griffinsnest. He knew who it would be from. He sighed and split the seal.

To his surprise, the letter began with a polite salutation, and contained more emotions than the scolding tone he'd expected.

May 22nd, 1996

Dear Harry:

You may be startled to receive such a letter from me, given that the issue of the linchpins has been settled between you and my family. It is true that I have no control of the Griffinsnest linchpins when working against my family combined. They agreed at the equinox meeting to allow you to attach our linchpins to magic instead of the earth, and I must abide by that decision.

But I can make your life difficult. As you probably know by now, werewolves killed both my parents. Both were killings by 'accepted' werewolves, which is the term I use to refer to lycanthropes who either willingly took the bite or have grown accustomed to the curse in the years since. Both did it as part of an obscure ritual held in some organized packs, known as the Grand Hunt. The object is to go after difficult targets—fully-trained wizards, in this case—and prove how superior their curse renders them. They did not have Wolfsbane, of course, so they made sure they were in the vicinity of my parents when the transformation and the rage took them.

I caught both monsters in wizard form. I challenged them to the same duel that Augustus Starrise used on Adalrico Bulstrode, so that they had no choice but to face me. I finished each of them by driving a silver knife into their hearts in the confines of the duel. So, while they killed my parents in accordance with their own rituals, I killed them in accordance with customs accepted by wizarding society for centuries.

That is the reason I am unable to object to your transference of the linchpins, however repugnant I find your politics. You honored the duel Starrise called, when I know that you could have interfered. You would have honored the way I slew the murderers of my parents. There is a wizard within you whom I wish to work with, one who forgoes vengeance for himself but will not twist the minds of others so that they also forego it.

But I know that werewolves run by your side, and I hear now that you are starting to fight for them more prominently. I have contacts in the Ministry who assure me that one pack of accepted werewolves is bragging they have you under control, despite the biting of Elder Gillyflower. I am sorry, but I cannot stand beside one who bows to monsters like the ones who killed my parents, who indulges them despite their vicious and violent tactics.

I am writing you because I wish to know the truth, and I trust you to answer me honestly. Do you bow to such werewolves? If you do, then I am your sworn foe from that moment forward. If you do not, then I may be able to help you.

Yours in the Light,

Gloriana Griffinsnest.

Harry sat back and frowned for a moment. He wondered if he really should tell her what he planned, then shrugged. If nothing else, she was not going to be the one to expose his tactics to Loki's pack.

And he could feel the boiling anger beginning to surge in him at the mere thought that Loki was bragging about having him under control. Didn't the idiot see that would only hurt his own cause, in at least two ways? Others would refuse to trust Harry as an independent political power, taking him no more seriously than they'd taken Cornelius Fudge, and would probably be extremely reluctant to help him fight for werewolves' rights. And other groups might think they could seize control of Harry by use of the same tactics, or even that they had to, to counter Loki's influence.

But then, Harry thought, as he pulled out parchment to draft his response to Gloriana, leaning on his Defense Against the Dark Arts textbook, I do not give Loki much credit for intelligence. Determination, yes. But it's no wonder that he spun this contest into violence as soon as he could, and threatened me to make me pay attention to him. Violence is all he truly understands.

When his letter was finished, Harry sat back and read it over before he sent it off with Hedwig.

Dear Mrs. Griffinsnest:

I thank you for writing me instead of simply assuming that the rumors you hear about me are true. There has been too much of that lately, and in fact it is the cause of the trouble in the Ministry.

I am under the control of no werewolf pack. Loki, the leader who claims that it is so, has threatened me with infection for people I love if I do not do as he wishes, and also promised to bite someone on the full moon of each month. The biting of Elder Gillyflower in April was only the first such attack. Elder Gillyflower was guilty of crimes against werewolves, and so was their target for June—who is now under the Ministry's protection and prosecution—but there is no telling whether they might not turn to biting innocents in time.

I do not care more for werewolves' rights than the rights of ordinary wizards and witches, or other magical creatures, and that is where Loki has made his mistake. I care for them equally. To be truly under his control, I would have to be convinced that he was right. I am not, and that will bite him in the end.

I have a plan that is two-pronged. The first is working on a cure for lycanthropy. Loki dares to imply that he speaks for all werewolves in threatening me. That is not true. At most, to use your terms, he speaks for accepted werewolves, and not those who hate and resist their curse. I wish to have a cure on hand so that those werewolves who wish to be free of the curse can, and to show that Loki's claims are false.

The second part of the plan does involve fighting for werewolves' rights, yes. I will understand if you can no longer give me the time of day once you read this. However, ma'am, consider this: When all laws are fair, when all rights of werewolves and wizards are equal, then werewolves will be protected far more than they are now. They will be able to have jobs and custody of their own children.

And they will be tried and sent to prison under the same laws. If Loki continues his course, then, once the laws are fair, he can be arrested and tried for use of Dark magic and war crimes. I will see him in Tullianum someday—not because he is a werewolf, not even because he threatened those I love or manipulated me, but because that is what would happen to a non-werewolf wizard using these same tactics.

I wish to end the endless cycle of vengeance. I enjoy wizard duels no more than Grand Hunts. It is your choice, however, if you wish to help me, beyond allowing the linchpin plan to proceed.

Yours sincerely,

Harry.

Harry nodded, and stood to walk to the Owlery.

“Protego!” Harry could have done this in his sleep. Without doubt, his Defense Against the Dark Arts practical was the easiest so far.

The curse coming at him from the box that the proctor had enchanted to cast random spells bounced; the proctor had to duck as it whizzed past her head. She stood again and smiled at him, writing something down on the chart that she held.

“Excellent, Mr. Pot—Harry.” She peered at him inquiringly. “What would you do if you could not use a shield that bounced back the curses, for fear of hitting your comrades in battle?”

Harry grinned at her and held up his hand, dropping the Protego. The next curse out of the box was a nasty one, meant to burn the skin so badly that normal healing spells would simply slide off it and leave the person writhing in pain. Harry knew it wouldn’t have come out of the box if the proctor didn’t think him able to handle it; the boxes adjusted themselves depending on the skill level of the student being examined.

“Haurio!” he called, and the jade-green shield formed around his hand, spreading out from his wand. The curse hit the shield, which ate it calmly. Harry turned an inquiring gaze on the proctor. “Like that, Madam?”

"Yes, exactly!" She seemed almost flustered as she scribbled, and Harry wondered if the rest of the examinations had been boring so far. He almost hoped so. He was enjoying this, and he'd like to secure at least one O.

"Well?" Harry asked, as Draco sat back and blinked at nothing. The rune circle around the bed shone frantically, as if Draco's venture into possession this time had agitated it. "How was that?"

"Very definitely—strange," said Draco, and ducked his head as if trying to escape Harry's gaze. "You're right. Possessing an object, even one that's self-aware like that one, is very different from possessing a human brain. For one thing, she has a very strong sense of herself as female, but no name. The people I possessed always knew who they were. There's one part of your mind that sings your name over and over. She doesn't see why she needs one."

Harry nodded and laid the Midsummer knife down on the bed. The Light blade glinted in protest, but subsided the moment his hand was no longer touching it. "Do you think you could make it float or stab if you had to?"

"It won't be easy." Draco locked his hands behind his head as he thought about it. Harry told himself to stop staring at Draco's fingers and having random thoughts about them. "But easier than possessing the Dark Lord, I think. Yes, I can."

"Thank Merlin." Harry smiled at him and changed the subject from battle. They'd been practicing this for hours, and Draco's head had to be ringing with worry over what would happen when Midsummer actually arrived. "How are your OWLs coming?"

Draco gave a shaky groan and moved his hands in front of his face. "Terrible!" he wailed.

"Draco," Harry chided him.

"All right, all right," Draco muttered. "Defense Against the Dark Arts and Potions weren't bad. But I couldn't make sense of the History of Magic exam. I should know better than that, shouldn't I? I had parents who gave me a good education in it. And then I stare at a list of dates and find out I don't know anything."

Harry laughed. "I know the feeling. They really should hire someone other than Binns. Of course, I'm not sure that he wouldn't show up in the History classroom and natter on and on even if they did."

Draco sighed. "Don't remind me. It didn't help knowing that even if I'd stayed awake in that class, it wouldn't have helped." He brooded for a moment, then brightened as he added, "But I've revised so much for my Charms practical that I'm mouthing the incantations in my sleep. That's got to count for something, right?"

"Well, let's see." Harry turned so that he faced Draco fully. "Get your wand, and I'll practice with you."

"That is—bright enough, I think." The proctor had one hand shielding his eyes.

"Sorry, sir," said Harry, abashed. He looked down at the rat he'd been supposed to turn purple with the Color Change Charm. It had worked, but Harry wasn't accustomed to using his wand for this, either, and he'd turned the rat such a brilliant purple that it looked like the sun was glowing from inside it. He shielded his own eyes as the proctor murmured a few cross-sounding words and managed to reduce the rat's color.

"I'd say that you don't know your own strength," said the wizard, with a faint frown at him. He'd seemed either intimidated by or outright afraid of Harry throughout most of the practical, but this time adopted a fatherly tone. "Best to get a handle on that before you try any Charms work in the field, son."

"I know," Harry apologetically, as he readied himself for the next Charm. "Usually, I just do it wandlessly."

The proctor choked, and turned green.

"What do you say, Harry?"

Harry eyed Moody calculatingly. The old Auror had told him to stay behind when he'd dismissed the dueling club, and Harry had, once the usual complement of wounds, bumps, and bruises from Moody's intensive training were healed, and the rest of the students had staggered out the door, moaning. Harry had thought Moody wanted, once again, to express his doubts about the members of the club actually fighting in the battle. He hadn't expected this.

"You're offering me a duel?" he asked Moody.

"Yes." Moody grinned wolfishly as he pulled out his wand. "You don't get a chance to have a proper one often, do you, boy? It's charging about and wandless magic this and draining Voldemort that. But even if your purpose is going to be just to fend him off on Midsummer—" Moody sounded as if he had his doubts of that "—you should still have some dueling instruction."

"I thought that was what you were giving me with the others," Harry protested.

"Have to hold myself to their pace there, don't I?" Moody was prowling in a circle that made Harry instinctively want to fall into a defensive crouch. "Don't dare use some of the spells I could, just in case they get badly hurt and go wailing to their parents about the mad old Auror." He tilted his head to the side, and his grin widened. "You can take it, though, boy. Know you can."

"All right," said Harry. "Wand, or not?"

"Will you use one when you're fighting?"

"Probably not," Harry had to admit. He concentrated on Moody's circling, and waited.

Moody's first spell was non-verbal, of course, a curse that exploded a few inches from Harry and tried to shower him with purple light he knew he didn't want touching his bare skin. Harry rolled swiftly backwards; this was one of those curses, like the Blood Whip, that would make shields explode. He had to put some distance between himself and it.

Moody conjured a wind that blew the purple flakes after him. Harry continued his rolling, until he knew he would fetch up against the far wall of the classroom if he kept moving. He tucked his knees beneath his body and called up a contrary gust of wind. It scattered the purple flakes harmlessly to the ground and drove at Moody, actually spinning him a step backward before he conjured a shield. His wooden leg clicked on the floor with a satisfying sound.

Moody was laughing, and called, "That's why you can lose duels, boy, because you turn to offensive magic too late, and defensive magic too often!" He used a wave of his hand to make Harry think he was throwing a curse that could be stopped by a Haurio, and Harry actually had the green shield surrounding his hand before he realized Moody had fooled him. The curse coming at him was the Blood Whip.

Harry turned his back and took the pain, hissing as it carved lines into his skin, while he reached for a spell he thought Moody wouldn't suspect. "Teredo," he whispered.

That would probably take a few minutes to take effect, so in the meantime he had wounds on his back that limited his mobility, a fully-armed opponent stalking towards him, and the need to use offensive magic—though since it wasn't a real duel, he had to hold back, or he could easily kill Moody.

He concentrated on something that would show he was trying while also being something Moody could defeat easily, and conjured a whirling cyclone of diamond blades, which swept over his shoulders and towards Moody. Harry turned to see what the old Auror would do.

Moody's wand moved impossibly fast as he conjured half a dozen small shields in the air, blocking the blades. Then he grunted at Harry, said, "Another lesson you have to learn is to prepare your next spell instead of watching your enemy," and clenched his hand in no spell gesture Harry knew.

A time-delayed spell, he realized a moment later, as bursts of light in front of his eyes blinded him; Moody had spoken two incantations, one for this spell, the second to keep it waiting until he made the hand gesture. Well, it had been a good move. Harry couldn't see anything but burning afterimages when he opened his eyes.

Harry decided to stop worrying about hurting the Auror. He obviously had no worry about hurting Harry.

"Sectumsemptra!" he called, and threw his hand over his shoulder towards the place where Moody had last been.

Moody cursed creatively. From the thump of his leg, Harry knew he'd dodged the curse. "What was that, boy?" he demanded.

A spell Snape invented, no wonder you've never seen it before, Harry wanted to say, but decided to hit Moody with quick spells instead, ones that would keep him moving.

"Ventus! Ardesco! Solem adversum intueri! Serpensortia!"

He heard the snake conjured at the end of that spell hiss inquiringly at him, asking him what he wanted it to do, and Harry hissed back, "Bite the old man."

There was the scrape of scales against stone, and Moody cursing from having to dodge wind and flame and blinding light and now a snake all at once, and then an abrupt crack and Moody's, "You can't actually call it off, can you?"

Harry turned around, forcing his eyes open, blinking. The bursts of purple across his vision had just started to fade, but now he could see the thin, dark line of a king cobra making for Moody, who was sprawled on the floor, his wooden leg broken. The fall had sent his wand reeling from his hand.

"Of course I can," said Harry, and told the snake, "Thank you. I don't need any more work from you."

The cobra twisted to look at him. "I'm hungry," it hissed.

Harry sighed and held out his arm. The cobra slithered rapidly across the floor and up his arm, understanding the invitation. "I'll take you to get something to eat and then set you free,” Harry told it. He glanced back at Moody, who’d been inching towards his wand. Harry called it with a Summoning Charm, and grinned. “Do you know what Charm I used on your leg, sir?”

“Looks like Teredo, from the way the wood’s gnawed,” Moody growled. “Well. You’ll do, boy. Eventually. Got to get you to abandon the defensive and go on the offensive sooner, and not pause to watch the pretty lights. Or the snakes, for that matter,” he added, as the king cobra nudged its head insistently at Harry’s hand, wanting warmth and food. Its body dangled down Harry’s arm and shoulders, then wound around his waist, a good eighteen feet of scale and muscle. “Still. Not bad for a beginner.”

Harry narrowed his eyes in thought. He’d scribbled down every fact about Saturn’s rings that he could remember, and he still wasn’t sure if it was enough for the written portion of the Astronomy OWL.

Draco, of course, would be smug. He’d learned more than enough star-lore when he was a child, thanks to his mother’s heritage, and he was probably finished already, or putting the last touches on a perfect essay. Harry shook his head and told himself to think about Saturn instead of Draco’s smile.

It didn’t help that he’d never been interested in the stars, at least not the way that centaurs and Professor Sinistra were. If star-lore had been a condition of gathering allies, he would have learned it, and likewise if magic concerning the heavens had been the kind he needed to learn to defend himself. But neither was true. Star-lore was really most useful for predicting the future and learning about history, not day-to-day survival in a war. Harry had always placed the knowledge that would let him survive, once to protect his brother and then to defeat Voldemort, first in his mind, above all other kinds.

He decided to write down what he could about Saturn’s position at this time of year. Merlin knew he remembered that, from all the dawns lately that he’d stood on the North Tower and stared towards the east, awaiting Midsummer and its storm.

“He had no right to do it.”

Harry sighed and leaned back against his chair. He and Peter were sitting in a room on the fifth floor that most people avoided, since Peeves tended to haunt it. Peter had performed a complicated curse that Harry had never heard of, which caused an image of the Bloody Baron to float in the air. Peeves took one look and fled, shrieking. Peter had admitted, when Harry pressed him, that he'd been the one Gryffindor House usually assigned to get rid of the poltergeist when they were still in school, and make sure he didn't interfere with any of the Marauders' plans.

Peter had Transfigured several of the broken chairs into whole ones, with a skill Harry envied but supposed he should expect from a wizard who had mastered the Animagus transformation by the time he was sixteen, and connected the room's hearth to the school's Floo network in moments. From there, it'd been a simple matter for him to call down to the kitchens and ask a house elf to prepare tea. And then they had sipped it and talked as Harry told him, in detail, about Remus. Peter had come to the school to help prepare for the battle; without Regulus, he was lonely in the Black houses.

Peter had listened to the story of Remus, without interrupting, and then made his strange declaration. Harry felt a knot of tension at the base of his spine uncoil. He had expected Peter to take Remus's side, really, since they were such old friends.

"I can understand why he did it," Harry said, striving to keep his tone neutral. "He had his sense of belonging stripped away from him again and again—first when he was bitten, and then when you got sent to Azkaban. And then, even when you showed that you weren't a sacrifice anymore, Sirius died, and James was a git." Harry shrugged. "So there were his friends gone. What was he like in the Sanctuary?"

"Better," said Peter. "But not perfect. The Seers don't try to make everyone the same as a 'normal' wizard, you know. They look at our souls and suggest ways to heal the gaps." Peter sipped from his tea, though it seemed an effort for him to open his mouth, which was set in a tight, angry line, long enough to get the tea down. "They suggested that Remus heal himself by coming to terms with his past—writing Snape, for example, though I don't know if he ever did that. Writing James. Writing werewolves." Peter sighed through his nose. "And it worked so well that he found a new sense of belonging, a new set of friends, and chose them."

Harry frowned. "Then I don't see why he had no right to do what he did."

Peter twitched his nose in the manner of a rat sitting up its haunches to sniff the air for danger. "Because Remus has never learned that one sense of belonging doesn't have to cut out others," he muttered. "First he was an outcast, and he let that define him. Then he was our friend, and that was so important that he was able to ignore Sirius's steadily more deranged behavior, and stay afraid of his own rage. He was thirty-four years old in your third year, Harry, and he'd never come to terms with the fact that he was a werewolf." Peter shook his head. "And then he did, and scarpered as if that meant no one else was capable of understanding him anymore. Well, of course we weren't, if he didn't explain!

"He betrayed you, he acted as if his old friends should just give up demanding anything of him while at the same time wanting them to trust him, and he's acting like an idiot." Peter ran a hand agitatedly through his hair. "It's always one thing or another with Remus, the extremes, never the middle. If he could just remember that sometimes people are two or three things and not one, he'd be better off." He drank more of his tea, moodily.

Harry shrugged a bit. He didn't see it the same way, but then, he hadn't been friends with Remus since they were both children. "I wouldn't mind so much if he had just told me that things had changed," he muttered. "Instead, he left me to figure it out on my own."

Peter rapped his fingers on his cup. "I hope for his sake that this pack is true," he said, enough bitterness in his voice to scald a cat. "That they'll be his friends and not just use him. If not, I think Remus might break."

He took a deep breath and then straightened himself with a shake, as if the motion would put all mention of Remus behind them, turning to

Harry with a bright smile. "Now. I'm staying to help with the battle, after all, so let me show you how well I can call rats."

Harry peered into the depths of the crystal ball, and wished the Divination exam allowed someone to dream prophetic dreams instead. He was good at that, at least if he was allowed to talk about the Dark Lord and his plans for Great Britain. The proctor for this exam was a humorless woman who only seemed to accept a certain list of pre-designated symbols as "real" glimpses into the future.

Trying to clear his mind the way he would for Occlumency, Harry let his gaze drift downward into the crystal. Supposedly, this was how one used one's "inner eye," too. Trelawney's insipid, simpering voice would be in his head in a minute if he thought like that, though, so Harry forced that away and concentrated on the present.

"Well?" the proctor prompted, long before Harry was ready with a complete lie. "What do you See?"

Well, when in doubt, go for the dramatic performance. Harry gave a violent start and shiver, and then shrank back from the crystal ball. He lifted his eyes to the woman's startled face. "Death," he choked out. "My own!"

The proctor sat up and reached for her quill. "What symbols?"

"A Grim," said Harry, choosing it easily, since Sirius's dog form had looked like that. "A great black dog, walking slowly through a fog-drenched forest. It turned and looked out of the crystal at me, and I knew its eyes were beckoning me on to a deeper vision." Harry put his hand to his face and shuddered dramatically. Inwardly, he was congratulating himself. Visions-within-visions were supposed to be difficult to pull off. If she believed him, he ought to get a higher mark than he would have otherwise.

"And what did you See within its eyes?" Scratch, scratch, went her quill.

"Myself, caught in a storm of light," said Harry, improvising quickly. "It was fading behind me, like the last sunset I'd ever see. I stood in front of a great snake and watched him slithering towards me. He had lightning bolts in his mouth, and around his tail he bore a bloody rose.”

“And what do those symbols mean?” Yes, there really was an undertone of excitement in the woman’s voice. Harry refrained from rolling his eyes, but it was a near thing.

“The snake means great danger,” said Harry. “And since I am enemy to Lord Voldemort, it means that he will deal my death. But he will do it by turning my own weapons against me.” He lifted his fringe so that the woman could see his lightning bolt scar. “Those are the lightning bolts. And the bloody rose around its tail—” He strained his memory for a moment. He knew the symbol was mentioned in Unfogging the Future, he could even see the page number that mentioned it, but his mind was as blank as the crystal ball for a moment while he struggled to remember.

“What?” the examiner asked.

“The bloody rose means something dangerous disguised as something sweet!” Harry was afraid that he shouted that last part, but he was vastly relieved to have remembered it. “Lord Voldemort will try to lure me into a trap that won’t look like a trap.”

“Remember this vision, Harry,” the woman said, her voice radiating importance. “It may be all that stands between you and You-Know-Who in the end.”

Harry bowed his head as if that had only now occurred to him. “Yes, ma’am.”

He grinned as her quill scratched wildly. If that’s not at least an E, I’ll eat my hand.

“I appreciate this, Luna,” said Harry, handing the final text of the article to her.

“You don’t need to thank me, Harry,” said Luna. She peered at the article for a moment as though she didn’t know what it meant, then nodded and accepted it. "You're kind to the walls, you know. You don't stomp on the floors the way some of the other students do when they're angry." Luna frowned absently. "I wish they would stop that. They don't know what memories they're putting into the castle." She focused on him again. "You're a good person, Harry."

Harry knew he blushed. "Thanks, Luna." He nodded at the article. "Do you know when it'll run in the Quibbler?"

"Daddy ought to be able to print it in a few days or so." Luna gazed dreamily into the middle distance now. "I'm glad. I'll take a copy to everyone who wants it, including Professor Snape and the Headmistress." She shivered. "Even though I don't like being in the Headmistress's office."

Harry indulged his curiosity. The article detailing his support for werewolves' rights in his own words was finally finished, and he didn't have another exam today. "Why not?"

"I went there to tell her it was Gilbert Rovenan who'd used the Entrail-Expelling Curse on you, because the furniture said so," said Luna. "And her office was unfriendly. I do not know if it was the window, or the door, or the fireplace, or the desk, or the moving staircase. But something in it hated the whole world."

Harry frowned. Odd as Luna's intuitions were, they seemed usually trustworthy. "Perhaps it was Dumbledore's influence," he muttered. "I'll tell the Headmistress, Luna, just in case it's a curse she's overlooked."

"It's something that hates the whole world," Luna repeated earnestly. "Tell her to look for that."

"I will." Harry waved farewell as he moved in the direction of McGonagall's office. It was a long way from Ravenclaw Tower to the dungeons anyway. He might as well take this one more short diversion. "Thanks again for printing the article!"

“Of course,” said Luna, with dead seriousness. “It’s right that you should be for werewolves’ rights. Werewolves are much less dangerous than Wrackspurts.”

Argh. No. Two times sixteen is not twenty-eight. Harry carefully erased the calculation that would have made his whole Arithmancy problem come out wrong.

He cast a brief glance at the other students in the room, all bent over their own exams. Most of them looked like he felt, half-hysterical with weariness. They’d spent days frantically revising for this exam; out of the subjects studied at Hogwarts, only Ancient Runes was commonly regarded as harder than Arithmancy. Well, Harry supposed Potions was harder for most students, but only because of Snape, and only because they didn’t concentrate.

Hermione, of course, was the sole exception to the frantic scribbling of her classmates. Harry didn’t think she’d erased once, and her face shone as she wrote careful number after careful number. Harry shook his head. Connor had told him horror stories about Hermione and the “study parties” she’d organized for the rest of Gryffindor Tower. They would be all glad when the OWLs were done with and Hermione couldn’t badger the rest of them to study anymore.

I wonder if Connor realizes that next year she’ll organize study parties around the idea of getting ahead on the NEWTs? Harry thought in amusement, and turned back to his exam, mind rested for the small bout of thinking about other things.

Harry had just sat down at the Slytherin table for breakfast—he’d come from wishing Connor good luck in the Gryffindor-Ravenclaw Quidditch game, which was today—when the post owl landed on his arm. Harry took its weight with a gasp. It was a great horned owl, and far heavier even than Hedwig. It arranged its feathers with a few quick preens, and extended its leg insistently to him, reminding Harry for a moment of the king cobra he’d released in the Forbidden Forest.

The parchment of the letter bore the seal of Griffinsnest. Harry blinked. He hadn’t expected an answer from Gloriana so quickly. He wondered if it was good news as he persuaded the owl to hop to his shoulder and opened the letter.

June 1st, 1996

Dear Harry:

I understand your plan to struggle for werewolves' rights. Though I cannot but think there will be more attacks, more bloodshed, and more victims cursed with lycanthropy before all is done, I would be remiss if I did not lend you information that may help you in fighting Loki's pack. Here is what I know about what I call 'accepted' werewolves:

-All accepted werewolves have spent time in the company of other accepted werewolves. Children bitten young, cast out of their homes, and taken in by a pack are the most common candidates for this position. Sometimes it happens with an adult who goes seeking the company of her 'own kind.' Werewolves who do not regularly associate with other cursed individuals do not develop this willingness to embrace the curse.

-Accepted werewolves demonstrate a greater strength and fluidity of body than any wizard. They can walk more silently, curl up in smaller places without claustrophobia, and endure greater extremes of heat and cold. You will know already about their enhanced senses, which are part of the burden of the curse for any werewolf.

-Accepted werewolves often take mates. Despite the many silly legends human wizards have about this—you would not believe how many I had to sort through when I was researching lycanthropy—this means little more than intense monogamy in practice. I have encountered no mated couple who had children of their own, unless the woman had borne them before taking the bite. Unborn children cannot survive the violent monthly transformations of a female werewolf. For this reason, accepted werewolves sometimes bite those of their female enemies they wish to condemn to childlessness.

-Accepted werewolves form pack structures that they claim imitate packs among natural wolves. Do not be fooled by this. A wolf alpha can be replaced when his strength fails, or when a cleverer subordinate defeats him in a dominance fight. The alpha of a werewolf pack typically cannot. His position is a combination of charisma, magical strength, and what I call “fascination.” The magic of other accepted werewolves focuses on him and binds with his. They will not challenge him unless his magical strength is somehow drained. However, killing him beheads the pack, and usually forces it to break apart.

-Pack magic has the following effects: very powerful layered spells, as the werewolves’ magic combines, most often used to shield their presence from their prey; prevention of Apparition by ordinary wizards; increasing the strength of individuals, so that they may be able to smash through stone and steel; focusing the ‘packmind,’ so that the werewolves act and react as their leader does.

-I have been unable to learn as much as I would like about pack culture; they keep it secret, and usually live in places a witch like myself has no access to. I have learned that it is largely communal, dedicated to opening the wizarding world up to the Muggle one—the philosophy being that their own packs show that wizards and Muggles can live in harmony—and deeply invested in vengeance. They will punish those they see as acting against them, the murderers of their mates, and so on. The custom about which I know the most, for obvious reasons, is the Grand Hunt to prove the superiority of werewolves. This involves competing pairs, sometimes mates but usually not, choosing intentionally difficult targets on the night of the full moon. Mostly, these contests are to the death, with the werewolf who causes the most damage and gets away winning. Occasionally, if the victim survives but is infected, the contest moves to persuading the victim to become an accepted werewolf.

I trust I have given you enough to be going on with, vates. Please let me know if you need any more information.

Yours in the Light,

Gloriana Griffinsnest.

“Pleased?” Draco asked, leaning over his shoulder to see the letter.

“And why shouldn’t I be?” Harry responded, passing the letter to him so that he could actually eat his breakfast while Draco read it. “There were no new victims bitten last night, which probably means Loki is keeping his word about their target for this having been Melissa Rosewood, and I have a lot of new information on werewolves.” He smiled, and knew it wasn’t a pleasant smile.

All his research on werewolves so far indicated that the curse was a web—a violent, self-aware, Dark web that lived to torture its hosts, and had probably been invented by a cruel Dark wizard. It was one thing if a werewolf did manage to accept that and live with it, Harry supposed, though before Loki he had known only Fenrir Greyback as an example of a werewolf who had. But spreading that web to unwilling people was not on, and the moment Loki had chosen to do it, he had set himself up as Harry’s enemy, just as a wizard who was trying to weave a new web to confine the centaurs or goblins would have. Harry was not vates if he stood aside and let Loki get away with something like that.

I’ll save him and condemn him both at once, he reflected, as he drank his pumpkin juice. Help his people get rights, because that’s the right thing to do. But then make sure he loses the ability to spread the web to anyone who doesn’t want it. A stint in Tullianum ought to do nicely. Harry carefully repotted the honking daffodil, and then stepped away from the pot and looked at the proctor. She gave him a nod, indicating that his Herbology OWL was done, and he could go.

Harry let out an explosive breath as he walked outside. He kept going until he was standing by the lake, and could sit down, lean against a convenient boulder, and close his eyes. So that’s done, then. It really should have been done yesterday, but for some reason, there’d been some emergency in the headquarters of the Wizarding Examinations Authority—a mix-up with Portkeys, Harry thought he remembered hearing—and they hadn’t been able to come to Hogwarts until Saturday.

“Harry! What are you doing out here?”

“Relaxing after my Herbology OWL,” said Harry, opening his eyes and peering up curiously at Draco as he hurried towards him. “What does it look like?”

“You need to be getting ready to go to Diagon Alley,” Draco snapped, hauling him to his feet. “Or did you forget that the festival to celebrate my confirmation as Malfoy magical heir is tomorrow? We still need to get you proper robes, Harry, and my mother refused to take us shopping until the OWLs were done with.”

Harry swallowed. “All—all right, then.”

Draco caught his nervousness, and smirked. “Honestly, Harry,” he said, steering him rapidly towards the edge of the grounds. “It’s not going to be as hard as revising, I promise.”

That depends on your perspective, Harry reflected, and prepared himself to face the exposure of his own absolute lack of understanding about which dress robes looked good and which didn’t.

Interlude: Prince of Cats

June 1st, 1996

Dear Harry:

I wanted you to know that I am committed to your cause. Fully, deeply, absolutely. I will not act against your principles, because they are mine as well. My uncle tended to think that ends justify the means—or, at least, that the ends of Light wizards justified their means. I will never make that mistake.

You have taught me more than you'll ever know. When you met me, I was little more than a disaffected rebel from everything my uncle taught me and believed in. Oh, I had reasons for my rebellion—I thought. But if someone had sat me down and forced me to look at those reasons, I would have found little more than childish sulking. You were the one who taught me to bring the grains of truth under that sulking to light.

I slowly came to realize, gazing at my uncle and my brother and pondering the reasons why they would not swear you allegiance as unconditionally as I did, that I despised them, and not just for their treatment of me. All they could do was look backwards. My uncle often spoke as if my mother were still alive. He valued her memory more than he valued his living nephews, unless those nephews complied in every respect with what he expected of Alba's sons, not themselves. And Pharos adapted himself to what my uncle thought he should be. Every bit of his own independence, his own spark, was crushed out of him long ago. That is the reason the Starrise family is faltering now, and why the power among the northern Light families has passed to Gloryflower. He is Alba's son still, not Augustus's heir, and certainly not a leader in his own right.

But I have looked at my own principles, and now I believe in what you say because it makes sense to me, not because it will annoy my brother. My uncle had doomed himself, according to those principles. The past needs to be seen in balance with the present and the future. The dead cannot control or compel the living unless the living allow them to do so. Behavior restricting the free will of others is repugnant because it acts, ultimately, against the free will of all. And the Light is wider than the narrow, inflexible image my uncle created of it.

I say to you now: Thank you for bringing me home. Thank you for showing me that I was not wrong in Declaring myself for the Light. And thank you for giving me a real reason to despise those who live like Augustus Starrise.

It is partly out of gratitude that I will bring the linchpin to you, but far, far more because it is a continuation of those principles we both share.

Yours in the Light,

Tybalt Starrise.

Chapter Eighty-Five: Draco's Debut

Harry closed his eyes and tried not to feel ridiculous. It was no use, though. He could feel the blush mounting up through his cheeks and his ears, mantling his face. He must have been more embarrassed at some point in his life, but he couldn't remember it.

"Could you make her hurry up?" he hissed out of the corner of his mouth at Draco.

"You can't hurry an artist, Harry," said Narcissa. Her voice was gentle, not as amused as Harry would have expected, and rather abstracted. A moment later, Harry heard the slight flick of her hands as she told the deaf robe-maker exactly what she wanted.

Harry let his eyes open up a slit. He stood on a raised stool in the middle of a shop he hadn't known existed, called Deianira's, which Harry considered a rather gruesome joke. The old witch who had met them was not Deianira herself—maybe they had named the shop after the legend and not a witch—but Ariadne Kaliadnos. Narcissa had treated her with great respect, spoken to her in sign language, and apparently told her what kind and color of robes they wanted. Ariadne had stared at Harry from cold blue eyes, then put him on the stool and started the robe-fitting.

With plenty of long, sharp needles and pins to help her, which poked Harry when he shifted too much. If she used magic to aid her, Harry couldn't sense it. That was probably what Narcissa meant by "artistry."

Harry turned his head slowly from side to side, easing his cramped neck, and looked around the shop; he hadn't got much of a look when they came in. The walls were covered with such thick draperies of cloth that Harry couldn't see what material they were made from. Robes of red and green and blue and a truly disgusting yellow hung in half-finished states on statues. The windows were small and dim. Harry supposed the view on Knockturn Alley wasn't anything to brag about, but he would have preferred some light.

He shifted his weight from one leg to the other, because he couldn't help himself, and Ariadne poked him with a pin. Harry yelped and glared down at her. She glared back at him, and returned to stitching on the hem of the robe. The robes were dark green. Draco insisted they made him look smashing. Harry didn't know about that. He didn't really care anymore. He had envisioned a boring journey through several shops in search of formal robes, too, but he had at least thought there would be movement. Based on his treatment so far in Deianira's, it didn't seem so.

Ariadne somehow flashed a message at Narcissa out of the mass of pins and needles and measuring appliances and Merlin knew what else that she held. Narcissa responded, and Ariadne let out a little grunt of satisfaction before going back to her stitching. Harry turned his glare on Narcissa.

"What did you tell her?" he demanded. "And why do you know that sign language anyway?"

"Oh, it's not really a sign language," said Narcissa absently, watching Ariadne stitch the new symbols with a small smile of satisfaction. "Not the kind the necromancers use, at least, and with nowhere near the complexity. It's merely a set of signals for agreed-upon words that come up in Madam Kaliadnos's work. As for how I know it, all the regular patrons of Deianira's have to learn it. Madam Kaliadnos insists on it. Those who won't learn it are obviously unfit for her services in any case."

Harry lapsed back into a grumpy silence. "You didn't answer my first question," he ventured a bit later.

Narcissa gave him a sharp-edged smile. "No, I didn't, did I?" she said. "All is well, Harry. I merely told her that she could put on symbols identifying you as the Black heir. After all, you are now, and one might even consider you the Black, since Regulus has—left." Narcissa did take care to delicately shade her conversation since they'd arrived in Knockturn Alley, Harry noticed. "They'll make the robes look impressive to the quality of Dark purebloods we're getting at Draco's festival."

“Not very intelligent ones, then?” Harry muttered.

“Harry,” said Narcissa, and her face was so serious that he blinked. “I will not have you ruining Draco’s festival,” she whispered, leaning nearer to him now. “I do not think there is a very great chance of that, but it may come about by accident. Understand that the people who will attend this festival value symbols and designs and gestures very highly, whether or not you do. And the festival to welcome a magical heir is a formal occasion. You will impress them to the degree that you remember that.”

Harry sighed and cast his eyes down. The bad things about getting joined to a pureblood Dark heir, he thought in resignation. “Yes, Mrs. Malfoy.”

Narcissa touched his hair for a moment. “In most things, I think you’ll do just fine,” she murmured. “But you really have been ignoring important gestures, Harry, or you have allowed your allies to make them for you. The appearance of the centaurs and the dragon at the alliance meeting, for example. Remember the value of symbols. They can contrive to make people accept things that otherwise they would reject out of hand.”

Harry cast a glance at Draco, who was leaning against a far shelf filled with bolts of cloth and watching him with an intent expression. He didn’t like as though he worried about what kind of impression Harry would make at the festival, or how much of a prat he looked standing there trying to avoid the jabs of Madam Kaliadnos’s pins. He just looked—happy, and as though he appreciated the dark green robes.

I can do this for him, Harry thought. After all, he pretends most of the time that he’s a perfectly forward-thinking embracer of Muggleborns, and that he isn’t afraid of centaurs or venomous snakes any more.

He straightened his back, flinched as another pin poked him, and decided to put on the best show he could—for Draco’s sake.

Draco would have thought he would always know Malfoy Manor. After all, he hadn’t only lived there most of his life; his father had taught him history in its rooms, had told him stories of where various ancestors had slept or bedded their partners or fought heroic battles against Mudblood invaders, had shown him artifacts that were connected intimately to the places that housed them, and had taught him early on the purposes of certain rooms—to remove glamours, for example.

But now he didn't recognize it. He stood in the doorway and stared at the great hall where his parents had arranged to hold the confirmation of his ascending to Malfoy magical heir, and his mind traced no familiar walls, saw no familiar doors, didn't remember the places where his father had walked with Draco just beside him, or his mother had walked with Draco in her arms.

The walls had vanished behind elaborate glamours that linked to the skies outside, but were themselves more perfect shades of dark blue than the sky would ever show, speckled with small imagined planets. The constellation Draco had taken the place of the ceiling, with silver lines of light connecting the stars for their slower guests who might not understand its purpose. Now and then, loud cries sounded from the walls of air, as though real dragons roamed just out of sight.

The tables themselves were creations of light and silver and stone; Draco didn't know what on them was real and what wasn't. His father had had the time to specially commission them, that was sure. The blue-gray cloths that covered them provided a subtle transition from the dark blue walls. Draco was sure that that was deliberate.

House elves would fill the room, bringing food and wine to anyone who required it, but glamours kept them out of sight, Narcissa had told him, so that the food would simply appear, as it did at Hogwarts. Subtle spells would insure that the guests avoided saying certain words that might disrupt the atmosphere, urging them towards the expression of others. But spells under that would encourage everyone's rational thinking, no matter how much wine they swallowed. Discussion of politics and business, certain to happen, would require it.

Draco had grown up knowing what it meant to be pureblood, but he had never experienced the equivalent of the rarified, distilled environment that surrounded him now. It made him a little heady.

And he would be bringing a halfblood joined partner into the middle of all of this.

Draco shook his head, and felt a faint smile curve his mouth. This wasn't the first time something like this had been done. After all, halfbloods were more acceptable than Mudbloods, if only just, and Harry's magical power was unquestioned. Most of their guests would consider that Draco had done well for himself when they felt Harry's strength. And the ring, and Harry's presence at the festival at all, would proclaim that his partner didn't find gatherings like this uncomfortable. Powerful halfbloods with some sense of polish were best of all.

The things that might go wrong were still endless, but Draco thrust the thought of them away. Harry had one of the finest senses of personal empathy he'd ever seen, and an overwhelming presence, when Draco could persuade him to exercise it. He would do well enough at this gathering.

And anyone who might try to insult him would either find his mouth blocked by one of the Malfoy spells watching for insults to the family, or mark himself in an instant as unfit for a gathering of this caliber.

Draco turned abruptly and made his way to the doors, where the first guests would be arriving. Part of his duties as Malfoy magical heir at this festival included acting as a competent host. You're an adult, his parents' every gesture towards him today had said. Let us see you act like it.

You will, Draco promised, and opened the front doors of the Manor. Harry yanked fretfully at the collar of his formal robes.

"You'll wrinkle them," said Draco calmly from his right side. "Stop. They look fine."

"They don't," Harry hissed. He was convinced that the formal robes were too long, since they swished around his ankles with more thickness and more insistence than his normal school robes. Besides, the collar was too high, and the dark green color made him look as if he were walking around in a pine tree, and the silver symbols stitched along the hem and cuffs...Merlin knew what they said, but Harry was rather afraid they reflected more disturbing things about him than his merely being the Black heir.

"They do." Draco reached out and captured his chin, forcing Harry to look at him. His own face had that serene expression Harry remembered from Walpurgis Night. "Really, Harry. You're going to stun them, even the ones who know you. And no, I'm not saying that only because I love you." He gave Harry a little smile and held out his arm. "Ready? It's almost sunset."

Harry sighed and settled his hand on Draco's arm in the position they'd practiced, to send all the right signals to the room. They had to enter the hall, and thus officially begin the festival, at the moment of sunset, since Draco had been born then. Even though it wasn't the fifth of June, but the second, Narcissa had been insistent that they observe the protocols.

"Happy birthday, by the way," Harry muttered to him from the corner of his mouth.

Draco's face lost its calmness. "What did you make me?" he asked Harry eagerly.

Harry laughed at him. "It's not actually your birthday yet, remember? You can't have your gift until the fifth."

"You should make me one anyway," said Draco.

"I'm giving you one right now," said Harry. "Appearing at this festival with you is my gift for the day."

Draco opened his mouth to argue, but just then, the doors of the hall swung open, the cue for their entrance. Draco's head lifted in a moment, and he adopted yet another serene expression. Harry wondered if he had a closetful of them, and entertained himself for a moment with the image of Draco taking calm masks off hooks and deciding which one he liked best.

“Here we come,” Draco murmured, and Harry tugged himself back from his thoughts in enough time to walk exactly beside Draco as they entered the room, and not trip over the hem of the stupid dress robes.

Harry hadn’t seen the hall before. He hadn’t realized how much the Malfoys had sculpted it to look like sunset inside. He controlled his urge to gape, putting in place the mask Lily had taught him for formal occasions like this—mildly appreciative, but deeply unimpressed—and turned to follow Draco across the front of the room to the table that stood at the far right wall.

Light spells glittered and flashed off his ring. Harry heard more than one murmur. He didn’t try to make them out. Anyone who didn’t realize he was doing a joining ritual with Draco by now was a nutter. More likely, they were trying to figure out the significance of the ring as a joining gift, or telling each other about the symbolism of the jacinth.

Draco reached the table, and the part Harry really hated started. Luckily, it was short. Draco turned to face his guests across the tabletop, his back nearly against the sunset-glamoured wall, and Harry had to stand beside him. He had to look out across faces staring at him with various politely-bred expressions of curiosity, interest, and disdain, especially from those who hadn’t met him before.

And he had to listen to Draco praise him like he was some bloody Lord.

“Welcome to the festival confirming me as the Malfoy magical heir,” said Draco, in a smooth, deep voice, which Harry suspected he’d adopted from his father. Harry preferred the way he normally sounded. “My name is Draco Malfoy, and in all matters tonight I mean to fully deserve the name. My father is Lucius Malfoy. My mother is Narcissa Black Malfoy. My blood runs with starlight and with power, and I embrace all that means. Welcome.” He dipped his head, and waited until everyone had finished bowing back.

Then he started in on Harry. “By my side stands my to-be-joined partner, Harry, once called Potter, once son of James Potter and Lily Evans Potter.” The response was a susurrus rather than ordinary whispering, but Harry could hear it. He’d expected it, after the announcement of his Muggleborn mother’s name. He restrained the childish temptation to yell the name back in their faces, and also to point out, helpfully, that two of the most powerful wizards he knew, Voldemort and Snape, were halfbloods. “Now called vates, a Lord-level wizard, the Boy-Who-Lived, friend of centaurs and defeater of Dumbledore.”

Harry bowed his head. Most people bowed back. A few stared arrogantly at him, with a stiffness to their necks that said they didn’t see the point of acknowledging him. Harry narrowed his eyes.

It’s childish, perhaps, but Draco did say that a lack of respect conceived in a place like this can follow me for the rest of the joining ritual.

He lowered one of the barriers on his power, and pure magic flooded the room, especially noticeable because so many of the spells on the walls and floor and house elves were subtle. Some of the wizards still staring at him as if he were something the Kneazle had dragged in widened their eyes most satisfactorily. Harry restored the shield a moment later, and sat down in his place, as he was supposed to do.

He picked up his wineglass, and in the next second it was full of shining dark liquid, courtesy of the disguised and incredibly coordinated house elves. Harry restrained the impulse to roll his eyes, and waited for Draco’s toast.

Draco spoke the words perfectly, of course, holding his glass high, and in that moment, he looked as Malfoy as Harry had ever seen him—and as flawless.

“To the future,” Draco said clearly. “To the power of magic spreading and flourishing in bloodline after bloodline, in magical heir after magical heir. To the preservation of our world.” Harry tensed in interest at what was coming next. Each magical heir got to choose the last line of the toast, Draco had told him, and it was often the first way he or she made a mark on the adult world.

Draco darted a quick glance at Harry, and then he smiled.

“To freedom,” he said, “and to will.” Then he lifted the wineglass to his lips, and all around the room, people followed suit.

Draco sat back down, well-aware of the half-astonished, half-wary look Harry had worn from the moment of the toast. He didn’t care. What mattered was that he’d made it, and declared himself in a way that even making his Declaration to the Dark right now wouldn’t have allowed him to do. He smiled at Harry and looked down at his plate, which was covered with the first course, a delicately seasoned pie of venison. Draco’s mouth watered for a moment

Then he cut off a precise piece and held it out to Harry on the end of his fork. Harry’s astonished look deepened, and then his eyes hardened. He and Draco had discussed the idea of feeding each other, and decided they wouldn’t do it.

What are you doing? he was asking now.

Draco cocked his head. He was better at reading the mood in the room than Harry was. He’d sensed more hostility than he wanted the moment they stepped inside the hall. Yes, it was idiocy, but there were some wizards here who would still see Harry’s blood status as the most important thing about him; even that pulse of magic would only convince them that the Malfoys had somehow found a way to harness a dragon, not that the dragon could think for himself. Draco needed to send an undeniable signal that he held his future joined partner in high regard.

That the way to do that was to follow convention to the letter, instead of rebelling, was something he knew Harry would have a hard time understanding, and he had no time to explain. He held out the piece of pie and waited.

Harry glared one more time and opened his mouth. Draco placed the bit of pie on his tongue and watched as he chewed and swallowed. Harry's eyes widened once, and he seemed about to choke; obviously, the taste of venison didn't agree with him. But he was far too well-mannered to spit it out. He inclined his head in a small nod to Draco, and then turned to cut his own pie and return the favor.

Draco smiled and waited for the serving. Harry had cut a much larger piece, probably as vengeance. He certainly watched in disbelief as Draco ate it with relish. Draco didn't really know what Harry disliked so much about it. Yes, the flesh was a bit gamy, but that was part of its charm; it was one of the more flavorful pureblood dishes.

He fed Harry more of the pie, keeping one eye on their guests all the while. The hall was filled with tables facing the one where he and Harry sat, to display the magical heir—and his or her partner, of course—to the whole room. Draco caught many glances in their direction, especially from those wizards who hadn't met Harry before. They would also be evaluating him, though, so he kept his face cool and his posture perfectly straight.

He nodded to those who caught his eye, or at least would admit to catching his eye. A surprising number were of those families who hovered distant from the Malfoys, and were often their rivals for influence in the Ministry. Draco knew they were wondering if he was a worthy successor to Lucius. He answered them with a smile like blue light on winter snow. They would know that he was, or they would fall before him. He wasn't sure which outcome would please him more.

The house elves whisked away the pie long before Draco had tired of reading faces and, through them, minds, and brought the second course, diced and salted manticore tails. Draco picked up the first bit and offered it to Harry with his fingers before he could touch anything.

Harry didn't object this time, or even insert the slight pause that he had before accepting the venison pie. He leaned forward and took the offering with a lightness that had Draco struggling to hide a grin. Harry understood, then, that flirting was out of the question. They had to present a perfectly stoic façade for this part of the evening.

Later, when they danced, they could get rid of that, and Draco was going to enjoy doing so.

He caught Charles Rosier-Henlin's eye as he took a bit of the manticore tail from Harry in turn. The man was obviously fighting to repress a grin, but his twin sons, with him, looked unaccountably earnest. Draco narrowed his eyes the tiniest fraction. If they think they have a chance with either Harry or me, they can forget it. The Rosier-Henlin boys were handsome enough, pureblooded enough, and wealthy enough to qualify as acceptable partners for him if Harry hadn't existed, but Harry did, and there was no question of any other person, for either of them.

On the meal flowed, with the introduction of sweet bread and fish from the Mediterranean and wine-soup and delicately flavored fruit, and Harry played the game well, accepting food from Draco's fork or spoon or fingers as the moment dictated, offering his own food in return, and ignoring most of the stares he got. Actually, to think about it, Draco wasn't sure if that last was Harry playing the game or just not caring what anyone else thought of him.

The end of the meal would be a challenge, Draco knew, and he heard Harry hiss under his breath as it appeared on their plates. It was a small scoop of ice cream in a silver dish, or at least it had started out that way. Magic had wound dozens of flavors into it, and spun it with trails of pure sugary icing in so many colors that they blazed under the deep blue lights of the hall. Draco could feel his mouth water. The sweetness was exquisite, but it was so much trouble for even house elves to make that Draco had tasted it only a few times in his life.

Harry would need to use his spoon to feed it to Draco, and he would need to do it first—another consequence of his being a halfblood in a pureblood gathering, yielding the sweetest of the food to his host and the partner most purebloods would see as undeniably superior. They'd discussed this, but then put aside the idea when they'd decided they wouldn't be serving each other their food. Draco hoped desperately that Harry would remember it now.

He did, though his face was distant as he scooped up a part of his own ice cream on his spoon and held it out.

Draco smiled at him and took his wrist, an undeniable mark of favor, as he leaned in to swallow the dessert. It felt like twenty ice-cold fruits, none of them mingling with each other, exploding in his throat at once. He swallowed around melon and apple and orange and others he could barely recognize, and reached for his own spoon with a hand that didn't shake, no matter how much it wanted to. "Your turn," he said.

Harry's eyebrows twitched as if he wanted to roll his eyes, but he opened his mouth and waited obediently. Draco gently tipped the ice cream in, and waited, holding his breath, for the next and most challenging part of this—the one that would have been a challenge even if they hadn't started feeding each other. He knew Harry had never encountered something of this sweetness before, and he wasn't completely sure if the left-over remains of his childhood training wouldn't lead to an unfortunate accident.

Harry swallowed, and his eyes widened. There was one horrible moment when Draco thought he would surely spit the ice cream back out. But then his eyes closed and his head tilted to the side, and he uttered a soft sigh that made Draco think unfortunate thoughts about private rooms and lengths of time that guests could reasonably expect their hosts to be gone.

He looked at Draco in the next moment, and gave him a smile of pure sensual enjoyment.

"Thank you," he murmured.

Draco knew that more than one person would have heard that—the preparation his parents had done would permit certain listening spells on their table—and felt a surge of power. Adherence to formal gestures would help, but nothing could compare with the true and avid bliss on Harry's face, or the way his eyes shone as he looked at Draco.

If this doesn't convince them that he's in love with me, nothing will, Draco thought, and leaned forward to take his next swallow of ice cream.

Harry could still taste sweetness tingling in his mouth when the meal was done. He almost wanted to ask for more of the ice cream, even though he knew it was a special sweet that the Malfoy house elves had worked hard to prepare. He even felt vaguely guilty at the thought that he'd enjoyed it so much when house elves had been the ones to labor to make it.

But he hadn't known any food could taste that good. For the first time, Harry was willing to believe Vera when she said that other people found sweet tastes a temptation, and thought it might be a good thing to overcome the training that had taught him to ignore chocolate.

Draco rose to his feet when the ice cream vanished, and inclined his head. "After the welcome and the food," he said quietly, "the presentation of gifts is in order, for those who wish to make them."

Harry sat on his own anxiety. As Draco had told him, this was the most vulnerable place in the festival. If no one had bothered to bring a gift, then the magical heir would look foolish standing in front of the room and awaiting something that never came.

Draco didn't look foolish, though. He looked utterly composed, as though never doubting that someone would have decided to bring him offerings.

And, of course, someone had. Harry turned his head at a glimpse of movement, and saw Hawthorn Parkinson advancing calmly up the aisles between the tables, clad in dark formal robes that emphasized her pallor and her blonde hair. Her neck flashed with an ornament Harry hadn't seen before, a medallion depicting a rose wound with thorns. It was probably a hereditary Parkinson piece.

Harry was occupied enough in studying it that he didn't realize the more significant fact about it for a long moment. It was made of silver, and Hawthorn wore it next to her bare skin with nary a flinch.

He looked, startled, into her eyes as she laid the small wooden box she carried down before Draco and bowed her head. Hawthorn looked back at him. Her gaze was as simple and direct as a shout.

Harry had written her about Remus, and about Loki's politics, not sure how she would respond. The medallion was her answer. She was a pureblood witch, first and foremost. She would not let even a werewolf's vulnerability to silver—and the pain the silver ornament had to be causing her—define her otherwise.

Harry blinked away any unfortunate emotions that might have crossed his face, and turned back to see Draco opening the box. His gasp was loud and heartfelt, but as he held up the gift, Harry couldn't see why. It looked like a ring, made of gold, set with a tiny sapphire—valuable, of course, but nothing more.

Then Draco looked at Hawthorn and said, "Thank you. The generosity of Parkinson in sharing its magic with us shall not be forgotten."

The murmur picked up in the hall again, running from person to person, and Hawthorn inclined her head, a tiny smile tugging at the corners of her mouth. "The generosity of Malfoys to their friends is well-known," she said. "I thought it worthwhile to answer a virtue with a virtue."

She turned and swept back to her seat, where Pansy waited in silence beside her chair. Harry found his eyes turning back to the ring, in disbelief.

Hawthorn had pulled out a piece of her own magic, solidified it, and given it to Draco. Or, rather, she had gone to a specialist in Knockturn Alley who could do it for her. That magic was permanently gone from her, weakening her, and would come to Draco's aid whenever he decided to dissolve the jewel and summon it.

Harry remembered what Adalrico Bulstrode had told him when he yielded up his own magic to keep Elfrida a witch. Dark purebloods valued magical strength more than anything, in the end (despite the resistance some people in the hall seemed to be having to the idea of his own power). To yield it, to sacrifice it, was something that most Dark wizards would do only for magical heirs, and even then not until their deaths. Hawthorn's gift was royal, and almost certainly no one here tonight was going to match it.

Draco slid the ring onto one finger, admiring it, and then waited again in the tense silence that followed. Harry wondered idly if anyone else would dare advance. Weren't they afraid of being embarrassed in contrast with Parkinson?

Adalrico Bulstrode did advance at last, though, with Millicent close at his side, as his magical heir. He limped, but he didn't let the limp slow him; rather, his whole body had adjusted to a dignity Harry didn't remember from the last time he'd seen him, so that he looked as if the limp were an old war wound, or badge of honor. He gave Draco a stately bow as he extended a dagger with a black stone in the hilt.

"For the Malfoy magical heir, on the eve of his confirmation," he said. Harry thought he sounded a bit like a card. "The blade was forged by my ancestors for use in the goblin rebellions, and the stone comes from the walls of our estate. We call him Sigurd, in memory of a hero who struck true more often than that. This blade shall always strike true, for you."

"My thanks," said Draco softly, taking the dagger up in one hand and turning it around. "It is a beautiful and marvelous weapon. The nobility of Bulstrode shall no more be forgotten than the generosity of Parkinson."

It was a wording that would insult nobody, Harry thought; Draco was being careful. Everyone in the room would still know that Hawthorn's gift, as the greater treasure, was the more valuable, but the wording permitted Adalrico to retire with his dignity and a smile.

Draco slipped the dagger into his robe pockets and resumed the motionless statue posture. Harry looked around for the next flicker of movement and was startled to see Arabella Zabini standing and moving among the tables. Granted, she had been invited and had the right to present a gift if she so desired, but Harry couldn't see her so desiring. She'd never seemed particularly friendly with Lucius or Narcissa, and Blaise's distance from Draco in school was another argument for that stance.

She carried a set of bells in her hands, and she laid them down on the table in front of Draco. Harry leaned forward to see them better. They appeared to be carved of crystal, from the way they shone and tinkled—but it was blue crystal, and their ringing trembled in Harry's ears as if it were a sound far away, like the sea roaring in a seashell.

"For the Malfoy magical heir," Arabella said, taking a step back and smiling, a sudden flash of white teeth in her beautiful dark face. "Rather than a weapon of war, a gift of dreams and mystery. Ring them, young sir, and only the music knows what dreams may come."

So that explains her giving him a gift, Harry thought, more comfortable now that he knew the bells' purpose. A challenge, a test. I wouldn't want to see what happens, necessarily, when he rings those bells.

Draco picked them up without hesitating, however, untwined the delicate silver chain on which they hung, and gave them a shake. Harry gasped at the sound of their music. Fawkes's singing barely rivaled it.

The room quivered around them and went giddy, and Harry caught a glimpse of distant mountains. It retreated in moments, however, and left Draco smiling and dipping his head to Arabella.

"Thank you," he said. "When the test comes, I shall remember that Zabini gave a gift of dreams and mystery."

That was nicely ambiguous enough that Arabella didn't look entirely satisfied as she went back to her seat. Harry restrained the impulse to shake his head in amusement. Did she think Draco would be an easier target than his parents, or was she counting on him not shaking the bells at all?

Charles Rosier-Henlin and his twin sons, Owen and Michael, were next. Harry studied their faces in unabashed curiosity as they walked up to the table. He thought he could see shadows in their eyes from their ordeal in Durmstrang, but they didn't seem incapable of smiling, only constrained from it by the solemnity of what they were doing. He relaxed a bit.

Charles nodded to Draco, but said, "The old tradition of festivals for a magical heir allowed guests to present gifts to his future joined partner or spouse as well as directly to him. Do you accept this tradition, Mr. Malfoy?"

Draco didn't act caught at all off-guard, though Harry stared. "I could hardly deny the validity of it," said Draco, "when I have been accepting gifts from my future partner all night—most simply, the gift of his presence. By all means. I would like to see what you have for Harry." He stepped slightly out of the way, to represent that this gift was not coming to him.

Harry stood, because Draco had. He could see no object in Charles's hands, though, and wondered what the gift was to be.

Charles stepped back, so Harry turned his attention to Owen and Michael. Owen—Harry thought it was Owen, from remembering the face of the boy Bellatrix had tortured in the Great Hall of Durmstrang—stood in front of his brother as he pulled out a dagger. Harry tensed in spite of himself.

"Harry, called vates, called the Boy-Who-Lived," said Owen in an exquisitely formal voice, "my brother and I owe you a life debt. At great peril, you came into Durmstrang and rescued us from the domination and torture of Bellatrix Lestrange. Innocence once lost can never be recovered, but lives preserved are worth future preservation, and all honor to the savior. I ask you now whether you have any wish to collect on this life debt, or whether you will turn it over to my brother and I, for payment as we wish." He lifted his dark eyes to Harry's face and waited.

Harry stifled a shiver. He knew Owen was at least a year older than he was, and possibly closer to two. It was slightly creepy to see him so submissive. But then, he was a pureblood in this moment more than he was an adolescent.

And he had asked Harry a question.

Harry let out a sharp breath and said, "You may fulfill the life debt as you will. I will not call on it or constrain you in any way."

Owen nodded, and drew back the sleeve on his left forearm. Michael was mimicking him. He turned to place his forearm over his brother's, so that when Owen slashed with the knife, he cut both of them at once.

"Then we pledge our loyalty to you," said Owen, voice proud and unflinching despite the blood that flowed from his arm, "as the Broken Guard did, as the Order of the Serpent did, as the Ladies of Walpurgis did. As guards, as courtiers, as couriers, as running hounds, as whatever you need us to be, then we are yours, for the saving of our lives and our sanity." He had cut a pattern that Harry couldn't entirely make out under the blood, but which looked like a lightning bolt.

Harry caught his panic and threw it back in a cage. He reminded himself that Voldemort had marked his Death Eaters on the left forearm because of a long tradition of Lords marking their companions that way, and the custom hadn't been unique to him.

And those ancient Lords and Ladies worth anything had treated their companions as companions—not the mindless minions Voldemort expected his Death Eaters to be, nor the mindless fanatics the Order of the Phoenix had turned into.

Owen and Michael chose to do this. Draco's long-ago words about not turning away or denying the free will of those who chose to follow him—and serve him, disgusting as the word was—echoed in Harry's mind.

He lifted his eyes and fastened them on Owen's face, which was silent and waiting and a bit apprehensive, despite everything. He would know that Harry might at least consider flinging the gift back in their faces.

Harry said quietly, "The pledge is accepted, and to you I return guarantees of protection, loyalty, and constancy. While I live, you shall never lack for a guardian, a champion, or a friend."

They weren't any old and ancient oath, because most of those promised more than Harry was willing to deliver; most of those were only used by Lords. They were words that Harry had decided on, and they eased the tightness in both Owen's and Michael's faces. Both swept bows as one.

"An honor to be beside you, Harry," said Owen, and looked down with a faint smile. "And the oath is true." Harry followed his gaze and saw that the wounds had already healed. The scars did look like lightning bolts. To his immense relief, they were only white, not any ridiculous combination of colors.

Owen and Michael, along with Charles, returned to their seats, and Draco stood. "I think the dancing can begin, now that the ritual of gifts has ended so satisfactorily," he murmured. "Amoveo mensas!"

And the tables vanished easily, the magic worked into the room responding to Draco as Malfoy magical heir, and it was time for the dancing, and now Harry had the chance to be incredibly terrified.

Draco waited calmly for his guests to get out of the way; the tables vanishing had caught them partly by surprise, though the truly alert had known what was coming when he announced the dancing and were ready to move. The chairs remained, however, so as not to place anyone suddenly on the floor. This part was about testing the alertness of the guests, not humiliating them.

Draco murmured the charm that removed the chairs, and then turned and extended his hand to Harry. Harry took it with a grimace that Draco doubted anyone else would notice, since no one else was standing as close; the skin around his eyes tightened, and his teeth briefly showed in a tiny hiss.

"You have nothing worry about," Draco whispered as they moved out into the middle of the room. Music began to play, the soft sound of harps and flutes also disguised under glamours and charmed to start the moment someone walked into the area formerly occupied by the tables. "I know you can dance. I watched you at the Yule Ball last year, remember, and I was horribly jealous of Loony all the while."

Harry didn't even smile. His hand squirmed in Draco's as if he wanted to tug at the collar of his robes again. "I wasn't wearing robes like these," he whispered. "I'll trip over the hem."

"No, you won't," Draco said, encouragingly, and began the first steps of the dance. They'd practiced this, but only in school robes. Harry began to grudgingly move in the constraints of the formal robes he was so worried about. He'd smoothed his scowl into composure by the time other people could start to take notice, to Draco's relief.

"I'm not comfortable here," Harry murmured, hardly moving his lips. "I'm not used to this, and I don't think I should have let Owen and Michael swear loyalty to me, and half the room still thinks my blood status is good enough reason to despise me."

"Half the room?" Draco released Harry's hand long enough to do a turn on his own, then caught it again. They'd had to choose the dance carefully, so as not to require Harry to make moves that were impossible with his lack of a left hand. "Not nearly that many of them, Harry. It's true that some of them might think you're a dragon on a leash right now, but they felt the purity of your power. They'll change their minds soon enough. Like you said, anyone who underestimates you deserves what it will cost him."

Harry just stared back at him, eyes, if not face, expressing his discomfort. Draco frowned. I honestly didn't think this would bother him so much. Why would it? He usually handles gift-giving ceremonies with ease. He handled all the talking at the alliance meeting even more easily. And he went to the Yule Ball and danced with Luna just because she asked, not to prove a point. Why are those same things hard on him now?

As he relaxed into the rhythm of the dance, Draco could let his eyes and mind rove, and study the way people watched Harry. He saw a great many tight-lipped glances and slight headshakes. There were also plenty of spectators who were taking advantage of the music to speak their true feelings, as Draco and Harry had, and it seemed as if there was violent disagreement in many couples. And Draco also noted how many eyes went to Harry, instead of him, though traditionally this was a festival to show off the magical heir of the family, and not his joined partner.

He looked back at Harry, and saw that he moved with his shoulders hunched and his head only half-lifted, as if he expected someone to call out every moment that he had performed a step wrong. He was obviously not returning the gazes by a great effort, rather than being naturally and effortlessly focused on his partner. He didn't make mistakes in the dancing, but it was mechanical.

Draco blinked as the truth hit him. He really does feel out of place here. It's as simple as that, and as complex. There's nothing anyone can do to dislodge me from pureblood society. I'll always have my heritage, and the Malfoy name has gone through crises before, but it's always commanded respect.

Harry doesn't have that guarantee. The Potters command no respect here. And the taint of his mother is everywhere on him. The people watching him take any defensiveness as a sign that he knows he's not supposed to be here, and any ease as a sign that he's boorish and doesn't appreciate the finer subtleties of pureblood culture. He can't win no matter what he does. His halfblood status always will matter to them, even if his magical power comes to matter more.

Draco was glad that the music allowed he and Harry to dance far apart from each other then, even with their backs to each other for a brief moment, because he wanted to hide his face as the realization struck him.

That's why Harry hates those pureblood prejudices. They affect him, too. He knows everyone here thinks of him as the child of a Mudblood, though he knows dozens of pureblood rituals most of them wouldn't even recognize, though he could be their Lord tomorrow if he wanted to Declare, though he's dedicated to the survival and protection of the wizarding world in a way that most of them will never find the courage for.

I can't hate them for the sake of some Mudbloods I'll never know, for the sake of some grand ideal in the abstract. I'm not that compassionate. But I can hate them because they make Harry uncomfortable.

The dance finished, and the guests politely applauded. Draco caught Harry's hand and turned, bowing to the multitude. Harry bowed along with him, face perfectly blank. Draco had thought before how well he controlled his emotions, always something Dark purebloods had valued. Now all he could do was compare that mask to the one Harry had worn in his first and second years at Hogwarts, when he had locked his emotions in a box.

He hated it now.

He turned and faced the room again, and he knew his stance had shifted; if nothing else, now he had one hand on Harry's shoulder, where he hadn't touched him before except for some requirement of the dance. Harry looked at him in mild confusion. Draco looked back at him, and tried to convey his defiance through his facial expression. Harry only blinked, so Draco leaned close enough to whisper into his ear.

"How dare they make you uncomfortable," he hissed.

Harry frowned. "You don't think it's my fault for being uncomfortable with the customs here?" he asked, once again barely moving his lips.

"They're being idiots," Draco said. "They claim to value magic more than anything, and they've just seen two children of a pureblood family become your companions, and they know that my parents approve of you. That should be enough for them, given all their supposedly accepted standards. And it's not. They're being hypocritical, and I don't know about you, but I don't want to struggle uphill through vast wastes of idiocy just to propitiate people who claim to value what we already have."

"What do you want to do, then?" Harry asked, looking befuddled, his eyes moving to several other faces in the room. Draco smiled slightly.

He knew he'd been whispering into Harry's ear for several moments, and that definitely went against the constraints of propriety at an event like this, which called for less intimacy between a couple still courting.

"Something that will show them Malfoys are, and always have been, above propitiating idiocy, even when it's traditional," Draco replied, and grasped Harry's chin to turn his face towards him.

Harry raised an eyebrow and tried to lean in, but Draco held him still. To mean what he wanted it to mean, this gesture had to come from him, or the skeptical guests would see it as just another uncivilized rudeness from That Halfblood.

He kissed Harry gently, thoroughly, with attention to detail, even more deeply than Harry had kissed him at the alliance meeting, and until he could hear several distinctly uncivilized gasps. Then he raised his head and turned to smile lazily at their guests.

"I am the Malfoy magical heir," he said. "Starlight and power run in my blood, and so does protective instinct. You might want to know that I do love Harry, that I intend to join with him, and that staring at him as if Voldemort had just appeared in your midst does nothing but make me angry."

Most of them turned away in confusion, or outright grinned—that was from the ones who knew him and Harry, including Hawthorn Parkinson and the Bulstrodes. Draco grinned back. The nice thing about suddenly breaking with custom, he thought happily, is that no one knows what to do with you when you do.

His father could certainly seize the moment, though, and he did, appearing from between the dancers to place his hand on Draco's shoulder. Draco tilted his head back to look at his father, and saw a faint, cold smile on Lucius's face.

"Truly," Lucius murmured, "an occasion such as this should be a joyous one, and a polite one. I am sorry that it could be neither for those who chose to stare. Our own—lack of discrimination in sending out invitations must be to blame."

Draco felt a sharp joy rising in his heart. His father wasn't furious with him for breaking from tradition; he was furious at the guests who refused to recognize what was right in front of them. And he was making sure and certain everyone understood that his family was allied with Harry, and planned to stay that way.

"The ceremony is officially over with the dancing, and Draco's second invocation," Lucius said then. "House elves will assist you to the Floo and outside the Manor's wards once you leave the hall, if you plan to Apparate."

Draco choked back laughter as he watched the undignified scramble that ensued. Not everyone left that way, of course; the people who had given gifts to him and Harry, and several others who could recognize reality when it was staring them in the face, bowed their heads, their eyes bright with amusement, and stayed to offer their thanks to Lucius and their congratulations to Draco and Harry. Owen and Michael Rosier-Henlin approached for a rather different reason.

"Where would you like us to stay?" Michael—Draco thought it was Michael, the one who hadn't spoken so far—asked Harry.

Harry looked at them and sighed. Then he said, "I'll be leaving Hogwarts near the end of June, most likely. Do you want to accompany me there, or not? I'm afraid it will be rather boring."

"It would be relaxing," said the other, Owen, dropping his voice. "We're quite recovered from Durmstrang, thanks, but our parents aren't ready to believe it yet."

Harry wore a brief wistful expression before he nodded. "Then come with us. I'm sure they'll be able to find room for you. Most of Hogwarts goes unused right now."

Owen smiled briefly, and he and Michael melted away to wait. Harry turned to greet some of the others who had lingered.

In passing, his eyes met and held Draco's for a moment.

Draco held in a gasp it would not have been dignified to utter. In Harry's gaze was utter gratitude, and relief, and a love so profound that Draco felt a bit humbled by it.

For a moment.

Then he lifted his head. Well, I am a Malfoy, and this is my confirmation festival. And that was a rather nicer gift than any other I got.

Pleased with the way the evening had turned out after all, he turned to talk with Adalrico Bulstrode, and exchange politely barbed insults with Arabella Zabini.

Chapter Eighty-Six: Strategizing

Harry frowned at the letter in his hand. It was short, and really should not have caused as much shock and confusion as it did. It was a simple request, and he could say no, and the person who had made the request would be bound to obey.

It's my own sense of obligation to her that's making it hard to say no, he thought, and read the letter again.

June 4th, 1996

Dear Harry:

Since you told me about the battle you intend to hold on Midsummer Day, I have thought I would like to join you in it. Tell me if I can. I have conducted intensive studies of Transfiguration in the past few months, and you have reason to remember my skill with rune circles.

Sincerely,

Henrietta Bulstrode.

The problem, Harry thought as he lay back against his pillow, was that Edith Bulstrode was intending to stay at the school for the summer—she had no wish to stay with her father—and Harry had promised that Edith would not have to see Henrietta again. Henrietta would undoubtedly make a valuable addition to the battle, but Harry couldn't justify asking Edith to leave the school for that, even if it would only be for a few days. She had nowhere else to go, nowhere else she would feel safe. She barely trusted the strength of Hogwarts's wards to keep her hidden from her mother.

In the end, he wrote a refusal. He would post it with Hedwig tonight, and hope that Henrietta accepted it for what it was: an appreciation of her battle prowess, but a determination to abide by his promises, even when those promises had consequences he didn't especially like.

"Have you finished making my gift yet?"

Harry looked up, startled. Draco stood in the doorway of their bedroom, grinning at him with brilliant eyes.

“Not yet,” said Harry, and stood. “I have this letter to post, and anyway, it’s not your birthday until tomorrow, or don’t you remember?”

“I remember, of course,” said Draco with a sniff, fiddling with the ring on his finger that contained Hawthorn’s solidified magic. He had developed the habit to insure that everyone noticed it in the past few days, and once he explained what it was, he had received more than one envious and awed glance. Harry wondered if Draco realized that Harry himself wasn’t going to express awe past the initial acceptance of the gift. “But I thought you might want to give me a hint. Or a choice, the way that you did last year.” He slightly dipped his head, and regarded Harry from under his lowered eyelashes.

Harry choked as he remembered the bond Draco had asked for last year, connecting them mind to mind and making it impossible for him to hide any secrets or emotions. “You want that again?”

“I didn’t say that I wanted that,” said Draco. “Just that I might like to choose. Unless, of course, you want to tell me what gift you intend to get me now, and I can decide if I’d rather have that one.”

“All of this is just a ploy to get me to tell you what your gift is early,” said Harry with some determination, and picked up his letter. “I have to go to the Owlery. You are welcome to come with me and continue trying to worm the surprise out of me if you really want to.”

“It’s not just a ploy,” Draco complained as he trotted beside him. “Why should it be? Of course I’d want to know what the better gift was, one I imagined or one that you made. Why are you irritated with me, Harry?”

“I’m not irritated,” Harry corrected him, as they went through the entrance hall and made their way up the first staircase. “I’m exasperated. There’s a difference.”

Draco tried a few other “subtle” ways of asking for his gift early, causing Harry to shoot him continual disgusted glances. They met Michael and Owen when they were on the fifth floor and near the quarters McGonagall had assigned them, though, so that distracted Draco thoroughly. He’d already told Harry that he didn’t like the way Owen watched him, trying to absorb indications of his intent from his face and actions.

Harry concealed his chuckle, and wondered if Draco had noticed the way Michael watched him yet. Harry couldn’t imagine it turning serious; Michael, as the son of a Dark pureblood family, would know what this courting ritual meant, and that he stood no chance of breaking apart a couple joined by it. But he was perfectly welcome to admire Draco from a distance.

I think the world would be improved if more people did that, Harry thought, while he answered Owen’s questions about where he would be during the battle.

“I’ll need to be fighting Voldemort,” said Harry. “Apart from the fact that only my magic can counter his, there’s a prophecy that concerns the both of us, and he’ll be aiming for me.”

Michael nodded. “Do you want us to protect your friends and partner, then?” he asked, gaze sliding to Draco. Harry hid a smirk, both at the question and at Draco’s indignation that anyone would consider him in need of protection.

“I would appreciate your help in doing so,” Harry admitted. “Distant guardianship, at their shoulders, because Draco, Snape, and my brother all need to be free to move around during the battle. There may be a slight chance that they’re in less danger than normal; the prophecy speaks of my taking a ‘division of the heart’ that will enable me to defeat Voldemort, and I think that he may interpret that as the death of someone close. So he may avoid trying to hurt them, in case he gives me that division. But I can’t be entirely sure he’ll interpret the prophecy that way, and every bit of protection helps.”

“Harry!” Draco all but squawked. “Shouldn’t you be asking your guards to stand at your back?”

Harry gave him a bright smile. "But, Draco, you're important to me," he chirped. "And I can protect myself better with my magic than you can with your own powers."

Draco gave him a glare. Michael took the opportunity to study his profile. Harry swallowed another chuckle, and looked back at Owen.

"There's one thing we'll have to settle after the battle, though," he said. "If Midsummer does defang Voldemort, the way I hope it will, and make him less of a problem for months or even years, then we have to give you a more regular role in my life than just bodyguards. Where I intend to spend the rest of my summer—well, I think I may take Draco and Professor Snape with me, but probably no one else. So think about that, please."

"We will," said Owen, snapping his fingers under his twin's nose to get his attention. "Thank you for giving us a place in the battle, Harry."

Harry nodded, trying to convince himself that Owen's tone held only the usual gratitude, and nothing worshipful or slavish, which would have been unbearable. "You're welcome."

Owen and Michael turned back to their own room then, and Harry and Draco made their way to the Owlery. Draco at least went on complaining about the bodyguards instead of getting his birthday gift, which Harry found a relieving change of subject.

Indigena spat dust out of her mouth, and then paused to shake dirt out of her hair. A moment later, she wondered why she'd bothered. More dirt fell into it from the roof of the tunnel.

I hate being this far underground, she thought, even as she stroked the vine that had dug the tunnel through the dirt and let her get this far. A second vine had extended beside it and widened the passage enough for Indigena to crawl through, but had retreated so she could fit in. And now they were about to head into unknown territory, the concrete and heavy stone there was no choice but to bore straight through.

This was heavy business, and dirtier than she had imagined, breaking into Tullianum from beneath to rescue the Death Eaters imprisoned there. It meant she didn't have to attend the Death Eater meeting tonight, though, as the others tugged in their new recruits and initiated them. Indigena had had enough of killing and torture from hearing her Lord talk of it.

She took a deep breath and touched the vine again. It rustled obediently. Indigena felt a smile of pleasure and love light her face, and didn't conceal it. Why should she? They were alone here, and ahead of them was a task that only they could do.

She leaned against the vine and closed her eyes. "Ready, my love?" she murmured. "For the final push?"

The tendrils, dark green veined with black, that she'd dreamed of and bred and created curled around her in answer. Indigena wrapped herself close, the plants beneath her skin flexing towards the outside. They would give her the ability to ride with her vine upwards and not be smashed. Indigena's body hadn't been fully human for years. She'd never regretted implanting the vines, leaves, and flowers that she had; they bounced most spells, disguised her when she needed to be disguised, and shielded her in moments like this. It only saddened her that most other people looked askance at her for it.

"Now," she whispered.

The vine struck upwards. Indigena felt the grinding shock when it hit stone. She closed her eyes and hung on, riding every wave as it again and again. Tendrils writhed over her head, seeking out tiny cracks in the solid material, probing always towards the presence of greater warmth and light overhead. Tullianum was their sun, and they were the long-buried seeds rising to meet it.

How great a force this is, Indigena thought, as the stones above her ground and shifted apart. The force of green and growing things, which drives a flower through inches of soil when the spring comes, which sends sap pumping up through trees like a heartbeat, which makes the first seeds return in months to an area blasted by fire or magic. And everyone else underestimates it.

The vine was tiring. It reached out to her, and Indigena bled her magic into it, pumping it full of the power that meant more to a creation like this than sap or blood. It surged again, and she held it, warmth and sleek life shifting beneath her, primal as muscle.

Ram. Ram. Ram.

She didn't know how long it took. She didn't know how much blood she shed as broken chunks of stone and concrete rasped against her skin. All she knew was the single, driven purpose, the will, that she was giving both herself and the plant. She was a strong witch. She chose to do something, and it got done. On and on they rose.

Indigena wasn't surprised to feel blasts from wands striking at the creeping tendrils that had already made it through Tullianum's floor. The Aurors would be trying to destroy her beauty before it could get far. But they were utterly inexperienced with magic like this. They didn't understand the insane determination that powered it, either the vine's or her own.

Indigena reached deeper into her own magic, and it answered her, reaching and grasping and whipping. Indigena knew Aurors were flying as the tendrils grabbed them, though she could not hear the sounds of their bodies smashing from down here, and only faintly feel the trickle of blood across leaves. Down here, it was peaceful.

The tendrils crawled on, racing and sniffing over the stone, seeking out those cells where people with the Dark Mark resided. Indigena felt herself smiling as the flowers she'd made for just this purpose turned back and forth, flagging out the smell of her Lord. The Mark on her own arm pulsed in recognition, and the vine lashed forward, driving through the doors, or grasping them and wrenching them off their hinges.

They flooded free, Death Eaters captured last year and Death Eaters captured this year, and Indigena sent up the massive arms of the plant, calling up three times her old strength so that they could tear open holes in the floor, and then withdrawing them. Most of the Dark Lord's servants didn't hesitate, dropping into the holes and sliding rapidly downwards. All the holes would lead to the massive tunnel Indigena and the vine had come through, in the end, and that would lead them to a spot on the outskirts of London where they would be able to Apparate to the Dark Lord's side. Since he would be calling, most of them should be able to reach him even without their wands.

And as for their wands...well, the Dark Lord had sent Karkaroff to kidnap a certain wand maker, who would create new weapons for his loyal servants.

Indigena waited until she was sure that no one with a Dark Mark was left in Tullianum prison. The Aurors had retreated and gone for help, or were dead. She pulled back the arms of the vine, reluctantly, and slid down the tunnel and into the dirt one where the Death Eaters waited.

A heavysset man, who fit her Lord's description of Walden Macnair, looked at her with a faint smile. "And you're a Yaxley of Thornhall," he said.

It was hard to remember human speech for a moment, but Indigena nodded. "Come to rescue you," she said, pulling up her left robe sleeve to reveal the Dark Mark. "We join our Lord for an assault on Hogwarts at Midsummer."

Macnair laughed, and his eyes shone. "That is what I like to hear," he said, and helped her lead the others back down the tunnel. Harry winced at the sight of the Daily Prophet headline the next day.

DEATH EATERS BREAK OUT OF TULLIANUM; TEN AURORS KILLED

He read the story, but the headline had encapsulated it, really. Immense vines of a kind that no one had seen before had dug up into the prison and dragged open the cells of those who carried Dark Marks. They had also killed every Auror that fired curses at them, until the remaining ones had run. Scrimgeour was quoted saying that he considered this a terrible tragedy and would reinforce the prison with new spells against any attack from beneath.

Harry suffered a momentary pang of guilt. Should I have anticipated that Indigena Yaxley would do that?

Maybe he should have, though he hadn't known she could create vines that would dig through stone. The ground around Hogwarts was dirt, and it was no real surprise that she'd been able to bore through that. But this...

Lucius told me she was dangerous, Harry thought, eating his eggs without putting down the newspaper, which hovered in front of him thanks to a Levitation Charm. I had no idea how right he was.

"Harry? Can I have my gift now? You haven't even wished me Happy Birthday yet!"

Harry looked up with a faint groan. Draco was sitting down on the other side of him, and he obviously hadn't seen the Daily Prophet headline. He looked under his plates as if searching for his gift there, then fixed Harry with an expectant gaze.

Harry grimaced and shook out the paper so that he could see it. Draco lost his smile.

"Voldemort did that?" he breathed.

Harry nodded. "With the help of Indigena Yaxley. They certainly didn't plan their escape themselves." If they had, he thought, as he turned to his breakfast while Draco read, then I would be contacting Scrimgeour in hysteria over my parents potentially breaking free.

"I—I can't believe this happened," Draco whispered. "You'd think the Ministry would have had wards under Tullianum."

"Under Tullianum?" Harry snorted. "Why should they have? It's underground—far underground, with solid stone beneath it. A prisoner could only do something about it if they had their wand or could do wandless magic, and the wards should have taken care of both those problems. They weren't going to waste magic on what seemed secure. There would have been an outcry against them for that, just as there will be for this.” He lapsed into brooding, wondering what Scrimgeour was doing at the moment, and convinced that he needed to send letters to his allies now, with the exception of Henrietta, asking them to come to the school and aid him in the Midsummer battle.

“Well, they’ll have wards there now,” Draco muttered, as he finished reading the article. He folded it neatly and tucked it away, then turned back to Harry. “And none of that excuses you from wishing me a happy birthday, or giving me a gift as soon as possible.”

Harry smiled faintly, and tried to pull his mind back to matters that he thought of as minor in comparison with how Voldemort might use the escaped Death Eaters. “It’s in our bedroom, Draco,” he said. “Do you want to go back and get it now, or wait until lunch?”

Draco bit his lip. “Why couldn’t you have brought it to breakfast with you?” He was spooning food onto his plate, though, obviously unwilling to go without breakfast so that he could see his gift. “Or why can’t you Summon it now?”

“Because it was too big for me to carry in my arms.”

Draco flushed with excitement, and all but bounced in place on his seat. “That should be brilliant, then,” he said. “I’ll come back with you to the bedroom at lunch.” He gave Harry a stern look. “And it should be worth waiting for.”

Harry gave a weak smile. He did hope Draco would like his gift, but he wasn’t entirely sure he would. Well, that worry had just faded and shriveled in the wake of his worry about Tullianum.

“You realize what this could mean, Rufus.” Amelia’s voice was quiet, but inflexible. She probably kept it that low just so he wouldn’t hear the gloating in it, Rufus thought sourly. She had lost to him on the issue of giving werewolves Portkeys to Tullianum, but she was going to win this struggle.

She sat in front of the desk in his office, and so did several other Elders of the Wizengamot, hastily summoned just after Rufus received a firecall informing him of the prisoners' escape. The rest of them looked as victorious as Amelia. They were starting to feel his strength for the first time, Rufus thought, and few Wizengamot Elders liked being bridled by the Minister. Cornelius's weakness had spoiled them further, and made them think it the natural state of affairs, that the Wizengamot should direct the future course of the Ministry.

"I do, Amelia," said Rufus, leaning back and letting his eyes survey all of them at once. He could hear Percy Weasley's nervous shuffling behind him, and spared a thought to wish the boy would calm down. "It means that we can no longer count on Tullianum as secure. And the Death Eaters are going to swell You-Know-Who's forces when they go back to him."

Amelia laughed quietly. "It's more than that, Rufus," she said.

There's a danger here that I didn't foresee, then. Rufus believed he had kept a reasonable handle on the formation of coalitions in the Wizengamot to oppose him, and had just as subtly undermined them. This one, though, he hadn't noticed. None of the Elders in the room was as close to Amelia as Emily Gillyflower had been. That bothered Rufus. What's their common bond? What cause do they share?

"In what way?" he asked, playing dumb. "Have you received more news on You-Know-Who's activities that I'm unaware of?"

One of the other Elders, a pompous idiot named Nasturtian whom Rufus had never liked, snorted. "You're perfectly aware of these activities, aren't you, Rufus?" he asked. "Seeing as how that young halfblood's published an article recently supporting werewolves' rights, and you did the same thing?"

"It was hardly an article," said Rufus. "It was an interview in the Prophet, and I believe I alleged that werewolves were dangerous creatures, as well." Inwardly, he cursed. He'd made it look as if Harry controlled him, or at least as if someone could make a good case that he did.

“You alleged,” said Amelia. “But I don’t think that you really mean it, Rufus. And now this escape from Tullianum. One might think that you could be a bit more prepared.”

Rufus ground his teeth as he watched her eyes. He and Amelia had been friends and colleagues for years, and then Emily had been bitten. Now Amelia was acting out of fear and guilt and rage at the way she felt compelled to abandon her friend. Rufus understood why she was pressing him so hard, using any excuse to worm her way back to the werewolf issue, but he hated it nonetheless.

“More prepared?” he asked, with a faint frown that concealed the speed of his thoughts.

“Yes, prepared.” Amelia leaned forward. “And so, of course, Rufus, we have to ask each other if we really want an unprepared Minister in a time of war. Of course we can’t have one who can’t meet the challenges. Poor Cornelius wouldn’t have stood the test. We had to vote him out. And, well, of course it’s too early yet to say if you really don’t have what it takes, but we would hate to find out that you don’t. Some more preparation would not go awry.” Her face was all anxious helpfulness.

Rufus heard the threat behind her words. We enacted a vote of no confidence on Fudge. We can do the same to you, if you get too troublesome.

And he had been, he realized now, with a blast of self-blame. He had not realized how deep and entrenched the hatred of werewolves was, how panicked the Wizengamot was in the wake of that bite, and how little it would take to tip the balance against him. With this escape, the rest of the Elders might accept the spin that Amelia was hinting she could put on it—that the escape was the fault of an incompetent Minister who let a fifteen-year-old boy tell him what to do. Being seen as in the pocket of Harry would help him no more than it had helped Fudge to be seen as in the pocket of Augustus Starrise.

They would vote him down in a panic, and accept the next and strongest candidate who appeared—almost certainly Amelia herself.

If he stepped wrong now, he stood the chance of losing everything.

Rufus had played the game of politics for most of the last sixteen years. This was his own fault for forgetting some of its fundamental lessons. Harry was able to forget them, but, well, Harry had Lord-level power, a diverse gathering of allies, and a responsibility to fewer people than Rufus did, ultimately. Rufus had his mind, and that was close to it, particularly with the deaths last night. Ten fine Aurors had fallen, and that included comrades who would have done their best to support him against unfair pressure from various portions of the Ministry.

Time to retreat and regroup.

"I am no one's pawn," he said now, his voice mild. "I had not realized that the perception had occurred. Of course a Minister must be strong in a time of war, Amelia, and Cornelius would never have done." He met her eyes and held them. "I intend to do."

She got the message. They'd danced with each other too long for her to ignore it. She smiled and nodded. "Good, Rufus. Really, that's all we wanted to know." She stood and extended her hand across the desk to him. "I need to go back to the Department and see to my people. We've lost so many..." And she let him catch a glimpse of her genuine grief, as a kind of reward.

Rufus shook back, accepting the grief with a slight nod. He would withdraw some of his vocal support for werewolves, modify his stance, in return for Amelia and her coalition not spinning this escape from Tullianum the way they could have. He disliked the practice, but there was much to dislike in politics, and if he had had the rarified sensibilities of a Gryffindor, he would have got out of the game a long time ago.

He waited until Amelia and the other Elders were out the door, and then turned to Percy. "I want you to write to Harry," he said. "They'll be watching my post for the next few days, so it can't come directly from me."

“What should it say?” Percy whispered. His face was pinched, outraged, and very nearly white. Rufus knew he had followed the contortions of the confrontation well enough to understand what they were up against.

“The details of what happened here,” said Rufus. “The motivations.” He smiled thinly. Harry would probably still be angry with him for backing off his public support for the werewolves, but, well, Rufus had moved too quickly on that. Time to back off, circle, and attack from another direction.

And he would do it by speaking to someone few if any of his opponents would expect to be helpful.

He rose to his feet. “If anyone needs me,” he told Percy, “I’ll be in Tullianum for the next little while, inspecting the damage. And after that will have to come a press conference with the Daily Prophet, I suppose, which can translate into an article illustrated with brave photographs of me inspecting the damage.”

He swept off, wondering if anyone would realize the other reason he wanted to visit the prison. Former Death Eaters and deranged Light Lords were hardly the only prisoners held there. There was also a certain werewolf, who had given out gnomish utterances so far. Rufus would see what he would say when faced with the Minister himself. Harry had a sheaf of letters clutched in his hand when he met Draco at the door to the Slytherin common room after their morning consultations on future classes with their Head of House. His face was pale, taut, and determined, and Draco wished irritably that Voldemort hadn’t chosen last night to break his Death Eaters free. Then Harry would be able to concentrate solely on his birthday, and not on politics.

“What is it?” he demanded, when they arrived in the bedroom, he looked around, and he still saw nothing large, valuable, and obviously for him.

Harry blinked for a moment, as though he’d forgotten what they came for, and then smiled thinly. “Oh, yes,” he muttered, and laid the letters on his bed while he reached under it. Draco heard him mutter, “Finite Incantatem!” and then he was pulling at folds of cloth, which rolled under his hand as he dragged them out.

Draco gaped. He had no idea how Harry had managed to get something so large under his bed without Draco noticing.

Then he thought, He’s a Lord-level wizard, you fool, and shook his head, paying attention to the gift as Harry unrolled it before him.

“Happy birthday, Draco,” he murmured.

Draco blinked. It was a tapestry, a dark blue one. It was also a very good likeness of himself, standing with a cloak in the Malfoy colors hanging from his shoulders and his hands resting easily on his left hip and his wand, in the middle of a circle of moon signs, quartered at his hands, feet, and head with symbols. The one at his right hand was a stalking lion, the one at his feet a skull, the one at his left hand a barren tree, and the last, above his head, three stars surrounding a dark space in the center. Draco saw the stars were brighter than the rest, glowing as if on fire.

“What does it represent?” he asked, almost ashamed to admit he didn’t know. His eyes went back to the eyes of his woven image. They were mesmerizing, and as if he had modeled for the weaving himself.

“Our courting ritual,” said Harry. He nodded at the lion. “That’s for my birthday, or the first of August—the constellation Leo. The skull’s for Halloween, obviously. The barren tree represents Imbolc, which comes in February. And the stars are—”

“Walpurgis,” Draco finished, reaching down to trace the symbol above his head. The threads shimmered with living heat against his skin. He shook his head in wonder. “And each of the symbols will brighten as we complete the courting ritual for that particular date?”

“Exactly,” said Harry. He gave a small smile at Draco’s stare. “I did pay attention to what you told me about the ritual, Draco, even if I didn’t read as much on it as you did. And I contacted a weaver in London that same week, giving her a detailed description of you. This has been a long time in the weaving, but I wanted to show you that I take this seriously.”

Draco slowly shook his head. “I had no idea, Harry—“ “Well, it wouldn’t have been much of a surprise if you had an idea, now would it?” Harry softened his words by letting the tapestry slip out of his arms to the floor, and stepping over it to kiss Draco solidly. “Happy birthday. I am sorry that I’ve been distracted, but this makes the Midsummer battle all the more worrying. It means we’ll probably get all the Death Eaters in one place, which I’m pleased about, but—“ Harry shrugged.

Draco put his arms around Harry and leaned his head on his shoulder for a moment, still watching his woven image. He decided that he might as well give Harry his own gift. “Do you know,” he muttered to Harry, “I managed to possess Snape last night.”

Harry jerked back in startlement and stared at him. “You did? I—that’s wonderful, Draco. But are you sure that he wasn’t just letting you do it to tease you about it later?”

Draco snickered. “No. I made him give a horribly-written Hufflepuff exam a good mark. Then I lingered in the back of his mind to see if he remembered and corrected it. He never did. And this morning, I heard a Hufflepuff squealing about her high mark in Potions.”

Harry looked torn between laughter and worry. “That comes close to a violation of his free will, Draco,” he murmured.

Draco concealed a sigh. It’s a good thing he has people around him who worry less about ethics than he does. “I think it’s a pretty small violation in the scheme of things, Harry,” he said. “And it proves that I can possess a Legilimens. That part of the Midsummer battle will work.”

“I hope so,” said Harry, and his face grew pale again as he looked at the letters on the bed. “I should send these.”

Draco stepped back, and let Harry go to the Owlery. Then he sat back and looked at the tapestry of himself for a time. He noticed that the second full moon sign past Walpurgis, the one that probably stood for June, glimmered just a little brighter than the rest of them. The tapestry marked the passage of ordinary time, too.

One thing about his depiction stayed with him as he gazed.

Harry made me more beautiful than I actually am.

Done.

Snape stepped back, and then prowled slowly around his cauldron. The potion within glimmered silver. It smelled like fresh, raw meat and blood. It would attract many werewolves, especially those running mad in their beast forms without a sane idea in their heads.

And it would poison them the next time their bodies changed from human to wolf. The lengthening of the bones would call out a venom like acid, deeply painful, feasting on their marrow. The alteration of their flesh and muscle would inspire the composition of their blood to change as well, until it burned them. And the last stages of the transformation would trigger the emotional poison, drowning their minds in despair and inspiring them to bite themselves until they died. Because a werewolf was made to withstand enormous amounts of magical damage, the poison would take a long time to work.

If he ever used it.

He had promised Harry that he would not.

Snape stopped and stared down into the potion, well-aware that it cast a faint silver light that glimmered on his face and perhaps made him look slightly mad.

He had created this poison solely to work out his hatred and his fear. He would feel safer to have this on hand, even though he would never use it.

No. Never.

Of course, there was one problem: the hatred and fear hadn't gone away. In fact, they coiled in the back of his mind, poisoning him, making him wake from sudden dreams of gleaming teeth and loping bodies and hot breath, and causing him to start at a casual mention of the full moon.

But he would never use it, because he had promised Harry.

He filled vials with the potion before it could cool into uselessness, set Warming Charms on them, and took them over to a cabinet on the far wall. He pushed them to the back of the highest shelf, then closed the cabinet and put the strongest locking spells on it that he knew.

He wasn't going to touch them. He wasn't going to use them.

They were just going to be there.

Interlude: The Serpent Bites

June 6th, 1996

Dear Lord Voldemort:

I write this in haste, and yet out of a desire to be as complete as possible. I also shed some of the conventions that have guarded our speech before this. I ask that you forgive me. Since I will use the incantation to send this directly to you, I think there is little chance of any of our enemies seeing it.

Potter has just sent me a letter in which he asks for my help at Midsummer. It is addressed Dear my ally rather than with my name. I fear that means he has sent his other allies letters, asking for their help, and has merely scribed the same words several dozen times. He may have excluded those he does not trust completely, but the fact that he is writing me suggests his scope of trust has widened. It is possible that many powerful wizards and witches could face you at Hogwarts on Midsummer.

I am unsure how much you know about this already, my Lord, so forgive me if I repeat information you already hold. Potter's letter stresses that he expects the battle on Midsummer to be difficult and long, and he expressly calls it a battle, rather than merely a skirmish, or a confrontation or duel between the two of you. He assures us that he has plans in place, which he will explain when we meet him in person. We will be meeting inside Hogwarts, and he has confidence in the strength of its wards. He ends his letter with the words, "With your help, I plan to defang Voldemort." I will send a copy of the letter along with this message, in case you wish to see it yourself.

Burke was a fool, a convenient prop to take my fall. When I found copies of his 'Serpent' letter, I adopted his pseudonym and wrote to you as him, though I knew you would notice the difference in handwriting when you broke the concealment charms. I was not, then, ready to declare my allegiance. Now I am. What Potter plans is mad. He cannot face the most powerful Dark wizard in the world in open battle and survive, however many allies stand with him. And especially since the escape of your loyal servants from Tullianum, my Lord, I know that you protect those who serve you, and draw them back to you.

I ask you now only what you think I should do. Should I come to you and take the Mark? Or should I answer Potter's letter and remain in his counsels as a spy to give you what information I can? It will be too dangerous to send letters from the castle, if you prefer the latter course, but I may use the spell that bends winds inside out to carry Potter's plans to you. Only tell me, my Lord, and you will have my obedience and my faith.

The Serpent.

June 6th, 1996

My Dearest Serpent:

Ah, I do so prefer it when you write with your left hand! You are right, Burke was a fool. And he did not even realize that the information he passed was of little use, or that he would inevitably be found out while carrying the Mark. You have proven more useful in both your letters.

For now, our Lord—and all honor to his name—wishes you to answer Harry's letter, and go to Hogwarts. It is best that you go as soon as possible. Harry will not confine his plans to one day or one hour or one meeting. The Dark Lord wishes to begin hearing them immediately.

If you are close enough to cause trouble and inconvenience to Harry and his allies, then do so. No killing—not yet. It would reveal you in such a close environment as Hogwarts is, and our Lord has particular reason for not wanting Harry's adoptive father, brother, or partner touched. Remain in the background, and stay ready to bite, like the serpent coiled at the breast that you are.

I think we shall be seeing each other very soon.

Regards,

Indigena Yaxley.

Chapter Eighty-Seven: End of Innocence

Minerva sat back in her seat and watched her students with a faint smile. Another year ended, and despite the battle with Voldemort lurking ahead—a battle in which she would get to participate, this time—the most important thing to her was that her students had survived to the end, and found some joy along the way.

And they had done it under someone who had not known she would be Headmistress until June of last year. Really, Minerva thought she deserved some congratulations.

She shot a glance along the staff table, taking in the faces of both professors and their guests. Severus, of course, was silent as he stared at his food. He had grown both more brooding, and more hateful when he did speak, since the werewolf attack on Hogwarts's grounds. Minerva tipped a heap of beans onto his plate. The glare he shot her made her glad that she'd known him for twenty years, so she'd had a chance to get used to it.

"Eat your beans, Severus," she said, and looked at other people as if it didn't matter to her whether he did.

Sybill was chattering some nonsense at Acies, of course. The Defense teacher never paid attention to her, and Sybill never noticed that she didn't, making them perfect dinner companions. Behind them, Rubeus carefully handled his knife and fork, as though afraid he would crush them. Pomona, a year-long veteran of sitting at his side, ducked his elbows occasionally as she munched her way steadily through a plate of shepherd's pie. Filius was conversing with Peter, who answered his questions about using rats in duels with amused patience.

Others of Harry's allies who had answered his plea for help yesterday were there as well—Belville, Rhangnara, Pemberley, Apollonis, Rosier-Henlin, Parkinson, Bulstrode. Minerva had been uneasy about letting a woman she knew was a werewolf into the school, until she saw that Hawthorn wore a silver necklace at her throat, and Harry had explained to her that she'd never spent time with Loki or cared about his goals. She was here to protect Harry and her daughter. That, Minerva could easily agree with.

She looked back at Severus's plate, and saw him Transfiguring his beans into cockroaches, which marched under the table and got into Sybill's robes.

"Severus," she said.

He gave her a flat stare, Transfigured the last bean, and then sat back. His gaze was haunted as it roamed the walls. Minerva ate a few beans of her own while she thought about that. He had grown increasingly restive since yesterday evening, when the first of Harry's allies arrived and she lowered the wards to accommodate them. But she had tightened them again at once, after making sure the wards understood who they were. Severus surely could not be worried about how well-protected he was here.

"Severus," she said, making sure her voice was gentle, not mocking, and that she held his eyes when he looked at her. "What is it?"

He shut his eyes and sat still for a long moment. Lines of weariness sagged around his face. Minerva frowned. How did I not notice those? He looks as if he has had many sleepless nights.

"I am afraid, Minerva," he said, hissing out that word as if it were an embarrassing sexual disease. "Is that what you wished to hear? Do you truly want to know how little I look forward to going into battle here, or having Harry do it for me?"

"The only students who will remain until Midsummer have their parents' permission to fight in the battle, and they've been improving as duelists under Alastor's tutelage," said Minerva, looking towards the end of the table where the old Auror sat. He was engaged in an argument with Rhangnara, setting out his cutlery to resemble the position of soldiers. Minerva shook her head in amusement. "And this time, Harry is choosing the ground, and has a great many allies at his back. Don't worry, Severus. In one way, this is madness, drawing Voldemort to Hogwarts. But he never tried to attack a target so strong and well-defended during the First War. He'll have a hard time taking us, and would even if we didn't have Harry with us."

"It is still risky," Severus whispered. "I still wish that we were drawing him anywhere but here."

Minerva patted his hand. "I know, Severus. Most of the time, events happen so quickly around Harry that it's hard to take stock of them before they're over. But this time, there are others with you to see your child go into battle, and even other parents to share your worries with." She looked down at the Hufflepuff table, where Mrs. Smith sat with her son, Zacharias, and conversed with him. Most of the students near her watched with awed eyes.

"My child?"

Severus was actually spluttering. Minerva concealed her smile as she looked at him and said, "Well, Severus, if he isn't your son, what would you call him?"

"He—I—"

Minerva shook her head and rose to her feet. The students were at once silent, gazing expectantly at her. Minerva saw more than one tight grin of anticipation at the Slytherin table, especially on the faces of the first-years. It was a good thing that some of them were children still, she thought, and worried more about tiny school matters than about war.

"As with the end of every year," she said, "there comes the presentation of the House Cup. In fourth place, with two hundred seventy-six points, is Ravenclaw House."

Polite applause echoed through the Great Hall. Filius's House ducked their heads and muttered something. Ravenclaw never had really recovered from the vicious point-taking it had received after the other professors discovered that the majority of the students hexing Harry had come from that House; Filius himself had reduced their points to zero when he realized just how many people had realized they were learning Dark Arts but hadn't approached him. There was a limit to how much Dumbledore's spell could excuse them, he said sternly when Minerva asked him about it. They had done well to earn this many points back.

"In third place, with three hundred seven points, Gryffindor House."

Again, more polite applause. Minerva allowed herself a moment of pure, indulgent House pride as she gazed at her lions. They had tried, incredibly hard, especially after she had cast Remus out and they no longer had a true Head to give them points. But they had fallen short of Hufflepuff thanks to the antics of the Weasley twins, among others. Minerva had to admit she was looking forward to seeing the twins leave after the Midsummer battle. Now that they had the thousand Galleons they'd received from Harry, they could do something actually productive in the world, as well as plague someone else.

"In second place, with three hundred eighteen points, Hufflepuff House."

Loud cheering from Pomona's House, which hadn't got that many points in some time. Mrs. Smith gave her son a glance, and Zacharias dropped his hands from applauding and shut his mouth. It comforted Minerva to know there was at least one person in the world who could control him.

"And in first place, and the winners of the House Cup with three hundred ninety points, Slytherin House."

She waved her wand, and the banners along the walls turned green, while Severus's House indulged in self-congratulatory smirks, bowing their heads as the other Houses clapped for them. A pair of first-years hugged each other in excitement, and were dragged apart in moments by Millicent Bulstrode. The lines of worry in Harry's face eased a bit. Minerva hoped he was thinking of things he had done to help his House earn those points, because there had been many.

"And now, enjoy dessert!" Minerva waved her wand again, and the food cleared rapidly from everyone's plates, reappearing as chocolate cake. Most of the students began gulping it down. Minerva sat down and began sampling hers at a more leisurely pace.

A swift glance at Severus revealed that he had a faint smile on his face, a mocking sneer, of course. He glanced at her and said, as sweetly as he was capable of saying anything, "Better luck with the House Cup next year, Minerva."

"Actually," said Minerva, pausing to take a swallow of pumpkin juice, "I don't consider myself Head of Gryffindor any more. Lupin didn't work out, but the person I've hired to take his place will."

"Hired to take his place?" She knew his eyes would be narrow; she hadn't mentioned this before. "And who would that be?"

"Peter Pettigrew," said Minerva comfortably.

Severus choked in a most satisfying manner.

The next day, Harry woke up slowly. He thought about skipping breakfast in the Great Hall. He and the other students staying until Midsummer had no classes, of course, just their dueling lessons and their plans for the battle. No one said that he had to go to the Great Hall on time now.

In the end, though, he decided to venture there. The other students were leaving directly after breakfast, and he wanted to say goodbye to those friends and acquaintances who hadn't received permission to stay, like Ginny, Hermione, and Ron.

He stood and stretched, and that small movement was enough to cause Draco to stir, poking his head through the bed curtains. Harry didn't give him credit for being fully awake yet, though, because he mumbled, "Want company in the loo, Harry?"

"Go back to sleep until your head clears," Harry retorted, and headed for the shower, Argutus draped around his shoulders in dozing coils of silver and white.

He had just turned the shower on when sharp claws raked his right arm. Harry stumbled back in shock, staring down at the cuts. He watched as they froze over in moments, the ice only growing thicker despite the heat of the water that pounded on them.

When he looked up, the bird with the toothed beak and lizard-like tail was crouching on the far wall of the room, wings fluttering in time to its derisive, jerky laughter.

You haven't learned the truth yet, have you? it asked, and extended one claw, bright with his blood. You haven't learned how to dissolve the bond that links us, and at this point, with every mark you bear, the chance of your learning becomes less and less.

"I thought you said there was no way to dissolve it," said Harry, careful to keep his voice low so that there was less chance of waking Draco and Blaise. "That we were bound no matter what happened. You seemed rather upset about that."

You understand nothing of what has happened. If you knew what I was, you would still reject me, because you are that way. You set harsh limits on yourself. You know nothing of what lies ahead of you, at the end of the dark road. The bird cawed its laughter again, scarlet eyes fastened on his face. And when someone tries to teach you the necessary lessons, you shrink into yourself and lash out. You are weak. That shall be your downfall.

Harry didn't see the worth of responding. He looked at the cuts on his arm again. Like the others, they were parallel claw marks, a few inches apart, and the numbing cold from them hurt worse than the pain and had already frozen the blood. They would have icy scabs for a time, but the scabs would heal and fall off. Argutus, shifting on his shoulders, didn't even seem concerned about them, but then, Harry didn't think Argutus could see the bird.

Weakness, and limitations, and the end of the dark road, the bird told him, and then raised its wings and flew across the loo at his head. As Harry ducked to avoid it, it vanished, breaking apart as if the water were the sun and it were mist.

Harry shivered and ran his clawed arm under warm water to somewhat take away the sting. He didn't think it was worth listening to what the bird babbled about. For all he knew, this was some trick of Voldemort's, come to coax him into relaxing the bindings on his magic, so that Harry himself would be swallowed up by the Dark and violent parts of his power.

"But where do you think she is?"

"I don't know, Draco," Harry snapped absently as he crossed the Great Hall to the Gryffindor table with his boyfriend beside him. "Maybe she didn't feel well, or maybe she decided to enjoy the first day of summer holidays and sleep in. It's not that unusual for Pansy to miss breakfast, you know."

Draco didn't look satisfied, but just then Owen moved up to Harry's side, and he actually growled and tried to shove him away. Harry caught Draco's hand and Owen's amused eye, and shook his head at both of them.

"Was there something you wanted, Owen?"

"Yes," said Owen. "I wanted to know if you'd like us to show some of the Dark Arts we learned at Durmstrang to the dueling club."

Harry hesitated. He could well imagine that Moody wouldn't like it, but they could do it when Moody wasn't there; he preferred to split the dueling club into halves now, working with the less successful students and leaving the better ones to Harry. Owen and Michael would be able to demonstrate to their heart's content in front of people like Cho and Zacharias, who wouldn't breathe a word to Moody.

"All right," Harry muttered. "But make sure no word of this gets back to Auror Moody."

Owen and Michael nodded and shivered simultaneously. Harry smiled at them, dropped Draco's hand, and turned just in time to receive a bone-crushing hug from Hermione.

"Don't you dare die," she whispered to him. Harry didn't think she would have been quite as affectionate if he hadn't been going to battle, but, after all, he was, and her parents hadn't let her stay to see it. "It wouldn't be fair, or right. You have so much still to do."

Harry gently patted her back. "I won't, Hermione," he said. "I'll do my best to survive, just for you."

She sniffled once and hugged him harder, then let him go and turned to Draco. "I suppose that goes for you too, Malfoy," she said. Her voice was perfectly ungracious, but a faint smile tugged at her lips.

"So glad to have your good opinion, Granger," said Draco, but he inclined his head to her, though he wore no matching smile.

Harry turned to receive a handshake from Ron and a half-hug from Ginny. "I wish Mum had let us stay," said Ron, frowning. "But she said that the twins were old enough to risk their lives, and we weren't." Resentment curdled his voice for just a moment before he brightened and recovered. "Be sure to tell us all about the battle in letters, mate, all right?"

Ginny nodded fervently, though her eyes, aimed over Harry's shoulder, were scanning the room for Blaise. "I want to know how all the spells from our club got used," she told Harry.

"I promise I'll remember," said Harry. It was amazing how easy it was to laugh and joke with people who wouldn't be here to see Midsummer, he thought, while he could hardly speak of anything but deeply serious strategy to the people who would stay.

"Good." Ginny gave him a second nod, and then went in search of her boyfriend. Harry turned to say goodbye to Neville. His grandmother had considered giving him permission to stay, but in the end had decided that she would rather have her grandson beside her.

Neville flushed with pleasure when Harry reminded him about his promise to find a counter for Indigena Yaxley's plants. "I'll send you the seedlings as soon as I have a viable plant, Harry," he said, his eyes glinting with excitement. "I'm not far from breeding one to counter the vines that stop wandless magic, I think."

“Good for you, Neville!” Harry said, and his ears flushed even more.

Harry turned away to bid farewell to the others, telling himself he could relax and ignore other pressing duties until noon. When he was done here, he intended to go up to the Astronomy Tower and watch the carriages that would bear them to the Hogsmeade Station safely out of sight.

“I think I can see Neville,” Harry said, leaning forward and putting his hand over his eyes. Draco tugged him back from the edge of the Tower—not gently. Owen and Michael, who’d accompanied them there, had stirred uneasily, but they settled back when Draco pulled on Harry’s robe. Harry supposed he was making them nervous, but he didn’t really see why. It wasn’t as though a wind were blowing, and the eastern sky behind them gleamed with the colors of the Light’s blessing on their coming battle.

“You can’t see Longbottom,” snorted Draco. “With those weak eyes of yours, Harry? It’s a miracle you see the Snitch.”

Harry ignored him, watching the carriages as they trundled onwards. He could see the thestrals that pulled them, and so, he guessed, could everyone else on the Tower with them. He wondered idly what the students inside the carriages who’d never witnessed a death thought. Didn’t they ever get curious about what made the vehicles move? Of course, they probably just assumed it was magic.

It was a glorious June morning, with the sun sparkling off the lake’s water and the dew on the grass and several thousand other things that Harry wouldn’t have imagined it could find an excuse to sparkle off. Harry experienced a moment of pure longing that he wasn’t in one of those carriages, going home to an ordinary family who loved him, laughing and joking with his brother, and perhaps trying to play a swift game of Exploding Snap before they arrived at the station.

Then he told himself firmly not to be an idiot. What he had wasn’t the destiny he would have chosen, but there were much worse ones.

“Come on, Harry,” Draco said. “I’m bored.”

Harry lingered a moment longer, though, determined to watch the carriages out of sight. The lead one hadn't gone far yet, just passing the edge of the lake.

He felt the moment when the wards vanished, the magic sucked out of them. He jerked up straight, his heart so loud in his ears that the sound of it hurt. That cannot mean what I think it means. It cannot—

And then the Death Eaters came out of the Forbidden Forest.

Harry thought he screamed. Draco grabbed his arm, and Owen and Michael grabbed his cloak, as if to hold him back from diving off the Tower. Harry knew he was fighting them, filled with conflicting impulses—to summon his Firebolt and get down there, to warn McGonagall, to shout until all the professors realized what was going on and spilled forth from the castle—

And then it was already too late. The first Death Eaters had aimed their wands and cried out the Killing Curse, and blasts of green light struck the first carriage. Harry heard a terrified scream that cut off in mid-note. Someone was dead.

The Death Eaters were running with their cloaks billowing behind them. They wrenched open the doors of the carriage and dragged bodies, two of them, small enough to be second-years, out of it. Then they manhandled the two struggling, shrieking survivors to the ground. More Death Eaters were coming out of the Forest, aiming their wands in curses that worked to stop the coaches and send the thestrals rearing and tossing their heads. Screams shattered the morning.

Harry's magic flared out of control. He used it to tear free of the grip of all three people holding him, and ran for the stairs down from the Astronomy Tower. The same thing was happening that had happened in the Forbidden Forest, that had happened in the woods where the magic had taken them for Walpurgis Night and let them hunt a white stag; the stones yielded in front of him, walls turned to misty remembrances of themselves, and he ran more quickly than anything mortal possibly could have.

He was calling even as he ran, intoning the Summoning Charm in his head again and again, and halfway down the stairs, his Firebolt met him. Harry swung his leg over it, and in a moment he was zipping down the stairs faster than his feet could ever have taken him, hunched small on the broom so as not to bump into anyone who might be pounding up or down the stairs in search of him.

There came the moment when Voldemort did something more than swallow the wards. His magic felt like a vast, dark, rearing wave, clouding half the sky. Harry felt him begin to swallow the magic from those students the Death Eaters had captured, and even through the stone, their cries seemed to reach him.

Harry reached the doors of the entrance hall at last, and blasted outward. The wards that McGonagall had put around the castle itself sparkled ahead of him, tightening as they tried to insure that no enemies could reach Hogwarts. Harry, not without regret, threw his magic forward, tearing a hole that he closed behind him when he was on the other side, and curled out over the grounds, moving towards the line of carriages and the Death Eaters wrestling students out of them.

Even as he moved, he saw a flare of magic from beside one of the carriages, the first sign of someone fighting back. It was Neville, his rage and fear lending him incredible strength. Harry saw one Death Eater go flying backwards, struck by something that appeared to be a forked lightning bolt. Then Neville turned and tugged the little girl that Death Eater had been holding towards him, shielding her with his body as he began running madly towards the castle.

Other spells struck across the battlefield. Death Eaters were burning with Ardesco, and staggering from the gusts of wind that came with Ventus. Harry saw Ron leading a troop of younger Gryffindor students back towards Hogwarts, and Ginny, her red hair streaming, staying behind to stand guard for three Ravenclaw first-years, who ran screaming and crying for safety.

“Harry!”

He swung his head. That was Hermione, motioning him frantically towards a carriage that had stopped at the edge of the lake. Harry dived, and caught a glimpse of a startled Death Eater, long blonde hair appearing from under her hood, holding a wand to Luna's temple.

Harry didn't ask himself about right or wrong; he simply lashed out, forming his magic into a snake, and swallowed the Death Eater's magic. She was crying as she staggered and dropped to one knee. Luna stepped away from her, looking vaguely puzzled. Hermione seized her hand and ran for Hogwarts.

Harry kicked back into the sky, half-dizzy with his newly-acquired power, looking around frantically for Voldemort. Dark power roared like a black flame behind him as he swung over the lake, and Harry turned that way.

Merlin knew how he'd assembled them that quickly, but Voldemort was there with a dozen children ranged in front of him, all of them either first-years or extremely small second-years. Harry hovered to a stop as he saw the magic blazing around them. A Dark Arts curse, he knew that, but not one he recognized.

Voldemort laughed softly. He wore no more intimidating garment than a dark cloak, but his magic draped hissing over him like a hundred serpents, and filled the day with an oppression that reminded Harry of Midwinter. His face remained bowed, but, coiled at his feet, a serpent made of stitched-together flesh reared. Its eyes were scarlet, and it stared directly at Harry. Harry knew what Voldemort was using to see, now.

"Such a simple test, Harry," Voldemort crooned. "I know that I cannot kill you until Midsummer, but you could make matters much simpler if you came to me and yielded yourself now. Your life for these children's, shall we say?" He waved a lazy hand, and the curse around them flared with obscene black life, letting Harry recognize it.

Life-Web. Harry felt his pulse pick up, hammering in his throat. Shit.

The Life-Web would tie up to twenty people together, and put the rein of their combined life-force in the caster's hand. He could will them to die at any moment, and they would. He could will them pain. He could will them suffering. He could will them to go mad. Harry had encountered mention of it when he was looking up ways to break Ariadne's Web; he thought Voldemort hadn't used it at Durmstrang only because the school was too big.

And it was another spell, like the Fisher King Curse Augustus had used on Adalrico, that could only be broken by the original caster.

"It tempts you, doesn't it, Harry?" Voldemort whispered, and tugged the tendril of black light that ran to his fingers. One girl, a Slytherin first-year whom Harry vaguely recognized, fell, face running with tears, too terrified even to scream. Harry thought her leg was broken. "Your life for theirs. Come closer, come lower, come to me, and I'll dismiss the Life-Web. I'll let them run home to their parents and have a normal life again."

"You're lying," said Harry, but his voice shook, and he could feel his body tingle with his own helplessness. Draco's words rang in his ears, asking what would happen if Voldemort ever tempted him to sacrifice his life for a dozen children he held captive. Would he be able to resist the temptation?

"You can't take that chance, can you?" Voldemort asked, and a boy in Gryffindor robes began to scream and scream, his limbs extending around him as if stretched on an invisible rack. Harry cast a healing spell in his general direction; other magic could still affect victims in a Life-Web, until the caster noticed it and refused to permit it. But Voldemort was obviously watching for anything that would spare the children, and after only a moment of relief, the boy went back to crying out.

Harry reached out sharply, trying to drain the magic that composed the Life-Web. It flared back at him, and flung his absorber abilities away. Voldemort chuckled. "The laws of magic are absolute, Harry," he said. "When they say that this curse cannot be broken except by the one who cast it, that holds true for anything that you might do to try and break it."

Harry became aware of other screams behind him. He had to turn and help the others. He had to protect the people fleeing to the castle. Even if the professors and his allies had come out to help—and he was unsure if McGonagall would be willing to lower the wards for that, what she would decide was the greater danger—there were still too many Death Eaters, over a hundred on the grounds already, and more flooding out of the Forbidden Forest. He had to do things other than hover over Voldemort and make impossible choices about a dozen children in a Life-Web.

But he could not leave them, either.

His vision narrowed to a tiny point, and the broomstick spun dangerously. Harry grabbed and steadied it, and heard Voldemort laugh.

“Well, Harry? What is it to be? What is your choice?”

Harry could attack Voldemort, but that glittering dark power draped over him, augmented by the magic he’d swallowed from Hogwarts students, said he wouldn’t win. And even if he managed, by some miracle, to kill Voldemort, that wouldn’t break the Life-Web. The children would most likely follow him into death, if what Harry remembered from reading about Life-Webs where the caster died was true.

Shouts sounded from behind him. Intermingled among the cries of pain and desperation were equally desperate, equally pained shouts of his name.

The world roared around him, and for every moment that passed while he dithered, someone else got hurt.

He had to choose.

Harry forced his eyes open, and chose.

Other magic could still affect victims in a Life-Web, until the caster noticed it and refused to permit it. Harry struck quickly, therefore, intoning the words in his head as his eyes moved from child to child.

Adsulto cordis. Adsulto cordis. Adsulto cordis.

The Gryffindor boy was the first to stop screaming, as the Heart Attack Spell killed him. Then went the Slytherin girl, whose face smoothed into an expression of blank surprise out of screaming about her broken leg. Then the Hufflepuff girl next to them, falling over without a gasp.

Voldemort, the snake's eyes fixed on Harry, didn't notice what was happening at first, and then he cried out in a mixture of rage and shock. Harry felt his magic shifting, trying to figure out what spell was doing this and block it. He was obviously hindered by his own belief that Harry would never kill anyone when he could rescue them, however, and for long moments the spell was still able to get through.

Harry, his eyes wide, dry, aching, feeling each heartbeat burst in his ears, flare and then die like a firework, hoped he had made the right choice, quick death over endless suffering that would not have ended, he thought, even if he gave himself up, because if he had not made the right choice it was too much to bear, and he killed the last first-year in the Life-Web just as Voldemort caught on to what was happening and moved to will their hearts back to normal. Then he snarled, and his magic rose after Harry like a spitting dragon.

Harry wheeled, sending the Firebolt towards the battlefield, and curving his absorbere gift around him like another Argutus, draping it from his shoulders and letting it swallow the magic of all the Death Eaters it could grab. The ones chasing the children who were running for Hogwarts noticed the difference first, and began to scream themselves, in primal pain and shock. Then Harry was among those who thought something was wrong and swung to look at him, and rapidly ripping away their strength, making it dwindle to nothing, in some cases, and making some wizards almost Squibs in others before they could Apparate away. And all the while, Voldemort's power ravened at his back.

Swollen with new magic, Harry swung around and met Voldemort with a tremendous slap that he thought echoed in the ears of everyone all across Hogwarts's grounds. Harry felt Voldemort reel back, and followed that with another slap, one that he knew came close to reaching into his enemy's magical core. The sky shook around him, blazing with strange light, and he heard thunder and screaming in his ears.

Voldemort leaned back from him, leery—either of his power or of the prophecy, Harry didn't know—and Harry turned once more, this time using the stolen power to drape over and secure the last run of the last students to Hogwarts. McGonagall had lowered the wards on the castle, after all, and opened the doors of the entrance hall, and Harry could see the professors running out, grabbing students' arms and pulling them inside, casting spells to hinder the few Death Eaters still after them, and repairing the wards again once the students managed to cross to safety. Harry scanned the grounds, saw a witch in a white mask chasing a group of Ravenclaws, and poured his boiling rage down a channel at her. She ceased to exist in the next moment, and the Ravenclaws made it, huddling behind Professor Sprout as she swept them all inside.

Harry did not know how many would have died if he had not turned when he did. He knew exactly how many had died because he had hesitated so long, though. When he faced the carnage, he could count the smaller bodies littered on the ground. Students dead and drained of their magic, and, by the lake, dead because he had chosen to kill them.

The world was spinning gently within his head, and his vision widened and then narrowed again, and his breath came in gasps. He did not know whether he had made the right decision, but he knew one thing.

If I had not chosen to lure him to Hogwarts on Midsummer Day, he would never have come here at all, and they would still be alive.

Guilt piled on top of him until Harry felt the need to bow his shoulders, but he remained hovering instead, staring towards Voldemort. If he intended to launch an attack now, then Harry would have to be ready to meet it.

Instead, Voldemort cast Sonorus, so that everyone in Hogwarts could hear his voice.

“I want Harry Potter,” his voice said, from every corner and every direction. “He is the price for your lives. Each and every one of you will live if you stay in the castle until Midsummer, and then each and every one of you will die if you attempt to shield Harry Potter from me. No one hurts the Lord Voldemort as he has and lives, but Lord Voldemort keeps his promises. You have thirteen days to think on this. Come Midsummer morning, I will attack without mercy.” Then his voice vanished.

Harry waited, but Voldemort was striding back across the battlefield, the flesh-snake slithering beside him from the look of it, and the surviving Death Eaters had retreated into the Forbidden Forest. Harry, his chest heaving, looked at the students’ bodies and wondered if it was safe to recover them.

A moment later, every body in sight began to bubble with black liquid and turn putrid. Harry swallowed back bile as he watched them dissolve, liquefy into floating purple and green globs. He had to turn his back to keep from losing his breakfast, at the smell and the sight and the knowledge that Voldemort had done this specifically so that no bodies could be brought back to the parents.

Harry remained hovering for some moments, both to keep guard and to count. Fifty-one, plus the dozen at the lake...

Sixty-three. Sixty-three people I’ve killed.

He flew back towards Hogwarts, through the last hole in the wards, which closed the moment he was inside. He landed near the entrance hall, and, as if in a dream, felt someone hugging him. He didn’t turn, didn’t look up to find out who it was, probably Draco or Snape, or maybe Connor. It didn’t matter. Remembering the choice and the number was what mattered.

I made the choice. I don’t know if it was the right one. And there will certainly be people in Hogwarts who want to turn me over to Voldemort, in hopes that he’ll keep his promise and let them live. He won't, of course, but that's what they could think will happen. And they'll see his not attacking Hogwarts as a powerful man's choice, rather than, as it is really is, fear and the belief that he can't kill me until Midsummer anyway.

Thirteen days of siege.

This will be hard.

And I do not know if I made the right choice.

Chapter Eighty-Eight: Path of Broken Glass

Minerva stood on the Astronomy Tower and watched with black hatred as Voldemort invested Hogwarts' grounds.

He had returned, scarcely five minutes after he had gone into the Forbidden Forest, with more Death Eaters. In fact, there were several hundred, a fact which dazzled and dazed her. The Dark Lord had never managed to summon that many except in the very last days of his power, just before he fell at Godric's Hollow. His recruiters must have been busy, especially among those students of Durmstrang whom Karkaroff would have had a chance to try and corrupt, but Minerva couldn't understand why. Why would they listen to him? What could he promise them? What made them so certain that he would not merely fall again?

And these Death Eaters had obviously practiced what they were going to do when they arrived in the grounds, or at least been told. They set up neat and immediate camps, lines of tents carefully protected with wards that Minerva recognized as those that would resist both weather and fire. The second kind made her want to laugh. Do they think we're going to be launching fireballs at them from the castle?

Well, they might, she supposed. She continued watching, and in a moment saw the reason why Voldemort and his minions had been able to pass through the Forbidden Forest so freely.

The ground shook as the giants arrived, at least twenty of them, all twelve feet tall and grunting as they set their immense weapons—clubs and spears—down on the Quidditch Pitch. The moment they were settled, one of the Death Eaters strode over to them from the middle of the camp. Minerva couldn't make out who it was from this distance, where he was just a moving dark robe, but thought it was probably Karkaroff, the wizard who had contacted the giants in the first place. Now he appeared to be making some kind of speech to them.

Minerva gave a rapid shiver, and hoped that Voldemort would keep his word, as much as that was possible, and not attack Hogwarts before Midsummer. They badly needed to come up with some kind of plan that would incorporate this many giants. Harry had made a few contingency plans for them, but not even he had suspected that Voldemort would bring more than ten.

Harry...

Minerva swallowed around the pain in her throat. Everyone in Hogwarts had heard Voldemort's final promise, because that was his intention. The adults would know better than to trust him. But the students, even the older students, might not. They might think they could earn passage out of the siege by turning Harry over. Minerva wondered, with resignation nearly as cold as her hatred, how long it would be before one of them would try.

She abruptly swung around, her eyes wide. She had wards up to prevent Apparition anywhere in Hogwarts; she was certain that if that weren't the case, then some of the Death Eaters would already have entered that way. But now the wards were telling her that strangers had entered anyway.

Godric appeared at her side a moment later, gasping as if he'd run. His robes looked rumpled, and his eyes were wide with fear. He was so upset that when his feet passed through one side of the Tower, he didn't seem to care.

"Minerva!" he cried. "There are Death Eaters using Portkeys to appear inside Hogwarts! A supply closet on the fifth floor, an old snogging room near the Prefects' Bathroom, one of the abandoned classrooms on the second floor—"

"I feel them," Minerva snapped, and began to run. "Just three pairs, so far?"

"Yes!" Godric kept pace with her. "But there may be more any moment. After all, many of them are going to know what Hogwarts looks like inside, since they were students here." The bitter undercurrent in his voice was strong.

Minerva nodded, and reached out a hand to him. Godric clasped it, though she felt only the faintest brush of warm flesh; he was most solid near the anchor-stone, and they were far from it.

Concentrating, they brought another ward whipping up, one they'd prepared but hadn't used because they had known Portkeys might be necessary to employ at some point. This one rendered all Portkeys useless within the school itself. The wards on the grounds were so shredded from Voldemort absorbing their magic that Minerva wouldn't have wanted to try and extend this protection there, if it were even possible. Now, though, the Death Eaters who had ventured into the school were trapped.

"Where are Rowena and Helga?" Minerva demanded, when that was done. They were coming down from the Tower now, and she was cursing her old bones. Well, when needs must, dignity is no answer, she thought, and dropped into her Animagus form. A tabby cat could bound down the stairs and around corners much faster than an old witch could.

"Rowena is going after the ones near the Prefects' Bathroom," said Godric, sounding a bit calmer. "And Helga is facing them on the second floor. They left the fifth floor for us, since we were closest."

Minerva mewed to show she understood, and then hurried forward. One of the moving staircases tried to turn on her, but she jumped from one revolving step to another, toe-walked across a banister, and sprang easily to the floor on the other side. She picked up speed after that, as if she had seen a mouse desperate to get away.

She saw the supply closet that Godric was talking about the moment they reached the fifth floor, because it was standing open, and no students would have been on this floor; Minerva had ordered their Heads of House to take them back to their common rooms the moment they were all inside. Two heavysset, unfamiliar men were walking hastily up the corridor, their hands on their wands. They obviously hadn't noticed her yet.

Minerva fought the urge to arch her back and spit, which would only alert them to her presence. She changed back instead, and drew her wand. A nonverbal Body-Bind caught one of them, and the other spun around, his face red, as his companion toppled to the floor.

He called out a curse Minerva knew better than to stand in the way of, and she spun aside as it slammed into the stone where she'd been standing. Godric flew at the man, but he dodged, his attention focused on Minerva. She leveled her wand, meanwhile, and murmured, "Transformo columbae!"

In a moment, the dangerous Death Eater was a helplessly fluttering dove, his wand clattering to the floor. Minerva conjured a cage and stuck him in that. The dove pecked at the bars and glared at her, as much as a bird could. Minerva meanwhile Stunned the other man, then released him from the Body-Bind and Transfigured him into a goldfish, conjuring a bowl of water immediately. She liked Transfiguring her enemies. It didn't kill them, but it kept them from causing trouble.

Carrying cage and bowl, she looked up at Godric. "Do Rowena and Helga need any help?"

"No," he said, drifting down to let his feet rest on the floor again. "Rowena knows so many spells I don't—she handled hers just fine. And you haven't ever seen what Helga's like when a student's threatened, Minerva." He shivered a bit. "She had the stones of the castle eat them."

Minerva nodded fiercely, satisfied. "And there are no other Death Eaters in Hogwarts?"

"No," said Godric firmly. "We felt only three pulls on the wards." He closed his eyes and sighed. "But this means that the students won't be able to use Portkeys to escape, doesn't it?"

"I'm afraid so," said Minerva. The pounding excitement of the battle had faded, allowing her to remember their predicament. "The moment I lower the wards, more Death Eaters would come in."

"Most likely," Godric agreed. "Then the Floo Networks are our best bet, I would think—"

“Not so.”

Minerva turned around. Peter was standing behind her, his face pale. Minerva frowned at him. “You aren’t at the Tower?” she asked.

“I asked Acies to watch the Gryffindors so I could come and speak with you,” said Peter. “And I looked in your office first. The Floo connection’s gone, Minerva. Destroyed. A spell I’ve never seen before, cast on it. The only thing I could tell was that it was a time-delayed one.”

“How could you be sure the Floo connection was destroyed?” Minerva asked, not wanting to believe it. She had thought they would manage to evacuate the students somehow, not listening to Voldemort’s insane dictum, and that, come Midsummer, only those who had chosen to face battle would remain.

“Because,” said Peter softly, “the fireplace collapsed. I lifted some of the stones back to their original places and cast the Floo powder in it, but there’s not a spark. No fire will burn in it. I tried every incantation I knew. And then I sent rats to the other Floo connections—the hospital wing, and Severus’s rooms, and all the others in the school. They all came back with the same message. Destroyed.”

“I—there has to be some mistake.” Minerva pressed the goldfish bowl to her face, feeling faint. “I refuse to think that a saboteur could have entered Severus’s rooms. A rat might be able to get in, Peter, but he has wards against everything else. Even Animagi.”

“If someone managed to cast a spell on your Floo connection, Minerva, that wouldn’t matter,” Godric said, his face distressed again. “They’re all linked to the one in the Headmistress’s office, so that she can prevent just anyone from coming into Hogwarts. Remove that keystone, and the others are going to break.”

Minerva restrained the impulse to utter some truly vile curses. “We have a traitor inside Hogwarts, then,” she said flatly.

Peter nodded. Godric murmured, “It seems so.”

Minerva closed her eyes and tried to control the reeling sickness in her belly. She had welcomed all of Harry's allies in her office on Friday afternoon, making sure they understood what was expected of them as long as they stayed in Hogwarts. The professors had been there as well. Anyone would have had a chance to cast a spell on her fireplace, particularly one that she didn't recognize, and one that was time-delayed to have no immediate effect. It could have been any of them.

She took a deep breath, and shook her head, and forced her eyes to open. "Then Voldemort has managed to shut most of the ways out of Hogwarts," she murmured. "I can't lower the wards against Apparition and Portkeys in case his Death Eaters enter. The Floo connections are damaged. Anyone flying over the grounds on a broom will be risking his or her life, and certainly the lives of any students."

"There are still some ways out," said Peter softly. "I was a Marauder, Minerva. I'll send the rats through the secret passages, to spy them out and see which ones are safe. That was actually what I was coming to your office to see you about."

Minerva felt her heart begin to beat again. "Thank you, Peter," she said, and smiled at him. "I appreciate it."

Indigena was beginning to wonder if she would spend most of her days spitting dirt.

She crouched in a large tunnel that led from Hogwarts into Hogsmeade—the inhabitants of the village had already fled, of course, leaving their homes and shops open to Death Eater foraging—and wound it with her vines. Other plants snaked through the soil in all directions, finding and digging into the passages that led across the grounds. The Dark Lord didn't think that many of them would see use, since most of them came up somewhere in the middle of the Death Eater encampment, but he wanted to guard the ones his hostages might use to escape.

It's easier if I think of them as hostages and not victims, Indigena thought, head cocked to the side as she wreathed the tunnel with another hanging drape of green tendrils and white flowers. The white flowers would look harmless enough, even pretty, to anyone who met them. But they contained an incense that would incapacitate any human, dropping them dreaming to the floor of the passage, where the tendrils could grab them and hand them to Indigena.

Indigena had just finished the third curtain of white flowers when she paused. The tendrils that coiled around the tunnel further towards Hogwarts—not much beyond her, really, since the Dark Lord’s strict instructions were to leave Hogwarts alone until Midsummer—were telling her about intruders. But not human intruders, or the flowers would already have breathed. Indigena listened to the reports of vibrations for a moment, then smiled.

“I think I hear the pitter-patter of little feet,” she remarked to the loops that draped over her shoulders. “Shall we do something about that?”

The vines agreed, and lashed out from her shoulders, traveling fast down the tunnel. Indigena waited, and soon they hauled several squeaking, thrashing rats within reach of her wand.

Indigena examined them minutely, and then cast several spells to be sure. They were all ordinary rats, not an Animagus among them. The traitor in the castle who went by the name of Peter Pettigrew and was a rat Animagus had probably summoned them, though.

She had the tendrils fling them back down the tunnel, and commanded the other plants in the secret passages where the rats had tried to sense a way out for the students to do the same. It would do no harm, and probably much good, to send Pettigrew’s little spies back to him and report that there was no way out where Yaxley’s vines coiled.

Indigena encouraged her plants to grow even more thickly after that. Naughty traitors, to imagine that there is a way out for them while I am on my Lord’s side.

Nineteen. And sixty-three.

"I don't know what the Ministry can do to help us, if anything," said Harry, keeping his voice low. He was pacing in the corridor just outside the hospital wing, where he'd been to visit those who had escaped from the battle with wounds. He'd invoked the communication spell to Priscilla Burke as soon as he left, as she was the only person in the Ministry he'd counted as enough of an ally to have taught the spell to. "We're trapped here with no way out. Someone's destroyed the Floo connections. The Headmistress has to keep up wards against Apparitions and Portkeys, in case the Death Eaters leap inside the moment they're lowered. Brooms are too dangerous, for obvious reasons, and Indigena Yaxley's plants are blocking the tunnels that lead out through the grounds."

He heard Priscilla make a noise of frustration that seemed to emanate from just above his wrist, but she didn't say anything for a long moment. That gave Harry leisure to lean against the wall and make the count in his head again.

Nineteen. And sixty-three. That makes eighty-two. Harry cradled the number in his mind like the key Arithmancy equation that would have allowed him to pass his OWL. Nineteen alive, but drained of magic. Sixty-three dead. Eighty-two people I've hurt. And how many hundreds have I failed?

"You have to understand, Harry," said Priscilla then, "we already have parents going mad and insisting the Ministry do something. They're not going to take it kindly when we tell them there's no way into or out of Hogwarts."

Harry heard a bark of laughter escape before he could stop himself. He bit his lips after that, though, because if he started laughing, he knew he wouldn't stop. He began pacing again, and listened to the way his steps on the floor seemed to bespeak numbers. Sixty-three. Nineteen. Sixty-three. Nineteen. "And why do you think Voldemort is doing this?" he asked her bluntly. "He wants to panic people. I'm sure he'd just love it if parents came onto Hogwarts grounds searching for a way to rescue their children. More hostages, and he could torture them in front of the walls and know that at least one child would see his mother or father dying in front of him. Lovely plan, to let them come. It's all working out for him."

"Harry," said Priscilla, voice growing harder. Harry couldn't tell which emotion drove her more, desperation or pain. "We can't stop them from going, if they choose to. The Ministry doesn't have enough Aurors to encircle Hogwarts and keep people from getting into the midst of the Death Eaters. Not to mention that he would attack if he saw us show up, anyway," she added.

"If you value their lives, you'll issue a warning about how stupid they'd be if they try to come here," said Harry, and rubbed his eyes with his hand. He felt exhausted, and it wasn't much after noon. Of course, the onrush of bad news and what he'd done that morning and the numbers repeating in his head would be enough to tire anyone out, but he needed to remain awake. "Make it blunt, no language spared. People have to know they're risking their lives if they come here, and their children's sanity. I don't care how much they miss their children, against that. They should stay away."

"They won't like it," Priscilla repeated.

"That, frankly, is not my problem," said Harry, and matched the snap in his voice to hers. "You may have missed this, but it's a little hard for me to influence parents when I'm in Hogwarts and trying to make sure that Voldemort doesn't take any of the hundreds of potential hostages around me."

Another little silence, and Harry went back to pacing. Sixty-three. Nineteen. Sixty-three. Nineteen.

"I'm sorry," Priscilla said quietly. "The Ministry's been besieged with owls and visitors since people started Apparating into London from Hogsmeade and reporting that there were Death Eaters at Hogwarts, and it's had me—upset. How's Thomas?"

Harry shrugged, then remembered she couldn't see him. "Well, from what I know," he said.

“That’s good, then,” Priscilla said, her voice a bit lighter. “We’ll do what we can, Harry, to keep people from panicking and people from coming to Hogwarts. I can’t promise we’ll be completely successful.”

“Do what you can,” Harry said, and then cut off the communication spell and leaned against the wall for a moment. Sixty-three. Nineteen. Sixty-three. Nineteen. And eighty-two altogether.

Before he could close his eyes and start thinking about what was going to happen next, Draco came through the doors of the hospital wing. Madam Pomfrey had wanted him in the hospital wing to help comfort the wounded Slytherin students, as he was one of the few who hadn’t been out on the battlefield himself. Snape was in his offices brewing the healing potions that Pomfrey was already running out of. That, Harry thought, was the only reason he’d been left alone so long after Snape’s initial catch and embrace of him.

From the look on Draco’s face, though, his solitude was about to end. Harry pushed himself up and tried to brace for the question.

“What happened when you were hovering over the lake?” Draco asked quietly.

Harry winced. Trust Draco to go straight to the heart of the most painful matter. But hiding this wasn’t something he could do. He had to let Snape, Draco, and eventually everyone else dear to him—and, of course, the children’s parents, when he was able to contact them—know exactly what he’d done, what he’d turned into out there.

“Voldemort had a dozen first-years and second-years in a Life-Web,” he said. “He offered to let them go if I would come down to him.”

“But you didn’t,” said Draco, and stared at him.

Harry shook his head. “Only the caster can break a Life-Web. He might have promised to let them go, but then I’d have to depend on him to keep his word. He could will them to die, hurt, go mad, anything, as long as he held that damn web. And he could have broken any spell I put on them, once he knew what it was, spells to heal them or levitate them away or do anything else. And while I hung there trying to decide what to do, people were dying around me.” He closed his eyes for a moment.

“What did you do?” Draco’s voice was as soft as a prayer.

“I used a spell that he didn’t think I would ever use, and so didn’t counter in time,” Harry answered, opening his eyes. “I killed them by giving them heart attacks.”

Draco was staring at him, and Draco’s stare filled all the world. Harry stared back. He deserved anything that might appear there, Merlin knew. Disgust, hatred, anger, shock, rejection... The list of possible emotions was so long that he hadn’t finished it before Draco moved.

Draco’s arms curled around Harry and tugged him hard against him. Harry leaned his head on Draco’s shoulder, and wondered what emotion this was. He knew what he wanted it to be, what emotion the warm embrace seemed to proclaim it, but he also knew that he’d changed, and no one would ever look at him the same way again. That meant Draco couldn’t have been hugging him in simple love.

“Merlin,” Draco said into his neck. “Oh, Merlin. Harry.” The next moment, Harry felt hot tears land on the side of his collar.

Harry patted his back then, his own body relaxing. He could deal with this. Grief and horror were feelings he knew well, knew how to comfort and soothe. And if they were directed at him, well, he knew how to deal with that, too. He’d seen them in his parents’ eyes during the last day of their trial.

“I’m so sorry,” Draco whispered. “I’m so sorry this happened to you. Harry—that can’t—I don’t know what else you could have done, but I can’t—that can’t have been easy,” he finished, his words choking around the sobs and limping to a halt.

Harry leaned back against the wall with his arms still around Draco, his hand still stroking soothing, comforting circles. He had the feeling he’d be doing this a lot in the next few days. Best to get used to this now.

“Harry, Harry, Harry,” were Draco’s next words, like a mantra. “Why aren’t you crying, too?”

“Because if I begin,” said Harry, staring over Draco’s head at the far wall, “if I start now, I’m not going to stop.”

Draco gave a convulsive shudder, and then abruptly stiffened in Harry’s arms. Harry could feel himself frown. What is it? Has he just now realized the full implications of what I’ve done?

“You think that, don’t you?” Draco asked, voice low and tense as an accusation.

“Think what?”

“You think it’s your fault. You think you should have made another decision, even though there was no other decision you could make.” Draco pulled himself away and grabbed Harry’s shoulders, shaking him. “Damn it, Harry, don’t do this! That’s how he’ll get inside your head. He doesn’t need to send dreams, not when he can make your own guilt eat you alive!”

“If I don’t feel this guilt,” Harry said quietly, not resisting the shaking, “then I’d already be gone, another Dumbledore or another Voldemort. This way, I know I’m still human.”

Draco said several things a properly-bred Malfoy, in Harry’s opinion, shouldn’t know. “And what solution would have been better?” he demanded then. “You, giving yourself up? You said it, Harry. You could have done that, and he still wouldn’t have released the Life-Web. All you would have achieved was your own martyrdom and a kind of squalling pride that at least you did the right thing. Fine if you want to die a Gryffindor, but damn you, you have to stay alive.”

“Oh, I know that,” said Harry, mildly puzzled that Draco would think he didn’t know that. “Boy-Who-Lived and all that, right?”

“Stop it, stop it, stop it,” Draco said, leaning in towards him now, voice low and intense. “Damn you, Harry, please. Don’t do this. You’re blaming yourself, and that's going to tear you apart, and then how are we going to survive this siege?"

"We're going to survive it because I'll make myself into a symbol," said Harry, and stepped back, tearing away from Draco's grip. "A symbol of hope or a symbol of hatred, whatever they need. You know there will be people who want to turn me over to Voldemort, in hopes that he'll keep his promise. I can't even blame them. I hoped, for one insane moment, that he would have kept his promise if I'd gone down to him."

Draco tried to grab him again. Harry dodged. He'd felt the trembling and cracking of the edges of his control as he stood there. He couldn't stay. Draco would hold him again and try to make him—Harry didn't even know what it would be, but it would involve admission of guilt and perhaps crying, and it would shatter him. He couldn't shatter, not now.

Draco called after him. Harry walked down the corridor and didn't look back. He had to get to McGonagall and offer her his strength to help bolster the wards on the castle itself.

Owen had ears. And he didn't like what he heard.

He and Michael had shadowed Harry for most of the morning and early afternoon, but as Harry spent a large part of the early evening cooped up with the Headmistress, they'd gone exploring. They wanted to know what the school thought of Harry, how many were hopeful and how many hostile and how many too terrified to think.

And so they went to the Great Hall, concealed with Dark Arts spells that Professor Fleur-de-lis had taught them at Durmstrang, and watched as the children brought there for dinner conversed and argued with each other. Many conversations were low-voiced, and choked with tears. Unnoticed, though, Owen and Michael could get close to the various House tables and listen in.

"I can't believe she's gone," was a common theme, with a variation of "He's gone," and Owen learned to ignore them. They were grieving, and grieving was a natural process after what had happened on the battlefield this morning. He himself had endured enough of it at Durmstrang, Merlin knew, after yet another day in which he saw yet another fellow student brutally tortured.

The other conversations were the ones that interested him more. The first he heard was between two older Gryffindor students, talking to each other in voices that the crack of cutlery and buzzed whispers of others would normally have concealed.

“Do you think he’s right?” one of them, a pale and rather pretty brown-haired girl, asked the other, a tall boy with dark eyes. “Do you think that if we really gave him Harry, then he’d leave us alone?”

“I don’t know,” said the boy, but not firmly enough to make Owen think he was Harry’s supporter. “We can’t trust him, I suppose. I mean—I know we can’t. But maybe...” His voice trailed off, and he said no more.

“Maybe,” the brown-haired girl whispered, and Owen nearly snorted at what he heard in her voice. Desperate hope, the kind of hope that got in under one’s heart and tore it. There had been some students at Durmstrang who thought that doing just what Bellatrix wanted, even torturing others when she ordered them to, would spare them. It hadn’t worked. And yet people had kept doing it and kept doing it. Stripped down to a question of their own survival or someone else’s, a surprising number of people would choose their own survival.

Owen supposed he couldn’t blame them. They were children, true children, even though the girl looked older than he was. They hadn’t learned, as he had, that you put aside those niggling little hopes and lived through a situation like this by pushing forward and enduring.

He passed the Ravenclaw table, and noticed the largest knot of students he’d seen yet, focused around one furiously whispering girl. Owen moved carefully nearer. One girl looked around suspiciously at the breeze on the back of her neck, but didn’t, of course, see him, so she returned to dancing attendance on the other.

Owen listened, too, and what he heard raised the hairs on the back of his neck.

“—for a reason,” the single, intense girl was saying, gesturing with one hand. “It all happened for a reason. The compulsion spell from Dumbledore, the Dark Arts we learned from Rovenan, everything. It was to prepare us for this. For a situation when we might have to do the right thing because no one else would.” She sat back and stared challengingly at the others.

“Yes, Margaret,” said another, her face troubled, “but the compulsion spell was to make us hate Harry just because Dumbledore hated him. What if this is the same kind of thing? You-Know-Who wants to make us turn on Harry because he hates Harry?”

Margaret shook her head. “Not the same thing,” she said, “not at all. Dumbledore was doing it because he’d been arrested for child abuse, and he hated that. He wanted to resume his power. But You-Know-Who just wants to kill Harry. The point isn’t getting us to hate him. The point is getting him. And you heard what he said. The moment he gets him, he’ll leave us alone. Or he’ll attack without mercy on Midsummer morning.”

Most of the students huddled around her flinched at that. A boy spoke this time. “Can we really trust him to keep his promises, though?”

“I’ve read some histories of the First War,” said Margaret, insistent. “You-Know-Who would sometimes send warnings to those villages he wanted to attack, promising the Death Eaters would strike at such and such a time. And they always did. He keeps his promises. I think he’ll keep this one.”

Owen concealed another snort. He had read those histories, too. What the survivors tended to forget was that Voldemort had only made such “promises” when he was fully come to power, and could use terror of his name just as effectively as actual raids. Before the last year of the War, he had never warned, simply attacked. There hadn’t been a single survivor of the Battle of Valerian.

“It’s something to think about,” said Margaret, with a firm nod.

And you’re someone to watch, Owen thought, and shifted away.

The Hufflepuff table actually exploded in a row as he watched, one that their Head had to come and break up. As she forcibly separated the two boys in the middle, one of them yelled, "I don't care what you say, Zacharias! He's going to kill us all if he doesn't get him!"

"You're being an idiot, Ernie," the other boy, who looked as cool and calm and unruffled as it was possible to be, murmured. "Of course he won't let us go. Why would he? A castle full of hostages to terrify, to torture, and to use on our parents to make sure they don't fight him? Oh, yes, let us go, wonderful idea. He isn't worthy of the name of evil, murdering bastard if he does."

"Some of us might be able to leave," Ernie insisted. It was patently obvious to Owen that he hoped he'd be among them. "You never know—"

"That is enough, both of you," said their Head sharply. "You are coming with me to my office right now."

Owen drifted over to the Slytherin table while that was settled. He didn't hear much there, though. Apart from anything else, some of them were using spells that muffled their conversations, and he had to be careful lest one of them managed to dispel the concealment charm he was using.

He met his brother back in the middle of the Hall, and looked an inquiry at him. Michael shook his head, eyes even darker than usual.

"It's—going to be hard for Harry," he said.

Owen smiled grimly at his twin. "Good thing that he's got us to protect him, then, and that we have a few less scruples than he does," he said, and Michael nodded back, his hand closing on his wand.

Harry stood on top of the North Tower, barely a few inches from the shimmer of Hogwarts's strengthened wards, and looked down at the campfires of Voldemort's army.

And it was an army, a true one. Harry knew that the Death Eaters Indigena had rescued from Tullianum had swelled his ranks, but only by a small amount. The majority of these men and women were new recruits, culled from other countries; Harry thought that he would have had some advance notice if so many Dark wizards had disappeared from Britain.

His hand tightened on the stone for a moment as he watched an owl, dodging towards the school, spiral to the ground in the wake of an Avada Kedavra curse. He wondered grimly whose owl it had been. A parent, trying to send a letter or a Portkey to a child? One of the Daily Prophet's owls attempting valiantly to bring the paper in? One of the regular pieces of correspondence that McGonagall dealt with in her position as Headmistress? They would never know. The Death Eaters had been killing all the owls that either tried to leave the school or reach it since they arrived that morning. Well, of course they would, Harry thought. The owls might bring a means of escape, and Voldemort wouldn't want that.

He supposed he should be in bed. But there was no one to make him go. Harry had Vanished away from Owen and Michael, and Draco when he had come looking for him, and Snape was still in his offices, this time brewing the Veritaserum that McGonagall needed to interrogate the captured Death Eaters.

There was a traitor inside the school. And Harry had brought him there.

He leaned his head on the stone and breathed in the cool air. This high, he couldn't smell the scent of the campfires, and the stars themselves seemed to make the night frosty and distant. He could pretend, for a moment, that he was reading about this situation in a history book or hearing about it as a story long after it was over, and his head could clear.

And then the numbers came back.

Sixty-three. Nineteen. One.

The “one” was that of a girl who'd slipped into a coma when Madam Pomfrey tried to cure the pain curse she'd suffered. The matron was unsure if she'd done it because of the pain curse, or because she was allergic to the potion used. Either way, she was hovering beside her bed now, trying frantically to bring her back to life and to light.

Sixty-three and nineteen and one made eighty-three. Harry was sure the number would climb before it was over.

He turned when he heard a light footstep behind him on the stone. It took him a moment longer to recognize who stood there, because her black robes blended so well with the night around her. Then he saw one of her sleeves flutter for no good reason, and knew it was Pansy.

Pansy, who had missed breakfast, because she must have known that those students would die on the battlefield this morning, and she was sworn by her oaths as a necromancer not to reveal that.

Harry drew in a deep breath, and then let it out again. He wasn't sure what he could say. Even if he gave her words of comfort, she couldn't respond to them, except in the sign language that he didn't know. And he couldn't blame her for not warning him. She was forbidden to.

She edged up beside him, though, and Harry could read the silent appeal in her body language well enough. He reached out and put a hand on her shoulder. The tension flowed out of Pansy, and she bowed her head. The intangible wind playing with the edge of her sleeve seemed to slow. Harry was almost sure he had soothed her.

He smiled at her, and then turned to make his way down the stairs. He'd patrol the school, and see if he encountered anyone roaming out of bed. The professors were so busy comforting all the students that they were bound to miss one or two.

And if that person needed to talk to him, then Harry could listen. If that person needed to punch him, he could allow that, too. If that person needed to scream and shriek in hatred because of what he had done, then Harry could take that, because he was ultimately strong enough to resist it, and he was ultimately in the wrong.

Sixty-three, sang his trainers as they whispered against the steps on the way down. Nineteen. One. Sixty-three. Nineteen. One.

Snape was unsurprised to find that the Death Eaters had already been Transfigured back from a dove and a goldfish when he carried the Veritaserum into McGonagall's office the next morning. They were seated in chairs, not only tied with ropes but stuck in Body-Binds that left their jaws alone hanging loose. The Headmistress looked up from contemplating their faces, and nodded to him.

Snape felt a grim surge of satisfaction as he uncapped the first vial. Dumbledore would have objected to this. In the end, of course, he would have allowed it anyway, after admitting that his methods of trying to persuade the Death Eaters wouldn't work, but he would have dithered long enough to cause harm and get him, morally, off the hook. McGonagall charged ahead and did what she had to do to protect her students, and moral consequences could be faced later.

Somewhat like Harry, in fact.

Draco had come to him last night, when he couldn't find Harry, and told him the tale of the dozen dead children. Snape understood as no one else could have. He'd committed murders even after he became a spy, because that was the only way he could have maintained his cover as one of the most vicious and violent of the Death Eaters. Sometimes he'd tried to find a way out, but with Voldemort's eyes always on him, there was usually no other decision to be made. One did what one had to do, secure in both the boiling bile of one's own conscience and hatred and misunderstanding from those who would never have to make such choices.

Snape wished that Harry had come to him. But Harry had not, and though a few of the other professors had reported seeing him in the halls, they had not approached him. Too busy with their own students, Pomona and Filius had told him when he asked.

Or too afraid, Snape thought, as he tipped the Veritaserum down the first man's throat. They think him marked for death already. No one walks too close to a man like that.

The prisoners became slack-jawed and loose-tongued enough when they had swallowed the potion, and willing to answer McGonagall's questions. For the most part, their answers were as expected. They knew nothing of why Voldemort had wanted to attack Hogwarts early, or who might have destroyed the Floo connections, and he had sent them with Portkeys to force McGonagall to bring down wards that would prevent their use. There were others waiting with Portkeys, and with the word Apparate poised on their lips, for the moment when she might lower those wards to try and send the students home.

Then McGonagall asked, "Does Voldemort mean to keep his promise to attack on Midsummer Day, and Midsummer Day alone?"

"Yes," said the one on the left, a man with dreaming, stupid eyes that Snape was not surprised had joined the Death Eaters. Idiots, the lot of them who would join with him now, he thought, curling his lip. "He will destroy everything on Midsummer. Unless Harry Potter is handed over to him first."

The second said the same thing, in almost the same words, when the Headmistress asked him. McGonagall glanced at Snape, to ask if he had any questions. Snape leaned forward. Both men wore identical robes, and had worn identical masks. Nothing to indicate which one of them was higher-ranking, and if they were both newcomers, as demonstrated by the state of their knowledge so far, then neither would know that much about their Lord's plans anyway.

But he did ask, "How will Voldemort use the giants in battle?"

"I don't know," said one, and then the other.

Snape frowned. He'd noticed that the one on the left had a very slight trace of a French accent, so he focused on him. "How has Voldemort been recruiting in France?"

"Through a contact in Beauxbatons," the Death Eater said dreamily. "I don't know who it is. He passes messages on to former students who are sympathetic to the pureblood cause, and they pass messages on to others."

Snape looked at McGonagall, but she was already standing, moving to her desk and scribbling something down. "When we can send owls again," she said, without looking up, "then I will inform Madame Maxime of the problem on her staff."

Snape felt a surge of gratitude that she had said when and not if. Then he told himself not to be ridiculous. The Headmistress might be the best leader for the school in this time of crisis, but that did not mean he had to feel gratitude towards her. Someone had to keep a clear head in what was rapidly turning into an exploding nest of loathing and fear.

As if the revelation had given her fresh strength, McGonagall returned to the interrogation. She still didn't elicit much that had to do with the present battle, but she was learning essential things about the methods Voldemort had used to find his Death Eaters in France, Spain, Belgium, and Germany. When this siege ended, Snape thought—when, not if—they would be armed with information that might enable other nations to join in and prevent more Dark wizards from flowing into Britain.

And when this is done, I am going to find Harry.

Harry moved carefully along a dungeon corridor. He'd nearly run into Connor in the entrance hall, as his brother passed him on his way to the hospital wing to visit Ginny, who'd sustained a nasty cut to the shoulder protecting the Ravenclaw students yesterday. Harry was glad that he'd concealed himself at the last moment, so Connor couldn't see what he looked like. As it turned out, one of the Hufflepuff boys who'd seen two of his friends riding in the same carriage with him did had wanted to punch him, and while Harry had taken the blow on his cheek without much damage, Connor was sure to fuss over it and pretend it was worse than it was.

He'd almost reached the common room door. He intended to be even more careful in opening it. He'd seen the way some of his Housemates watched him last night. It was one thing to unite against Ravenclaw Death Eaters attacking him in the school. He wondered, now that open war had come at last, how many would be thinking of saving their own skins, and how many had relatives outside the school in masks. He would stay only long enough to retrieve some of the ingredients for a common healing potion from his trunk, and then go to brew it. He could give what was left over to Madam Pomfrey.

A hand closed on his shoulder, and Harry nearly panicked before a too-familiar voice said, "There you are."

Harry turned around in resignation. Snape stood behind him, and his eyes narrowed when he caught sight of Harry's swelling cheek. Harry looked away for a moment.

"You know," said Snape, voice soft with fury, "that making yourself into a martyr will not serve to keep the siege at bay. Why are you doing it?"

Well, at least he's not playing sympathetic. That's a relief. "Because Edgar White needed to work out some of his frustrations, sir," said Harry, his voice neutral. "And by hitting me, he avoided hitting someone else. And it's true that I didn't anticipate that Voldemort would attack early, when I really should have."

Snape gave a jerked-off noise that might have been a laugh in another universe. "We should have anticipated that, Harry," he said. "The professors, and the rest of the school. We thought the students safe enough behind the wards as they went down to the Station; it was only a short carriage ride. We were the ones who did not anticipate that the Dark Lord would swallow those wards. Do not rub the stain of blood so deep into your skin that it will never come out." He tugged hard on Harry's shoulder, turning him around. "And come with me, so that I can give you a healing potion for your cheek."

Harry followed obediently, but did feel compelled to say, "You must know what I've done, sir. Draco would have told you."

"I've heard." Snape did not look at him as he strode rapidly along the corridors. That relieved Harry, but at the same time, he couldn't reconcile it with the fact that Snape was telling him not to make himself a martyr. The lack of sympathy made sense. But why was there still some sympathy left?

“Then you must know what I’ve become,” Harry said.

“Become?” Snape stared at him now.

“The same as Dumbledore,” said Harry, staring into his eyes, willing him to understand. He didn’t open his Occlumency pools, because he didn’t want to let Snape into the echoing cavern of grief and pain and numbers that was his head, but he let as much emotion as he could shine on the surface. “Someone who sacrifices a small number of people for what he calls the greater good. Someone who makes horrible decisions because he let himself be backed into a corner, and then justifies it by saying that he couldn’t have done anything else. I’ve tried to prevent the rot setting in too deep by not justifying my decision, sir, but there’s no getting around the fact that I did this. The person I was two days ago would not have.” He winced as he neared the end of that speech. The swelling at the edge of his jaw was starting to interfere with his talking.

Snape gazed at him in silence. Then he said, “Harry, I committed numerous crimes when I knew what the Light was, when my conscience had been restored to me, because it was the only way I could continue to serve the side I thought was right. I—grieve for it. And I did not let it change my whole perception of myself, because I knew how and why I did it. In time, I came to understand that there are different kinds of courage in the world. This is the courage that a Gryffindor will never understand, the courage to make a decision that the world will hate you for and not hate yourself for it.”

“But that’s exactly what Dumbledore did, sir, and why my mother said I should believe in him,” said Harry. He felt a strand of wondering agitation twine through his brain. Why was Snape doing this? He had changed, he knew he had changed, and Snape, if he had gone through a similar situation, should only know it along with him. “He made the hard decisions that everyone would hate him for—“

“And he tricked himself into believing they were the right ones.” Snape sneered. “Always, he justified himself to himself. In time, he minimized the costs, and then he could always choose the road of sacrifice, because the costs meant nothing to him. You have already resisted that by not justifying your decision. You know what those lives cost. You know you will never make a decision like that as a routine matter of course. You are not Dumbledore, Harry."

"Perhaps not yet," said Harry. "But does it really matter that my action was small and his were larger?"

"Yes," said Snape, voice like a hammer. "Yes, it does. If you will not understand me on that scale, Harry, then understand me on this one. Can you see yourself dwindling into what Dumbledore became at the last?"

"Not right now," said Harry. "But I could become that. I could progress along the road of sacrifice until—"

"Then you are not there yet," said Snape. "And you are aware of it. Unless you insist on believing in destiny like a Hufflepuff and thinking that every action we take advances us in a certain direction regardless of whether we want to go there, then you will resist this temptation. It is only a temptation like the others, Harry, a trap set to destroy you. Think yourself evil, or doomed to become evil, and you are doing to yourself what your mother and Dumbledore wanted to do."

"But what I did was evil!" Harry yelled. "Merlin, why can't you understand that? Every mistake of arrogance, recklessness, stupidity I made yesterday, and before—"

"Then let us examine a situation in which you tortured Voldemort until he released the Life-Web," said Snape, voice emotionless now, the way it was when he lectured on a potion he did not particularly enjoy. "You willingly cause your greatest enemy unimaginable pain until he does your will. A use of compulsion, and a use of agony. And meanwhile, behind you, other children are dying while you wait for Voldemort to crack. And what then?"

Harry snarled at him.

"You see what I am driving at," said Snape. "On some level, you even believe it. There were no right choices, Harry. Those who will cry and scream and blame you for this are those who were not in that situation, and had they been, they could well have done something worse. Let them cry and scream and blame you, if that is what you want, but do not encourage things like this.” He gestured at Harry’s swollen cheek. “That only increases their conviction that they are right and you are wrong, and it will do you more damage than anything else. It weakens you physically, when we need you strong.” He sniffed, and then sneered. “And you have not eaten, slept, or bathed since yesterday morning, have you?”

“No,” said Harry, knowing he sounded, and looked, very small.

“That is more stupid than anything you did on the battlefield,” said Snape, and turned away with a snap of his robes. “Come with me. When you have had the healing potion, you will bathe, eat, and rest. And I do not care if a hundred Hufflepuffs are seeking to punch you for what you did or failed to do yesterday.”

Harry trailed after him, mind a kaleidoscope of shattered pieces. Snape should know corruption if anyone should, since he had served both Dumbledore and Voldemort. He should have recognized the corruption settling in Harry. And yet he had refused to acknowledge it. He had even insisted that Harry’s plan to let other people take their frustrations out on him was the real stupidity here.

Harry hadn’t decided how that made him feel yet.

“I like the idea, but I can’t think of anything that would make them swallow it,” Harry said, leaning on one elbow as he frowned down at Fred and George’s latest creations, a pair of sweets that would cause the people who ate them to go blind until they ate the antidote.

George—well, Harry thought it was George—gave him a fierce smile. Both the twins’ smiles had grown more edged since the siege began, Harry had noticed. He held up a vial of what looked like water, or perhaps Veritaserum, at the most dangerous. “We thought of that,” he said. “So we’re going to—“ “Fly above them,” Fred finished. “And scatter the drops onto their heads like rain. Whoever it touches will go blind.”

Harry frowned. "And you're sure you won't catch any of our own fighters when they're in the middle of the Death Eaters?"

"Ah, but our side will be carrying the antidote," said Fred, and displayed what looked to Harry like an identical vial. "We'll give it to them before they go into battle, and they'll just have to—"

"Swallow it, if this potion touches them," George finished, and shook the vial he held. Harry drew back from it, a bit warily, though the vial was capped. "We'll tell everyone about that before we go to battle."

Harry nodded. "And you have enough for everyone who'll be fighting next Friday?"

George and Fred gave him identical looks of pity. "Hate to disappoint you, mate," said Fred. "But our army—"

"Just isn't that big," George finished. "We'll have enough for multiple doses of the antidote, come to that."

Harry sighed. "All right. Anything else you have ready yet?"

The twins shook their heads, and left with comments about designing more. Harry leaned back against the wall of the Room of Requirement and watched them go.

It was the third night of the siege, and Harry was letting himself be as cautiously hopeful as he ever got. He was feeling better now that he'd rested and eaten, and both yesterday and today he'd joined Moody in here for intense sessions with the dueling club members. That now included every student fifth year and up—or those students who had been fifth year and up—in the school, though not everyone would be going out onto the battlefield. Some of them would stay in Hogwarts and defend the younger students when Midsummer came.

The days had also included strategizing with the people Harry was absolutely certain he could trust, the twins among them. He had to face the fact that the traitor who had disabled the Floo Network was most likely someone among his allies, and that meant he couldn't talk to them unless they would consent to take Veritaserum and answer a few questions first. Harry hadn't asked them to do that yet.

He pushed himself wearily to his feet. It had been hours since he'd eaten, and once he did, then Draco had demanded he come back to the Slytherin common room and sleep in his own bed. Otherwise, he'd said, Harry would just show the rest of Slytherin House he was afraid, and some of them would begin to think he was weak, and Harry would have people who might try to open Hogwarts to Voldemort just because the Dark Lord seemed stronger.

Harry made his way quietly to the kitchens. He would ask the house elves for a few pieces of bread and cheese to prepare his own sandwich. They would mostly be asleep at this hour of the night, but a few were always awake, cooking the breakfast in shifts and preparing food that would have to last longer periods of time.

He reached the entrance he knew from the Marauders' Map, the pear he would have to tickle, but slowed down when he heard muffled voices coming from behind the painting. Most of them were house elves, but they sounded shrill with distress, and there were the deeper tones of at least one wizard there. Harry hesitated, and then waited, leaning his ear against the painting and murmuring an eavesdropping spell. If the wizard had legitimate business here and caught him, Harry could always plead the security of the castle.

The wizard's voice came into focus first. "...just let me cast the magic that I need to cast, you chattering imbeciles!" His words were so high with nervousness that Harry didn't recognize him.

"But Headmistress McGonagall says good elves is not letting nobody cast magic in the kitchens!" wailed one of the elves, and Harry heard the soft fleshy sounds that came from them tugging their ears or wringing their hands. "Nobody but good elves is supposed to be here! No sneaking food, no nasty tricks, no no no!"

"It will only take a minute," said the wizard, his voice softening now. "I promise. Just let me cast it, and I'll be out of here in a moment."

“No,” the elves whined in chorus, but Harry suspected they would lose the argument. A wizard could often trick, bully, or persuade servile house elves into doing what he wanted, because they would punish themselves later, and the web kept them too terrified to protest that much unless the threat was blatant.

Harry thought he'd heard enough. If this was innocent, such as casting freshness charms on the food, then the person inside could hardly protest him walking into the situation. But Harry was beginning to suspect that this was the traitor.

It would make sense for him to go after the food, so that it would be easier for Voldemort to starve us out, Harry thought, and tickled the pear. It giggled and transformed into a handle. Harry pulled the door open.

Mortimer Belville swung around, wand in hand. The house elves around him glanced up from sniffing and tugging their ears and banging their heads against tables. Harry caught Belville's eye.

The man panicked. He whipped his wand towards Harry and chanted something in what sounded like Gaelic, a spell Harry had never heard before. A beam of green light not that far from the shade of Avada Kedavra formed and flew towards him. Harry ducked under a table, and saw the light sever the wood neatly.

Yes, Belville is our traitor, he thought, as he scrambled back to one knee and cast a nonverbal Body-Bind. It recoiled from a shield that Belville had brought up around himself. Harry surprised himself with how calm he was. His anger was a mounting boil on the horizon, though. Makes sense, I suppose. None of us recognized the spell that had disabled the Floo connections, either.

Belville got behind the cover of a table, and pointed his wand at the heaps of pancakes and eggs the house elves had set out for breakfast. Harry didn't know what he had in mind—perhaps a rotting curse, or some kind of poison—and he didn't intend to wait and find out.

His anger had arrived, and that was more than enough for him to will Belville to be still. Belville froze. His eyes gaped, and his hand was stone, despite the awkward position his arm was currently in. Harry watched in puzzlement for a moment as his face turned blue, then realized his spell prevented Belville from breathing, too. He shook his head and released the man's lungs from the spell. Belville could breathe, but do nothing else, as Harry floated him out from behind the table, prized his wand out of his motionless fingers, and nodded to the house elves.

"He was trying to hurt Hogwarts," he told them. "I'll take him to the Headmistress, and she'll deal with him. Now, this is very important. Did he cast magic on any food in here?"

"No, Master Harry, sir!" said an elf who still had his hands clamped on his ears. From the sound of his voice, he'd been the one who had objected to Belville casting the charms in the first place. "We prevented him!" There came a chorus of vigorous head-nods from all around the kitchen, and Harry relaxed.

"Thank you," he said, and the elves' eyes welled with tears. Harry went on hastily before they could begin an outburst. "I'll take him into custody from here, but the Headmistress and Professor Snape might have questions for you later."

"Mistress McGonagall and Master Snape shall always be welcome," the house elf in the lead said firmly, and once again the others nodded so hard it looked as if their heads would fall off.

Harry nodded back, and then levered Belville into the air, deliberately floating him upside-down as he began the trek back to McGonagall's office. There was nothing that said he couldn't "enjoy" the experience of blood rushing to his head while Harry maneuvered him along the hallways. At least it was better than dropping him on his skull, which Harry also had the temptation to do.

"Caught the traitor."

Draco hadn't expected Harry to come and sit at the Slytherin table for breakfast that morning, much less make a declaration like that. He stared, his mouth gaping open in a most un-Malfoyish manner, while Harry began to eat his pancakes, simply ignoring the eyes that watched him from around the Great Hall.

“Well, who was it?” Draco demanded at last, when Harry showed no indication of following up that amazing introduction with anything else. He’d intended to scold Harry for not coming back to the common room last night after all. That had prompted more quiet mutters and shiftings of alliance. At least half of Slytherin, Draco thought, considered Harry afraid now, half-helpless in the face of Voldemort’s threat.

Harry swallowed the mouthful of pancake he’d taken, and replied, “Mortimer Belville. McGonagall and I questioned him under Veritaserum last night after I caught him trying to tamper with the food in the kitchens.” He rolled his eyes and snorted when Draco gave a nervous glance at his breakfast. “Don’t worry, I caught him before he could do anything. He said that he’d written two letters to Voldemort using the name Serpent—the name Burke had used. One was before Midwinter, and the other was a few days ago. He informed Voldemort that I considered him one of my allies, and that he should come to Hogwarts before Midsummer to prepare for the battle. It might have been one of the reasons that Voldemort decided to move and come to the school early, since he didn’t want all of my allies to have time to arrive.”

Only when Harry stabbed his fork down viciously did Draco realize how angry he was. Harry had rarely showed any emotion but compassion and quiet determination in the past few days, as if he didn’t want anyone to realize that their supposed savior could also feel rage. Although, Draco thought, as he watched Harry stab again, hard enough to make his fork skid and shriek on the plate, I suppose that could also be because he thinks he has to be some kind of ridiculous symbol to everyone, a saint or a martyr, someone perfect.

“Indigena Yaxley wrote him back,” Harry continued, after another few bites. “He was supposed to report what he could of my activities to Voldemort, and, of course, cause as much pain and trouble in Hogwarts itself as he could. He was the one who disabled the Floo connections.” Harry shook his head. “No wonder we couldn’t recognize the spell. It was one he'd studied in some obscure book—and that's where he got the fact that all the Floo connections in Hogwarts are linked to the Headmistress's office, too. Ravenclaws."

That was loud enough to make half the Ravenclaw table glare at them. Draco nudged Harry with one elbow and nodded at them when he looked up. Harry, to Draco's intense, secret delight, glared instead of turning away or just bearing the glares as he had for the past few days, and the Ravenclaws were the ones who wound up averting their eyes in confusion.

"Can you repair the Floo connections, now that you know what spell did it?" Draco asked, and then could have kicked himself for phrasing the question that way. Harry didn't need more troubles piled onto his shoulders, as if he were the only one who could relieve them. Draco should have asked if McGonagall or the professors, the ones who would normally take care of those responsibilities, could do it.

Harry's face took on a disgusted expression. "No. He never looked up the countercurse. Hermione's volunteered to research in the Hogwarts library and see if she can find something, but I don't know if she will. I know we don't have the book Belville talked about."

Draco nodded. At least Granger's handling it, doing something actually useful, instead of expecting Harry to save her like the rest of them. As much as he hated to admit it, Gryffindor had been the House most supportive of Harry since the siege began, and the one to argue most vehemently against the idea of handing him over to Voldemort in hopes that the Dark Lord would keep his promise and leave the rest of them alone. The Slytherins outside of those already devoted to Harry were too busy thinking of the politics, the Hufflepuffs were mourning the greatest number of students killed from their House, and the Ravenclaws were returning to their old distrust of Harry with a vengeance. But between them, Potter, Granger, and the Weasleys were browbeating the rest of their House and dragging them along where they might have resisted, as well as urging the upper-year Gryffindors who'd never participated in the dueling club to attend.

"What's going to happen to Belville now?" he asked.

“That’ll wait until after the battle’s over,” said Harry. He swallowed a few more bites, then rose abruptly from the table. “I can’t eat any more right now,” he said, tossing his head like a restless horse. “Come on. I want to talk to Snape again. Maybe he needs help brewing the healing potions. And then I should visit the hospital wing and see if that girl who fell into the coma is awake yet.”

Draco stood, though he wanted to object that Harry should stay and finish his breakfast. He was too relieved to see that Harry had managed to put aside his guilt and self-loathing for the moment, though. Later, when the mood had had some time to settle in Harry, he would nag.

They made it to the middle of the Great Hall, Draco occasionally catching ripples of movement from the corner of his eye as the Rosier-Henlin twins followed under a concealment charm, and then the hex came flying from the Ravenclaw table.

Harry was turning to meet it before Draco recognized it, and the Rosier-Henlin twins were intoning Protego together, so that the hex crashed into three Shield Charms at once and dissolved. Harry stood in silence and looked for who had done it. He didn’t say anything. He didn’t have to. The expression on his face did that for him.

The Ravenclaws shuffled and shifted apart, and then a boy Draco thought was a seventh-year got shoved forward from the middle of them. He stumbled once, but regained his balance. Draco saw, from the corner of his eye, that Professor Flitwick was already on his way down from the head table, his wizened face looking even older than usual.

“Gorgon,” said Harry, his voice inflectionless. “Do you know, I did think that we’d taken care of our disagreement last year.”

Draco did know the boy. He’d insulted Harry in second year, been terrified of him in third, and dueled with him at the beginning of fourth. He managed to look frightened and sulky both at once now, and his eyes cut back and forth between Harry and his Head of House.

“Gorgon,” said Flitwick, halting a few feet away. “What excuse do you have for your behavior?”

Gorgon exploded, his fists clenching. “What excuse do you think I have?” he shouted. “He got my cousin killed, Professor! He did it because he was careless and an idiot and—and maybe he’s not a Dark Lord, but does that matter? He had some idiot plan to face You-Know-Who, and he just couldn’t leave the rest of us out of it! He had to do this, too!” Abruptly he straightened, eyes darkening further, and his next words came out like a whip tipped with malice.

“And actually,” he said, speaking to Flitwick, but with his gaze locked on Harry, “I heard something that makes me reconsider the accusation of Dark Lord, Professor. I heard someone saying that she looked over her shoulder when she was running to the castle and saw some of the first-years dying beside the lake. Harry here just hovered on his broom over Voldemort, and did nothing to save them. What good is he as the Boy-Who-Lived, if he can’t even face You-Know-Who the way he’s supposed to?” Murmurs of outrage began circling the room in the wake of his words.

Draco looked at Harry, and saw that his face had turned white. His own stomach was missing its bottom now. Shit. Someone saw. And if they know that Harry actually killed those children...

Gorgon looked pleased with the way he’d scored a hit on Harry, but Flitwick interrupted his triumph. “You will come with me to see the Headmistress at once, Gorgon.”

“What? We’re not allowed to speak the truth now, Professor, even on the edge of dying?” Gorgon demanded. “You’ll notice that he didn’t deny it!”

“We are not allowed to cast hexes on each other in a situation as desperate as this one.” The tiny little professor’s voice had grown markedly deeper, and Draco was reminded that he’d been a dueling champion in his day. “The Headmistress has forbidden it outside of actual dueling practice. I do not know which punishment she will choose for you, but I am sure it will be severe.”

He led the way out of the Great Hall. Gorgon followed, though he did dare a final scowl over his shoulder at Harry.

Draco looked at him warily. Harry swallowed once or twice, but nodded when Draco caught his eye.

“There are some people who are going to react that way,” he muttered. “Let’s go find Snape. I’m fine.”

No, you’re not, Draco thought in exasperation as he trailed Harry to the door, closely followed by the Rosier-Henlin twins. It’s one thing to know they blame you, and another to know they’re willing to hex you to exercise that blame. What if they do it again? What if someone finds out that you mercy-killed those children, Harry? Will you just stand there and let them curse you?

Connor might not know much. That was one thing Snape had told him whenever they dueled together: that he didn’t know much, even when he got one of the Light-based spells right. And he might not know that much about Potions, or Transfiguration, or Herbology, or in fact most of his school subjects. He might only be good at honesty, and flinging hexes, and compulsion, and flying.

But he knew this much.

“You’re being stupid,” he told his brother.

Harry paused and stared at him between strands of his fringe, which was matted and dripping with sweat. He’d tried to show Connor a fire-based spell that was supposed to seek out every scrap of wood on an enemy’s body and burn it—including a wand. Connor couldn’t yet master it. Harry had shown no sign of impatience, or of discouragement. He just went on showing it to Connor, over and over again, long after everyone else had left the Room of Requirement and gone to dinner.

It was six days into the siege, Thursday evening, and Connor knew how things stood now. Every day, more and more people in the school got angry at Harry, because they were stupid. He’d largely managed to keep such stupidity out of Gryffindor, because he made everyone who wanted to say it back up his argument, and so far it always trailed off into mumbles of “but someone walking down the corridor’s best friend’s cousin’s sister said” and unfounded allegations about Harry practicing dark spells on helpless spiders in random corners. But it was deeply-rooted in Slytherin, and now it was beginning to affect Harry.

“I don’t know what you mean,” said Harry, in that monotonous steel voice that Connor hated. “This curse could save your life someday, and on Midsummer, the Light will be overhead. It’ll help you if you ask. You have to know this curse, Connor. I know you might not get it right tonight, but you will eventually.” He turned away and faced the far wall again, where a stuffed “wizard” made of cloth had lost every bit of wood it owned twice over. “Now. Like this. Ard—“

“You’re being stupid,” Connor cut in, determined to make Harry acknowledge him this time, “because no matter how much time you spend drilling and dueling and strategizing and catching traitors, there will always be someone who blames you, Harry.”

Harry’s shoulders stiffened. “I know that,” he said.

“Then fucking act like it!” Connor burst out, letting his temper have free reign. He knew Draco and Snape had tried to talk to Harry about this, but they were too content to back off and wait when Harry showed signs of pain, or said that he understood. Connor didn’t plan to. Serpents bite on the heel. Lions go for the throat. “Stop treating yourself like a Muggle machine! Stop flinching every time someone mutters about you having caused this! Stop worrying about them so much! We have to have you to win this siege and organize this battle, because you’re the only one who can face Voldemort, and that’s not even counting the people who want you to live because we love you and would prefer that you not die, please. Driving yourself to exhaustion won’t work, and you can’t go out there and offer yourself up!”

“What makes you think I would?”

Connor stepped towards him, seized his brother’s arm, and spun him around. Harry faced him, looking blank, his green eyes carefully closed. But Connor knew this expression of old. It wasn't blank and it wasn't cold. It was the look Harry wore when he was being a stubborn dumbarse.

"Because I grew up with you, Harry," Connor snapped. "And I didn't know everything, but I noticed this. You acted this exact same way when James or Sirius or Remus said something that you wanted to think deeply about. You disappeared into yourself and let your body function on its own. I noticed because you always played your worst games of Quidditch on those days. And now I think you're working yourself up to go out there and try to settle this once and for all. Or, at least, you're not here, and you need to be here."

Harry blinked, and for a moment, Connor saw a glimpse of something human in his eyes. Then he whispered, "But it's sixty-four now," which made no sense at all, so Connor asked about it.

"What do you mean?"

"She died," Harry whispered. "The girl who went into the coma. Heloise Whitestag. She died this morning. And sixty-three people died on the battlefield. So that's sixty-four people dead now."

Connor cocked his head and waited, eyes narrow, sensing his brother wasn't done.

"Sixty-four people I've killed."

Connor gripped his shoulders and shook him. Harry's teeth jarred in his head, and when his head stopped bouncing, he gave his brother a look of abject astonishment.

"You. Are. Being. Stupid," said Connor, and resisted the impulse to slap Harry across the face when his stare only deepened. "You didn't kill them, Harry." Harry tried to interrupt, but he charged on. "No. I've heard those rumors about the lake, and I don't know what happened there. I'll wait until you're ready to tell me. But for Merlin's sake, Harry, stop brooding and come back. You're not going to give Voldemort what he wants. You know he'd slaughter us all even if you went out to him. You're not going to do that. Say you won't."

“Connor—“

He’s reluctant to swear. He was thinking about it. Connor was only thankful that he’d found out about this, and not Draco or Snape. They would have yelled. This didn’t need yelling, not now.

“Harry,” he said, and softened his voice, and gripped his brother’s shoulders so that he could stare into his eyes. “Say you won’t. Swear it to me.”

Harry stared at him.

“Swear it on Merlin and your magic,” Connor insisted.

Harry swallowed, closed his eyes, and said, “All right. I swear it on Merlin and my magic.”

Connor wrapped his arms around Harry and hugged the breath out of him. He felt Harry’s arms curve around him a moment later, and Harry let out one large sob, but not a flood of tears. Maybe that was a good thing. Maybe it wasn’t. But at least Connor had managed to avert what could have been his brother’s most painful stupidity.

“Good,” Connor muttered into his ear. “And in return, that oath and this particular piece of stupidity will remain between us.”

Harry nodded, his head moving lightly against Connor’s neck. Connor sighed, and hugged his brother one more time.

Anyone else, and he’d be the one reassuring him, he thought, stepping away so that he could draw his wand and practice the wood-burning curse again. But because it’s him, he thinks there should have been something more he could do, and some way to save us all before Midsummer.

Well, sometimes there’s just not.

Hawthorn hugged her daughter one-armed. “You’ll get through this, Pansy,” she whispered. “And, in the meantime, know that I am incredibly proud of you.”

Pansy nodded, and her hands flickered out from her sleeves, speaking in the sign language of the necromancers. Thank you, Mother. I promise that I won't do anything stupid. I'll only do what has to be done. I love you.

"That's my girl," Hawthorn said, and then she let her go, and watched as Pansy walked calmly out of the room. The black robes concealed her motions, her general shape, and her face, but she was still the daughter Hawthorn had raised. In spite of her reassurance, Hawthorn did not truly think she would turn from her path and break her oaths. She had kept silent when she knew that dozens of children would go forth from the school and die. She would get through the coming battle, too.

Hawthorn had long since settled with herself whether it was moral for a necromancer to keep silent when she knew that someone would die. Seers saw the future in uncertain terms, and made prophecies that could shift, but what a necromancer saw was inevitable. Telling would make no difference. Death was absolute, and people would die the way they would die.

She turned and drew the cover off the basin of warm water the house elves had brought her the moment she asked for it, no fuss and no questions. With a sigh, she bathed her left arm in the water, and frowned at the black skull and snake on her skin that was the reminder of an old, old foolishness.

For the last two nights, as the siege turned on through a week since its beginning—it was now Saturday afternoon—her Mark had been steadily darkening and burning. Hawthorn had known when her former Lord was summoning the Death Eaters before, but the pain had never been this bad before, and she feared some new evil. She had caught Adalrico's eye in the past day, and Snape's, and Peter Pettigrew's. Their faces were all grim. They all held their left arms as if they were tender. When pressed, Snape had admitted that he feared it might be something similar to what Regulus Black had suffered—an apparently infected Dark Mark. He had given Hawthorn a potion that helped with the pain and advised her to bathe the Mark often.

Hawthorn was not sure what would halt the Mark's inflammation after the siege. Regulus Black had pursued some arcane method of healing not open to the rest of them. But she was confident that they would find some means of halting it. Snape was a Potions Master, and for the sake of old fellowship, he would share any solution he discovered with them. And Hawthorn herself was no slouch in Herbology, though nowhere near Indigena Yaxley's level. She could look to the plants of her estate, the Garden, after the siege.

After the siege.

The words could sound as if they described another universe, if she let them.

Hawthorn would not let them. She refused to regret when she felt the burning of the Mark, and think about what would happen if she had chosen to accept Fenrir Greyback's coercion and join in the effort to resurrect the Dark Lord three years ago; she certainly refused to surrender. She did not bow to intimidation.

She narrowed her eyes, and knew a small growl was bubbling in her throat.

Of any kind.

She had received a letter from Lupin last week, just before she prepared to Apparate to Hogsmeade. He had detailed his choices in the matter of Loki's pack, laid out the laws against werewolves and the worsening situation, and begged her to come and join him. He hadn't wanted her to know beforehand because he feared she would betray the plans to Harry, but now that he knew anyway, Lupin wanted Hawthorn to consider that she had a choice to acknowledge herself as a lycanthrope.

I choose to define myself, Hawthorn thought, as she watched the water begin to boil around her Mark. I am not a brand on my arm, and I am not a bite on my neck. I follow no master, and I follow no Lord. I give my loyalty where I choose, and I am a pureblood witch, and a mother, and a widow, and part of Harry's circle.

She pulled her arm free of the water and called aloud for another bowl, which had a house elf appear, bowing, at once. Hawthorn thought she rather scared it, since she knew her eyes were flashing amber and the hair on her body was standing up, and she looked as frightening as a werewolf could so near the dark of the moon.

That did not matter, though.

I am myself. I will not back down. I will think in terms of 'after the siege' if I choose to.

And I will go about tomorrow, find the source of this nonsense saying Harry should surrender himself, and put a stop to it.

"Do you think you can really expand the illusion enough to cover all the horses?" Harry asked Honoria dubiously. He had to admit, he hadn't considered using her glamours as a major part of the attack before. He knew she was good with tiny illusions, even good enough to use them unconsciously and in great detail, but the horses would blaze in the storm of the Light and would make quite a lot of noise as they charged. Harry thought even a master illusionist would be hard put to cover that.

Honoria only grinned at him. Currently, she wore an illusion that made her hair look short and black, and her robes flashed with distracting letters in various colors. Harry didn't know why, except that she'd wanted it that way. "I promise, Harry," she said, "I can cover anything you want me to."

Harry nodded, slowly. "All right. But I'll want you to practice before we actually get into the battle."

"Of course!" Honoria looked around at the Room of Requirement, which at the moment resembled a place for planning strategy, with a round table in the middle and the walls covered with maps of Hogwarts. "What do you want me to make this look like?"

“Surprise me,” said Harry.

Honorio nodded and closed her eyes, a tiny line furrowing her brow. A moment later, the Room around them vanished, and they were tumbling through the air, in freefall, with the fires of the Death Eater camp beneath them and getting closer all the time.

Harry swore and grabbed for some handhold despite himself. It felt incredibly real, and not only visually. He could hear voices beneath him, the rush of passing air, and Honorio’s exultant laughter. He could feel the wind in his hair and the turning of his body, too, so thick that his brain kept insisting he was falling. The smell of cooking drifted up to him.

Then the vision of sky and camps was gone, and they sat in the Room of Requirement once more, with Honorio gazing at him innocently.

Harry found his voice on the third try. “You’re right. It will more than do.” He was even more impressed than he was letting on. Ordinary illusionists could create sensory effects of all kinds. But to coordinate them so that they struck at the same time and formed a seamless picture took incredible skill.

Honorio stood up and clapped her hands, the illusion around her hair melting to reveal her ordinary bright curls again. “Thank you!” she said, and hurried out of the Room, leaving Harry alone.

He leaned back against the wall and closed his eyes. Exhaustion pounded through him once again. It had nothing to do with ordinary weariness of the body; he’d slept in Slytherin last night, from just after nine at night until well after six, and “shown” everyone who would take the hint that he wasn’t afraid of the shifting currents in his own House.

But worry and anxiety were taking their toll. The battle was in four days, five if one counted the Sunday now half past. Voldemort had still not made a move on the castle, but Midsummer’s steady nearing, and the announcement about his granting the other students safe passage if Harry came down to him—repeated every morning, now—meant he didn't have to. Fear feasted in the castle, more ravenously than a pack of Peter's rats. Sidelong glances came at Harry from the most unexpected people, including Blaise and some of the others he'd trained with in the dueling club. He could see the promise whispering in their brains. Just give him up. Just give him up and we are safe.

And the words had taken hold in his own brain, as Connor had somehow managed to see on Thursday. Harry had to wonder if there wasn't something he could do to insure that Voldemort kept his promise.

I could trick him into swearing an Unbreakable Vow. That was the sanest of the many plans, mad as a fever dream, that had assaulted him so far. And Harry knew they were mad, even as he entertained them. He was the only one who could face Voldemort. He knew it. He had to stay within the castle, no matter how much others might want him out.

But their fear, and the idea that if he was such a hero and the Boy-Who-Lived he should do something about this, and the urge to do anything rather than increase the numbers pounding in his head, all dragged at him like puppies with a rag between their teeth. Shouldn't he do something? Was his reluctance only because he knew that people who loved him would be upset to see him die, and because he had, perhaps, corrupted himself more than he knew by killing those dozen children near the lakeside? What if Snape was wrong, and he was right? He had changed himself, crossed a chasm he could never cross back over, by killing those children. He had stepped onto a path that would lead him to become Dumbledore, in the end.

If he went down to Voldemort, if he struck, if he tried to end it now and the prophecy was with him, then at least the world might be spared two Dark Lords, or a Dumbledore with absorbere abilities.

"Harry."

He sat up quickly. He hadn't thought someone could enter the Room without his knowing it, but then, he didn't know everything about the Room of Requirement.

Vera stared at him for long moments, then shook her head. "You have another hole torn in your soul," she whispered. "Why did you not come to me?"

"Because I needed to fight through this on my own," said Harry. "I needed to think about it. I have to look at what I did through my eyes, and not just others'. Of course other people are going to tell me that I did the only thing I could, because they want to keep me alive. But I have to decide for myself if this is a crime deserving death."

He blinked when he finished. He hadn't realized until he said it that he had thought of going to Voldemort as much like an execution as like a sacrifice.

Vera took a seat on the floor opposite him, folding her legs under her. "You did something horrible," she said softly. "And it was the only thing you could do."

Harry shook his head. "You can only see the effects on me," he said. "You can't see the thing itself."

"I read your conflicting motivations better than you read them," Vera said, with no sign that she'd been insulted. From what he'd seen of her, Harry almost thought the Seer was incapable of feeling anger. "You know, at bottom, that surrendering yourself is not a choice. You know the true prophecy, and you know that someone must stand at your right shoulder when you face Voldemort."

Harry shifted, and shrugged one shoulder. "Maybe not. My brother might be the one destined to defeat him instead."

"You do not really believe that, either," Vera told him quietly. "You do not know how he could love the whole of the wizarding world. And I have seen him, and he does not—not yet. If the time can come when he can fulfill that part of the prophecy, it is long hence."

Harry lowered his eyes.

"Your soul is shredded, and you are falling back into old habits of thought, that you yourself are evil and deserving of punishment in situations where you will excuse others." Vera reached out and cupped his chin, turning his eyes up to meet hers again. "I do not have enough time to heal you now," she added, voice a dying fall. "But I hope that you will let me try, when this battle is done with—and that you will not kill yourself in the meantime, because you have deluded yourself into thinking you deserve it."

Harry hesitated, then swallowed and said, "I—I haven't told anyone yet, but I had planned to go to the Sanctuary for the summer."

The smile that crossed Vera's smile was warmer than the sunrise. "That is a wonderful idea, Harry," she murmured. "That would be part of the reason that you are so determined to drive Voldemort from the battlefield bleeding?"

Harry nodded. "I couldn't leave the wizarding world for as long as I need to if he was still active and sending his Death Eaters on raids. But if I wound him as badly as I'm planning, he won't dare show his head for months. I am going to make him hurt." His hand was clenched so tightly into a fist on his knee that it hurt, itself. Harry took a deep breath and forced it to relax. "And then I can go to the Sanctuary. I need to get past the lingering traces of these soul-wounds I bear. I'll bring Snape and Draco with me if they want to come, and if they would be welcome."

"Your Malfoy and the Bitter One are more than welcome," said Vera. "And I wish you good luck in the battle. Do not kill yourself, for then I would never see you healed, and that would be a tragedy." She leaned nearer and let her dry lips brush his cheek, then stood. "Do not drive yourself to madness, either. The grief and fear of those around you is understandable, but it is, in the end, grief and fear, not rational thought. Allow them to feel emotions in peace, but not to control your actions."

Harry watched her until she left, and then bowed his head and rested it on his arms for a long moment.

Maybe I can get through this. Maybe I can. More, maybe I'll deserve to get through this, if I try very hard.

Those words ran on the surface of his mind. Underneath it ran another mantra.

Sixty-four. Nineteen. Sixty-four. Nineteen. Sixty-four. Nineteen. Millicent stared in silence at the dark specks in her father's hand. Then she raised her eyes to his face.

"Does Harry know you have those?" Her voice was smooth and calm and normal. She congratulated herself on it. She would have felt even better if she hadn't felt the need, a moment later, to put her hand out and clutch the wall of the room where her father was staying, once a Defense professor's quarters.

"Of course not," said Adalrico, and put the specks—the Black Plague spores, Millicent corrected herself; she could call things by their true name—back into his robe pocket. "He would forbid me from using them, if he knew. Quite right and proper for the ethical side not to use disease magic."

Millicent watched him carefully. Adalrico sounded—odd. Different. He was rubbing his left arm, and she knew why, so that wasn't the difference. He prowled back and forth from the bed to the room's far wall, and all the while his free hand opened and closed, opened and closed again, as if he didn't know what to do with himself.

"Father?" she ventured at last. "What's wrong?"

"This is all wrong!" Adalrico exploded, spinning around. Millicent noticed him stumble as his weak foot came down, but he recovered in moments and shook his head impatiently at her, so she stayed where she was. "We need to be fighting poison with poison. I know I could reach a few of the Death Eaters from the walls, if McGonagall would drop the wards for one moment. I would give them fear. But she won't, because she is too worried about some of the students getting hurt." He slapped his hands together, snarling. "This is war! They're already hurt! They've seen other students die in front of them. I think it's time that my old comrades saw some of their own die."

"You think Harry should be harsher," Millicent summarized. She should have known this was coming, she thought, reflecting back on little hints her father had been dropping all week. This was Monday, the tenth day of the Dark Lord's siege. She supposed she should be grateful he'd held back from snapping as long as he had.

"Of course he should be," said Adalrico. "Make the other side suffer, the other side sacrifice. That is the way to fight a Dark Lord. It is the way we fought Dumbledore, when I was a Death Eater." His hand slid up and down his left arm in a soothing motion. "Show them that you mean to kill them, and continue killing them until they withdraw from the battlefield. Harry is too hesitant, too gentle. He makes the Dark Lord believe that he can conquer us, and he can. He will destroy us unless we prepare ourselves to carry the battle to him."

"I think we're doing that," said Millicent, feeling as if she watched a stranger. She knew her father was crueller than most people, far crueller than Harry, but watching him actually prepare to betray a formal family alliance was madness. Has he forgotten that that scar on his arm will burst open and bleed him to death if he betrays Harry?

"On Midsummer," said Adalrico. "And what is the point of waiting until then? Why not break the siege now, and charge?"

"Because a storm of Light is coming on Midsummer," said Millicent. "And it will help the Light allies Harry's assembled."

"We should not wait," Adalrico insisted. "We should attack now."

Millicent stood very straight. She felt three loyalties pulling and tugging at her: loyalty to her father, loyalty to Harry, and loyalty to her family. But two of them were pulling in the same direction.

"I am going to Harry now," she said, "unless you swear by our name that you will not attack the Death Eaters on your own."

Adalrico spun around and stared at her. “What?” he asked at last, his voice soft with disbelief.

“You heard me,” said Millicent. She felt light-headed, but she had no doubt that this was the right thing to do. “We swore to him, Father. The honor of our family is at stake. And he is my leader, my vates—if you want to put it that way, my Lord. You are doing this because of your own impatience, not because it’s the right thing to do.”

For a long moment, there was only the sound of noisy breathing. Millicent was vaguely surprised to realize that some of it was her own.

Then her father said, “And is that not betraying the honor of our family, Millicent? To turn on your own father?”

“Not when you would be the one to do wrong by the Bulstrode name,” Millicent retorted, and took a step forward. “I’ve watched Draco’s father lose his grip on the Malfoy honor slowly, because his son knows what Harry is better than he does. I don’t intend to let you lead us down that same rocky path, Father. Swear now, or I go now.” She let a shimmer of black run around her fist, just in reminder to her father that she was his magical heir and could use any of the gifts that he possessed to stop her.

Adalrico held her eyes. She held them, and stared back.

Then he stepped close to her, swept her up in an embrace, and murmured into her hair, “I swear by our name that I will not attack the Death Eaters.”

Millicent managed to relax, her head spinning. She put her arms around her father in return and held him. She was already almost as tall as he was.

“My daughter,” Adalrico whispered. “My heir. I am so proud.”

And that is what being Bulstrode means, Millicent thought. We endure, and we do not falter, no matter what the test.

Hermione paused in her reading of the latest book and wiped her eyes for a moment. They were watering. She’d been reading since dinner the night before, and because not even Madam Pince was going to chase her out of the library under these circumstances, she'd read straight through the night. She thought it was somewhere around dawn now.

Dawn on Tuesday, her helpful calendar-voice piped up to remind her. And the battle begins on Friday.

She bent back over the book with a vengeance. There had to be a way to restore blocked Floo connections somewhere. She was determined that it should exist. This book was a dense history of the way the Floo Network had been first established, and how Floo powder worked. Her eyes ran easily over the long, complex sentences, untangling them.

A pair of hands came to rest on her shoulders, and began to massage. Hermione resisted the pressure for a moment, but then leaned back with a sigh and a groan, and let her head roll to one side, so that her cheek rested on one of the stroking hands.

"You shouldn't read all through the night like that," Zacharias whispered into her ear. "You'll strain your eyes and get dark circles under them, and then where would you be, a pretty girl like you?"

"Oh, I don't know," said Hermione, fighting the urge to close her eyes. "I suppose I'd have to fall back on my intelligence."

Zacharias went on rubbing her shoulders for a moment, then pulled out the chair next to her and sat down. Assuming he'd come to keep her company, Hermione started to turn back to her book, but he claimed her hand. Startled, she turned to look at him.

She was even more startled when he lifted her hand to his lips and kissed her fingers. The expression on his face was utterly serious.

"Hermione," he whispered. "I never understood before just how stupid blood prejudice was."

Hermione blinked. What brought this on?

“They want to kill you,” Zacharias went on earnestly, gesturing towards the walls. Hermione reflected that even when he spoke as if life and death mattered, he was still pompous; it didn’t seem to have occurred to him that she knew that. “Not because you hurt them, not because you took a political office away from someone, not because you’re better at magic than they are, but just because you’re—you. And that’s wrong, and it’s stupid, and I’m sorry I never really realized it before. I’m sorry.”

Hermione reached out and hugged him, closing her eyes as she felt him kiss her neck. She kept them closed, so that she wouldn’t let the tears gathering behind her lids roll down her face.

“I love you,” Zacharias whispered.

Hermione nodded, choking on sobs of exhaustion and fury and sadness, unable to respond for right now. She didn’t fight when he gently pushed the book away from her and led her back to Gryffindor Tower.

Snape had been on edge most of the day. That could have something to do with Madam Pomfrey at last having enough potions to ease the pain of those students still in the hospital wing—including Calming Draughts to dose those who had suddenly become Squibs thanks to the Dark Lord—and so not requiring his skills. It could have something to do with this being Wednesday, the nineteenth of June, two days before the solstice and almost the last day of the promised time Voldemort had granted the school to deliver Harry up to him.

It almost certainly had to do with several potions ingredients gone missing from his store, the locking spells undone by a fairly complicated Dark Arts curse.

Snape had, of course, cast several spells that should provide him with images of those who had crept into his offices and “liberated” the ingredients. He had expected to see the Weasley twins. He had not expected there to be no images at all. Another Dark Arts curse had insured that every tracking spell would fail, including the ones Snape had chosen.

The ingredients gone were asphodel, wormwood, valerian roots, and sopophorous beans—the ones that made the Draught of Living Death.

Snape had gone at once to McGonagall, but when he had told her what she suspected, she had, her mouth tightening, agreed that he should not announce the theft to the school. Instead, she would join him in the place most likely to reveal the students who had taken it. So they were now both waiting, quietly, Snape under a Vanishing Potion and McGonagall in her Animagus form, at opposite ends of the corridor that held the Slytherin common room.

Snape knew, unfortunately for his students, what House that particular skill at Dark Arts was most likely to belong in.

He even thought he might know why the thieves had chosen to brew that particular potion. He wanted to be wrong, however, and if he was, then he need only embarrass his Slytherins instead of—

Instead of do something worse.

His thoughts cut off as the door to the common room opened. Blaise Zabini's head poked out, and he glanced up and down the corridor. Then he nodded and looked back over his shoulder.

"It's clear," Snape saw him mouth.

He could see McGonagall half-close her eyes so that the light from the torches wouldn't reflect in them as two of the seventh-year students, including one of the prefects, who had been in Snape's NEWT Potions class, stepped out of the common room with a bundled shape over their shoulders. If one wasn't looking for it, it would appear to be a set of blankets and a pillow, as if Blaise and his friends were heading to the Great Hall to make a common sleeping pallet among numerous other students. More and more people did so every night, finding their common rooms too claustrophobic and isolated. Snape was sure the three had counted on the deception to save them if anyone saw them on the way. They'd even added glamours to make it look as if the blankets had long, tasseled ends.

As Snape flicked his wand and dismissed the glamours, the hair poking out of one end of the blanket came into view. It was black, extremely messy hair.

White-hot rage consumed him, aided, it seemed, by the throbbing pain in his left arm. He had to fight to keep from simply sending the Killing Curse at Blaise and having done with it. Instead, he sipped the antidote to the Vanishing Potion at the same moment as the Headmistress changed back and said in an extremely cold voice, "Mr. Zabini, Mr. Findarin, Mr. Tipperary, what do you think you are doing?"

Blaise spun around and stared at McGonagall in shock. Findarin and Tipperary were a bit smarter. They raised a Shield Charm against any hexes that McGonagall might cast, then turned and started hurrying up the corridor away from her—

Only to find their Head of House visible again, and waiting for them. They stopped running, and the bundle nearly slipped off their shoulders. Snape waved his wand and caught it with a Levitation Charm, floating it to his feet. He slit the blankets open with his wandless magic. Harry's face, slack with the Draught of Living Death, appeared as the blankets uncoiled from around him.

Snape had to breathe several times to clear the red haze from his vision. He had thought that someone might be arranging to kidnap a student, but he had imagined the victim would be a Gryffindor, Hufflepuff, or Ravenclaw lured into his House's territory and made a scapegoat for Slytherin's increasing frustration with the siege. That there would be people in his own House who would turn on Harry...

It was a good thing McGonagall was here, he thought dimly, as he turned back to hear the explanation. A very good thing. Or he would have killed them. He could feel the words Avada Kedavra waiting at the back of his tongue, and had to concentrate on not saying them.

Blaise had started "explaining" by then. "It was just a prank, Professor," he said innocently, eyes wide. "We were going to put him in the Great Hall and laugh at him when he woke up in a strange place tomorrow—"

"You are lying, Mr. Zabini." The Headmistress could make her voice a whip when she wanted to, Snape admitted. "With any other student, I might accept that as an explanation, but not with Harry. You were going to take him to Voldemort."

Blaise fisted his hands and didn't respond.

"Mr. Zabini?" McGonagall asked. "Or do we need Veritaserum?"

"Fine!" Blaise shouted. He was shaking. Snape saw the frustration and the rage and the effect of twelve cumulative days of pent-up emotion running through him. "Yes, we bloody well were! I've been taking to my mum with the communication spell Malfoy taught me, and she wants me home, and she doesn't trust Harry to win the battle, and I'm—we're all so fucking tired of this! If we give him up, then we can leave!"

"And did you truly believe that Voldemort would keep his promise, Mr. Zabini?" McGonagall's voice was a hiss. Snape stooped and drew out the antidote to the Living Death that he'd prepared, pouring it into Harry's open mouth and massaging his throat to be sure he swallowed. Harry blinked his eyes open a moment later, looking drowsy and puzzled.

"He might!" Blaise yelled back. "Anything's better than this hell we're living through right now!"

Harry heard. Snape saw his eyes close, and his body jolt as though someone had just slapped him everywhere. Then he got slowly to his feet, swaying and wincing. Snape seized his arm.

"How did they get it to you?" he whispered.

"A glass of butterbeer," Harry replied, his voice tired, his eyes on Blaise. He ignored Findarin and Tipperary, who were cowering in place. "Everyone in the House was drinking one, except Blaise, who wasn't there. Even they—" he jerked his head at the seventh-years "—took one. I think Blaise must have had the antidote on him. When he came back, he gave it to them. But I remember most people falling asleep in the moments before I felt the potion overcoming me." He was silent a moment, then said, "He really meant to turn me over to Voldemort?"

"Yes," said Snape.

"Oh," said Harry, and then turned and pressed his face into Snape's robes, and said nothing more. Snape stroked his hair, eyes on his former seventh-years, and on McGonagall, who appeared to have heard all she wanted to of Blaise's story.

She Stunned all three of them briskly, then nodded to Snape. "I'll put them in the room off my office," she said. It had turned into a temporary holding cell for the captured Death Eaters and Belville, as much to keep them from the wrath of the general Hogwarts populace as anything else. "Wake your students up, and then talk to Harry."

Snape nodded, and stood aside so that she could stride up the corridor with the three bound students floating behind her. Blaise's face was still frozen into an expression of panic-stricken anger. Snape studied the Headmistress's expression, thinking she would be weary about having to do this to her students, but it appeared to have only pissed her off.

"Harry?" Snape touched his—yes, he could admit it in the privacy of his own head, his son's hair—and made Harry look up at him. "I didn't brew enough antidote for everyone. I thought I would only be dealing with one or possibly two victims of the Draught. Let's wake up Draco and a few of the other most skilled Potions students. Will you help me brew more of the antidote after that?"

Harry's eyes showed naked gratitude for the chance to put off discussing what Blaise had done. "Yes," he said.

Snape nodded and strode towards the Slytherin common room, his arm and his temper both still burning. At least anger was a distraction from the fear that he could have lost Harry permanently.

One more day.

Behind him, he heard Harry murmuring to himself. When Snape listened, it sounded like a sequence of numbers. "Sixty-four. Nineteen. Three. Sixty-four. Nineteen. Three."

"What is that?" Snape asked, after he had given the password and the door swung back.

Harry jumped, then stared at him, eyes shuttering. "Nothing," he said.

Snape raised an eyebrow, but let it go as he gazed at the common room full of his sleeping House. It is not nothing, and we will discuss it in good time, Harry, as we will young Mr. Zabini's attitude. Be assured we will.

Chapter Eighty-Nine: Tomorrow We Leave For Battle

Harry opened his eyes slowly, not realizing where he was for a long moment. Then he remembered. Snape had told him to sleep on the couch in his private quarters last night, not trusting the rest of Slytherin House to take care of him.

Harry winced at the memories of Snape's precise, cold voice as he lectured on House loyalty, and the lowered eyes of the other Slytherins. It really hadn't been their fault, any of them. Blaise, Findarin, and Tipperary had had to feed them the Draught of Living Death as well, just in case they might have tried to interfere with their kidnapping of Harry. Yes, some of them might have stood aside and let them take Harry to Voldemort, but some of them might have stopped Blaise and his friends. They would never know now.

Since he was fully awake, his mind began reciting the numbers again.

Sixty-four dead. Nineteen without magic. Three I frightened enough to try and take me to Voldemort.

He sat up, stretched, and pulled his glasses from a nearby table before he realized that Snape was sitting on the chair opposite, watching him and sipping a cup of tea. Harry jumped and stared at him. Snape waved his wand, still saying nothing, and a tray bearing tea and a bowl of cornflakes with a cup of milk close at hand floated over to him.

"Eat," he said. "I've fetched this food from the Great Hall for you. It's morning," he added, anticipating Harry's next question, "and Voldemort has already made his announcement about wanting the school to turn you over to him. This time, McGonagall countered with an announcement of her own, explaining what had happened last night. Everyone now knows that the Headmistress thinks such betrayal dishonorable, and how disappointed she is in any House that could consider it. You will be guarded today to make sure that does not happen again." Snape sipped his tea and watched until Harry poured the milk into the cornflakes and started eating just to get away from his stare.

Sixty-four, said the sound of his own chewing in his ears as he ate.

"Where's Draco?" he asked, when he'd swallowed a few mouthfuls.

"I sent him back to Slytherin after my speech," said Snape, and drank some more tea. "I knew he would wish to guard you and speak with you, but a large part of that speaking will be apologies that he did not recognize the taste of Living Death in time. It cannot help you now."

Harry stiffened for a moment, but Snape followed that with nothing more ominous, so he forced himself to eat some more cornflakes, and even drink a bit of his own tea. Nineteen, said the swish of the liquid in the cup.

"What will help me?" he asked a few minutes later.

"Being talked out of this guilt that you are carrying," said Snape. "I thought I had managed it. I thought Draco had managed it. I thought your own mind had managed it. Alas, it seems that we have not." His voice was without inflection, but Harry could hear the steel underneath.

"I don't know what you mean," said Harry. "I accept, as you said, that those who didn't face such a decision can't understand why I did as I did. And I know that Blaise and the others betrayed me out of fear for their lives, and not because of something I did." Three, said the shuffle of his shoes on the floor.

Snape made a muffled sound oddly like a chuckle. Harry laid down his spoon and stared at him. Snape stared back, and if there was amusement in his face, it was a cruel, predatory, hawk-like amusement.

"How many times have I told you, Harry," Snape said softly, "you cannot lie to a Legilimens?"

"I am not lying—"

"I heard you counting last night," Snape said unapologetically. "I believe I know the numbers. Sixty-four dead, counting Miss Whitestag.

Nineteen without magic, turned into Squibs. And three members of your own House who turned on you. People who have accepted responsibility for their own decisions, Harry, do not recite numbers like that to themselves.”

“I have accepted—“

“You have not.” The only sign of Snape’s anger, besides the force in his voice, was the way he suddenly released his teacup and pointed his hand at Harry. Wandless magic kept the teacup hovering in midair. Harry wondered if Snape was even aware of that. “You are making the dead more important than the living, the wounded more important than the whole, those who blame you more important than those who do not. You are living exclusively in their company, and by doing so you betray us.”

Harry felt as if he’d been punched in the gut. He looked away from Snape and tried to explain what he meant, what he felt. “If I forget about them, then I’m betraying their memory—“

“I have no interest in listening to your tired self-justifications,” said Snape, voice as cold as Harry remembered it being from first year. “You are betraying us, Harry, with every breath you take that is focused more on doom than on survival, with every glance you give that looks on the past as if that is somehow a sacred country. Tomorrow we leave for battle. We may fail because Voldemort is the stronger, or because Death Eaters kill us. I will not have us fail because our leader is distracted and dreaming of his own guilt instead of how best to protect us.”

Harry shivered. The words had cut him like shards of ice or glass. “I—I can’t watch anyone else die because of me,” he whispered.

“Then announce that now,” said Snape, his voice pitiless, “and turn the leadership of the war effort over to McGonagall. Tell your allies that you’ve failed them. Tell them that you are afraid, and because of that, you’d rather walk out and give yourself up to the Dark Lord, because you cannot bear to see death. You would rather commit suicide, make yourself a martyr, then endure what is a natural consequence of war. And, before you go, make sure to tell the Sorting Hat that it made a mistake. It should have put you in Gryffindor after all—save that now, not even they are squalling about martyrdom.”

Harry clenched his hand. Emotions were blowing through him like winds, and he wasn't their container, but a leaf tossed about in them. He couldn't identify all of them. Fear was the predominant gale, though. “Don't you understand?” he insisted. “Bringing Voldemort here was a mistake. I should have set up a trap for him elsewhere. I had no right to endanger the life of anyone who didn't volunteer to be in the war. All those who've suffered so far were innocent. And I killed twelve of them myself—“

Snape laughed. Harry flinched again, certain he was hearing the boy who had flung devastating insults at James and the other Marauders in their sixth and seventh years.

“Be sure to tell Voldemort that,” Snape mocked, his eyes on fire with darkness. “Be sure to tell him that every victim who suffers as a result of this war is your fault. Be sure to tell him that war should only be between those who have agreed to suffer in it, so that they can bid their families properly farewell, and wave their hands, and go out to die after their morning tea. This is war, Harry. The Dark Lord does not care, he has never cared, about who is innocent and who is not. He prefers the innocent as victims, in fact, because they are so much less likely to fight back. And I am sure he would rejoice to know that his greatest enemy is tearing himself apart over a dozen dead children, rather than concentrating on saving the hundreds of living children still trapped in Hogwarts.”

Harry was breathing faster now. And he knew that one of the emotions howling through him was anger. But what Snape was saying was still wrong, still had to be wrong.

“I'm like Dumbledore if I use numbers,” he said, “if I say that the lives in Hogwarts are worth more than the lives of those children who died on the battlefield, just because there are more of them.”

“Has it occurred to you,” said Snape, voice descending to a rumbling purr like that of some great hunting cat, “that even Dumbledore was right when he began? He lost himself slowly to the mantra, the idea, of sacrifice. He made decisions in the First War that led to the loss of a small number of lives to save a greater. That is true. And tell me, Harry, would you say it is right to save the lives of twelve children over nine hundred? That is approximately how many students remain in the school right now. Would you trade them for those dozen first-years and second-years, if you had the choice to make again?"

Put like that, it did sound impossible. Harry shook his head, though. "Did Dumbledore ever kill a dozen people himself?" he asked. "Did he kill a dozen children?"

Snape's mouth parted slightly, and his eyes glittered. He whispered, "What do you think had to be done with the children when the Children's Massacre was discovered?"

Harry swallowed.

"There were spells cast on them to make them remain alive," Snape continued. "The official story, of course, is that they died when their rescuers tried to take them from the crucifixes. That is not true. The truth is that Dumbledore, and the others who came with him, had to end those spells and release them to death, because their wounds were mortal. They killed them out of mercy. Ask Minerva about the Massacre, Harry. Ask her what it was like to stare into the eyes of more than a dozen children as she took them down from their crucifixes and ended their lives, that she might end their suffering. The cowards in that situation were those who stayed behind because they refused to be responsible for the death of a child, not those who took those deaths on themselves and sent them where they would hurt no longer."

Harry closed his eyes for a moment. Then he said, "You told me that that kind of courage wasn't something a Gryffindor would understand. To—have to make that kind of decision. But McGonagall made that kind of decision after the Children's Massacre?"

"Not all Gryffindors, I should have said."

Harry took a deep breath and looked at Snape again.

“Do you see what your guilt will cost us?” Snape asked. “If Minerva let herself be incapacitated by the guilt that some children died under her care, she could not lead the rest of the school and tend to the living. She feels the emotion, but the time to let it wash over her is not now. She will wait until she may indulge it. And in this, Harry, she is wiser than you are, because you are indulging your pained and aching conscience now, at the expense of the pained and aching people around you.”

“But I—but I could hurt them,” Harry whispered. “I have hurt them. Even if I get through the battle, shouldn’t I go to Tullianum on murder charges?”

Snape lunged forward, grabbing his shoulder and shaking him fiercely. Harry squeaked in surprise and mortification. Snape was the third person in two weeks who had shaken him, and Harry was beginning to feel like a naughty child.

“Do not think that way,” Snape said fiercely. “Or every wizard who fights with you tomorrow should go to Tullianum on murder charges, Harry.”

Harry lowered his head. Snape caught his chin and tilted his face upward again, so that he had to face those intent black eyes.

“What is it about this that troubles you so much?” Snape whispered. “That they were children? That this was the first act of war in which you had to make a decision you did not know was right? That others blame you? That last should be no surprise. That second was something you must have known you would have to do someday. And as for the first, there are children here in Hogwarts as well, Harry, some of them younger than your victims, still alive. They are more valuable than the dead. The living are always more valuable than the dead. They matter more. They have the possibility to change, to redeem themselves—and to live after this battle is done. Will you fail them because you are too busy memorializing those who can no longer hear you?”

Harry shivered. He felt chills tearing him apart, chills from so many disparate emotions that he was no longer even prepared to say that fear and anger were among them.

“We go to battle tomorrow,” Snape said again, voice a concentrated force of rage. “Will you abandon us to face Voldemort alone because you must hide your head in mourning? Will you let children die because children have already died? Will you let the Dark Lord kill us?”

“No!”

Harry’s vision became sheened with blue as the phoenix fire exploded from him, and his emotions coalesced as one, righteous anger. Snape pulled back at once, though the flames had not burned him. He eyed the aura that surrounded Harry, and there was a look of grim satisfaction on his face.

Harry was breathing hard. This rage was a precious thing, and he hung onto it. He still could not be entirely sure, whatever Snape had said, that he had done the right thing. He did not understand how anyone could have that certainty about an act of war like this, and he envied McGonagall’s seeming ability to go on living her life as normal after it. Perhaps he would talk to her, when this was done, and get some kind of advice about not letting a war wound define one’s life.

For now, though, they did have a battle to fight.

And he could see, if he accepted Snape’s stinging words as truth, the way that others must have seen him—Draco, and Connor, and the Ravenclaws who stared at him with doubt in their eyes, and the Hufflepuffs who had whispered in his wake, and the Slytherins who might have agreed with Blaise about the need to give him up. If he was this deep in mourning, if he cared about no one but the dead, then perhaps he wasn’t going to save them, and then why shouldn’t they take their chances with Voldemort? A weak savior offered them no options.

You were the one who told Voldemort to come to Hogwarts. You were the one who insured that a battle on Midsummer Day, and not just a storm, would happen in the first place.

So fucking act like it.

Harry almost smiled when he realized that that last sentence was in his brother's voice, and then he set about expanding his Occlumency pools to trap his guilt and sadness and fear. They could not interfere right now. They had no place on the battlefield. As Snape had said, it was anger and a desire to see everyone around him live that would get them through.

How had he so thoroughly forgotten his own lessons? Put your head down and endure. Shove forward, no matter how much it hurts.

The battle was the task for right now. Everything else, including the justified accusations that he would face when his murder of a dozen children became public knowledge, would have to wait. Voldemort was certainly not going to politely stand aside while Harry contacted the parents of his victims and told them to do whatever they liked to him.

When that moment comes that they know, his conscience whispered, it will be a harder test than this.

Harry acknowledged that, and put the realization aside. It would happen, but he could not allow it to dominate his actions for now. And if he had to lock and chain his emotions artificially with the Occlumency Snape had taught him, then he would. He had already planned to go to the Sanctuary this summer, because he had begun to wonder what unhealed mental wounds would cost him in the war. Now there was a more urgent need for healing, but it could wait.

He looked up, and caught Snape's eye. "Thank you, sir," he said.

Snape sneered at him. "You should have known better than to fall into a pattern," he said. "Or, barring that, you should have come to me at once."

"I know that now, sir."

Snape shook his head. "When this is finished, Harry, I think you should devote your summer to making sure such emotions will never incapacitate you again."

"That's why I've arranged with Vera to go to the Sanctuary, sir," said Harry, and had the supreme satisfaction of seeing Snape choke. He smiled and stood up, still blazing with the phoenix fire. "I'm going to meet with my allies now, just to make sure they all understand their part in the battle. Can I borrow some Veritaserum, so that I can make sure there are no traitors among them?"

Snape rose and fetched the vials of Veritaserum without a word, all the while staring at him as if he had become a different person. Harry smiled at him, pressed his hand—the flames wouldn't burn anyone he didn't tell them to—and then left. For the first time in days, a list of tasks was unfolding in his head, a sign that he was back to normal now, and could think of what he was supposed to be doing.

Meet with my allies and make sure they're true. Set up those older students who are going to stay in the school and protect the younger children. Pass the phoenix fire through the stone again, and purify the last of that foul magic—and make sure that Draco and Snape know what I'm doing this time. Speak with Tybalt, and insure that he does have his linchpin ready. Speak with the Malfoys, and see if they're coming to the battle tomorrow...

"You're happy."

Ignifer turned with a start. Honoria stood behind her, staring at her with such innocent eyes that Ignifer knew immediately she must have been there for a few minutes. Ignifer shook her head and tried to regain control of her face. "Why would you think so?" she asked, turning away again. "We go to battle tomorrow, and our leader has just told us that he does not expect everyone to survive. I would be happy if I were guaranteed to live, but there is no reason for joy in the face of this."

“Bollocks,” said Honoria cheerfully, and shut the door of Ignifer’s room. Ignifer couldn’t help glancing at it. Honoria shrugged when she caught the glance. “I know counters to most of the simple unlocking spells.”

“I am not surprised.”

Honoria laughed at her. “But you are happy, Ignifer,” she said, going over and stretching out on Ignifer’s four-poster, a bed so ugly that Ignifer was not surprised it had been relegated to the dusty “guest” quarters before she came to Hogwarts. “I can tell. And I even know why you’re happy.”

“Do enlighten me, then,” Ignifer said, turning to face the mirror she’d conjured earlier. She had to stare closely at her hair as she used spells to fix it in place on her neck. She didn’t want it getting in her face during the battle. “Since you know so much more about my own emotions than I do.”

“That’s what a lover should do,” said Honoria. She ignored the startled little jerk that Ignifer made. “And you’re happy because Harry came back. He’s been moping himself into a corner for the past few days, and you were wondering if we would get the chance to fight and die with honor. Now we will, because he woke up and realized that the rest of us were more important than the people who died for him. You aren’t frightened of dying tomorrow. You’re frightened of the way you might have died, if Harry was still grieving so much that he refused to lead or made some strange and incompetent plan. I don’t really understand this focus on honor that you have, but I suppose it has something to do with your Light past.”

That was actually remarkably accurate. Ignifer saw no reason why she should have given up all her honor when she Declared for the Dark. That was in and of itself the honorable thing to do, when the wild Dark had saved her life, though of course her father hadn’t seen it that way. But she wasn’t about to admit that Honoria had guessed right. She went on braiding her hair in silence.

“Now that we’ve talked about the emotions,” said Honoria, her face and voice very bright, “can we shag?”

Ignifer did choke this time, and spin around to stare at her. Honoria was sitting up, and she had a faint smile on her face, but the smile was serious enough to let Ignifer know that she would—shag her, if one had to use that vulgar word, in a moment if Ignifer accepted the invitation.

“No,” said Ignifer, who had the feeling it’d taken far too long for her to give a simple denial. Her voice sounded muffled. “Of course not.”

Honoria pouted and rolled back over on her side, accidentally-on-purpose letting her robes ride up to reveal a length of her thigh. “And why not?” she asked.

“There is every reason why not!” Ignifer spun around. Her face was burning. She tried desperately to recall the codes of behavior that her family had drilled into her about this when she was a young girl. There weren’t many of them, actually. When the time came that she should think about bearing children, then she would look for a suitable husband, pureblood and Declared to the Light, and hopefully the magical heir of his family, though the last wasn’t required. It would be enough of an honor for his children to bear the Apollonis name, after all. They would do everything by formalities that Ignifer had known all her life.

One thing those codes were clear about was that no one was supposed to pursue anyone else. That was for halfbloods and others who didn’t have the assurance of a marriage whether or not they loved.

Well, a halfblood woman is trying awfully hard to court me, Ignifer thought, slightly hysterical. And she’s also Declared for Dark. I suppose only the magical heirship is lacking.

“I don’t know why you’re doing this,” she told Honoria when she thought she had her breathing under control, catching her eye in the mirror. “If it’s only to be funny or tease me, you can leave. I will never joke back. I have no sense of humor.”

“Yes, you do,” said Honoria. “It’s a lover’s task to know that, too. And as for why I’m doing this, I told you already. You’re beautiful, and intelligent, and stubborn, and proud. I want you.”

Ignifer ducked her head, feeling her cheeks burn. Pureblood prudery, perhaps, but she just wasn’t used to hearing people talk like that.

“And as for why we should shag now,” Honoria continued, a bit of hope entering her voice, “you know the situation. There are history-songs that talk about it. The night before we leave for battle. Couples bed each other to assert the primacy of life in the face of death.”

“The history-songs I heard usually placed such—bedding after the battle,” Ignifer pointed out.

“Well, that’s stupid,” said Honoria. “Because how did the couples know they were still going to be alive then? We’re alive right now.” Her hand moved in the mirror, and Ignifer saw her patting the bed. “Come here, Ignifer. Don’t let some shadow of your father stop you.”

Ignifer closed her eyes for a long moment. She would be doing this for a stupid reason if she gave in, she thought. No matter what Honoria might say about asserting the primacy of life, it was mostly going to be a quick fumble, without dignity, without the rules that Ignifer had known all her life.

Well, ask her about that, then. See what she says.

Ignifer opened her eyes and turned to face Honoria. The younger woman was watching her intently, holding her breath. Ignifer frowned. I wish she would not do that. It’s as if she finds me too beautiful to resist, and I know that is nonsense.

“I might break the rules for you,” she told Honoria, “but it would be only a few moments of passion, and that would feel tawdry to me.”

Honoria gave a smile Ignifer hadn’t seen before, and rose to her feet. “A few moments?” she murmured. “That’s what you think. It’s six in the evening now, and we have until at least six tomorrow morning.”

Ignifer swallowed, her heart beating fast, as Honoria came towards her and took one of her hands, standing on tiptoe to whisper into her ear.

“We have hours,” Honoria whispered. “And I intend to use a few of them near dawn for sleeping, if that.” Her other hand slid coaxingly along Ignifer’s arm, and she drew back to smirk at her. “If you agree, of course,” she said, and repeated the sliding gesture, making Ignifer feel an inexplicable urge to squirm closer.

Ignifer shut her eyes for a few moments, and contemplated it. This obviously meant something to Honoria. It would not be quick. If they both survived the battle, it might be repeated.

And if this broke the rules she had known all her life—did that matter? Her father doubtless thought she had lain with every Dark pureblood already, because he believed that was what Dark witches and wizards did. Ignifer did not think Honoria would gossip about it. And if one of them died in the battle tomorrow, no one else would ever know.

“All right,” she whispered.

Honoria immediately seized her mouth in a kiss, as if afraid she would back out if she waited a moment longer. Ignifer bowed her head, and slowly, hesitantly, kissed back. A moment later, Honoria undid the charms on her hair so that it tumbled around them.

“Don’t need these right now,” Honoria whispered, curved an arm around her neck, and drew her back into the kiss.

“And then the witch went home, because she had a diamond necklace and a cup on a chain, and that was all she’d asked of the world,” Thomas finished. He gently set the book aside, stroking the cover. Really, the library at Hogwarts had the finest collection of old fey tales he’d ever seen, ridiculous legends that broke all the laws of magic. But he’d enjoyed reading them aloud via the communication spell to his children for the last few days.

“Father?”

Rose's voice, emerging from his left arm, pulled him back. Thomas looked towards the sound of her voice and imagined her seated in the library, just finished copying down the words he'd read. She was the one of his children most interested in preserving old knowledge, especially if it was new to her. "What is it, dear?"

"Do you think you'll die tomorrow?"

Thomas tilted his head back and regarded the ceiling with a frown. "Well, Rosie, I don't know," he murmured. "We're prepared, and we have a good plan. And I think that I know enough spells that the Death Eaters don't stand a chance of guessing them before I use them, especially when they're non-verbal. And I know that I trust Harry, and most of the people who'll go to battle with him trust him, too. The children in the school don't, or they wouldn't have tried to give him over to Voldemort yesterday, but they don't count as much. And—"

"Father!" Rose's voice was just slightly exasperated. "Do you think you'll die? That was the question I asked." Her words wavered on the end.

"I don't know," Thomas said, studying his wrist in interest now. "Have you been reading those books again that claim you can develop Divination ability without being born with it? You can't. That's one of the things we learned from the Grand Unified Theory. Divination is a useless subject to teach. There are some students who will just never be able to master it, and that means—"

"Father. No, I haven't been reading those books again. I know they're useless. But—you don't sound afraid. And we're all afraid that you'll die. Even Mother, though I know she doesn't show it." Rose's voice lowered on the last words, as if she thought Priscilla, or one of her siblings, might be listening to her.

Thomas smiled gently. He had no doubt that it was true, if Rose said it was so. She was his magical heir, and because of that, he'd treated her a bit more like an adult than the other children. And she'd reacted to the training well, seeing things that an adult would be more likely to notice most of the time.

"I would expect them to be afraid," he said, tilting his head to the side and rubbing at the back of his neck. "It's death, after all. And they're not here with me. And your mother's been overworked in the past few days, with the Ministry exploding as news of the situation at Hogwarts spreads throughout the wizarding world."

"But you're not," Rose whispered.

"No," said Thomas. "I'm not."

"Why not?"

Thomas shrugged and stood, meandering through the shelves of books to put away the one he'd borrowed to read to Rose. "I don't know. I never have been. Death is there, and it's going to happen someday, and I would prefer that it not be painful. But—it would be like being afraid of the sky. It's always there. It won't go away just because you want it to. And your life's easier when you don't ignore it."

"The sky doesn't kill you, though." Rose's voice sharpened in the way that Thomas knew meant she was getting angry with him. He was sorry for that. He never did know when he crossed the line from ordinary behavior into anger-making behavior.

But he didn't live in the same world as other people. He knew it when he tried to explain things that were simple to him, and they didn't understand. But he could get frustrated by that or he could get used to it, and he'd done the latter.

"But in other ways, it resembles death," he said. "And I think being afraid of either of them would be silly."

Rose said nothing for a moment, but the tingle of magic on Thomas's left wrist told him she hadn't ended the communication spell. He waited patiently, running his fingers along the shelf of books in front of him. He had to go to bed soon, to be ready and rested for the battle in the morning, but he wanted to choose some light reading to take with him.

"I love you, Father," Rose whispered. "I hope you don't die."

Thomas laughed gently as he pulled out a book on centaurs he hadn't seen before. It would interest him to read what implausibilities filled it. "I love you too, Rosie, and I hope the same thing. Good night."

"And take care of your mother."

"Well, of course take care of our mother," said Michael, giving him an offended look.

Charles really couldn't blame his son for doing that; it had been a stupid reminder to give the twins, that he wanted them to take care of Medusa if he died in the battle tomorrow. Some of the promises they had requested from him in return were more outlandish. For example, Owen had wanted Charles to create a guarding spell that would follow Harry around like one of the Muggle dogs that guided the blind. Michael had wanted Charles to adopt a child, one of their older cousins, if they were both gone. He didn't think his parents should be without children.

The house will feel so empty if they are both gone, Charles thought, watching his sons as they lounged back against the bed in his guest quarters. But that would be true even if only one of them died.

There was a pause in the conversation. None of them could really think of anything else to say, Charles supposed, or any other promises to make. They had pressed hands, and confessed fears, and asserted what would happen if one of them survived but the others didn't.

Charles wondered if Owen and Michael were afraid. Owen's face, in particular, was so calm that he could tell hardly anything from it.

He was not afraid.

He had known this day would come when he committed his family to Harry. In truth, this day had been coming for twenty-six years, since Voldemort had returned to Britain. This was the first time that someone who was not Dumbledore would go forth in battle against the Dark Lord with the whole world able to watch.

Charles felt a fierce, quiet gladness that he was here, and able to participate in the battle. Since his nephew had died in a failed Death Eater raid, he had known Voldemort would not benefit the Rosier-Henlins. But Harry would, and he had survived his own first great moral crisis. When Charles asked what had driven him so deep into grief, Harry had talked to him in private and told him what had happened to the children in the Life-Web.

The first of many decisions like that, Charles thought. And he will not let it callus him.

Charles mourned for those children's parents, but he rejoiced that his own family followed a leader so strong and had found a place close to him. He reached out now and clasped first Owen's hand, then Michael's.

"To death in the morning—causing it, and not experiencing it," he said. It was the salute his father had given him the first time he fought.

Owen repeated it, and then Michael, their voices strong and shining. Charles nodded, and watched as they left.

Then he invoked the communication spell to speak to Medusa. It might be the last time he would ever do so.

But he was not afraid.

Pansy sat down on the top of the Astronomy Tower. It was high enough to be cold, even though summer was coming tomorrow, and the sight of the fires beneath her was intimidating enough to scare most people away from the walls. Even the wards seemed thinner up here.

That was, in fact, the point. No one was likely to bother her.

Pansy closed her eyes, and dropped straight into the cold darkness she'd learned to carry within her about three months ago. The world around her sang like a cracked bell, but within the darkness, all the bells stopped. Pansy found herself in the midst of a deeper cold than she had known could exist. This was the darkness left when life had passed, she thought. Someone could stop speaking aloud, and still have the warmth that breathing and moving blood lent. She herself was a living example. And Lucius Malfoy, for all that he prided himself on his chillness, could not have endured a cold like this. Only the dead and the necromancers were meant to.

When she looked up into the darkness, she saw holes in the place of stars. They were always there, patiently waiting, sometimes gently tugging on the dead. Most of the dead who did not become ghosts but remained close enough to the living world to communicate with necromancers went up those holes in the end. Pansy did not know what lay beyond them, because no one ever returned to talk or tell.

“Hullo, Pansy.”

She turned and nodded to the most talkative spirit she knew, who foamed towards her like mist. He created a face for a moment, then let that go and took the form of a great dog instead. He claimed to find it more natural. Pansy wondered if it was because a human body was more complicated, or if it had to do with the fact that his animal form so closely resembled a death-connected Grim.

“Hullo, Sirius.” She could speak aloud here, because this was not the mortal world. She sat down and watched him for a moment as he snapped at drifting bits of his own misty body. “Looking forward to tomorrow?”

Sirius Black turned his head and stared at her for a moment. His eyes held the mad, haunted look that Pansy had grown used to when he “taught” at the school in her second and third years. Most of the time, he looked like what Pansy supposed was his younger self, rather madcap. She knew why he had changed.

“Hush,” she said quietly, and reached out a hand to stroke the cold mist on the top of his head. “Tomorrow will be hard, but I knew that when I first gained the ability to see death. There will be people who perish tomorrow. But there are people who perish everywhere, every day. And since I'll be on the battlefield, you'll have the ability to come forth and help Harry."

The haunted look in Sirius's eyes eased a bit, and he licked playfully at her fingers. "That's true," he said. "But I'm still not looking forward to tomorrow."

Pansy nodded. "I know." Sirius would be able to appear only in the form of a ghostly dog. He couldn't actually rejoin the world of the living, and even if Harry saw him, which was doubtful, Pansy didn't know if he would be able to speak to him. They were part of such different worlds now. Sometimes she caught Sirius looking up at the black holes in the darkness. It had been nearly two years since he died, and other than his own guilt and remorse at the manner of his death and a wish to help make up for it, Sirius had no tie of love or vengeance to hold him here, the way most spirits did. Pansy was frankly surprised he had resisted for so long. She wondered if she would have come back in a few days, battle or no battle, and found him gone.

"I miss him," Sirius said then, which was part of their nightly rituals.

"I know," said Pansy.

"I wish I could do something more to help," said Sirius, and wagged his tail, and looked frustrated. Pansy knew what she had to do. As she progressed further in her necromancer studies, she had learned that part of her task was to help ease the dead's powerful emotions. The living had the living to do it for them, but the dead had no one if the only people able to speak to them wouldn't help.

"You can't," she said gently. "You're dead."

Sirius no longer snarled at her when she said that, the way he had when she was first able to see him. He lowered his head and put it on his paws instead, and gave a pitiful whine.

"Harry misses you," Pansy whispered, stroking his fur. "And you miss him. But you can't be part of the same world anymore. The divide is too deep. And after tomorrow—well, I don't know, Sirius. Do you think you'll be able to stay here much longer? I expect to find you gone each time I come looking for you."

"I don't know," said Sirius, and rolled over so his head was against her knee. "I still wish I'd told him. There were so many things I could have done differently, and then I might have been there, and helped him when Lily and James turned on him."

"It's over and done," said Pansy firmly. "It was inevitable. You died there because you were meant to die there. If my father had seen you alive, he would have known."

"I suppose destiny is true," Sirius grumbled back, "but it does bugger all for comfort."

Pansy laughed quietly and ruffled his fur again. "Your brother is getting help now," she said. "He broke his own silence that might have cost him everything. And Harry will win this battle. We'll help him win."

Sirius sighed and closed his eyes. "I know," he whispered.

"You'll be at peace in the end."

"I know."

Pansy said nothing else. They had discussed the ins and outs of the battle as much as possible, and Sirius knew everything about it as it related to him and Pansy. They could do no more but sit in the cold and darkness, and share silence.

"You realize that someone could see us outlined against the castle and fling a curse at us," Draco said softly, nuzzling his face into the back of Harry's neck.

Harry snorted, and said, "That would be why I have a concealing charm up, Draco, so that the Death Eaters don't take the chance to reduce us to small smears of black goo on the wall."

“Oh,” said Draco, and then peered over Harry’s shoulder at the campfires again.

They were up in the North Tower, because Harry had wanted to go there before he went to sleep. Draco had agreed, particularly when he found out that they could be alone there. He hadn’t been alone with Harry all day; first had come Snape’s shredding of Harry’s guilt complex in his quarters, and then had come endless strategy meetings, sometimes with all of his allies, sometimes with just one. Draco had kept himself busy enough, speaking with his parents via the communication spell and practicing his possession abilities, slipping through the minds of the Slytherins. He was relieved to find that most of them were shocked at Blaise’s treachery, and even angry. Draco knew the feeling. He was going to find Blaise when the siege was done.

But now they were alone, and standing on the North Tower, and gazing out at the camp of their enemies. Well, Draco supposed, one couldn’t have everything.

“Thank you,” Harry said.

Draco stiffened slightly in surprise. “For what?” he asked.

“For not pressing me today,” Harry said, turning around and holding his eyes. “For not insisting that I talk to you when I wasn’t ready. And for not wailing and blaming yourself for falling victim to Blaise’s trick. It happened to all of us.”

“I would only wail if he was beyond my reach,” said Draco calmly. “As it is, he’ll pay.”

Harry regarded him sternly.

“He will,” said Draco. “Him, and Findarin, and Tipperary, and Belville, and the two Death Eaters McGonagall captured. They all will, Harry.”

“I think we should let the Ministry try them—“

"The Ministry won't consider what they did a crime," Draco interrupted. "Well, the adults maybe, but not three harmless students." He made his voice into a vicious parody of what Harry had told him the Department of Magical Family and Child Services woman, Madam Shiverwood, sounded like. "So they'll definitely leave them alone. And that's not right, Harry. You have to show that you won't let your enemies get away with something like that. If that means setting your allies on them, fine. But you can't leave them just dangling around unpunished. They were idiots."

"They were frightened," Harry corrected quietly.

"So were the rest of us!" Draco exclaimed. "But you don't see the rest of us doing something that mad, do you?"

Harry's body was tense in his arms for a moment. Then he sighed out, and leaned against Draco. "All right," he murmured. "If you can get McGonagall and Snape to agree, then I won't interfere."

Draco waited for some contradiction, some protest, some explanation of morality. But Harry said nothing, just looked at the fires.

"And that's it?" Draco asked, his voice growing edged in spite of himself. "That's all the objections you'll make?"

"I'm tired, Draco."

Draco resisted the temptation to snap that they all were, and waited. Harry was letting his weight be supported as much by the stones in front of him as he was by the arms around him, he thought.

"I'm tired," Harry continued. "And I can't afford to be, not if we're going to win this war. I always intended to send Voldemort howling so that I could take some time to heal myself and make the future progress of the war a surer thing. Now it's even more urgent. I frightened myself with how far I fell until Snape rescued me. And I'm not entirely sure, even now, that I made the right choice, and if I confront the parents of those dead children like this, I'd break."

“But you aren’t going to tell them that you killed their children,” said Draco, slightly incredulous.

Harry turned and looked at him, eyes calm and luminous. “Of course I am. They deserve to know what happened.” He shook his head when Draco opened his mouth to argue. “No. I’ll face them, and deal with what I have to deal with. But I’m going to put it off until I can actually deal with it, and that won’t be until after I visit the Sanctuary.”

“I thought that was a fever dream of yours,” Draco murmured, burying his face against Harry’s neck again.

“No,” said Harry. “I’m tired, Draco, of lots of things. I’m tired of drowning in guilt that other people would overcome easily. I’m tired of extending too much forgiveness and only knowing it when someone else points it out. I’m tired of not being able to relate to you physically, and then dismissing my own attempts to overcome that, because there’s always something more important going on.” His hand found Draco’s own and squeezed it. “This is the point, after the battle, where more important things end for a while. I’m going to the Sanctuary, and working on my own healing, so that eventually I can work towards the healing of the world with a surer heart.”

Draco swallowed, decided he would choke if he tried to say anything, and settled for turning Harry and kissing him. He was not sure what affected him more: the revelation that Harry was finally, finally taking some time for himself, or the revelation that Harry was talking about his own life after the battle as something he would have, and not have to give up to Voldemort in payment for having killed those children.

Harry kissed back, firmly, and then smiled as he pulled away. “Would you like to come to the Sanctuary with me?” he asked.

“I would have followed you if you left me behind,” said Draco, and wrapped an arm firmly around him. “No letting someone else teach you what pleasure is like.”

Harry laughed, high above the battlefield, on the edge of death, and Draco had to close his eyes.

Chapter Ninety: Beneath This Storm of Light

The dawn came, and with it, the storm.

Harry met it standing on the edge of the Astronomy Tower, watching the east as it shone with gentle colors at first, orange and peach and apricot. Then those hues melted into each other, and grew fiercer and fiercer, and surged, and turned the color of gold and diamonds. The image of a gryphon hung in the sky, hovering with wings spread over Hogwarts, blazing with all the colors of fire.

Harry could hear frightened shouts from the Death Eaters behind and below him. He allowed himself a tiny smile. Did Voldemort tell them that they would be fighting beneath the Light itself today? Or did he consider that a tiny, pesky little detail that they didn't need to know about?

The gryphon's wings faded into white where they met the clouds, but the center of its body was real, defined, sharp, and full of gold. Its talons, blue, were held tucked close to its chest. Its eyes were rubies made of light, and its neck and head blared orange. Harry wondered if the talons or the wickedly curved beak were causing the Death Eaters more problems. Or perhaps it was the lion-like hind paws, though as yet they were still fighting to form out of the sunrise.

Harry lifted his left wrist, both to salute the Light and in a private memorial of his own. A year ago today, he had lost that hand.

The gryphon abruptly began to flap its wings. Harry stared, and heard the wild song of the Light in his ears, played by the turning of the sun and the moon and the stars, very close. The song melted into an echoing cry that streamed out of the gryphon's beak. Harry felt the sound uplifting him.

From behind and beneath him, the Death Eaters didn't find it nearly so inspiring. And why would they? Harry wondered, looking over his shoulder and watching their stumbling panic with a faint smirk. This was the Light screaming its defiance at the Dark and its Lord. They would know that its greeting or its blessing or both was not meant for them.

Harry turned back in time to see the gold at the center of the gryphon's body growing brighter, until he had to put his hand over his eyes. Then the image broke with a crack like thunder, and the air flooded with more music and with light cleaner and purer and richer than ordinary sunshine. Harry was not surprised, when he felt able to look up again, to see that the center of the sky was aswarm with glittering, tumbling golden waves, all of them edged with white like the gryphon's wings, all of them moving in a lazy circle that centered on Hogwarts.

The storm of Light had arrived.

Harry turned to face the Death Eaters and the battlefield again. Voldemort was moving through their ranks, heading to the front of the crowd for his morning announcement about what would happen to the inhabitants of Hogwarts if they didn't hand Harry over. Harry kept his gaze fixed on him, and hoped McGonagall was watching for his signal.

"Today is Midsummer," Voldemort called out, his voice, accented with Sonorus, striving for dignity and failing. "The thirteen days of grace that I gave you have passed. Now that the storm—"

Harry called his phoenix fire, finding no trouble in summoning righteous anger with Voldemort right below him. It flared, blue and white, and Voldemort's snake swung its head to look at him. Harry was almost sure he saw the Dark Lord's lipless mouth part in a smile, though of course he was too high up—as Draco would have reminded him—to make out such details.

Harry called the phoenix fire to leap higher and higher, and then sent it up around him in a dazzling display of light. By now, all the Death Eaters were watching him, and so was Voldemort, amused and attracted by the reckless spending of such magic.

Harry had counted on that. While they focused on him, McGonagall quietly dropped the wards in one specific place, and the Weasley twins would be making their way out through the hole under one of Honoria's illusions. They were carrying the vials of potion that would make those it touched go blind, and they were heading for the Quidditch Pitch, where their brooms were stored. McGonagall closed the wards again the moment they were through. Harry waited until he felt them tighten before he spoke.

“Here I am, Tom,” he said, and saw Voldemort make a checked movement that bespoke his fury. Harry smiled more widely. He does hate being called by his name. “What do you think? Should we settle this with a duel once and for all, like Lords and gentlemen?”

“I think not, Harry.” Voldemort’s voice had gone back to the disgusting croon it had been when he captured the children in the Life-Web. “You should have known better than to challenge me. When you succumb to my power, and lie broken and bleeding at my feet, looking up at me, you will learn better. I will personally take charge of your reeducation myself.”

And on he went, blathering, while another tiny hole in the wards opened up in front of Harry. He knelt down, scooped up a handful of what would look like tiny golden pellets from the stone in front of him, and dropped them over the edge of the Tower.

The Gloryflower insects fell until they hit stone or soil, and if they hit stone, scurried madly across it until they could reach the soil. Harry hadn’t had a chance to spread them through Hogwarts’s grounds before Indigena arrived. They were going now, though, with the specific imperative to bite every plant that wasn’t grass or a tree. That would doubtless mean the loss of some native flowers and Hagrid’s vegetable garden, but it would get rid of Indigena’s vines and blossoms and thorns. Harry didn’t dare send out the Gloryflower horses, among others, until he knew Indigena wouldn’t be able to just grab them with vines and hold them motionless.

“What are you doing?” Voldemort demanded abruptly. His snake was apparently looking in the right direction to have noticed the insects, though not the hole in the wards.

Harry arched a brow and smiled as he scattered another handful of insects downwards. “What does it look like I’m doing, Tom?”

Another twitch from the Dark Lord. "It looks as if you think that you need help in defeating me," he sneered.

"I would say that," Harry agreed, and then lifted his eyes to scan the five hundred or so Death Eaters behind Voldemort. "But you hardly came prepared for single combat either, Tom. Giants. Really. Was that necessary?"

By now, Voldemort was shaking with anger. Harry dropped two more handfuls of insects before he was able to respond.

"They shall all die," Voldemort whispered. "They shall all perish, and I shall make you kill some of them yourself, as you did by the lake."

Harry kept himself from staggering with an effort. Voldemort's Sonorus was touching the ears of everyone in the castle, if he kept the form of the spell he had used for his morning announcements. That meant that everyone would now know he had killed those children in the Life-Web.

He pushed it aside. He would deal with it later, and hope that no one would try to stab him in the back from within the school because of it. He looked outward again, scanning the distance, the road that led to Hogsmeade.

"What are you looking for, Harry?" Voldemort called. "Aurors from the Ministry come to save you?"

"No," said Harry, softly enough that he didn't think Voldemort could hear him. His eyes locked on a glint of light that wasn't the storm reflecting off something. "A second sunrise."

A moment later, horns, or the sound of horns, broke the morning, sounding like the hunting horn that Harry had heard summoning him throughout Walpurgis. He felt his face break into a smile in answer, especially when one of Honoria's illusions answered with trumpets from within the school. Some of the Death Eaters looked uneasily over their shoulders.

“What was that?” Voldemort demanded.

Harry couldn't believe he wanted an answer to that question. But he didn't have to give it, because it answered itself in the next few moments.

Gloryflower had arrived.

The ground shook with vibrations as a herd of artificial unicorns came charging, their bodies glinting silver as running water beneath the golden sky, their diamond horns sharp and lowered and playing that hunting call over and over, their hooves flashing and their manes streaming. They bound straight past the still-staring giants and slammed into the back of the Death Eaters. Harry saw more than one body go flying, stabbed by a horn through the guts or kicked by one of the hooves that Laura had told him were as sharp as knives.

Vines lashed out of the ground, grabbing and slowing some of the unicorns, but these were not the horses Laura had sent. They had no riders to take care of, and plenty of edges. The unicorns whipped up and down, and the vines fell cut and wriggling from their feet and their bodies. Harry saw spikes springing out of their necks and flanks, severing their assailants and then withdrawing beneath the silver again so that the unicorns could pick up speed.

At the same moment, some of the Death Eaters began to scream. Harry concentrated, sharpening his ears with his magic, and made out some of their words. They were blind. Fred and George had reached their brooms, and were on them above the field, scattering down drops of their potion.

Harry looked down at Voldemort, and saw the fury gathering on his face. His magic was gathering around him, too, a Dark answer to the Light overhead, and Harry could feel it opening like a pit with snakes at the bottom.

He stepped back from the edge of the Astronomy Tower, dropped the phoenix fire, and reached out his hand. The artificial animal curled up beneath the wall, so that Voldemort wouldn't see it before it was time, raised its head and blinked at him, then bowed its back so that Harry could climb aboard.

This was the creature that Laura had said her ancestor had built a prototype of. She'd sent the prototype and one other copy of the creature to Harry. Harry thought it had started out something like a thestral, but Laura's ancestor had gone slightly mad in adding spikes and horns and fins, until it looked more like a cross between a thestral and a dragon, and perhaps a unicorn if one took into account the enormous single horn rising from its forehead. It was made of iron, and ugly beyond belief, but its sides had ready-made stirrups. In spite of his lack of experience riding horses, Harry could ride this and know he wouldn't be thrown off.

He fixed his feet into the stirrups and leaned forward. The iron creature spread its wings. Harry felt the egg-shaped stone bouncing in his robe pocket, along with several other stones pried from the walls of Hogwarts. The egg-shaped stone was full of the purified magic he'd taken from Dumbledore and Voldemort, and finished cleansing last night with Peter and Draco and Snape to watch over him.

The other stones were empty.

Right now, anyway.

The iron creature took several running steps, and then launched itself from the edge of the Tower. Harry clutched the spiny neck; his Quidditch gear, especially the glove, was essential to protecting him while he rode the beast. They circled out over the battlefield, tents and fires and Death Eaters swinging crazily beneath the madly flapping blue-black wings.

Harry used one knee to nudge the iron creature upward, and it took the command, rising. Harry streamed across the grounds towards the Forbidden Forest, looking all the while for some sign that not just the Gloryflower unicorns were there.

He saw it in the form of three separate triangular flashes of light, their agreed-upon signal, and pumped his arm. The Gloryflowers, the Griffinsnests, the elder Malfoys, and the others waiting on the edge of the grounds began to move forward. They'd arrived without being noticed; the Death Eaters hadn't been worried about a threat from behind.

Harry wheeled the iron beast around again. He could see threats from at least two directions. The first was that the giants had begun to move, swinging their clubs onto their shoulders with stern grunts and heading for Hogwarts. They wouldn't care about wading into the panicking Death Eaters, Harry knew.

The second was that Voldemort was attacking Hogwarts's wards.

Harry took a deep breath and opened his absorbere ability as widely as it would go. Then he began to rake the Death Eaters gathered around the Quidditch Pitch and the edges of the Forbidden Forest, swallowing their magic with no care for if it was fouled or not. He needed as much power as he could get his hand on, and it wouldn't matter if he gulped enough to burst him, because he would pass most of it directly into the stones in his pocket.

Voldemort swung to face him at once. He pointed one hand, and a spell Harry didn't know traveled up through the air towards him in a deadly dark cone.

Harry spun the iron beast to meet it, and it obeyed him as quickly and neatly as the Firebolt would have. This was his major part in the battle, other than gathering magic. He would face Voldemort and hold him, because no one else could do that.

He broke the dark cone, turning it aside, deflecting it into small scattered particles that fell and burned themselves out harmlessly long before they hit the grass. Harry gave Voldemort a smile he was certain to feel and then began gulping more magic. Voldemort, he thought, would have to come and face him. He wouldn't want to drain his own followers of power, and to break through the wards and drain those inside Hogwarts would take moments of effort in which Harry would have a chance to become more and more powerful.

Sure enough, Voldemort, maddened by the thought of losing to him, did not leave him alone. He gave a command in Parseltongue that sounded choked in dirt, the same language he had used to control the worm in the graveyard, and several Death Eaters flew aside as something slithered over to him from the direction of his tent.

Harry fought to hold onto his breakfast. The creature was a flesh-dragon, made of stitched-together parts of Muggle bodies, the same one he had seen in some of his visions when he'd still held the Occlumency link to Voldemort open. It breathed not fire, but a great and vicious stink, if he remembered correctly.

And now Voldemort was mounting its back, accompanied by his snake, and pointing Harry out, still shouting in choked Parseltongue. Harry saw the dragon's head, slick and pale and sewn together, lift and orient on him. The great wings flashed and flapped, and the dragon began to rise from the ground.

Harry braced himself for the meeting, glad he rode a non-living mount that couldn't be affected by the stink, and hoped that his attacking allies were in a position to do something about the giants.

Lucius ducked, his hair flying, as one of the giants' clubs tried to smash him into the ground. Narcissa dropped smoothly to her knees behind him, grabbing his shoulder and shielding him with a Protego as one of the giant spears stabbed at him. The giant recoiled. Lucius knew maintaining the Shield Charm had cost his wife, but she didn't appear to be tired as she held out her hand and helped him rise.

"On three?" she asked.

Lucius nodded, and put his back to hers. They were aiming at giants who appeared to be ignoring them now for the sake of getting to Hogwarts, or had perhaps simply forgotten about the smaller creatures when they looked away. Giants had notoriously short attention spans, which was one of the difficulties with getting them to be allies in wizard wars.

"One," he said.

“Two,” Narcissa echoed him.

“Three,” they said together, and followed the number with the curse that alone could carry all their rage and hatred when their son was cooped up in a school and threatened by the madman Lucius used to serve.

“Avada Kedavra!”

Twin beams of green light shot away from their wands, and each felled a giant. Lucius laughed aloud, cold, fierce pleasure rising up in him. He heard Narcissa laughing with the same emotion behind him. He never felt so close to her as he did in these moments. He turned and claimed a hungry kiss, in the instant before she had to cast a Shield Charm around him to protect him from a giant’s flying club.

In fact, Lucius saw as he looked up, the giants seemed to be going mad, acting as if something invisible were circling their heads and taunting them. Were there giant-gnats?

“Takes a more concentrated—” Fred shouted as he emptied one of their vials of blinding potion on a giant’s head.

“Dose to bring them down,” George finished, nodding as he emptied two vials on the same giant, flying his broom with his knees, and then reached into his robe pocket for another. “Yes, it does.”

Fred grinned at him, and George grinned back, thinking that this was really the perfect way to test their new products. Protected by their illusion, no one could see them to hit at them, and that meant they only had to dodge randomly fired curses and, now that they were among the giants, wildly swinging clubs. And since they had both been Beaters on the Gryffindor Quidditch team for the majority of their school careers, that was no trouble.

“Bet I can get that one,” Fred said then, nodding to one giant in the center of the tangle, which was staring at its blind, flailing brothers in dumb wonder.

“Not before me!” George shouted, and urged his broom forward. Fred laughed and rose over the giants’ heads. George, meanwhile, took the lower route, around and through the giants’ arms and weapons.

A club passed close enough to cause a whiffle of wind to run up his ribs. George shivered and put on a burst of speed to carry him clear. He nearly hit a second giant in the armpit, but spun the broom twice, in a maneuver that Connor had shown him, and ducked around the obstruction. He had to keep one hand on the vials in his pocket so they didn’t fall or fly out, and he had to watch all the time just in case he missed a shadow that would indicate a weapon was coming at him, and he was blasted again and again with the foul smell of sweating giants in close quarters.

He couldn’t remember the last time he’d been this madly happy.

He came out under his last raised arm, and saw the giant he and Fred had targeted immediately ahead. He also saw that Fred was going to reach him first; his route had been faster after all. George cursed and pulled up, hovering, ready to listen to whatever taunts Fred gave him in good humor.

Fred turned and glanced back, seeing him. A smile lit his face, and he drew breath to shout something.

Their target had had his head lifted. Now, for the first time, George saw his nose working. Then he grunted, and swung his club around in a steady circle.

Fred never saw it coming.

The club caught his broomstick and smashed it to kindling. Then it broke his legs—George could hear those snaps of bones as if they were his own—and traveled on, straight into his ribs. George shrieked, on fire with his twin’s pain, sharing the sensations as he never had before.

He was diving without conscious thought, falling and falling, his eyes locked on Fred’s motionless, falling form. He felt himself draw his wand and chant the Levitation Charm without realizing he would do it, either. With Fred unconscious—hopefully unconscious, at least—he felt only half-alive.

He saw Fred slow. And then he caught him, he caught him, oh he had him, wrapped close in his arms, held tightly, and he could feel Fred's ribs twitching and folding inward in a way that no ribs ever should, and Fred choked on blood and met his eyes.

"Don't you dare die, you son of a bitch," George breathed, as he spun his broom and rose, flying directly towards the castle. He would get through the wards, he would burst through them if he had to, and if they went in through the Owlery, they would get to the hospital wing that much faster.

"No call to go insulting Mum," said Fred faintly, and shut his eyes.

George dismissed the glamour that would keep anyone from seeing them and realizing they needed help, and flew.

Harry cursed softly as Voldemort forced him to wheel high enough, and bring up enough defenses, that he could no longer easily reach and drain the Death Eaters. Voldemort was laughing at him, and his laughter sounded just as unpleasant aloud as it ever had in Harry's dreams.

"What good is magic if you do not use it?" he said now, and another spell that Harry didn't recognize came at him, this one a purple stream of light that forked again and again as he looked at it, like intelligent lightning bolts splitting to attack a target.

Harry swallowed that magic, too, and saw Voldemort's face twist. They were high enough now that Harry was shivering, and the lazy swirls of golden light turning overhead seemed closer than the people struggling on the ground.

Voldemort said something else, but Harry didn't really hear it. He was struggling with the flow of power he'd swallowed. He'd pressed most of it into the stones, but he had to retain some of it in case Voldemort hit him with a spell that couldn't be shielded against and was too vile to gulp down. And already he felt distant and detached from the world, floating above it in a way that had nothing to do with his mount. He could do almost anything with this much magic. Why shouldn't he do it?

If he feels like this most of the time, Harry thought, eyes lingering on Voldemort as he spun the iron beast away from another bolt of forked lightning, this time green, it's no wonder that he thinks other people are of no account.

Voldemort touched the neck of his flesh dragon, and it drew its head back. Harry saw the slick jaws part, and he sucked in a quick, deep breath of air.

The dragon breathed, a clinging, choking cloud of inky murk that flowed around Harry's face. He could feel the oiliness of it against his skin even before he was forced to open his mouth to take in new air and smelled the reek. He began to hack. The smell was burning the lining of his throat and mouth, and the only solution he could think of to keep from vomiting his guts out was to aim the horned thestral for the sky and hope that it would bring him clear of the cloud soon.

It appeared to have worked; Harry could see light and golden sky a moment later, and he breathed clean air frantically to ease the burning. But his mount shook a moment later, and Harry realized that the flesh-dragon hovered not far away. Its tail had just slammed the thestral, and barely missed breaking his own leg. Now its head was coming around again, the jaws parting.

Harry dropped into the instincts that he usually kept for Quidditch, and willed the beast to dive. It obeyed him, dropping like a stone for long enough that Harry knew people would have been yelling his name in fear and fury from the stands if this was a true game. Then he kicked out, and the thestral turned and began to climb again in steady circles.

Harry turned his head, scanning for Voldemort, and saw the dragon bearing down on the battlefield. The Dark Lord had either got bored with him, or realized the best way to infuriate and incapacitate Harry was actually by attacking his allies.

I'm not going to let him do that.

Harry opened a conduit directly to Voldemort's magic, as he had done in the Chamber of Secrets, and last Midsummer in the graveyard, and began to drain him. The foul taste was enough to make him vomit this time, but he succeeded in getting Voldemort's attention. The dragon swung around again, a strange whistling shriek bursting from its throat.

"You dare?" Voldemort breathed, staring blindly down at him.

Harry thought that was fairly obvious, and tugged furiously at the siphon. He threw up again, but Voldemort was losing strength.

And now he had the Dark Lord's attention fully fixed on him.

Harry prepared to do some fast flying.

Ignifer shifted anxiously as she waited for Hogwarts's wards to part enough to let her and the other fighters out. McGonagall had been reluctant to agree at first, since they didn't know if Yaxley's plants were gone or remained to restrict their free movement, but Ignifer had pointed out that her fire could burn most vines and flowers, even magical ones, away. And since the Weasley twins had come back to the castle wounded, and Harry's allies on the far end of the field were tangling with Death Eaters now, someone had to do something about the giant problem.

Honorina stood close at her side, now and then giving her smiles as if to remind her of what they'd done last night. Ignifer avoided her glances, but only some of the time.

At her back were Harry's other adult allies and some of the older students. Minerva had also been extremely reluctant to let them risk their lives, but they could make a difference on the battlefield. Scattered though the Death Eaters were, distracted though their Lord was, some of them might make a concentrated effort on the wards, and then they would be fighting to protect the lives of defenseless students. And there simply weren't enough fighters on the field if they sent only the adults.

Ignifer leaned forward now, staring intently, watching for the moment when the blurred vision of the Hogwarts grounds, courtesy of the wards, gave way—

And then it did. She could see the flagstones of the courtyard just beyond the entrance hall, and the grass beyond that, and the struggling shapes, without looking through a veil of mist.

She led the way out, fire flaring around her, Honoria still keeping her place close beside her. Ignifer wasn't surprised to see glamours of other fighters take shape, replicating them at first, but appearing different enough the further away they stretched to make the Death Eaters think they were fighting many more enemies than were actually present. Honoria shrugged and smiled when she saw that Ignifer was watching her.

"The more we can keep them from striking at us, the better," she said. "These will even bleed and scream like the real thing."

Ignifer stopped herself from saying that Honoria was brilliant, because that would sound too sentimental. Besides, the next moment Honoria was sprouting feathers and hurtling aloft, looking for the place where she could use her illusions to best effect. Ignifer was sure she heard her cackle before she vanished into the storm of gold hovering over the castle.

A giant, brushing off the remains of what looked like a curse that had tried to tie it with ropes, stumbled towards her. Ignifer held out her wand. Though she could not call on the Light for help as she knew some of the wizards and witches today would do, her old sympathy with fire, which normally only the Light-Declared had so strongly, had never left her.

"Ardesco!" she cried.

Flames burst through the giant's gray skin, and it began to slap at itself inefficiently, trying to put the fire out. Ignifer laughed, and ran forward, calling out the incantation for the Flame Whip. It formed in her fist, and she lashed, curling it around the giant's leg and pulling. It tottered, but remained standing upright, even as it howled in pain. Ignifer wasn't surprised. Giants could take a lot of damage before they fell. She supposed she could have slain it in a moment with the Killing Curse, but she preferred not to use the Unforgivables, and she definitely didn't want to take the chance that her curse would fly awry in such close quarters with her allies.

She laughed again, but that was cut short when the ground in front of her wrenched itself apart and vines exploded out, coiling around her legs and binding her wand arm to her side. Ignifer was a prisoner in moments, and had to stand still as the giant she'd burned hefted its club and stepped towards her.

Pansy knew she didn't have much time. So, the moment they stepped through the gate and she felt the rhythm of the battle reach out for her, she retreated into cold and darkness instead, reaching for the connection to Sirius.

He was there, a misty white dog, dancing around her like a mortal puppy. Pansy smiled faintly and ran her hand through the fur on his head.

"Ready?" she asked.

Sirius barked in answer, and Pansy began to open a gate from this quiet, dark world, this inner space, to the outer regions of light and life. It was harder than she'd been prepared for; death itself pressed against her, trying to keep them separate. Pansy had to stand still for a moment and let it see that she was one of its servants. She would not open the gates for any perverted reason, the way that the Dark Lord might, seeking a way to live forever. She knew everyone died eventually. She let the cold strike directly to the center of her mind, and share the visions she had seen, and see how she had kept her vows not to tell anyone.

Death was satisfied that she had kept the sacrifices and the vows. It rolled aside, and Sirius streamed into the world with a howl more nearly akin to a scream. Pansy knew that no one save those on the edge of death would be able to see him, but he would pull their wounded enemies into the darkness all the more quickly, and he would inspire and gift their side with strength from an unknown source as he passed by. Sirius had been a Light-Declared wizard in life, after all, one of the reasons he had so irritated his parents, and today was the day of longest Light.

Pansy opened her eyes and found herself kneeling on the grass, shaking. Her mother stood over her, stroking her shoulder and blocking a curse with a Shield Charm.

Pansy? Her hands asked the question with considerable concern.

I'm well, Pansy answered, and that satisfied Hawthorn. She even smiled for a moment, and Pansy saw Sirius bound past her and hit a group of Death Eaters staggering with the impact of curses from the elder Malfoys. They screamed. Hawthorn laughed, and lifted her wand to deal with the giants.

Pansy closed her eyes. There were two more things she had to do. One required an enormous test of her necromancer powers. The other required nothing but courage and the acceptance of the inevitable.

She raised her hands and called in a voice inaudible to everyone save those who had passed, "Dead in service of an ignoble cause! I respect you, I recognize you, I know your sacrifices and would honor them! As we pass and meet on the road, I going in one direction and you in the other, I would send you to take revenge on the one who condemned you to death! Will you hear and heed me?"

The call echoed and reechoed in a world of loneliness and darkness that lay just behind the living world, the stopping place of the newly dead. Pansy's task was to get her voice to that point. She could not control who would answer, or how they might respond. That was not up to her. A necromancer spoke to, and for, the dead. She did not compel them.

She felt a cold sigh flow past her, and then a few voices answered, followed by more, until she had a chorus of perhaps a score moaning around her. Pansy stepped back, away, sideways—English had no good words for such a direction—and showed them the gate she'd opened back to the living world for Sirius. Frost struck her side as they, too, took it.

Sirius had had to go back as a spirit because of the long time that had passed between his death and his return, and because he had no body; his had been burned in the Black funeral rites. But these dead were the fallen Death Eaters, and they had bodies to possess again.

Pansy could hear the screaming begin even as she opened her eyes. The newly reanimated dead were taking revenge on those responsible for their deaths, as they saw it—Voldemort's other soldiers, who had brought them here in the first place. The one who respected and spoke to them was on the opposite side. That further justified taking revenge on their former comrades. Pansy could hear panicky voices screaming curses that would have no effect. The dead had set minds that did not succumb to intimidation or any form of compulsion. The Death Eaters would have to destroy their bodies to make them stop coming.

Pansy laughed at the thought, finding it more than a little ironic that Death Eaters were so afraid of death. What happened to possessing the force that ends life, and insuring your own immortality? she thought, giddy. Is it too much to see the real thing walking?

She had not realized how much easier calling up the dead would make her last task. She was in their company now, and she felt them reaching out to her, stroking her with cold hands, claiming her as their kin. They knew she was one of them, and Pansy knew she was one of them, and the living world was falling away about her.

She knew what she had to do.

She turned her head, and there she was, a witch with blonde-brown hair and dark eyes and the shadow of leaves beneath her skin, riding an enormous vine that had just burst the soil and was growing upward like a tree. She had lost some of her plants to the golden Gloryflower insects inhabiting the soil, but not enough. Pansy knew she would continue to make trouble until she was driven from the battlefield.

And there was only one way to do that.

With a sense of inevitability, with a sense of the grace of fate, with a sense of turning cycles and turning wheels, Pansy faced Indigena Yaxley and called again. This time, what came down the road that Sirius had taken into the sunlit world was nothing so simple as a spirit. It was the force of cold itself, the force of death, and it struck Indigena's vine with the impact of a whole winter. Pansy saw the leaves wilt and curl, the smooth green body develop brown spots, the strength leave the vine like running sap or running blood.

Indigena's head swung at once, focusing on her, the leaves beneath her skin shifting and bunching. Pansy spread the cold wind wider, acting as a conduit now, attacking the vines that held her comrades still and helpless before the onslaught of the giants.

Her head throbbed with cold and the foreknowledge of death and a very great joy.

Her hands lifted and began to move in the final patterns.
"Avada Kedavra!"

Hawthorn watched in satisfaction as the giant threatening Apollonis fell, and then turned, by habit, to see what her daughter was doing, even though she knew Pansy possessed weapons that no one else on the battlefield did.

She was in time to see a pair of green-black tendrils lift Pansy high and turn her around. Hawthorn caught a glimpse of her daughter's hands, dancing out a familiar set of signs.

Hawthorn's heart withered. She recognized the signs not because she knew the language itself, but because she knew what every necromancer said right when he or she met the moment of death.

Do not mourn me. This is my fate. Thus I die.

Hawthorn was not sure whether it was one kind of inevitability, the knowledge of disaster, or the second, the disaster that said she would be too late anyway, that held her to the spot as the tendrils wrenched Pansy apart, and she saw her daughter die. The blood came thick and fast, a spatter of gore as her arms were tugged from her body that told Hawthorn she would have needed magical healing in the first few moments to survive. And those moments were past, and then another tendril closed around Pansy's head and pulled that off, sealing her fate.

Hawthorn's heart blossomed again, and its single flower was rage. She turned and saw Indigena Yaxley gazing for a moment at the bloodied vines, as if she could not believe the violence of her darlings.

Hawthorn did not cast the Killing Curse again, though she could have. When she had run in the Death Eaters, she had been called the Red Death, and feared for her knowledge of blood curses. That was what she called on now, dropping straight past the times when she was Harry's ally and a werewolf and a pureblood witch, back into the primal violence of her youth.

"Caedes," she spat.

The spell was a single beam of thin red darkness that touched Yaxley in the shoulder. It did not matter where it had touched her, though, because the effect was the same. Yaxley shuddered and bent over as her blood began to force its way through her skin in gouts, imitating the cascades that had fallen from Pansy. She would die in a moment if that kept on, but Hawthorn did not intend that she do so. This woman had killed her daughter. For that, she would suffer.

"Sanguis sanguis," she cast next, the Blood-Renewing Spell. Yaxley's body would work furiously to create the blood to keep her alive, no matter what it cost in pain or strength. And meanwhile, the blood went on forcing its way to her shoulder and outward, and Yaxley was finally beginning to sob with the pain. The plants beneath her skin were writhing, bending into fearsome patterns try to and find some way to stop the flow of blood, but Hawthorn doubted that even they could do much against the fury that had powered her spell.

“Incruentus,” she said, and saw the effect when Yaxley jerked and grunted, her hands moving frantically in the air. That was the Bloodless Curse. It Vanished the liquid from the usual parts of her body that would make blood, including the marrow of her bones from which red blood cells could come. That meant the Sanguis sanguis would have to feed directly on her magic, on her flesh, and on the other liquids in her body—including the liquids in the eye—in order to power itself, which it would need to do because the Caedes spell kept draining the blood out from her skin. Hawthorn had perfected the ability of all three curses to work together during the First War. And now for the final touch, while Yaxley was writhing in what would be only the beginnings of pain.

“Semper fidelis,” she whispered.

The Permanence Curse settled on top of the other three, binding them in place. Even a skilled healer would have a hell of a time undoing them. Hawthorn laughed, and laughed again when Yaxley somehow gathered the strength to Apparate and her plants fell limp all over the battlefield, and found the laughter changing to tears when she knelt beside the torn corpse of her daughter, without awareness of having crossed the intervening ground.

“That’s why you died,” she whispered. “Because you knew that I would grow angry enough to drive her away if she killed you.”

But also because she saw her ending here—she has known what her death was since Halloween—and knew she could not tell me.

Hawthorn cradled her daughter’s severed head. Blood had never troubled her. She let it run down her arms as she kissed Pansy’s lips.

Then she rose and turned to fight, the rage possessing her more fiercely than it ever had during her werewolf transformation.

Draco clamped his arms around the neck of the second iron beast for a moment. He could do this. He could do this, couldn’t he? He and Harry had talked about it yesterday in the strategy meetings. It had seemed simple then. Do this, and then do this, and then do this. Harry would have to face Voldemort alone because he was the only one who could resist the Dark Lord’s magic, and Draco wouldn’t be able to keep up with the exchange of spells. Besides, Harry would feel the obligation to protect him if Draco was close at his side.

None of which made it any easier to direct the thestral to soar up over the battlefield until he was a good five hundred feet aloft, and then circle there, instead of flying after Harry.

Draco lay along the thestral's neck and closed his eyes. He knew he couldn't fall, since the stirrups clamped his feet in place, and he'd had the thestral coil a few of its whippier spikes around his legs, but he still hesitated for a long moment before his mind leaped free of his body and swept the battlefield, looking for someone to possess.

He found it absurdly easy to locate a Death Eater. The Dark Marks on their arms were like brands of foulness in Draco's mind, steaming piles of shit that he didn't want to step in. He selected one and landed neatly in his head, seizing his mind and slipping on his body like a glove before the idiot could object.

His name was Walden Macnair. Draco felt a certain warm glow—most definitely his own, and not Macnair's—at the memories that name brought up. This was one of the Death Eaters who had entered the Ministry last Midsummer night and tried to kill the Minister. Harry had gone charging in like the hero he was, of course, and could have been wounded or even died. Draco would happily use Macnair to further his own ends.

He made the heavyset body hold up its wand, and Morsmordre flowed easily off its lips, casting the Dark Mark into the air. Those Death Eaters who could still walk, and hadn't been drained of their magic, saw it and rallied to Macnair's side. Draco made the lips stretch in a cruel smile and nodded to each of them as he caught their gazes. All of the man's memories were open to him, and this was what he would do if he was actually trying to plan a counterstrike. The real Macnair was a small hammering presence at the back of his mind, unable to break through the wall Draco had set on him.

"This is what we do," Draco whispered in a voice much hoarser and deeper than his own. "Our Lord just spoke to me through my Mark."

He held up his left arm, and all the other Death Eaters looked suitably impressed. Draco fought to keep from rolling his eyes. "He wants us to go to the foot of the North Tower in Hogwarts and attack there. There's a weakness in the wards. We'll burst inside and be able to attack the students before any of these fools out here knows what we're about."

The other Death Eaters laughed and agreed. Draco again fought to keep from rolling his eyes. Idiots. I'm surprised that none of them think to mention this. For one thing, why would Voldemort send Macnair, of all people? Indigena Yaxley would be the most obvious choice, since she has vines that can bore through stone.

But the twenty Death Eaters he'd gathered followed him across the battlefield without hesitation, ducking around and between the legs of the giants, and more came over as they saw the strength and purpose with which Macnair's delegation was moving. Draco estimated he had thirty-four or thirty-five behind him by the time he halted at the base of the North Tower and nodded to part of the wards. The Death Eaters with him squinted obediently, as if they could see the nonexistent weak place.

"Now," said Draco, and made Macnair hold up his wand. "On the count of three. Use the Blasting Curse. One. Two. Three!"

The Death Eaters eagerly intoned the Blasting Curse, and Draco rose out of Macnair's mind like a falcon just as they reached the last syllables of the incantation. He could hear Macnair shrieking somewhere in the distance as he came back to himself.

It didn't matter. They had no time to retreat. McGonagall had strengthened the wards at the base of the North Tower, as well as a few other places around the school, especially for this trick, and the Blasting Curse bounced from the layered defensive magic and came back at the Death Eaters threefold. Draco heard several screams, most of which ended in a few moments, but one of which went on and on and on.

He opened his own eyes again, and panted. He didn't look at the North Tower. He told himself he wasn't afraid of what damage he'd caused. He just didn't have the time to pause and survey every disaster he inflicted on Voldemort's forces. He was doing this for Harry, and Harry needed as many of the Death Eaters as possible dying and down. He was tearing Voldemort's power base to shreds today, and anyone on the Dark Lord's side who did survive the battle had to be aware that joining him only meant defeat and death.

Draco gave himself just a moment more of peace on his mount's steady iron back, and then went to kill again.

Ron found himself breathing hard as he charged. Defending other students from an unexpected Death Eater attack was one thing. Going out into the middle of a developing battle, even if it was to help save Hogwarts from the clutches of the Dark Lord, was...something else.

But he had the rage to do it. There was no doubt of that. Since Ginny's wounding on the last day of term, Ron had been in a constant state of low-level rage that made him look forward to a chance to yell, sit on, or punch people in Gryffindor who talked nonsense about Harry. Connor had taken to handing repeat offenders over to him. Ron had found it very satisfying indeed to break Cormac McLaggen's nose. Then Blaise had betrayed everyone, and Ron had held his sister as she cried and dreamed of revenge.

And then, just before he probably would have gone out the gates anyway, as one of the most experienced of the dueling club members, he had heard that George and Fred had come back to the hospital wing, with Fred wounded and not expected to live. Ron had broken into a volley of swearing that made Hermione scold him, before he put the rage back inside himself where it belonged, and planned on how to unleash it.

On his enemies.

He looked upward, and the waves of golden light from the storm were swimming overhead. Harry had explained that the Light respected free will, unlike the wild Dark, and so would not normally interfere in wizarding wars or politics, unless someone dedicated to it committed a great wrong. But because it so respected free will, it would come to someone who called it on a day like this.

Ron was a Light wizard, from a pureblood family that had followed the Light for generations, and right now he was breathless with rage.

He held up his arm, and he yelled, a wild, incoherent appeal of fury and need.

And the Light answered.

A whirling golden cone descended, looking like a localized hurricane as it bore down on him. Ron found himself floating for a moment as it claimed him. Then it set him back down, but he felt magic leaping and burning in him, ready to defend Hogwarts and harm Dark wizards.

A Death Eater loomed up in front of him, no doubt taking him as easy prey over an adult opponent. Ron held out his wand and incanted a variant of the fire spell. “Incendio!”

The flames that burst from his wand looked more golden than orange, and the Death Eater howled with surprise as his cloak began to burn. He cast it off, and Ron lit his robes on fire, and his shirt underneath them, and then his mask. He staggered away, howling with pain now, and Ron let him go. He didn’t know who had hurt Ginny, so he would settle for wounding those he could get his hands or his wand on.

It was the giants he was really interested in.

He ducked the sweep of a curse above his head—he was Keeper for Gryffindor, and really, this was no harder than dodging Bludgers, or especially Moody’s curses—and zeroed in on a giant that so far had made it across the grounds with only minor scratches and burns. It had just stabbed a spear through a witch with bright golden hair, and as Ron watched, she spasmed and died. Ron sucked in a deep breath, but he had seen children die two weeks ago. He continued charging.

The Light leaped up in him. Giants were considered Dark creatures, and with good reason; like dragons, they simply didn’t care about any will save their own, and they lacked compassion for the most basic needs of other species.

“Oculis et auribus captus!” he yelled, a spell Moody had made them practice over and over again until they got it right.

The giant bellowed, and Ron snarled, a sound that might have been a smile if he hadn’t been so angry; it wasn’t pleasant, suddenly going blind and deaf. Then the giant swung its club wildly, and Ron rolled under the motion of it and came up on one knee. He was about just beneath the giant’s knees, and he was going to take advantage of that.

Moody had said it would happen this way, in battle, no matter how angry he was. He would see a chance, and he would take it. His instincts had more say in the matter than any strategy. Ron saw what he had to do next the way he saw a move in chess.

“Concutio!”

The Concussive Force Hex left his wand with a jolt that traveled all the way up his arm to his shoulder, and Ron grunted as he briefly went sprawling backward. He scrambled up fast enough to make his vision blur, though, and heard the giant’s knee shatter with a noise not unlike Moody’s wooden leg, when Neville—Neville, of all people!—had finally got through his defenses and put the Hex to work.

The giant tried to take a step anyway, since they weren’t the greatest intellects around, and began to topple like a tree. Ron saw one path out, and took it, not allowing fear a place in his heart, because a Gryffindor didn’t, and ducked forward between its legs. One foot tried to stamp on him, but he was too quick, and came out on the other side as the giant fell beneath him with an impact that jarred him back to his knees.

Ron turned around, but Hermione stepped up just then, aimed her wand at the giant, and said a spell that Ron couldn’t hear. A moment later, the giant began to snore, rackingly. Ron nodded. She’d sent it to sleep. Someone else could handle the Killing Curse; Moody had been emphatic that none of them should try to cast it.

Ron turned, restless as a thestral being fired upon, to seek his next target.

Hermione was relieved that she'd done all right so far. That was what she told herself, at least, as she watched Ron dodge past the falling giant with her heart in her throat. Idiot, to take risks like that! her brain yelled.

She supposed she was taking a risk herself in running up to the giant and casting the sleeping spell right after, but at least it got the giant out of the way. She took a deep breath, and stilled her shaking wand hand. She'd tried to fight back-to-back with Ginny for a moment, but Ginny had seen one of her comrades from the dueling club in danger and gone to help. Since the wound on her arm limited her mobility and the amount of magic she could cast, she was playing mostly a defensive role, and letting other people take care of the offensive.

Hermione knew Zacharias wasn't on the field yet—he was waiting with the golden horses, to charge when the crowd in front of the gates cleared a little—so that was one less person she had to worry about. And she supposed she could follow Ron for a little while and guard his back. The idiot was so angry over Fred getting hurt that he wasn't watching out for himself.

She turned around to track Ron's progress, and a Death Eater jumped gracefully over the fallen giant's back and came down in front of her.

Hermione felt logical thought coil into a lump in the back of her mind and scream. She recognized the man in front of her. He'd caught her on her way back to Gryffindor Tower from Zacharias's room one night and held her captive for an hour while he tried to wake Harry up, whispering in her ear all the while about what he'd like to do to her if they were alone, and what the silver collar around her neck would do to her if Harry didn't cooperate.

Evan Rosier smiled at her and swept her a mock salute. "Do bow, Hermione," he said. "That's what everyone does before a duel. And we must pay attention to the forms of propriety. As one of my favorite poets says, 'Honour and shame from no condition rise; Act well your part, there all the honour lies.'"

Hermione made herself bow back. She doubted that Rosier knew anything about honor, but he had kept his word to Harry on the matter of the life debt, in a fashion. His adherence to the formal rules of dueling might be all that saved her, because she didn't think she could survive if he simply hit her with anything. Moody himself had managed to survive duels with Rosier, but not bring him down.

Rosier began to circle, smiling all the while. Hermione fixed her gaze on his collarbone, since she couldn't look at his face. Lessons yammered in her head, barking in Moody's voice about watching her opponent's eyes during a duel, but she couldn't. She would see her death, and her violation, written in his face if she tried.

"Good girl," Rosier whispered, in that same breathy tone that he'd used the night he captured her. Hermione wondered if it was possible for a voice to sound like rape. "You're a good girl, aren't you, Hermione? A bit naughty perhaps, sneaking out at night to visit your boyfriend, but I can't imagine you've gone very far. There are parts of you no one has ever seen. Those are the parts I would like to put my mouth on. Cogo!"

Hermione already had a Protego up; Moody had made them practice the Shield Charm, in particular, until they could do it nonverbally, and she'd brought it up during his last few words. The Compression Curse bounced, though it had come in so powerfully that Hermione's shield had trembled and cracked. She dropped that shield and quickly replaced it, and saw Rosier watching her with bright eyes, never having stopped his circling.

"Very good, Hermione," he whispered. "Perhaps, after all, you have some more experience than I thought. Just a little naughty, should we say? Perhaps a bit of knowledge, a bit of wetness at the thought of being touched. Ardesco!"

Hermione could have laughed. That one Harry had taught them, and Moody had warned them that Rosier had a fondness for curses like this one—spells that started in the victim's body, and got in under shields. She knew the counter of it, binding a Haurio close to the skin and channeling the magic right into the Absorption Charm as it struck her. She was left unharmed, not bursting into flames. Rosier's eyebrows raised a little higher.

"Even better than I imagined," he said, and began to circle faster. Hermione sped up her pace to match him, and when he moved a bit backwards, she moved a bit forwards. She saw a flicker of something in his eyes, and thought she could not imagine it was fear, it made her feel more confident. "Good, good, good. I wonder what would happen if I made you want to spread your legs for me, Hermione. If you—"

She tripped over something on the ground, and fell. Rosier had led her right into the path of a body with the new dueling circle. Hermione struggled frantically to recover, to stand—

And then Rosier's Severing Curse hit her, cutting her open from collarbone to navel, and all the world was pain. Henrietta had not been a Beater on the Slytherin Quidditch team for nothing.

She came in low across the battlefield, clinging to her broomstick and hidden under a concealing charm, because otherwise people would be so unkind as to throw curses into the air at her. Behind and ahead of her raced the Bludgers she'd enchanted to crack bone and obey her and only her. There were five of them, and they circled restlessly, her own destructive, impatient little toys.

She neared the middle of the Hogwarts grounds before she saw something she wanted to hit in the sea of madly struggling figures. She whistled, and one of the Bludgers sped forward and smashed a giant in the skull. It looked puzzled and reached up with one hand to feel the wound instead of immediately collapsing, of course; giants were famous for having thicker heads than humans, in all senses. Henrietta whistled again, and the Bludger turned back to hammer at its target. It was too small for the giant to even see, and far too fast for it to catch. It would keep on hitting until its target fell. Henrietta would trust the people on the ground to get out of the way.

She looked back and forth, searching for some place to send the other four Bludgers. If Yaxley had still been here, she would have been the one to hit, as the most dangerous of Voldemort's Death Eaters. But Henrietta had seen the vines stop lashing a few moments before she joined the battle, so she must be gone, perhaps dead. Henrietta envied whoever had managed to kill her.

Who is most dangerous, then?

Rosier if he's here, but Merlin knows if he's decided to take part in this. Karkaroff, then.

Henrietta stretched out a hand, and one of the Bludgers sped over and hovered in front of her. Henrietta smiled at the little eyes that peered at her out of the rounded top. Learning Transfiguration did indeed have its uses.

"Igor Karkaroff," she said. "Is he here? Lead me to him."

The Bludger turned and streamed away. Henrietta set herself to follow, ducking and dodging among flailing limbs and curses that hadn't hit their intended targets and screams of pain and tragedy. This was for Harry, and this was battle—a real one, not that pitiful little debacle on the beach or the scramble at Woodhouse. Here, the very number of the enemy made them dangerous. Henrietta laughed. She was happy.

Abruptly, one of her other Bludgers made a high, keening whine. Henrietta spun around on her broom to face it. She had enchanted them all to do that if they sensed Rosier, but she couldn't believe that he was really here. There seemed to be too high a factor of chaos in this battle for him to risk it.

"Where?" she demanded.

The Bludger dived. Henrietta followed, letting the concealment charm fall. She knew of no way to fool her Bludgers, and if Rosier was really there, she wanted him to see that his doom was coming for him.

She wasn't in time to warn the brown-haired girl before she tripped and Rosier cast his Severing Curse, but she did have the supreme pleasure of seeing Rosier look up at her over the fallen child, and the expression on his face change from triumph to madness. He was screaming in moments, a cry of frenzied rage, and his wand snapped up to launch Merlin-knew-what curse at her.

Henrietta smiled and made a throwing gesture with her right hand.

The remaining four Bludgers streamed past her, all aimed for Rosier. He Apparated, leaving Henrietta blinking and disappointed, but appeared again only a short distance away. Like homing pigeons, the Bludgers turned, insanely determined to follow him.

Henrietta chuckled as she plowed to a skidding stop in the dirt and cast a clotting charm to keep the girl from bleeding her life out. Then she scooped her gently into her arms. If Rosier had targeted her in particular, then she was probably a close friend of Harry's, and Henrietta would therefore save her life. She only hoped the wards would open to let someone transporting one of the wounded through. Charles cast the Killing Curse, coolly, and the Death Eater witch with long red hair went down. He spun his wand in his hand once, by way of celebration of his victory, and looked around.

He'd been keeping track of both of his sons, a skill born of long practice. Michael was with Severus Snape, shadowing him under a Disillusionment Charm and guarding his weak right side. Snape hadn't liked it, but when Harry had looked at him yesterday and explained that, due to a change in their original plans, Draco would be riding in the air beyond the reach of most danger, and Michael would be guarding him, the man had relented. Charles had been intensely amused. At times, it was fascinating to watch another father-son dynamic at play, even though he would have hated to be in such a relationship with either of the twins.

Owen was shadowing Connor Potter, essentially serving as a guide to defensive magic at the same time as he protected him. Potter was Declared to Light, and Charles knew he wouldn't use half the Dark Arts spells that Owen showed him. That was all right. It was essential that Potter fight, since he was better-trained than most of the student fighters and they had so few, even with the other allies pouring in across the back of the Quidditch Pitch. And he had to be protected, since he was so important to Harry. Teaching him was a distant goal compared to his survival and what he could contribute to the battle.

He caught a glimpse of Potter then, wielding a blade that blazed with Light, which he'd apparently fetched from the ancestral Potter estate, Lux Aeterna, over the Easter holidays. Owen spun and shielded him from a Cutting Curse, at the same time avoiding getting hurt himself. Charles felt the corners of his mouth lift in a small smile of pride.

Then Potter charged a Death Eater who was getting ready to deal death to a black-haired Ravenclaw—the twin sister of Potter's girlfriend, Charles thought. His dark hair flew, and he yelled bravely, distracting the Death Eater into looking at him. Owen struggled to keep up with him.

And behind him came a second Death Eater, stripped of his mask and so familiar to Charles. It was Karkaroff, formerly the Headmaster of Durmstrang, and a traitor to Charles's sons and every other student who had been in his care. He had entered Owen's blind spot, if Owen was even watching for danger behind him at all and not for danger to Potter in front. His wand was already moving in the beginning stages of the Avada Kedavra curse.

Charles began to run. He cast Concutio at Karkaroff's arm. Whether the man heard him or just instinctively sensed danger, he did jerk away in time, and thus kept himself from acquiring a broken limb. He spun to face Charles, and his eyes narrowed.

Charles dipped his head, the only concession he would make to the formal bow to begin duels, and fought.

He realized in only a few moments that he was outmatched, and why. He himself was a weak Legilimens, and had weak Occlumency walls. Karkaroff was a much stronger Legilimens. He was reading Charles's every move, every spell, out of his mind before he could cast them.

Charles knew his only chance was to use a spell of such power that it wouldn't matter if Karkaroff saw it coming; he still wouldn't be able to block or shield against it. The Blood Whip Curse came to mind. Charles chanted it aloud, and saw with black satisfaction the fear in Karkaroff's eyes when he recognized it.

Someone shouted behind him, and a stunning blow hit Charles's own leg, sending his Blood Whip wide. He fell. He tried to roll over, to stand, and he couldn't. Broken shards of bone clashed together in his knee. Someone had hit him with Concutio. A moment later, the same person hit him with Expelliarmus, and he lost his wand.

That person was a second Death Eater, and he came up to stand over Charles as Karkaroff closed in from the other side. Karkaroff laughed. Charles saw his death in the other man's face.

Then Igor Karkaroff made a mistake, a rather stupid one.

"When you are dead," he whispered, leaning close to make sure that Charles could hear him over the chaos of battle, "I will find your sons. Both of them shall remain my prisoners for as long as my Lord says that I may keep them alive."

Charles narrowed his eyes, and then closed them. He heard Karkaroff laugh in delight. He thought he had made his victim succumb to despair.

In truth, Charles simply wanted to cut off eye contact, and thus Karkaroff's ability to read his mind.

His magic did not shake as he reached for the spell he would need, the only one he was able to cast like this, wandless, his will and his hatred and his protective rage powering it, and insure that Karkaroff did not go on from this moment to hurt his sons.

Their names ran through his mind, blazed in his thoughts from blue letters to red.

Owen. Michael. Medusa.

The red letters grew brighter, brighter, brighter. Charles concentrated, and he could not hear Karkaroff and his companion discussing ways to torture him; he could only hear his wife's voice, and his sons', pledging to him last night that they would take care of their mother if he fell.

Burn, burn, burn.

"Pyra," he whispered.

The Self-Immolation Curse blasted out from his belly, a wheel of flashfire that caught and vaporized both Karkaroff and the other Death Eater in instants. Then it turned back on Charles, hungry, burning, consuming him in his funeral pyre.

He knew that he died smiling.

Harry kicked the thestral into another downward spin. The flesh-dragon followed, close and irritating as ever. Any curses Harry had fired at it had simply skipped off the smooth skin.

Harry was getting frantic. He hadn't been able to absorb magic from the Death Eaters after that initial surge when he'd first flown out of the castle. Voldemort pressed him too closely, and Harry's attempts to drain him were answered with magic so choked with foulness that it only made Harry vomit it back. And then Voldemort had tried to absorb Harry's own power, which, considering how much stored magic he was carrying in the stones, would be disastrous.

I have to do something to distract him, to make him back off for a moment.

Harry invoked the communication spell. The air just above his left wrist buzzed and tingled, and a gull-like screech answered him. Harry blinked. Honoria must be in her Animagus form. He hoped that she would be able to perch in a tree or something soon and do what he required of her.

"Honoria? Can you hear me?" he asked, as he spun the thestral up and over another lightning bolt.

A second screech. Harry nodded at nothing, and whispered what he wanted: a complicated illusion, one that would distract Voldemort as long as possible, and make him think a force had arrived on the battlefield to aid Harry that he was the only one able to handle. Since it was an ally that had aided Harry once before, Voldemort should have no trouble believing it.

Honoria screeched back, and Harry cut the communication spell, wheeling up again so that he could face his enemy. The blasted remains of Voldemort's crimson eyes locked on his across the gap. Harry blinked, then shook his head. Well, of course his eyes remind me of that strange bird's eyes. I already decided that that bird is a message from him, of sorts.

"Did you know," Voldemort said, in the conversational tone that he had been using for most of the battle so far, "that your brother is dead?"

A moment of coldness made Harry's lungs stop working, but he shook his head. Don't believe him. Don't believe him. He's just saying that.

Voldemort took advantage of the distraction, though, sending a Crucio across the gap between them. Harry shuddered and clung to the thestral, grateful again for the stirrups that held his feet in place, riding out the pain. He caught crazed glimpses of light from below as he managed to end the spell, but he couldn't tell if they were symptoms of blurriness in his vision or the sight of the Light storm reflecting off the charging Gloryflower unicorns.

Then Voldemort, who must have felt magic coalesce above him, released a cry of shock and rage, and Harry managed to force his cramped, burning neck muscles to let him look upward.

Honoria had done as he asked. The illusion of an Antipodean Opaleye cut the air overhead, roaring, her jaws giving forth fire. She dived straight at the Death Eaters, and Harry had no doubt that she could and would wreak havoc, for all her glamoured nature. Honoria was capable of creating the sensation of fire, and of heat, and the conviction in the minds of her victims would do most of the rest.

Voldemort turned the flesh-dragon at once to answer this new threat.

Harry took a deep breath and went back to magic-gulping, passing the power more and more rapidly through him to put into the stones, doing what he could not to think about madness and pain and death in the field below.

Chapter Ninety-One: Children of Godric and Helga

Zacharias steadied his golden horse as it stamped and tossed its mane beneath him. He wasn't entirely sure if it was picking up on his emotions, or whether the Gloryflowers had crafted it just so that it would do these kinds of things, to make it more like a normal horse.

He didn't really care. His whole mind was taken up with Hermione.

Yes, the school was buzzing with other things, other rumors, other gossip, but what did that matter? They were the lesser concerns of lesser mortals. Hermione had come in wounded to the hospital wing; the Headmistress had seen a witch hovering with her on her broomstick beyond the school's wards and apparently recognized the witch, so she'd let them inside. Madam Pomfrey was working on her right now, but the Severing Curse was a tricky spell, difficult to heal. She didn't know if she would save Hermione's life yet. And she had insisted that Zacharias would be a distraction if he stayed in the hospital wing and tried to watch.

So he was going out to ride with the others on the golden horses, as soon as the fighting in front of the entrance hall had cleared enough for them to make a charge. The other riders shifted and whispered and exchanged tense notes about whether they expected to survive on the battlefield, or even odds on who else might come back alive.

Zacharias wanted to scream at them to stop it, that death was nothing to joke about. He understood why they were doing it, though. They didn't have someone possibly dying in the hospital wing.

He had already decided what he was going to do. He simply had to clear his mind of boiling fury enough to attempt it. He sat on the horse's back and let the chatter of his classmates wash over him like the useless blather it was. He had to be calm. He could feel his mother watching him across the gap between their mounts, and wondered if she knew what he was about to do. She was the one who had instructed him in this, long ago, when he was first Sorted into Hufflepuff.

This is a weapon I hope you will never have to use, Zacharias, and certainly not in the middle of battle. It is tricky, not entirely under your control, the way the magic of your wand is. And you stand a chance of losing a part of yourself if you give in to the seductions of the change.

Zacharias knew that was all true; what little information was available on the phenomenon agreed with what his mother had said. In taking on the identity of an ancestor, he risked losing himself.

He did not care. He was angry enough not to care. And this, this breathless pause before they went to battle, was the best chance he would have to calm himself and call out in breathless appeal. The Light storm overhead should help. Both he, and his ancestor in life, had served the Light. And their connection through his being in her House should help, too. Zacharias didn't know if it was going to work, not for certain, but nothing was certain in this process, one reason it hadn't been tried in decades.

Helga? he called. He knew part of her lingered within the school. He'd sometimes been privileged with a glimpse of her, sliding along the corridors or peering at him from behind a tapestry. Zacharias had always imagined he could see her not just because he was a Hufflepuff student, but because he and his family were her last blood heirs. Most of the time, that meant nothing, was no more than a formality he might use to gain a political advantage over people particularly impressed by the Founders and their legends.

But, if she would agree, then he could yield control of his body to her, allow her to possess him and ride forth to battle. Zacharias continued calling her name, his voice steady and sweet, and some moments later he felt the first approach of the shy gentleness he'd always associated with her.

Why? a voice asked him. He might be creating the voice, but he didn't think so, not when he was sincere in his desires to have her spirit possess him. He answered back as if it were real, at least.

Because I am angry, and the woman I love may be dying. And because this battle is being fought at Hogwarts, and threatening the students you stayed here to protect. And because I am asking. Please?

He felt her regard for long, silent moments. Zacharias realized he didn't even know what having part of Helga's spirit ride out with him would do to the battle. Perhaps it would weaken the defenses of the school, and that would be a good reason for her not to leave. Or perhaps she would have a hard time sensing the other two Founders present in Hogwarts and reconnecting with them, even once her possession of him was done. He hadn't thought of consequences like that. He'd simply asked.

Then she said, Yes.

And Zacharias gasped as magic flooded him.

Oh, of course he'd felt his own magic rise up before: when he first received his wand, when his mother taught him the more complicated spells, when he was confirmed as the magical heir of his family. But it had been nothing like this. Zacharias knew how deep his magical core was, how joined to the rest of him. He was a powerful wizard, but his power did not extend forever.

This was power that seemed to go on rising, like a mountain being pushed up from the collision of continents. The magic shuddered through him, solid as stone, the strength of the earth. Zacharias contemplated that concept in a dazed fashion for a moment. Most wizards didn't care that much about earth magic in comparison to the "mightier" forces of wind and fire and water, but those who did knew it was the strongest of all. The earth had only to shrug, and the continents went scurrying, rivers tumbled from their courses, and the volcanoes shuddered and belched fire.

Helga was the same way. Zacharias felt in a moment as if she'd always been sleeping in some part of him, perhaps his blood, and now she had awakened and claimed the rest of his power. That was all. It was less a losing of himself than an expansion into a piece he hadn't known he had. Suddenly he remembered the days of the Founders a thousand years ago, and the odd thing seemed that he had never done it before.

The change was noticeable. Zacharias, looked around through dazed eyes, saw the other riders staring at him. He apparently had an image hovering over him, superimposed on his features. He suspected it would be the image of a short, plump witch with kind brown eyes—or, at least, they would be kind if they weren't currently lit with battle-fire at the danger to Hogwarts's students.

"It is safe for us to go forth now," said Helga through Zacharias's mouth. It should have been strange to feel his own mouth moving without his will. It wasn't. The voice wasn't his own, so of course he couldn't use it himself. Helga turned towards the wards and nodded.

A face formed in the white mist of the wards, nodding back. Zacharias knew it was Godric Gryffindor, though he hadn't seen that particular Founder before. A moment later, the wards dropped, and the horses foamed forward, heading straight for the break.

Zacharias had ridden horses before, but Helga had ridden all kinds of beasts, horses and flying horses and dragons when she'd had a disagreement with a Hebridean Black over the site of her garden, and she seized control as the better rider. The golden horse lifted and flowed with Zacharias through a quarter-turn that plunged them straight into a mass of Death Eaters, standing back-to-back as they fired curses at a bevy of golden-haired witches and wizards.

Helga let out a battle-cry that hadn't been heard on any field in a thousand years. "Blood and bone and storm and crow!" Zacharias tried to uncover her memories of what it meant, but they were in the thick of battle before he could figure it out, and then he was hurting the people who had helped hurt Hermione.

A spear formed in Helga's hand, the memory of a spear long gone joined to the storm of Light swirling overhead, which recognized the Founder and hailed her with joy as an old comrade. Zacharias felt Light surround him with a dizzying corona that made most of the Death Eaters scream and hide their eyes as the spear plunged down, taking the first victim through the area between collarbone and throat. He fell, and he screamed again, a separate cry from the blinded ones, and Helga laughed and danced the horse backward. It moved with a grace no living thing could have had. Helga approved of the Gloryflower horses; she wished she could have had one the last time she fought Inferi.

She spun the horse so that she faced the rest of the tangle of Death Eaters, coming back together after her initial charge. She clasped her hands this time, having no need of reins to command her mount, and imagined a quiet brown plain in her mind, suddenly ripping and fracturing open to reveal a pit of deep green and red waiting beneath.

The earth opened under the Death Eaters and dropped them straight down. They cried out as they fell, too. Helga laughed softly. They should know better than to face a Founder on the grounds of her school, she thought, as the horse jumped easily over the crack and landed on the other side. Because it amused her, Helga channeled her magic through the golden hoof as it gave a delicate stamp. The grass and dirt and stone rolled over the heads of her victims when the horse stamped, as easily as if nothing had happened.

Helga whooped aloud and turned to search out the next group of enemies. It had always taken enormous amounts of destruction, or an enormous threat to the students, to rouse her; she had never been of a temper like Godric, who went forth to war at the slightest excuse, or like Salazar, who would nurse his grudges until they were smoldering like lava under the surface. But now she was roused, and her descendant had called her, and what was this Voldemort but another Dark Lord, like Aelfric, like Yellowgorge? She had fought them in her time, been part of the army that fought them, and she had survived. She would survive this, too, and send Voldemort howling.

It is contemptible that he attacks children. Even Yellowgorge never did that, she thought, and charged at the next group of Death Eaters. She was singing as she rode, and the earth sang back to her, long spikes of stone that she had implanted beneath the soil to serve as a last defense spinning for the surface. The Death Eaters did look satisfactorily surprised when they were spitted on them.

Connor went to his knees, and not only because Owen had slammed a hand onto his shoulder urging him to do so, though the older boy would think that was the reason. He'd known a Killing Curse was coming. What Moody said was true: after a while you learned to identify wand movements out of the corner of your eye, or you didn't survive.

He scrambled back to his feet at once. That wasn't entirely his choice. The sword buzzing and humming in his hand tugged him along.

Connor looked down proudly at the sword as he attacked a Death Eater who had cornered Ginny and was threatening her and the wounded girl she stood in front of. He'd retrieved it from Lux Aeterna over the Easter holidays, from behind a ward that opened to him as soon as it realized that he, and not James, was the Potter heir now. The sword had a sharp, barbed blade, and a hilt so bristling with thorn-like projections that Connor had been unsure how to hold it until the sword itself showed him. It talked, sometimes, but not often, and then it had a male voice, as brusque and commanding as Moody's. It mostly wielded itself, too, which Connor didn't mind, since he didn't know that much about swordwork.

And with the storm of Light in the sky, the sword was active and alive and darting happily around.

Death Eater coming at you from the side, the sword's voice hissed in his head.

Connor knew the opponent must be dangerous. The sword didn't normally warn him about enemies, even the ones who came so close that Owen had to fend them off. He stopped and spun around, nearly spitting Owen. Owen muttered and leaped out of the way. Connor chose not to pay attention to the muttering.

The Death Eater who faced him still wore a mask, and so Connor couldn't focus on his eyes the way Moody had taught them, even as the man lifted his wand and whispered, "Sanguinolentus."

Owen shouted the countercurse. Connor didn't need him to. He'd already ducked. And his eyes were fixed on the man, still. So far, he'd wounded people with the sword, and then run away again as the tide of battle, and the sword's hunger to feed on the Dark, carried him on. He had the sense that this would be his first conscious kill.

Yes, it will, said the sword in his head, and a thick, muffling layer grew over his thoughts. Connor thought it had already been there, but now it was more present, more bracing.

It's to keep you from thinking too much about what you're doing as you kill, said the blade calmly. You would only fall into hysterics, and that's not something you need right now. Right now, you need to be a hero.

And that made sense to Connor. Of course it did. He stood up, and held the sword at the ready. The crystal blade vibrated and buzzed, but the actual sword hung low in his hands, as if he didn't know how to wield it. And Connor was prepared to say that that knowledge wasn't part of his muscles. The sword would wield itself.

The Death Eater whispered, in that same horrible voice, "Dolor."

The curse came at him. The sword jerked up, and the curse bounced off it. The crystal was glowing like a Shield Charm now, and Connor experienced a moment's wistfulness that Harry wasn't there to see it. He always appreciated a good Protego. He would have liked to have seen this, Connor thought.

The Death Eater incanted a wind curse next, one that was probably meant to tear the sword from his hand. But Connor stepped forward, and the gust died as he walked into the middle of it. The Death Eater raised a shield and began to speak a long and complicated curse. Connor experienced a moment's contempt in the part of his mind that was still his own. You don't do that. Moody said you don't do that. It gives your enemy too much chance to hurt you while you're still struggling to reach the end of your spell.

The sword cut through the shield and stabbed straight into the Death Eater's chest.

The man screamed, and Connor saw why when he tried to move away and found he couldn't. Some of the barbs on the edge had hooked into his flesh. And now the sword was glowing like a heartbeat in time with the lazy currents of Light overhead, inflicting pain on the man. Connor swallowed. "What's that for?" he whispered aloud.

The Light knows what he has done, the sword said in its stern voice. All the murders, all the torture, all the rapes he has committed. So now it is inflicting that pain back on him, making him feel what his victims felt. That is justice.

Connor shivered, and wondered if it really was, but then he reminded himself that he was Declared to the Light, and just because Harry wouldn't approve of this didn't mean it wasn't justice. Harry had a hard time recognizing justice and differentiating it from vengeance.

The sword pulled free at last, leaving the man dead on the ground, and turned Connor in a different direction. Just before he completed the spin, Connor caught a glimpse of Owen's face. His eyes were dark and thoughtful, and not all of what was in his expression was approval, either.

Connor looked away, and let the sword tug him deeper into the tides of battle.

Snape could not watch Harry as much as he would have liked, because he had to pay attention to the battle on the ground.

He'd already dueled several Death Eaters whose fighting styles he recognized of old, though he hadn't known their names then, and hadn't heard of them even during the short time he'd spent in Azkaban before Dumbledore rescued him. It didn't matter. Their feints and parries and counterattacks were more important in a battle than their names and past histories, in any case. He traded counterattacks with them, and he either finished them or was swept away in the surging chaos. Their side was killing the Death Eaters, but five hundred wizards were not defeated that easily.

And their side suffered losses, too. Snape had heard about the Weasley twins before he entered the battle. He had briefly seen Hawthorn Parkinson, fighting like a woman possessed, and knew that only the loss of her daughter could reawaken the Red Death. He watched from a distance, too far away and too separated by wizards to do anything, as Rosier felled the Granger girl. And after the charge of the golden horses began, he saw the last giant on the field step directly on top of the Chang girl, crushing her out of existence.

More appalling, at least to his eyes and soul, was the loss of the only one of his Slytherins riding a golden horse, Catrina Flint-Digsby. She was busy unleashing binding curses on the Dark wizards in front of her, trying to weaken them and give the younger students easy victims, and she never saw the Avada Kedavra that took her from behind. For that matter, Snape never saw her killer. When he turned to look, the faceless figure had already vanished in another wall of surging flesh.

Snape had used the Killing Curse three times in a row after that, on the next three victims he faced, and the Rosier-Henlin boy fighting close at his side had never uttered a word of condemnation.

Now, at last, he burst into a clear space and could lift his head, staring at Harry. Voldemort was still contending with what Snape knew must be an illusory dragon, since Harry had told him about Acies's refusal to bring a true dragon to the battle. Harry flew his iron thestral in a circle and drank and drank and drank magic. Snape saw numerous pitiful, screaming shapes on the ground, and knew that must be Harry's doing. Suddenly turning into a Squib would be quite a shock.

He had to quell his fear and pain; Harry was doing magnificently. He either wasn't aware of the losses beneath him—and Snape had to admit that he might not be aware of individual deaths—or had learned to put them aside and do what had to be done. Snape felt a moment of shining hope. If Harry could indeed do what he had planned, it would wound the Dark Lord more deeply than any individual strike ever could.

"Sir, look out!"

Michael flung him to the ground. Snape ducked his head into the earth himself as he realized that Voldemort had destroyed the glamour of the dragon. Bits of magic were raining to earth, spell-flakes from whatever curse he had used. Snape tried not to breathe them in. It was generally a good idea not to let the Dark Lord's magic affect one.

He looked up after that, though, thinking Voldemort would return to his pursuit of Harry at once. He certainly couldn't let Harry drain the magic from every one of his living followers on the field. Snape's left arm burned with the reminder of Voldemort's temper.

But instead, the grotesque beast Voldemort had created, a mockery of even the illusory dragon he had just destroyed, simply hung in the air. Snape squinted, trying to make out the movements of his wand, but his former master was safely concealed behind that slick pink neck. He had no chance of learning what spell he would cast before he cast it.

He recognized the effect, though, when a dark purple bruise formed in the air not far above the battlefield, and thunder spoke in a death-rattle. Voldemort had not started the spell higher because the storm of Light would probably have stopped it, and because he wanted his victims to suffer more. Snape recognized it because he had once tried to help his Lord create a potion that would mimic the effect before Voldemort designed the spell: Imbrifer Voro.

Where the rain fell, it would flay the flesh, as it had in Valerian, the wizarding village Voldemort had devastated in the summer of 1980.

Snape scrambled to one knee and tapped his wand against his left arm, ignoring the pain of his Dark Mark, desperate to invoke the communication spell and warn Harry what they were about to face. He heard a shout, and looked up to see another pair of Death Eaters running at him, but Michael was holding them off, for now, his wand flashing in quick spellwork that made Snape suffer a brief, irrational pang that Rosier-Henlin had decided to send his sons to Durmstrang.

"What is it, sir?" Harry's voice was tight, and Snape didn't blame him. Even with the stones in his robe pockets as reservoirs, the effort of passing that much power through his body would tire him.

"Voldemort is calling the flesh-eating rain," Snape said tightly. "The purple spot a little behind you and off to the side."

Harry was silent for a moment, and Snape wondered if the communication spell had faltered. But when he looked up, he realized that Harry was flying the iron thestral like a Firebolt—just not in the direction of that bruise.

“Harry!” Snape shouted.

“There’s a second one,” said Harry, in a voice that said he was speaking from between clenched teeth. “And it’s right above Draco.” Draco again leaped out of a dying Death Eater’s mind, this time a witch. He shook his head as he opened his eyes and sat up on the thestral’s back again. He had never quite got used to possessing someone female. It always left him feeling as if he had appendages he didn’t, and lacked some of those he did, for hours afterward.

He looked up to see Harry flying at him, and blinked, wondering why. Sure, there was thunder speaking above him, but that was to be expected when there was a storm in the sky, wasn’t it?

A drop of rain fell abruptly on his arm, and Draco screamed, even before he jerked his head away from Harry and stared at his skin. It was peeling neatly away from his left forearm, in a way that Draco had only ever imagined happening if he received the Dark Mark. The iron beast he rode jerked and shuddered beneath him as his panic translated downwards.

Another drop hit on his head, and Draco shouted with the pain. His scalp was splitting open, and he could just imagine the next drop hitting on the tender and unprotected bone of his skull. He began to flee wildly towards Hogwarts, not knowing what else he could do.

“Draco!”

That was Harry’s shout, and Draco, despite his better judgment, turned the thestral around. Harry slid past him, crouched low in his own saddle, a desperate, focused look on his face. He flung his arm out, and a shimmering cage of green light formed around Draco, a ward that Harry added to as he turned and rode past again, and then again. When Draco looked up, he saw the sharp-edged rain being deflected from the edges of the cage.

He looked at Harry in wonder. Harry gave him a grim smile, and then dived. Draco looked on in astonishment as a green ward spread out from him like a spiderweb, a flat plane between sky and ground, fed from Harry's magic. Draco had never seen the spell before, but that didn't surprise him. Harry was full of such power at the moment that just being near him had made Draco's heart shudder and jump. He could probably do much more than this, if he wanted.

And he'll be afraid of that, and that's part of what's holding him back, Draco thought, as he went on watching, safe in his own drifting cage.

The ward spread further and further, billow on billow of green. Now it looked less like a spiderweb, and more like a storm in imitation of the storm of Light above. It coiled under Voldemort's purple bruise, which Draco saw when he looked for it, and refused to let any of the flesh-eating rain through. Draco caught a glimpse of white-blond hair, and was extremely glad of it. The thought of either of his parents flayed alive by that rain was more than he could bear.

Come to that, my wounds don't look that good, either.

Draco drew his wand and laid it against the wound in his arm, concentrating. Harry had taught him some of the most basic healing spells. He ought to be able to handle this.

"Integro," he murmured, and watched in satisfaction as the skin regrew over the wound. He wasn't sure about the one on his scalp. It did hurt, but he didn't want to try and heal it without a mirror. He put his left hand up, and felt gingerly at the cut. It seemed to have stopped bleeding. He decided to trust that it'd clotted, and looked back to find out the outcome of what Harry and Voldemort were doing.

He saw Harry rising up out of the green ward, and Voldemort riding straight towards him, bent over the neck of the flesh-dragon—the ugliest thing Draco had ever seen, far uglier than the iron animals he and Harry rode—and casting a curse that filled the air between them with whirling diamond shards.

Harry was tiring.

He could feel it in every muscle of his body. His legs gripped the thestral too hard. His feet pressed into the stirrups until his ankles ached. His throat burned every time he took a breath, though he thought some of that came from breathing in the reek of Voldemort's beast earlier. His arms shook when he moved them, and his hand was a joke; he didn't know how he'd managed to cast the first ward straight at Draco and not out into the wide and empty sky. His vision spun with the effort of watching out for Voldemort's spells and dodging them, and thinking faster than his opponent. And his magical core was overstretched with the sheer amount of magic he was passing through it into the stones, themselves full and warm with power.

He had not realized being a conduit for the magic was so exhausting. He had to fight himself every step of the way. The absorbere gift was meant for swallowing, he was learning now, or for vomiting back a wave of power in his opponents' faces, and not for simply acting as a tunnel through which the magic could pass on the way to somewhere else. Holding himself open like that, envisioning a passage instead of a mouth, hurt. He felt as though someone had been beating him with sticks from inside his skin.

And he had to fight the temptation to feast on the magic and make it part of himself, too, on two fronts. First was the mental distancing effect, the natural attraction that whispered the battle and the purpose Harry intended to use the magic for weren't half so important as exercising his will. Second was the absorbere gift trying to snap shut. He couldn't let that happen.

And now Voldemort, the bastard, was attacking his allies—no, it was him again, with the sun glittering sharply on the diamond shards that were rapidly closing the distance. At least Draco was no longer in immediate danger, and Harry could deal with the threat without losing his mind.

Harry uncoiled a tendril of the magic and sent forth a cone of intense light and heat, though it was in liquid form, the liquid he had once heard Hermione informing Ron actually comprised the sun. It poured on the shards and dissolved them. Of course, then Harry had to weave a net beneath the sun-liquid to keep it from plummeting to earth and harming his allies.

That was a stupid mistake, he thought, as he dodged the thestral around yet another bolt of lightning. That was a mistake Moody would punish me for. I should have used a different weapon.

“Tired, Harry?” Voldemort whispered as he sent another attack, a small ball of darkness that broke apart into many small balls and whizzed at Harry like Bludgers, ducking under and around Harry’s defenses and forcing Harry to send many small counteracting balls of light after them. “You could get rid of me if you would only use that magic. I can feel you roiling with it. You could grow, as I have grown. I gave you the absorbere ability that night in Godric’s Hollow, Harry. I know how it works. It is not simply a mechanism that you can use. Its purpose is to feed you and sustain your strength, very like the blood-drinking ability of a vampire. Any moment now, it will close, and force you to absorb what you have taken into your body. You cannot stop it any more than you can stop your stomach from digesting food.”

“Shut up,” Harry snapped, and then realized he was losing his hold on his temper and his emotions. His attention was necessarily divided into three: focusing on Voldemort’s words, maintaining the wards he had spun over the battlefield and Draco to shield them from the flesh-devouring rain which hadn’t stopped falling, and scooping magic from the Death Eaters. He shuddered and bent double as a tide of tainted magic flowed through him. The tunnel he kept envisioning trembled and nearly snapped shut. Harry thought he was holding it open by brute strength now.

Voldemort laughed softly, in delight, and pulled up his flesh-dragon. Harry watched him warily, but he sent no more spells. Instead, the snake stuck its head around the dragon’s neck to watch him. Harry frowned at him in confusion.

“I will watch you,” Voldemort remarked. “This is a possibility that I did not foresee, Harry: that you would swallow so much tainted magic that it would swamp your own and make you into a Dark Lord. In a few moments, you will be my heir in truth, unless you expel what you have taken, now.”

Harry could feel an edge of compulsion riding that word, and he had to fight to ignore it. He clung to his “meal,” and forced away the image of himself as a Dark Lord, uncaring about others, detached from them by the river of power flowing between him and them.

Voldemort laughed again. Harry closed his eyes, and admitted to himself that he needed help.

So he did what he hadn’t dared to do so far, because, after all, he had not Declared. He reached up and asked the storm of the Light, the wild Light if there was such a thing, for help.

And the Light answered him. Perhaps it was only because he was fighting the Dark Lord and not because it considered him a Light wizard. Harry didn’t know. He did know that he was suddenly bathed in a flood of gold, like pure, concentrated sunlight.

It struck through him like the phoenix fire, and made many of the impurities he had swallowed turn to smoke and vapor. It filled him with the memory of gryphon wings and flexing talons, and tearing the flesh of the wild Dark, forcing it back into limits. It reminded Harry of why his restraining himself was good, because to do otherwise would only be another instance of the strong conquering the weak. The self-restraint of Lord-level wizards was the salvation of the free will and sanity of others.

And it made him understand, for a moment, why his parents, and his brother, and Dumbledore, and Sirius, and Peter, had all Declared for Light, what about this great and golden force had attracted them.

Exultant, Harry stretched out his hand and laughed. He opened his eyes to see Voldemort’s snake staring at him, and smiled.

“I am not like you,” Harry said softly. His skin glimmered with gold as he spoke, as if the sun were creeping through him, and he felt courage rushing up behind the gold, propelling him back into battle. It did not matter if the fight was hopeless, because it had to be fought anyway. "I care about free will as much as wildness, and cooperation with others as much as doing things by myself. My parents and Dumbledore came much nearer to making me a Dark Lord than I ever will on my own." He clasped his hand over the stump of his left wrist and extended them towards Voldemort. "Fiat lux!"

Light burst from his fingers and struck Voldemort. Harry could see the flesh-dragon starting to melt away like a bad dream, its feet melting into the blocks of goo that which had lain on the battlefield when Voldemort corrupted the bodies of his victims. Voldemort screamed and rode the dragon down a short distance, getting out of range of the stream of Light.

Harry turned his head towards the Forbidden Forest as he caught a glimpse of movement from the corner of his eye, and saw centaurs pouring onto the battlefield. They carried spears and war-hammers, and one of them played a drum. Harry laughed. They had told him, once, how many hundreds of years it had been since wizards and centaurs had fought side by side, but he had forgotten.

With a fuller heart than he had possessed in some time, he lifted his hand so that the stream of Light glowed back into the sky like a beacon, and swirled towards the school, to drain those Death Eaters who were trying to attack the wards. For once, he thought as he glanced back and saw Voldemort laboring after him on his half-melted beast, he was forcing the Dark Lord to fight defensively.

Ginny pulled hard at Padma's arm. "Come on," she whispered. The Ravenclaw had been wounded on the back by a Death Eater she'd managed to kill, and then wounded again on the arm by the one who'd attacked her after that. Ginny had found her lying in the churned, trampled mud, in shock, and had to slap her several times to get her to move. Now they were almost back to the wards, but Padma had fallen again, and the wound on Ginny's arm that she'd received in the attack on the carriages was throbbing. She didn't think she had the ability to carry Padma with one limb so weak.

"Come on, Padma, come on, please," she whispered, crouching over her and stroking her hair. "Come on, you can see your sister again, she's safe in the school. You want to see her again, don't you?"

Parvati had been one of the dueling club students who'd remained behind to safeguard the younger ones, since Moody hadn't judged her trained enough to accompany them onto the battlefield.

Ginny squeezed her eyes shut and shook her head. Her mind was wandering. Mud and blood and death and pain surrounded her in every direction, and she didn't think Fred was going to live, and she had to get Padma back to Hogwarts.

"Come on," she repeated, and was about to begin the next round of coaxing when she heard hoofbeats. She lifted her head in fear. They'd barely managed to dodge the golden horses once before, and then the herd of silver unicorns after that. Ginny would have to crouch over Padma now and hope that the horses or unicorns jumped them if they were coming round again.

But it was a herd of centaurs instead, and they were slamming broadside into the Death Eaters like a whole bevy of Killing Curses. Ginny shivered as she watched one spear driven so far through a cloaked figure that it plunged out his back, planted itself in the mud, and then impaled its victim completely. She had never realized what kind of force a spear with the strength of a charging centaur behind it would carry.

The main group pounded past them, but one, a dark chestnut, wheeled around and trotted towards them, his black tail billowing. Ginny stared at him uncertainly. She had been raised on evil tales of rogue centaurs and what they did. Besides, she thought this herd was only friendly to Harry.

"My name is Bone," said the centaur in a deep voice. "Is your friend wounded?"

Ginny nodded, responding automatically to such a sensible question. "I don't think she'll make it back to the castle without help."

"Then come with me," said Bone, and dropped to his knees in the mud. "Climb onto my back," he added patiently, when Ginny just stared at him again. She had never heard of a centaur lowering himself enough to let any human ride him—again, with the exception of Harry, but Harry was the exception to everything.

Biting her lip, Ginny managed to drag Padma the few feet that separated them from the centaur. Then she draped her over Bone's back, and asked, "Can you carry two of us?"

"You are small," said Bone. Faint amusement tinged his voice.

Ginny waited, but he said nothing else. Carefully, she slung one leg over his back and then climbed up, holding Padma in place over his withers.

The centaur rose and trotted towards the castle. Ginny didn't dare believe they were safe until she saw the wards dip for them and then rise, closing behind them. Then she had to shut her eyes so the tears wouldn't fall, even as she gave Padma over to the eager, reaching arms of her sister.

She turned to thank Bone, but he had already charged out of the wards again and back onto the battlefield. Ginny wondered for a moment if she should join him, but Professor Sprout stepped up then, took one look at her arm, and began to cluck about taking her to the hospital wing and Madam Pomfrey.

Ginny sighed, and tried to be satisfied with what she'd accomplished so far. At least, if she was going to the hospital wing, she could check on Fred.

Minerva knew how many students had been wounded or killed since Voldemort's initial attack. Godric was keeping track of them for her.

Eighty dead, thirty-one wounded.

For the moment, Fred Weasley and Hermione Granger were in the "wounded" category. Minerva had spoken with Poppy, though, and the matron refused to reassure her that that would not change by the end of the day.

Minerva stood now in the window of her office and watched as the centaurs joined the battle. They might be enough to turn the tide. They would never be enough, because nothing would, to bring back the dead.

She took a deep breath, and fought the urge to close her eyes as she saw another of the golden horses fall into an explosion of blood and churned earth from a detonating curse, marking the place where another of her students had just died. Godric's voice echoed softly in her head, changing the toll to eighty-one.

She could not be out there on the battlefield fighting, much as she wanted to, much as her fingers twitched and reached for her wand, because she had a school to protect. And she would protect all the students in it. Though she desperately wanted the wounded Gryffindors, her students, her lions, to live, she could not feel less desperation for Zacharias Smith, whom Godric had told her had called Helga to him, or for the Ravenclaw Patil girl Ginny Weasley had rescued from the battlefield.

Or even for my Slytherins, she thought, eyes on Harry as he wheeled low past the school, making three Death Eaters beneath him suddenly slump to the ground. Minerva could feel the force of his absorbere ability pulling on the wards for a moment, and then he was past and up and gone. She tilted her head back to watch him. The determination in her solidified like steel forged in a tempering fire.

Yes, they are my Slytherins, now, as much as they are Severus's. I think I could set the wards around their common room without help if I had to try again.

And she would stand by her students in all things, she thought, her hands pressing into the stone hard enough to hurt as she watched Harry pause to exchange another flurry of spells with Voldemort. That meant defending what they had done in the name of defending Hogwarts.

She had heard Voldemort's announcement this morning of Harry killing children by the lake. Everyone had. It was the one thing that could distract her students from talk of the battle—at least, students who didn't have siblings or parents or cousins fighting on the grounds. They were muttering, building fear in their eyes and their minds and their hearts, wondering if Harry could be responsible for killing them, too, if they pushed him far enough.

Minerva was sure there was a good explanation, and she would wait until Harry could give it to her, and then she would stand by him no matter what happened.

They are my students, she thought, forcing herself to be still as she saw the horse that bore Helga just barely escape a Killing Curse. All of them.

Harry surveyed the battlefield for a moment. He had the time. Voldemort was coming up behind him again, but he was slowed by his dragon's half-melted state, and his own rage. He obviously couldn't think of many spells to send at Harry that he hadn't already sent, and he was wary of simply contributing magic to Harry's growing stream of it.

He was surprised to see how many Death Eaters were dead. Perhaps fifty were left alive, and they were trying to retreat, though his allies weren't really letting them. The last giant had fallen, and the centaurs were running freely across grass that only an hour ago would have sprouted plants to snare them, bunching for massed cavalry charges against those Death Eaters stupid enough to stand and resist them, and then scattering apart again to chase the fleeing survivors. The grounds were thick with death.

The sight of all those piled bodies did not make Harry feel good. But he felt considerably better than he would have had the sight been a devastated, cracked-open Hogwarts filled with the bodies of students instead.

He lifted his head, wondering if it wasn't time to begin his final taunting of Voldemort that would sting the Dark Lord into chasing Harry and Draco to the place of their final confrontation.

A flicker of movement in the air caught his eye. Harry turned the thestral quickly. Was Voldemort brewing another killing storm?

But the shape that soon resolved itself was far stranger. It looked like a massed flight of winged horses, bearing riders. From the horses' bodies depended chains, leading to something enormous that hung and swayed gently beneath them. Harry thought he could see gold, but that was not unusual; the Light storm was reflecting off whatever it was. Polished glass, metal, water? Harry thought it must be a trick of Voldemort's, since he hadn't asked any of his allies to do something like this, but couldn't imagine that it was dangerous. Voldemort would have used such a weapon to threaten the children in Hogwarts before now.

Then the winged horses passed into the shade of a less intense part of the Light storm, and Harry could see what they were supporting. A tank, filled with water and swarming bodies.

And then the sirens began to sing, and as Harry saw compulsion twining around the minds of everyone beneath him, he felt the balance of the day once more tip towards despair.

Chapter Ninety-Two: A Body Made of Music

Harry looked down at the battlefield as the sirens' songs began, automatically fighting off their influence as he built a core of concentrated rage and flung the attempts at compulsion into his Occlumency pools, and saw his fighters faltering. One golden horse had been charging and creating carnage, sometimes carrying the flickering image of a woman on its back and sometimes carrying Zacharias Smith. Now the horse slowed altogether as its rider stared up at the sirens. Then he or she nodded obediently and turned in the direction of Hogwarts. Harry wasn't entirely sure if the sirens were going to command his people to drown themselves in the lake or simply go back to the castle, but either way they were targets.

Even Voldemort's Death Eaters were targets, as they began walking towards the castle, and Voldemort did not seem to care. He was laughing exultantly, and Harry spun towards him, glaring. He caught a glimpse of the snake's head weaving around the dragon's neck before Voldemort called across the gap between their mounts, his voice loud and mocking.

"Did you think that you had tamed them, Harry? But they are not for you to tame. What could you offer them but self-restraint, a life of change or of tameness beyond a web? When I explained to them what a vates was, what kind of limits you wanted to impose on the magical creatures, they understood at once. They did not want to ally with you. I offer them more freedom than you ever will."

Harry didn't waste his breath on answering. He swung the iron thestral and rode directly at the tank, wondering, as he went, whether he could smash the tank open and let the sirens plummet to their deaths. A single kick from his mount's hoof might be enough to shatter it.

He had accepted the necessary deaths of Dark wizards who stood to oppose him, and he'd had to accept the same for magical creatures when he realized Voldemort had allied with the giants. He would be sorry to cause the deaths of the sirens, but if they were bent on causing the deaths of his own fighters, he had no choice.

A flung Avada Kedavra nearly made him start, until he realized that it came from a wizard riding one of the winged horses. Harry cursed as he counted a dozen of them, all of them in the dark cloaks and white masks of the Death Eaters, and all of them determined to protect the sirens' tank. They were hindered by their horses' chains, but, on the other hand, they had only to fight defensively. Harry was the one who had to fight offensively, trying both to get past their magic and to break the tank.

Perhaps I don't have to close with them, though, Harry thought, and sacrificed a bit of the magic he'd eaten in a long, curling dark tendril, shooting straight through the impressive array of Dark curses and smashing into the tank.

The glass shimmered, and did not crack. Harry snarled as wards, invisible before, sprang to life, wound into the glass. Layered defensive magic, layer after layer, and not all of them spoke of Voldemort's work, either. Some of it was magic that Harry had never seen before, which he suspected came from the sirens. He tried again, with a stronger bit of magic this time, and realized, as a single sharp-edged ward sprang up to turn it aside, that there could be endless wards strung around it. He might waste moments hammering at the tank before he broke it.

And in the meantime, his fighters were still walking mindlessly towards the school, both centaurs and wizards. Harry cursed again. By allowing the centaurs to fall victim to compulsion, he was abandoning his vates duties.

Only two human figures on the battlefield didn't seem caught by the sirens' song. Harry recognized the tall one as Snape; of course, since he was an Occlumens and had had experience with siren songs once before, he'd probably worked on building his mental defenses. And the other was—

Connor?

Of course, Harry thought a moment later, relieved. You cannot compel a compeller.

And then Voldemort lifted his hand almost lazily. One of the dark cones of light he'd used on Harry earlier blasted down and tore into the back of Harry's defenseless, stumbling allies. A witch who looked like one of the Gloryflowers died without a sound, and others tumbled, bleeding. But they rose to their knees in the next moment and began moving towards the school again, while the sirens' songs played like silver harps around them.

Harry screamed in anger, and abandoned his attempts to get to the sirens' tank. He had to defend his allies first and foremost. He flew towards the school, and heard Voldemort laugh again as he passed him. Harry glanced at him, then pulled the iron thestral up and felt himself go very still.

Voldemort's flesh-dragon had one half-melted paw clamped around the second iron thestral, and Draco sat, glaze-eyed, just under the dragon's jaws. The teeth, jagged implanted spikes of bone, were parted delicately around Draco's head.

"I think we should discuss some things first, Harry, before you go to the rescue," Voldemort said sweetly.

Connor didn't understand what the fuss was about. People started turning around and going back towards Hogwarts, and he assumed he must have missed a general call to retreat. Then he discarded that. After all, there were still Death Eaters walking around, so the battle wasn't over. Granted, the air was full of an irritating buzzing noise, but so? That didn't matter.

Then he realized that buzzing noise seemed to matter to everyone else, and when a shadow passed over him, he lifted his head and saw the block of glass swaying on the end of its chains between the winged horses. The glass was full of water, and swarming shapes with long blonde and red and blue hair, from the glimpses that Connor caught. And fish tails.

Sirens. That's right. Harry said something about Voldemort having freed the sirens last year.

Connor took a deep breath. Well, he had the ability to resist the sirens. He could, maybe, use his compulsion on the people now wandering witlessly towards the castle, which included even Owen, he saw with a quick glance around. He could urge them to come back. But he didn't think he could control that many people at once, and besides, that was still compulsion. Connor winced to think what would happen when he had to explain to Ron how he'd ordered him to do things.

What should I do?

He stared up at the tank, and bit his lip. Harry was up there somewhere, but he couldn't have a solution to the problem, or Connor was sure the sirens would have stopped singing by now. Perhaps he was busy fighting off Voldemort and making sure he didn't hurt anyone else. That left this particular problem up to Connor.

He took another deep breath, laid down the sword on the ground—it didn't protest, now that there were no more Death Eaters to fight—and then drew his wand. “Accio Nimbus 2001!” he shouted, remembering how Harry had summoned his Firebolt during the First Task of the Triwizard Tournament last year.

A quick flicker of movement above the Quidditch Pitch, and then a broom came zooming towards him. Connor occupied himself in the moments until it arrived by staring at the walking mass of people and trying to make out his friends. He caught an occasional glimpse of red hair, but it could have been almost anyone. Some people were crawling on their knees, despite dripping wounds. Connor shuddered, and felt fire fill his eyes and his belly.

That is wrong. It is wrong. I am going to go up there and do something about this to set it right.

There were some people who weren't moving in the general direction of the castle, Connor noticed when his broom finally arrived and he swung a leg over it. They were all in the robes of Death Eaters, but most of them bore the marks of curses: missing limbs, deep wounds in their chests, burned and torn clothing. When one turned towards him and stared with blank eyes, he understood. Inferi, probably, or reanimated corpses.

But though they were dangerous, and had blood on their hands, indicating recent kills, Connor didn't feel threatened or afraid. He thought he heard a distant bark, and felt a lifting-up of his heart. He smiled at them, and then he rose, heading straight for the tank and the flying horses around it. He intended to keep beneath the tank until he was right up close to it. He didn't want the riders noticing him and launching curses at him.

Snape stared intently into the sky, letting the compulsion of the sirens' song slide off him moment by moment, forcing himself to hear it as an ugly buzzing and not a beautiful sound. What was Harry doing? He should have been down among the compelled victims by now, snapping the web of the sirens' song, or he should have smashed the tank.

Then the flesh-dragon drifted into view, a flash of iron visible close against its side, and Harry circling it on his own thestral. His body was so still that Snape knew what must have happened. Voldemort had Draco. No one else would have made Harry react that way, and forget the others suffering beneath him.

Snape parted his mouth in a snarl. I suppose this is up to me, then. I make a poor guardian for anyone but Harry, but so be it.

He turned and began firing binding curses and Body-Binds at the crawling, stumbling, mindlessly walking people—like Inferi, all of them. Snape felt sharp contempt for those unable to resist the spell of a little music, and used that contempt to fuel his incantations. When his victims began collapsing to the ground, wrapped in magic or ropes, he used Mobilicorpus to separate the Death Eaters from the students and Harry's adult allies.

He did not allow himself to think about what would happen if he was unable to capture some of them before they reached the castle—where Minerva would probably feel compelled to open up the wards to them—or the lake, where they would drown themselves. He worked.

Harry circled Voldemort, and felt sickness assault his stomach and bite his throat, his vision burning bright yellow. He kept trying to think about battle, and the thoughts kept sliding away under the influence of those jagged teeth posed around a blond head.

"They make a fetching picture, don't they?" Voldemort whispered. Harry could feel the pressure of his eyes—or, more accurately, the pressure of his snake's eyes—but he refused to look at him. His whole being was focused on Draco.

I have to get him out. I have to tear him free.

"I am tempted to keep them like this," Voldemort continued. "To know that you are helpless to do anything else, look anywhere else, until your lover's peril is resolved. How sweet. Love, the weapon of my enemies, is turned upon them and becomes their greatest weakness. So it has always been." He leaned around the dragon's neck and ran a hand like a white spider down Draco's cheek. Harry shuddered convulsively, as if it had been himself that Voldemort touched, and saw the Dark Lord smile.

"The price is the same as always," Voldemort breathed. "If you come to me of your own free will, if you surrender and bind yourself with an Unbreakable Vow not to hurt me or my Death Eaters again, then I shall bind myself with a similar vow not to hurt your lover."

Harry tried to breathe. His chest was too tight. He tried to think. His mind was too tight. He kept rebounding on the fact that Draco was in danger, and love and fear were such a twined chorus that he honestly couldn't tell where one ended and the other began.

"I think I grow bored of this tableau, lovely as it is," said Voldemort. "We must change the stakes."

That was Harry's only warning before the dragon turned and scraped one bone tooth down Draco's head, parting skin and hair as delicately as the flesh-eating rain had done. Harry shouted, but heard no words in his own shout; it sounded more like a half-strangled sob. Voldemort threw a mock-concerned look in his general direction, and then stroked the side of the dragon's neck, making it gently dislodge its tooth from Draco's flesh.

"Is something the matter, Harry?" he asked. "Something you would like to say to me? Something you would like to promise?"

Harry tried to wake up. He tried to find that level of thought he'd been able to sustain while the children were under the Life-Web. He had managed, then, to reason out that the correct course of action was to kill them, even though he hadn't wanted to, even though it was horrible, and part of the conviction had come from the fact that nothing was more important than saving lives, he could not save their lives, and people were dying behind him as he hesitated.

But those children had not been Draco.

A gap opened as he hovered there, indecisive, a crack in his morality that let him look straight into his heart, and what he saw there made him sick. He did care more about Draco's life than the lives of a dozen children. He was not the person he had thought he was, who, while admitting that some people were more important to him than others, could supposedly accept their deaths and go on. He could not accept this death. It would destroy him if those jaws closed, and those bone teeth came down, and Draco died. He might turn his back on Draco and go into the battle, declaring one life less important than the majority, but he would not live long after that. If nothing else, his self-disgust would deprive him of his will.

But the choice that Voldemort offered him was impossible, too. He could not abandon his allies the way that surrendering himself to that Unbreakable Vow would require him to.

He bowed his head, and heard Voldemort laugh.

Connor paused halfway up to the tank to cast a Disillusionment Charm on himself, because Moody had taught them all how to cast them and, really, one of his best lessons was that your enemies should remain unaware of you as long as possible. Then he went on flying, peering closely at the tank.

It appeared to be made of glass, but Connor's plans to just hurl Concutio at it and smash it that way vanished as he realized that the glass glimmered with the lines of numerous wards. He couldn't break through them with magic—and where there were that many wards, there would be others. That was part of Moody's lessons, too.

He flew in a circle for a moment, biting his bottom lip again as he considered the dilemma. He had to do something, because Harry was unable to do something, or he would have done the something already. But what?

Then he knew.

Connor shifted uncomfortably on his broom. He didn't like the thought of what he had to do, and Harry would like it even less. The only person who had ever given him lessons and thought this was a good idea had been Voldemort himself, in the guise of Sirius. Connor knew, from watching his parents and Dumbledore and Sirius, how what seemed a good weapon at first could corrupt you. He wasn't going to defeat his enemies but lose his soul.

But no one else was doing anything about the tank. When he glanced off to the side, Harry hovered motionless in front of Voldemort's dragon, apparently talking to him. Snape was working to slow people down on the battlefield, but that wouldn't change the balance of the sirens' voices. They would still compel people, Connor thought, and sooner or later the compulsion would include the order to attack anyone who tried to prevent them from reaching the lake or wherever the sirens were really sending them. And what if people in Hogwarts were hearing the sirens? Voldemort would have a whole school of helpless hostages.

He had no lesson to help him, nothing but the decision to take action now and bear the consequences later.

Like Harry, come to that, he thought, and nudged his broom around the edge of the tank's bottom and towards the first of the flying horses. Meanwhile, he was preparing himself for what he had to do, making moral arguments that were discarded almost as soon as he heard them.

Harry wouldn't like this.

But he wasn't doing anything to stop this.

It's not really a Gryffindor or a Light thing to do.

But Sirius was a Light-Declared wizard and a Gryffindor, and he did it, and I don't think the Light rejected him for it.

People might hate you for this.

I don't care.

Connor felt his stubbornness accrue, and then he was rising past the first of the winged horses to get a good look at the wizards on their backs. They all wore earplugs. Connor snorted. He wasn't surprised.

He struck with compulsion like a whip, reaching out and coiling it around the first of the Death Eaters' minds. He felt surprise, and shock, and instinctive struggle, but Sirius—no, Voldemort—had taught him how to handle this when they were practicing with rabbits and rats. Connor brought his own will down like a smoothing hand, and the rippled blanket of the other wizard's mind gradually relaxed into a smooth, quiescent mass, ready to fold or twist the way he wanted it to.

Loosen the chains, Connor thought, pouring all his will into the command. Drop the tank.

The nearest wizard turned his attention to the side of his mount's saddle. Connor turned and caught the next wizard in his net, and smoothed out the rebellion, and gave the same command. The wizards and witches still in the saddle watched with growing bewilderment as their companions obeyed some unknown impulse, but it never had a chance to grow beyond bewilderment to firing curses to stop them. Connor seized them before they could get that far, overrode their wills, and demanded that they listen, too. And the further he went, the easier it was. The last few victims were almost salivating at the chance, as if they thought that this couldn't be evil or contrary to their Lord's commands if everyone else was doing it.

Connor rode his Nimbus up above the tank and hovered there, sneaking glances in the direction of the hovering Voldemort and Harry. He had a bad taste in his mouth, but he kept the compulsion curled near the front of his mind, ready to unleash and inflict trouble if Voldemort noticed anything and interfered.

He never did. Connor turned back as the chains let go with a clinking rush and the tank with its sirens began to plunge towards the ground.

Only then did he realize that perhaps he should have given someone on the ground advance warning against the approach of so much glass and water.

Snape had seen it coming. From the moment that the odd, jerky movements of the Dark Lord's minions in the saddles of the flying horses caught his attention, he had been prepared for it.

Merlin knows how Harry did it, but there it is, he thought, with a flash of pride. Even when he appears helpless, floating in front of Voldemort as if there is nothing he can do, he reaches out and convinces his enemies to help him.

He began chanting the strongest Shield Charms he knew, linking them together as he had observed one could do in Harry's mind, building wards against the approach of the tank. He put them a good distance behind both his prisoners and the sluggishly crawling people still under the sirens' influence. Then he forced himself to turn back to the victims now clawing mindlessly at the castle's walls. The wards were down, faltering, as the sirens probably exerted their influence on the people inside Hogwarts to open the doors to the intruders. Snape had to prevent that from happening, and that meant the wards he had woven behind them would have to be enough.

He heard a snap like the breaking of the world, and turned in time to see the tank falling.

It hit the ground like a windstorm, and Snape fell to his knees. He heard the songs change to shrieks in the moment before he tightened his Occlumency walls again, refusing to let himself listen to the music as it really was. Then the glass cracked up the sides, and crazed, and the water plunged out, turning the field to mud. The sirens were left writhing, most bleeding, in the wreckage of what remained. Snape thought they were still trying to sing in the moments before the dead Death Eaters he had noticed here and there from the corner of his eye rushed upon them and reached out, strangling their slender throats.

And all the singing stopped.

Shouts of dizzy bewilderment popped up across the field as people on both sides of the battle recovered their minds. Hogwarts's wards sprang to life, strong and glittering.

Snape, surveying the castle in satisfaction before he moved to unbind their fighters, did think he saw one figure in a cloak staggering along an upper battlement, but dismissed his automatic concern. Whoever it was, and whatever the sirens had been trying to compel him to do—jump, open the wards, lower a rope to help the Death Eaters up the walls and into the castle—he wouldn't do it now.

The crash and splash of the tank jarred Voldemort's attention away from Draco and Harry, for just one moment. His snake pivoted to stare, taking his eyes away with it and aiming them in one direction only.

Harry moved.

He'd been so afraid to use the magic he contained before, for fear of only making the situation worse; if he jarred or jolted the dragon, then it could drop Draco. Besides, Voldemort was able to feel what he was doing before he did it, and could block it or wound Draco permanently. But he had to do something now, and so he did, unwinding the magic he'd collected and hurling it forward in great whips.

One twisted around the dragon's jaws, holding its head in place, and the other grabbed Draco and tugged him forward. Harry held his breath as Draco's scalp just barely scraped under the bone teeth, and then he swung crazily out into midair, dangling from nothing but Harry's will and magic. Harry hastily reeled his boyfriend in towards him. He could hear Draco, awakened from the daze of the sirens' songs, cursing him and Voldemort and the world in general, but he didn't let it distract him. Voldemort was screaming and hurling magic at him, and Harry had to open up the absorbere tunnel again to eat it.

The whip at last swung Draco up on the iron thestral behind him, and then he was clutching Harry's back and babbling about the pain on the side of his head. Harry nodded absently to show that he was listening, and reached back to brush his hand against Draco's waist. Draco squawked.

"If you'd just listen to me, Harry, and realize that—" he began.

"Do you have the knife?" Harry asked.

Draco sighed and shifted so that the hilt of the knife Adalrico Bulstrode had given Harry came in contact with his seeking hand. Harry nodded his thanks and whipped the blade out, draining magic into it with a sense of relief. The knife was far more magical than the stones, and could swallow most of what Harry was pushing through himself, though if Voldemort kept throwing power like that, heedless of where it went in his rage, it wouldn't be long before this receptacle, too, was full.

"Are we ready?" Draco leaned forward to whisper in his ear.

"I think we are," Harry replied. "This is almost as much magic as I can take, and we need—"

A long, tearing scream claimed their attention—everyone's attention. Harry turned his head, at the same time as Voldemort turned his, or his snake's, and stared at the North Tower.

A single figure was perched there. Its cloak streamed behind it, and from here, Harry could smell smoke and fire. Acies, he thought, full of wonder and unease. What is this? Why has she come out on the battlefield? I thought she wasn't going to fight because of what the songs of the Light and the Dark might do to her.

And then he remembered that there had been even more music than that on the battlefield—the sirens' songs. The air had been full of song. And the dragons were called the Singers.

Harry knew then what was coming.

He kicked the iron thestral into a downward swoop, shouting. Snape looked up at him, and Harry shouted again, invoking Sonus on his voice. "Get everyone inside! Now!" He was weaving a ward as he spoke—easy, since he was practically leaking magic—a half-circle of white light and phoenix fire around Hogwarts. He didn't know if it was going to be strong enough. He hammered protection against fire into it as hard as he could, and still he did not know if it was going to be enough.

He completed the first half-turn in the making of the ward, feeling how hard Draco's hands clutched at his waist, and as he wheeled, he caught a glimpse of Acies.

Her cloak had flown off. Immense shadows projected above her back, shifting and billowing lazily. Wings, Harry realized, when they turned to the side and caught the light of the storm overhead. Wings larger than those belonging to any dragon he had ever seen.

Acies's body tore open, and her dragon shredded its way free.

Harry had never seen anything like it. Coil after coil, yard after yard, of body unfolded and went on unfolding, overflowing the North Tower—all of it clad in red-gold scales, like blood lit by phoenix fire. The sense of magic and immense strength, the magic it would take simply to support that enormous body and to fly, lapped the battlefield like a second storm. Harry saw the great head twisting, the golden eyes opening, and even from that far away he staggered when he caught a mere glimpse of those eyes. They led into a mind like the sea in storm, alive with wildness. He might tangle with a dragon like that, but he would not win.

This was not one of the living species of dragon, he realized, as she reared on the Tower and opened her wings to their fullest extent, making a darkness under the day. This was a dragon like the one whose skeleton slept on the Isle of Man, making the great hall where the Opallines lived. This was the dragon that had faced St. George, the dragon that wizards had supposedly invented the Killing Curse to kill, the dragon Harry had been interested in enough after the Isle of Man to look up briefly—the British Red-Gold. Extinct for a thousand years and more, and now a living one spread her wings and roared her defiance at the sun.

Harry could hear nothing of Acies in that cry.

Remember me, she had asked of him, when there is nothing human left of me.

The dragon swung her head slowly from side to side. It looked like doom on patrol. Harry caught a glimpse of the stone crumbling beneath her weight, and knew she might bring down the North Tower. He wondered if he would have to attract her attention so that she would fly from Hogwarts before that happened.

Then someone else attracted her attention. One of Voldemort's Death Eaters, recovered from the sirens' songs and staggering about outside Harry's protective ward, raised his wand and cast Avada Kedavra at her.

The curse fell far short, fizzling out before it ever reached the Tower. Harry thought there was too much fear behind it and not enough hatred. But it got the dragon's attention.

She opened her mouth, and she breathed.

Fire charged up her throat like a dozen Hogwarts Express trains and slammed into the ground hard enough to make the castle lurch. The wizard who'd cast the Killing Curse didn't have time to scream before the blast of brilliant white heat overwhelmed him. Harry recalled Paton Opalline saying that a Red-Gold's fire could vaporize, and so it certainly seemed to. The fire leaped once, like a ball of the sun-liquid that Harry had called on to melt Voldemort's diamond-shards, and then slammed into Harry's ward.

He could feel it melting. Nothing wizard-made had had to contend with flame like this in so long that they no longer knew how to do it. The ward was crumbling, and would lose its strength in a moment.

Harry made a decision he knew he would regret. He snapped his ward backwards, exposing the Death Eaters who still lived and who had either separated themselves to the side or been separated by Snape, and wrapped it tight around the students and his allies who were still outside the castle.

The fire roared. Harry heard no cries. The white mass wavered on for a few more feet, then settled to the ground and began to burn out a charred crater. The Death Eaters were gone. They would be less than bones, Harry knew, less than ash. It was a quick death, but a death of immense pain, contracted into a few moments.

Harry fought not to be sick. He felt Draco's hands clutch at his waist, and the iron spikes curl around his legs, both holding him on the thestral's back. He looked up at the dragon just as she lazily spread her wings and soared into the air. Trees in the Forbidden Forest bowed to the ground in the wake of her rising. For a moment she hung there, blazing with such magic that Harry shivered.

He thought of trying to stop her. Then she turned her head again, as if she had heard the wish, and the eye swept across and staggered him, and Harry knew he could not. He could not reach a mind that wild, and if he tried to cage her, she would surely react to the binding with another string of flame. He had no faith in himself to withstand anything stronger than that first lazy blast, nor to outfly the fire.

He had to watch as she turned and swirled up into the gold of the sky, turning almost golden herself as she reached it, and then parting the storm and vanishing into it. Harry shook his head dazedly. Acies is gone. What remains is—undoubtedly a problem I will need to deal with later.

But he had wasted too much time already in indecision. He took a deep breath, and forced himself to commit to the course that would leave Voldemort too broken to raise a second army of Death Eaters. He tightened the ward around the students and adults as they retreated into Hogwarts, checked for a moment to make sure the fire was burning where it was and was already the recipient of water spells from behind Hogwarts's own wards, and then faced Voldemort.

He had anticipated having to taunt the Dark Lord into following him. That was not the case, he saw, as that rage-filled face turned towards him. He merely had to laugh, and he could practically feel Voldemort reaching certain conclusions. The dragon had been planned, he would think, and Harry had destroyed all his Death Eaters.

His flesh-dragon flung the iron thestral away like a toy, and began to scull steadily towards them.

"Hang on," Harry muttered to Draco, using his hand to push the Midsummer knife into a robe pocket and feel the stones. Yes, he had them all, glowing with warmth, and the knife beside them, and Draco at his back. Though originally they'd planned to fly on separate thestrals, perhaps this was better. This meant that Voldemort didn't have a chance to catch Draco and hold him hostage on the way there.

"I'm ready," Draco said, his voice reflecting none of the pain and fear Harry knew he must be feeling. His hands tightened on Harry's waist like claws.

Harry nodded, and then kicked the thestral and turned it. A map of the country unrolled in his mind, and the thestral responded obediently, flowing south faster than the flesh-dragon could fly, but never so fast as to get too far ahead of Voldemort and lose his interest. The whole point was to lure Voldemort, make him think he could win, as neither Apparating nor Portkeying would have done.

And on and on they went, aiming straight for London.

Chapter Ninety-Three: Many-Legged

Harry wondered how the Obliviators would conceal this one.

The iron thestral flew south with steady wingbeats, now and then hiding behind a cloud when Harry thought they could get away with it, now and then dropping back so as to almost let Voldemort's flesh-dragon close its teeth on its tail. Sometimes they were high enough to be sure most Muggles wouldn't see them, but not often. Harry wondered what kind of tales would follow them, and whether Scrimgeour would be angry with him for forcing the Ministry to cover up a flight that he wouldn't have wanted happening in the first place.

If I wonder about that, he admitted to himself, I can keep from wondering if this plan is actually going to work.

During the periods when the thestral pulled ahead of the flesh-dragon, he worked grimly, emptying himself of as much absorbed magic as possible and tucking it into the Midsummer knife and the gaps in the stones. It had been essential that he gather as much power as he could. Now that he had it, it was essential that he not be carrying it when they arrived at their destination.

"Do you still think you can possess him?" he asked Draco over his shoulder, as he pressed another smooth fold of power into the blade of Light. The knife accepted it with a purr. Harry thought it helped that they were riding through the anniversary of the long-ago day when it had been forged.

Draco visibly shuddered behind him; Harry could feel the tremors through the hands that gripped his waist. He let his own hand fall, caressing Draco's fingers and wrist. "It's all right if you can't," he said quietly. "Tell me. It only needs to be for a few minutes, but you can possess the knife, as we agreed. I'm going to leave it with you anyway."

"I'm not—that is, I think I can do it," said Draco, his voice firming. They ducked around a cloud, and then rose up into a clear blue sky. They'd left the storm of Light behind when they left Hogwarts, and now Harry thought they were somewhere just south of the Scottish border. "But I'm worried about the other parts of it. What happens if you get consumed?"

"That's why I'm shifting the magic I hold," said Harry. "Otherwise, I'd be in incredible danger when that thing came out. But it goes for the strongest target, and Voldemort is the strongest target—or he will be once I finish shifting all this magic." He was almost finished, he thought. He'd pulled back to his ordinary magical core, and that way he was less strong than Voldemort was.

"Do you think he'll really follow us into what he has to know is a trap?" Draco asked, as they hurtled around a looming cloud-mountain in front of them. They'd already gone through a few clouds that big, and both Draco and Harry had found it unpleasantly cold and hard to breathe. "He'll have to suspect when we reach it."

Harry twisted around so that Draco could see his grim smile. "And that's where you come in," he murmured. "That's the second reason I need you to possess him, so that he doesn't just Apparate back out. I think I've made him too angry to consider it, but I've been wrong on Voldemort's psychology before. When and if he starts suspecting, you'll be there to give him something else to think about."

Draco shut his eyes and leaned his head on Harry's shoulder. Harry turned back forward just as a blast of the flesh-dragon's oily black breath curled around them and began stinging his eyes and nose again.

Draco coughed, then shrieked in pain. Harry didn't want to think about why, and anyway, he couldn't see the cause in the choking murk. He squeezed Draco's hand on his waist by way of reassurance, ground the stump of his left wrist into Draco's other hand, and urged the thestral up until they cleared the fog.

He turned around to check on Draco, and realized that the flesh-dragon's breath must have stung the wound on the side of Draco's face and neck, the one carved by its teeth. Draco had his eyes closed and was sweating, and the wound had turned a nasty purple color all around its edges and opened again. Harry grimaced. He'd already tried to heal the injury, and it refused to obey the basic healing spells he knew.

Maybe I can ease the pain, though.

He laid his hand on Draco's cheek and murmured, "Dolor haurio."

Draco's face eased, cautiously, as though he didn't trust the relief creeping through him. Harry grunted as the painful sensations flowed into him, instead. He accepted them, though; he'd long been used to more severe agony, and at least it didn't open a wound on his face to match Draco's. He was going to need all the speed he possessed when they got to their destination, so he didn't want to be slowed by slipping on blood. He faced forward again and continued flying.

"Thank you," Draco whispered.

"You're welcome," Harry whispered back, even though he didn't think anyone could hear them. A glance over his shoulder revealed the flesh-dragon had fallen behind again. Voldemort was snarling and lashing one hand up and down on its shoulder, as though he wanted to coax more speed from it but was currently unable to do so.

"When we get through this," Draco said, "I do want to go to the Sanctuary. I want to do it as soon as possible. I realize there are details to be settled and deaths to arrange, but Merlin, Harry, I want peace and comfort. I want a period of time when I know that you're not going to die and I'm not going to, either." One of his hands found its way to Harry's chest and urged him back until he lay with his head on Draco's shoulder. "I want to celebrate our next joining ritual on your birthday in style," he murmured, and gently nuzzled the side of Harry's neck.

Harry gave a breathless little laugh, and urged the thestral to fly higher and faster. "That you can think about that when we're in the middle of a flight away from the Dark Lord, Draco, and hurtling towards a trap that you admit you're not sure will work any more than I am..." He shook his head.

"Why?" Draco insisted. "What's wrong with it?"

“There’s nothing wrong with it,” Harry said. “I didn’t bring it up to say there was. It just says wonderful things about you. And probably painful things, but I am not about to mention the painful things when we’re on the back of a flying beast a thousand feet in the air and you’ve already admitted you’re nervous.”

Draco’s arms locked around his waist again, this time with less of the painful, frenzied clutch they’d had when they left the battlefield and with more of a tight hold that said he couldn’t dream of letting Harry go. He let his chin fall forward until his head rested on Harry’s in turn, and sighed.

Harry continued steering the thestral south, with a deeply absurd sense of, It will be all right. It really will.

Harry felt the tension of the wards even before they arrived, when London was only a distant smear on the horizon. They asked him, in all but a human voice, whether he was sure he wanted to go through with this.

I am, said Harry, and reached for the commanding voice he had learned, of necessity, when dealing with the Black wards and the Black artifacts. Fall. Let us through when we come.

The wards acquiesced. That was the wrong word, really, Harry thought, as he dipped the thestral so that Voldemort’s dragon couldn’t breathe another cloud of choking murk on them. After all, the wards weren’t really intelligent enough to argue with him, or hold a conversation with him. Nonetheless, there had been doubt, and now there was none. It was extremely hard to explain to anyone who wasn’t actually linked to wards.

He wondered idly if Draco felt the same way—or did the responsibility for the wards around Malfoy Manor still fall so much on his father that he hadn’t ever talked with them the way that Harry had with the Black ones?

“Harry, he’s coming!”

Harry felt all his muscles tense, and he looked over his shoulder not for confirmation—he trusted Draco—but because he wanted to see the angle Voldemort was approaching from. There had always been the possibility that he would attack before they reached their destination and their trap, though Harry had been more worried about him turning back.

The flesh-dragon was picking up speed again, half-melted wings flopping desperately in the air. Voldemort's snake wrapped around his waist as the dragon came closer and closer, swaying so that Voldemort could see them. Harry growled under his breath. It might be a good thing to destroy that snake, but then Voldemort would withdraw entirely from the battle. He had to keep his enemy angry, not panicked.

And he had to survive the flight until they could get to Number Twelve Grimmauld Place.

Harry clenched his knees on the thestral and waited for the dragon's next attack—or Voldemort's. From the way he was holding his wand, he had given up on commanding his beast to use its reeking breath. A spell was the more likely thing. Harry cranked up his awareness, opened his mind to his instincts the way Moody was always insisting they do in battle, and practically held his breath as he waited.

“Avada Kedavra!”

Harry heard the first syllables, and was already turning the thestral. No shield or barrier could block the Killing Curse; Moody had repeated that hundreds of times to the dueling club students, never mind that many of them had already heard of it from Mulciber disguised as him in their Defense Against the Dark Arts classes last year. He hadn't wanted any foolish heroics, any attempts to charge down a dragon's maw when the dragon was spitting that spell at them.

The beam of green light traveled far above the thestral as they dropped. Harry grimaced as he saw Muggle buildings loom sharply into view. Perhaps Voldemort was trying to chase them into the sight of Muggles—though Harry couldn't imagine what he would want to accomplish with that.

Speaking of which, I can at least help the Ministry, he thought, and wrapped a Disillusionment Charm around himself, Draco, and the thestral. Voldemort could still track them easily, by the pull of Harry's gathered magic if nothing else, but the Muggles shouldn't see them now.

When he looked back, Voldemort had taken something like the same tactic, as the outline of the flesh-dragon had faded to a shadow. Harry smirked. He doesn't really want Muggles seeing him yet, no matter what he claims. Taking over their world and never fearing what they could do to a wizard, my arse.

Harry kept an eye on him as the thestral dodged and twisted. He hadn't bothered with the Disillusionment Charm before because they'd passed so rapidly over the Muggles' heads, and he hadn't been sure, then, that Voldemort wouldn't abandon the chase and turn back to plague his allies. But he was sure now. Oh, he was sure. A second Killing Curse a few minutes later confirmed it.

"Harry?" Draco asked, when they'd dived so that the Killing Curse had no chance of touching them, and then rose again.

"Hmmm?" Harry asked. He was leaning forward. He'd memorized the map between Grimmauld Place and Hogwarts carefully, and he knew the thestral was flying in that direction, but it might still be possible to miss the house. They were going so fast that they might hurtle over it, and the Disillusionment Charm had put a misty barrier between them and the world.

"You really aren't frightened, are you?"

Harry glanced back at him in curiosity. "Bloody terrified," he said simply. "Or I will be, once this is finished." He shook his head, remembering the fear that had gripped him when Voldemort held Draco hostage. Perhaps I used up most of my terror then. "It might not work, and then we'll have Voldemort in a house full of dangerous Dark artifacts and all this captured magic. That would be terrifying for any wizard. But I think it is going to work."

“Why?” Draco’s whispered word brushed Harry’s ear like a gnat’s wings.

“Because I have faith in you, and faith in myself, and even faith in the monster we need to let loose to make this work,” said Harry simply, and brushed Draco’s hand with his own again, and then looked down sharply as a familiar, looming shape made itself known. Down! He urged the thestral on with his mental voice and his knees, and the thestral dived.

Harry floated the stones and the Midsummer knife out of his robe pockets with a Levitation Charm as they fell, and tucked them firmly into Draco’s. He had to go into the house with only his own magic about him. Voldemort absolutely must be the strongest wizard when they arrived. He told himself that again and again, to keep from automatically reaching for that drained magic and using it to protect himself.

When they flew through the downed wards and he felt the singing begin, he didn’t try to fight it, either. He bowed his head and murmured to Draco while he still had enough self-control left, “You know what to do.”

Draco squeezed his elbow to the point of pain, but said nothing. Harry took that as a yes.

The thestral landed on the walk in front of Number Twelve Grimmauld Place with a grinding of iron hooves. Harry launched himself off its back and ran madly at the door, Draco right behind him. If Voldemort caught them before they could reach their proper places, there would be bugger all they could do about it.

The door burst open in front of Harry, as if sensing his urgency, and he and Draco parted at the foot of the stairs, Draco flying towards the room where he’d carved his rune circle over the Easter holidays, and Harry running like mad towards the door from behind which the tempting song curled. He could hear legs dancing, and a voice like many voices murmuring, Let me out. Let me out. I must be free. Vates, vates, let me out.

It was practically a relief to give in to that song, to lay his hand on the door Canopus Black had covered with warding spells and to blast Dark magic, the only kind that would work, through them.

Draco slid into his rune circle with a gasp, and, reaching out, drew the Midsummer knife to slit a tiny cut on his finger. Then he squeezed with rough pinches at his finger as he held it above the appropriate rune, eyes on the door all the while. He could hear the grating sound as the flesh-dragon landed, and knew Voldemort would be coming through the front door in a moment, clad in power. Fall, you stupid drop of blood. Why in the world is this taking so long to fall?

The drop of blood did fall, at last, and land on the rune Draco needed it to land on. The circle flared with dazzling power around him, sealing itself. Draco sat back, panting, and then flung his mind outward, seeking the core of Voldemort's mind.

There it was, before him, all blazing, rotting foulness. Draco would have hesitated to dive into it, but he knew that he absolutely had to. Voldemort could not go up the stairs and find Harry before Harry finished releasing whatever the singing beast was.

It was a mad plan, but someone had to help Harry do it and not die.

Draco took a deep breath and leaped through Voldemort's barriers, possessing him.

A locking spell faded away. Harry smiled. He was very nearly one with the song now, which thrummed in his brain like strings of silver given a voice, and was finally able to say something other than the banal pleas for freedom it had been giving for so long.

Thank you. You will not regret this. I am not of this world. We are not of this world. We will show you such things as you have never seen, such wonders as wizardkind never tells of. Only open the door, and let us show you...

Harry thought that was a good thing, a good idea. He knew he had fallen into compulsion—knew it and rejoiced in it. He was so tired.

The revelation he'd had on the field when Voldemort took Draco hostage was one he would rather not have had, and had raised questions he would rather not answer. He would have liked nothing so much as to collapse and let others take over his life for a while, normal people who knew better than he did, and here was someone who would do it for him, if he would only listen to the song.

I can have my free will back when I want, can't I? he asked the creature, and it sang to reassure him.

Of course, vates. Would we compel someone who is dedicated to free will forever? No. Only let us go, and you will see the extent of our compulsion. There is a meal waiting for us downstairs, a powerful wizard. That is wonderful. That is exactly what we wanted. We will go free, and eat, and then I will come back upstairs and teach you what compulsion and free will mean.

Harry smiled, and closed his eyes, and another locking spell faded from the door. The many legs danced in anticipation.

Draco realized almost at once that possessing Voldemort was going to be different from possessing either Dumbledore or Snape. Yes, both of them had been powerful wizards, and both had been Legilimens.

Neither had had, as Draco was quickly discovering Voldemort did, the ability to possess someone back.

The moment Voldemort felt the intrusion to his mind, he tried to grasp and read the thoughts of the intruder. Draco slipped free of the hold and plunged further into the reeking insanity of the Dark Lord's thoughts. It felt worse than the choking cloud of breath he'd experienced from the flesh-dragon. He had to pause, gasping, and Voldemort caught up with him.

For a moment, he felt his own will melting, or being shoved away into a tiny corner of his mind. For a moment, he felt his own body in the rune circle, horribly present around him when it shouldn't be, lifting a hand as if he would smudge the runes and let himself out—and let Voldemort have access to the stones and the Midsummer knife that he carried, filled with the magic Harry had stolen.

No. I won't let that happen. Draco was already ashamed enough of how Voldemort had managed to use him against Harry on the battlefield, and how he had gone tamely along with it because he'd surrendered to the sirens' compulsion. That wouldn't happen again. He imagined himself as oiled snake, oiled flesh, oiled thoughts, and shoved away from his body again. He melted through Voldemort's grasp and roiled through the thoughts he carried far from the surface, seeking one that would let him have a solid grip.

Voldemort roared and dived after him. Draco could read enough of his mind now to know that he thought Draco was searching for one specific bit of information, the one that would tell Harry why Voldemort was immortal. He really, really didn't want Draco to find that information.

Well, then let's look for it, shall we? It would be better than Voldemort realizing what Draco was really doing: holding him here until the beast, the better distraction, could come for him.

Draco lunged in and out of Voldemort's thoughts, pretending he knew where he was going, and all the while uttering random words. When he did, they bounced back to him like echoes off those memories that contained their concepts. Normally, Draco could simply see anything in a victim's mind he wanted, but given Voldemort's inherent resistance to possession, he had to use this method instead and hope he stumbled on something worth reading. Heart, mind, love, darkness, sun, immortality, death, necromancy, ghosts, corpses, Inferi, soul—

The shriek Voldemort gave when he heard Draco saying "soul" was devastating. And then the claws of his mind reached down and hooked into Draco, making him scream in pain. It was worse than when he'd awakened after the dream Harry had created to trap the Dark Lord with the false prophecy.

Voldemort turned him over. In a moment, Draco knew, he would read everything, and know what Harry was doing, what his plans were, and even that the prophecy that had lured him to Hogwarts on Midsummer Day had been false.

In desperation, Draco did the only thing he could do. He taunted, We already know all about you and your soul, you bloody arse, and Harry is going to do something about it in a moment.

There was a breathless pause, a shocked moment before the storm, and then Voldemort hurt him.

Harry released the last locking spell. The door in front of him looked ordinary now, a wavering wooden panel, hardly fit to contain a creature of the magnificence that waited behind it.

In the creature's excitement at being free, it ceased to sing for a moment.

And then Harry recovered his will, and knew what was going on, and rolled out of the way.

The wooden door bulged and tore open down the middle. The creature poured into the world beyond like an exultant string of shit; so Harry felt the compulsion that came with it, now that he was awake. Not silver strings, but the trembling voice of a thousand screaming and murdered insects, he thought, shivering as he leaned against the wall and watched the creature heading for the stairs.

It did indeed have many legs, all attached to a segmented dark green body like beads of metal. It resembled a centipede as much as it resembled anything—if centipedes had no head, and many faces embedded in their sides, shielded and then revealed again by fluttering, white, wing-like discs. The faces were all human, all distorted, and all screaming with wide and yawning mouths. The mingled voices appeared and disappeared again depending on whether the wings were obscuring their faces or not. Harry shuddered as he thought of what the faces probably were: the remains of the creature's previous victims.

His speculation, or what he remembered based on what Narcissa had told him about the creature, was right. It ignored him and headed downstairs. It was aiming to consume Voldemort, who was the strongest wizard in the house now that Harry had shed the magic he'd gathered.

Harry sprang to his feet, waited until the last green bead was out of sight, and then ran after it. He needed to be not far behind the creature if he wanted to defang Voldemort. Because even that creature, in the end, was not his ultimate weapon against his enemy; it was only a distraction, to hold Voldemort still while Harry rendered the Dark Lord impotent. He might have depended on Draco alone, but he didn't think Draco could hold Voldemort as long as the creature would.

He hoped, as he pounded down the stairs and caught sight of the creature's last pair of legs just turning the corner, that Draco had managed to hold Voldemort for as long as it had taken him to free the creature.

Draco had never hurt so much.

Everywhere he turned, everywhere he looked, there was pain. He tried to reach out and grasp Voldemort's mind or magic, but every thought turned knife-edged and flung him away. He was bleeding, he knew he was, shedding memories or opening wounds in his mind. And this time, he didn't think they would be so easy to repair as they had been after Harry's dream. Snape wasn't here to heal them, anyway.

Worse, Voldemort was tainting him, bleeding himself into Draco in some way that Draco didn't understand. Or maybe that was just what possession by the Dark Lord felt like. Draco shuddered convulsively as he thought about that, and heard Voldemort chuckle, low, in his ear.

Do you like this, little one? Voldemort asked, in a voice that echoed from everywhere Draco turned, and sparked more and more pain. You were so eager to possess me. Do you not like being in the confines of another mind?

Draco gasped, and then cried out. And then he knew he was back in his body, in the rune circle, and had been forced out of Voldemort's mind completely.

The Dark Lord stood in front of him, his flesh-snake wrapped around his neck, staring at Draco with crimson eyes. It was the most terrifying thing Draco had seen, not least because he could feel the power pounding around Voldemort. He crouched very still, a mouse before the hawk that had already noticed it.

"Little one, little one, little one," Voldemort whispered. "At my mercy, again, and I need no sirens or dragon this time. And I need no other weapon to torment my heir, or press a blade against his throat. He will swear to help me conquer the wizarding and Muggle worlds, or kill himself slowly, by torture, if that is what it takes for you to be free of me."

Draco closed his eyes, his stomach and his brain swimming. He knew he was helpless. His head hurt so badly that he didn't dare attempt possession, and he had no other weapon that could defeat the Dark Lord, or allow them to contend as equals.

"You will begin," Voldemort said, in a gentle, inexorable voice, "by spilling your blood on the rune circle, and opening it, and then tossing those stones and that intriguing knife to me."

Draco didn't see that he had a choice. When he tried to gather himself to defy Voldemort, the Dark Lord twitched one pale hand, and Draco fell with a shriek as a shock of pain coursed through him. And he could not die. That would kill Harry more thoroughly than to see him as Voldemort's victim and prisoner. He could only try to delay.

Moving as slowly as he could, pretending he was too afraid to move faster—which was very nearly true—he reached into his robe pocket and scooped up one of the stones. Then he dropped it because his hand was shaking. Voldemort laughed, sounding more amused than angered.

Then he turned his head, and his snake pivoted to face the room's door and hissed.

Draco looked up as he heard the tap of multiple feet and the screams. Then he tensed as the creature came hurtling around the corner and headed straight for Voldemort.

And the Dark Lord didn't run, instead staring at the creature as if it were the most fascinating thing he had ever seen. Then it was on him, grabbing him around the waist with two of its legs and drawing him close, pressing his face against what Draco soon saw was one of the many, many mouths in its side. Its body whipped around him like a necklace as he went, unresisting, and more mouths, revealed by those fluttering wings, closed on Voldemort and began to feast—on his magic, Draco thought.

Harry slid around the corner of the doorway, panting. Draco, his hands now as shaky with relief as they'd been with fear, took a moment to squeeze the cut on his finger and coax another drop of blood onto the rune circle, opening it and dropping the protection it had afforded him—and allowing physical objects to cross the circle. Harry held out his own hand, and the stones and the Midsummer knife zipped out of Draco's robe pockets and across the boundary to land in his palm with a smack.

Harry slipped the stones into his robe and spent a moment surveying Draco as he clutched the knife. Draco tried to smile back, but he knew he hadn't fooled Harry. He didn't know how Harry could ignore the sucking beast and its victim to focus on him, but he did.

"Are you going to be able to do this?" Harry asked quietly.

"Yes," Draco whispered. Harry stared. Draco forced himself to cough and repeat it more loudly. "Yes, Harry, I am. I can do this. I can't Apparate, so I've got to possess it. I will."

And Harry bowed his head, accepting that with the faith he had in him, and whirled to face Voldemort, holding the Midsummer knife high. It shimmered in the sunlight coming in through the one window. Draco shuddered. The knife had been forged from the last ray of sunshine on a Midsummer day, Harry had told him, and she was full of magic. He supposed it was only right that she should shine.

Harry spent a moment muttering to himself, as if he were counting. Then the beast turned, and Voldemort's foot lashed out of the protective circle of green body.

Harry stabbed down, plunging the Midsummer knife into Voldemort's calf.

Even Draco felt the rush of magic that followed.

Harry rode the rush of magic through the knife, pushing himself forward with his will, using the power he'd stored in the blade to rise through Voldemort's flesh and blood and straight into his magical core. He would never have been able to do this if Voldemort was aware of himself, of course. But he wasn't, caught in the compelling embrace of the beast, and since the creature was ignoring Harry for the sake of the much tastier meal he'd brought it, he was free of its song.

He dug into Voldemort's magical core, and felt a few feeble defenses shatter before him. Then he spoke/willed the spell he'd chosen into existence, the spell he'd had the inspiration to use when he saw Augustus Starrise and Adalrico Bulstrode dancing at the spring equinox.

"Ulcer regis piscatori!"

The Fisher King Curse created the wound that could not be healed except by the caster, just as it had when Augustus used it on Adalrico—but instead of opening it on Voldemort's ankle, Harry opened it in his magical core. At once he began to spew power, losing it like blood.

The wound would continue to exist until Harry said it should not. Voldemort could still swallow magic—Harry knew of no way to take the absorbere gift, an innate power, away—but it would run out of him again as fast as water pouring into a sieve. Harry knew it would force Voldemort to retreat, to hide until he acquired some means of defending himself.

Voldemort screamed. The pain, and the drain of the power, had awakened him from the beast's spell. For a moment, he wavered on the brink of giving in to the compulsion again, but then he gathered himself up and Apparated, already barely able to do even that much. Harry, yanking the Midsummer knife and his own consciousness out of his victim in the moment before the Apparition happened, couldn't restrain a scream of victory.

And then he had to watch out, as the beast, deprived of its meal, turned to sing to the second strongest wizard in the house.

Chapter Ninety-Four: The Shining Road

Harry could feel the beast drawing in its breath to sing, if it had a breath. He didn't know how long Draco would be able to possess it, and given how wounded he thought Draco was, from the way he held himself, he rather thought they should save that moment of possession for a more opportune time.

Before the creature could start to sing, then, he drew a stone out of his robe pocket and held it up.

The creature gave a sound oddly close to a purr, and the voice Harry remembered from behind the locked door came back. Will you give that to us? We want it. It is beautiful. We are hungry. We want it. The eyes of all the faces were looking at it, Harry saw. The wing-like discs were drawn up so they could see, and they had stopped screaming for now, as if their meal of Voldemort had eased their pain.

Harry, his heart pounding—the creature could start singing again at any moment, after all—said, “I'll give it to you, but not here. This house is stained with the remains of my enemies. It is only fitting that you go and sing in a new place.” With the stone still in his hand, his eyes on the creature, he reached out and pulled at Draco with a gentle Summoning Charm. Draco drifted over to him and settled in the crook of his handless arm. The creature didn't appear to notice. As Narcissa had told him, Harry thought, it was interested only in meals of strong magic. Taking a step backward, Harry continued, “Do you know the Black house Silver-Mirror?”

We do. I do. The nearest face turned to watch the stone, the stretched mouth twitching in yearning.

Harry reached out to the wards on Silver-Mirror and commanded them to fall, now. Luckily, Silver-Mirror was the property that gave him the least trouble. Wayhouse would have been inclined to argue. “Then follow us,” he whispered, and tugged gently on the stones and the Midsummer knife, so that they tingled with magic and shone to the creature's multiple eyes. He bowed his head over Draco's and prepared to Apparate with him to Silver-Mirror.

With his face so close to his boyfriend's ear, he could murmur, and be reasonably sure that the creature wouldn't hear. "When we arrive. Possess it, for one moment. Keep its attention. Can you do that?"

Draco said nothing. But a moment later, his hands clasped on Harry's binding arm so hard that they momentarily cut off the flow of blood. Harry nodded in acknowledgment, and then closed his eyes and Apparated.

Side-Along Apparating someone else, especially someone he wanted to be as careful of as possible, hurt. Harry landed on his feet, however, and moved gently back from Draco with the stone in his hand, not allowing himself to think of failure any more than he did when he was chasing the Snitch in a Quidditch game. This was going to work, because it had to work, because it was the plan he had devised and it was going to work. He said so.

The beast appeared, coiled in the entrance hall, beneath the golden pool that slid drops of flame down the chains to the lamps.

Draco leaned forward.

Harry knew the moment when he possessed it, because the creature called out in all its many voices, and he moved.

Draco wanted to do nothing so much as curl up in a corner and go to sleep. His mind hurt, and his head hurt, and his magic hurt. He thought he could still feel the taste of Voldemort's taint in his throat if he spat.

But Harry had asked him to do this, and Draco knew that Harry would not have asked for help unless he truly needed it.

He looked up at the beast and lunged outward, reaching across the gap between them, touching its mind.

It hurt like stretching a cramped muscle hurt, and that was only the use of possession itself. Much worse was trying to grasp a mind so thoroughly alien. Harry had told him that a dragon's mind was alien like a storm, and Dumbledore's had been filled with ideals Draco found foreign, and Voldemort's had been a seething pit of Dark magic so foul even Draco's father would have refrained from using it.

But at least Dumbledore and Voldemort had been human—or had once been human, in the case of Voldemort. This was not. This never had been. It was not a conglomerate, a patchwork, of its victims' memories, as Draco had assumed it would be. It was—

It was hunger.

Draco moaned as he tried to grasp that incredible drive to eat and eat and eat, to consume and swallow magic until nothing was left, and could not. His stomach was already aching, and he knew that was a bad sign, that he could feel his own body and not the creature's. Hunger puddled in him. He wanted to give up his own magic to allay that yearning, or, more, swallow some of the power Harry had stolen. Why did he have that much? He didn't need that much anyway.

The creature came closer. Draco looked up and found himself staring into one stretched, narrow face embedded in a body segment like a great glass bead. The wing-like projections stretched out, trembling, and sniffed at him. Draco felt the interest and curiosity coursing through him like shards of broken glass.

Interesting, said the creature. You are strong in your possession gift. Perhaps we will eat that.

“Singer!”

And Draco knew that meant Harry was ready, and he could let his hold on the creature's mind loosen, and drop back into his body. He shuddered, wrapping his arms around himself. Merlin, he hurt. Hollowed-out and cold and bleeding and oily and befouled. He bowed his head and hoped that Harry wouldn't ask him to do anything else, because he might do himself permanent damage this time.

Harry had already chosen the one he wanted to use, of course. That had been part of the purpose of planning the way he had, all ahead of time. Draco's rune circle and his decision to surrender to the creature's compulsion long enough to free it and the Midsummer knife had all been part of the plan, and so was this.

He threw a subtle brightening spell at the one of the portraits hanging on the wall that he'd chosen as most useful. Then he had to adopt a suitably befuddled expression, and wrap his Complete Vanishing spell around the stones and the knife so that they would appear not to be there at all, and call, "Singer!"

The creature turned towards him, as much as it could be said to turn towards anything when it didn't have a head. The mouths gaped and stretched at him.

"I dropped the magic!" Harry called, and nodded at the portrait that showed a silver road stretching into the distance. "In there!"

The creature needed no instructions from him. It knew that it could enter the portrait. There did come one dangerous moment when Harry thought it might choose to swallow the picture's magic instead of go through.

Harry used that moment to say, in a voice as seductive as possible, "All of these lead to magical worlds. Imagine the feasts that wait for you there."

Many legs drummed. The creature hurtled forward and at the portrait, unwinding its body from the floor as it went, to half-rear. Harry shuddered as he watched the first beads of the body hit the paint and begin to vanish. It was still probably the ugliest thing he'd ever seen, and he wasn't sure whether the stretched faces or the insect-like legs made it uglier.

The creature hurtled through, at last. Harry took his courage in hand and forced himself to step up to the picture, to look and see what it was doing. It could have been waiting on the other side, ready to eat him.

Instead, he saw the green body rapidly making its way into the distance on the starlight road, a part of the portrait now.

Harry took the frame in his hand and gently turned the painting to face the wall. Regulus had told him that if he did that, no one and nothing who had entered the picture could come through again, and Harry trusted Regulus.

I couldn't trap Voldemort in the pictures, because he knew about them, he thought, as he turned away and let himself relax a little. But the creature wasn't a wizard, and could be tricked.

Draco was sitting on the floor, his arms wrapped around himself and his head bowed until his hair completely hid his face. Harry hurried over to him and embraced him. Draco leaned against him, quaking. Harry wasn't sure if it was from cold or pain or fear.

"What can I do to help?" he whispered, stroking Draco's hair. "Tell me."

"I'm so tired," Draco whispered back, which made Harry add weariness to the list of suspects for the shivering. "I just—I felt Voldemort bleeding into me, mingling with me, almost possessing me in turn. He said that he was going to use me against you. And he hurt me—tore part of my mind, I think. And then possessing the creature taught me what hunger means. And I just want to rest, and I don't know who can heal me. Snape, maybe? Madam Pomfrey? I don't know." He pressed himself against Harry like a young dragon blindly seeking shelter.

Harry told himself that now was not the time for guilt. For one thing, it would keep him from doing what had to be done; for another, Draco had chosen to come with him, chosen to fight, and feeling guilty because he'd got wounded in doing so would diminish his sacrifice. "Do you want to stay here while I go back to Hogwarts and fetch them?" he asked. "Or do you feel as if you can be moved?"

"I can be moved. You have to do what you gathered that magic in the stones and the knife for," Draco said stubbornly, and then his eyes widened as he stared over Harry's shoulder. "Where did they go? You didn't really drop them in the painting and give them up to that creature, did you?"

"No, stupid," Harry muttered, gently scooping Draco up with half his own strength and half Mobilicorpus. "I Vanished them. See?" he added, and removed the Extabesco plene so that Draco could see them. "And of course I'll do what I gathered the magic for, but it doesn't have to be here. It would probably be better done in Hogwarts, anyway, because that's closer to my targets. Or I'll ask Connor if I can use Lux Aeterna. Don't worry about it."

"Of course I'll worry about it, Harry," Draco said, with a faint arrogant tone to his words that did more to reassure Harry than any protests about how well he felt. "Until you do that, then you won't want to go to the Sanctuary, and I want to. We are going there as soon as possible. And you're not going to think of anything besides healing and me, are you?"

"Not in that order," Harry said softly.

Draco stared at him for a moment.

"You don't have any idea how magnificent you were, do you?" Harry shook his head in wonder. "Draco, I couldn't have done this without you. There's no way Voldemort would have held still long enough for me to stab him and inflict that wound on him, or wouldn't have sensed what I was doing at once. You fought beside me, and you were wounded in doing so, and you still managed to perform one last feat of heroics." He wished he could have touched Draco's face, but his hand was caught beneath him, supporting his back, so he settled for ducking his head and rubbing his cheek against Draco's. "You're wonderful, Draco."

"Well, I'm glad you realized that, at least," Draco muttered, and closed his eyes.

"How many Apparitions do you think you can take?" Harry asked, forcing his mind to turn to practical matters. "The iron thestral is surer, but slower, and I want to get you healed as soon as possible."

Draco sucked in his breath. Then he said, "I can—I can take four or five Side-Along Apparitions, I think, Harry. Can you jump the distance between here and Hogwarts in that many?"

Harry smiled in relief. "I certainly can." He firmed his grip on Draco with both his arms and his magic, remembering just in time to float the stones and the Midsummer knife back into his robe pockets. "Hang on," he murmured, and pictured Grimmauld Place, and Apparated.

Harry landed, with Draco firmly in his arms, on the road just outside of Hogwarts. He wasn't sure if McGonagall would have restored the wards that made Apparition impossible on school grounds, and he didn't want to risk bouncing from them and injuring Draco if she had.

It looked as if she had, if the buzz in the air was any indication. Harry nodded to no one in particular and tightened his grip on Draco again. He imagined the wards would inform McGonagall the moment he walked in.

"Just a bit further, Draco," he murmured, and then realized that Draco was unconscious. Well, Side-Along Apparition was unpleasant. Harry told himself it was that and nothing else as he headed up the path towards the gates. He would not waste time in useless worrying. He would do something useful instead, like getting Draco to the people who could heal him.

He came in across the Quidditch Pitch, and had to close his eyes for a moment at the sheer destruction. The ground was churned mud and grass, and covered with blood. The slanting sunlight of early afternoon seemed to have lost its power, and the usual sounds that Harry remembered from Hogwarts at this time last year—birds, creatures' calls from the Forbidden Forest, the high singing of the wind—were gone. All this destruction had happened in no more than a few hours, since the battle had started at dawn.

And there were bodies.

Harry performed a small charm to keep his and Draco's faces clean of the stink as he walked among them. The giants were first, great gray lumps too huge to be real, lying sprawled in the mud with clubs and spears close by their sides. Their flesh smelled cooked more often than not, since they'd been the victims of numerous fire spells.

Harry avoided one with a cracked skull that lay in a pool of its own brains.

Then came the people.

Harry couldn't close his eyes, because he had to pick a steady path for himself that wouldn't jounce Draco. So he moved, and he looked into faces, and he recognized the dead when he could.

There, sprawled in the mud with a broken half of a giant's spear through her, was the body of a golden-haired witch whom Harry thought must be a Gloryflower. Laura would mourn. Not far from her were two Death Eaters who seemed to have died trying to kill each other. Harry was uncertain why, until he realized that one of them had actually died from a Severing Curse through her belly, and had her fingers clamped on the neck of the other. He nodded. She must have been dead, and someone had summoned her back—Pansy? She had fallen now that the battle was over and she had no more vengeance to take.

He passed the remains of the sirens' tank, and had to step more carefully than ever, over bits of broken glass and strangled bodies. He forced himself to meet the sirens' dead eyes, for the most part pools of blue and green with no pupil anymore. He wondered if their pupils disappeared when they died.

He passed a sprawled mess of tendrils, Indigena's plants. And in the middle of them was a small torn shape in black robes that, even now, winds that didn't exist elsewhere tossed about. Harry checked his step, longing to hesitate further. He knew, though the body's head was missing, who it must be.

Pansy.

He couldn't linger, though, not with Draco possibly suffering more and more pain in his arms. Take care of the living first, he heard, as if from a distance, one of his mother's lessons that had not ceased to matter. The dead will take care of themselves.

He turned and went on, and saw Hogwarts's wards shimmering fierce and tight around the castle. The fire Acies had caused was out, though it had burned a crater into the ground which still smoked. A breeze blew the scent of cooked flesh towards Harry. He blanked his mind, hiding the remembrance of the burning Death Eaters in the Occlumency pools, and went on towards the castle.

Flung hands and squashed golden horses and broken weapons and bodies lying motionless and unmarked from the onslaught of Avada Kedavra. Staring eyes and torn robes and footprints carved in mud as if in stone and blood flung like a new constellations. Dead and doomed plants and the tattered remains of Hagrid's hut and a dead centaur with all his legs broken and the distant, trailing sound of a dog barking, which Harry didn't understand.

All of it crashed into him, wounded him in ways that Draco's wounding and his own desperate struggle against Voldemort and even the death of the dozen students by the lake had not. By the time he reached the front doors of Hogwarts, Harry knew that he had to turn Draco over to those who could care for him and then go and do what he'd collected the stolen magic for in the first place. He needed something good to come out of this battle, something more than defeat and death for his enemies. He needed to have an upsurge of life and freedom.

"Harry!"

That was Honoria, running towards him from the doors of the castle. Illusions of lions danced on her shoulders, all of them with paws spread in welcome. Harry summoned a faint smile for her, and evaded her attempt to embrace him, afraid it would make him drop Draco.

"Can you call Madam Pomfrey, Honoria?" he asked quietly. "Draco is wounded, both in body and in mind, and he needs help."

Honoria managed to tame all the impulses that would have probably insisted she joke with him about this, and just nodded. "And how is he wounded?" she asked, as she extended her arms above her head, ready to form into wings.

“He took a wound from a dragon-tooth on the side of his face. He possessed Voldemort until I could stab him and wound his magic, and then he possessed a strange creature, an alien—thing.” Harry still had no name for it. He shook his head. “Tell them to talk to Narcissa Malfoy. She was born Black, and she might know more about the creature than she told me, since it was in the Black house.”

Honorio stared at him for a long moment. Harry wondered impatiently why she wasn’t going, and then she said, “Voldemort’s wounded?”

“Yes. Not dead,” Harry added hastily. He could easily imagine how Honorio’s exuberance could cause her to exaggerate the news, and what kind of consternation it would cause when the Dark Lord turned out to be alive. “But wounded, with a hole in his magical core draining out every attempt he makes to use a spell. I imagine he’ll find something to repair it in time, but he should be quiet for at least the duration of the summer. And all his Death Eaters are dead.”

Honorio murmured, “Thank Merlin.” Then she nodded briskly to Harry. “Bring him towards the hospital wing. I’ll get Madam Pomfrey.” A moment later, the gull climbed above him, towards one of the high windows.

Harry murmured, “Extabesco plene,” as he cut a small hole in the wards and moved inside the castle, repairing the hole behind him. He didn’t want anyone else grabbing him and delaying him on the way to the hospital wing. The important thing was getting help for Draco, not—yet—pausing to explain their defeat of Voldemort twenty-two times.

He saw plenty of people in the corridors as he made his way upward, but, of course, none of them sensed him. Most younger students stood in corners murmuring, as if glad that it was over, or else asked older students questions with wide-eyed curiosity. Some of those older students, their limbs in slings and their bodies moving with the tenderness that marked recent experience with healing magic, bragged about their part in the battle; others simply shook their heads and looked away.

Harry saw numerous faces pale and stiff with tears, and knew it was for the casualties. He saw Hawthorn, sitting near the entrance of her guest quarters with her hands over her face, and his heart gave a steady, throbbing ache that struck all through him. He wanted to stop and comfort her, but, once again, he wouldn't get help for Draco that way, and he didn't think any comfort he could give before someone else saw him would ever be enough. He wanted to wait until she could have the time and attention she deserved.

He reached the hospital wing at last, and saw both Snape and Pomfrey waiting beside an empty bed. Harry let the Complete Vanishing Spell go, and saw Snape's gaze lock on him, first, before it moved to Draco.

"He possessed Voldemort," said Harry, before anyone could tell him anything, and laid Draco gently on the bed. "For several minutes, I think. Voldemort possessed him back. It hurt him—mental wounds. And there's the wound on the side of his face that Voldemort's dragon caused." Madam Pomfrey was already running her wand over that injury, muttering under her breath. Harry continued, though now he was growing aware of the stares from other beds and a few people already edging forward to talk to him. "He also possessed a strange creature locked in the Black house, but only for a moment. It looked like a centipede, headless, with the faces of its victims set into its sides, and it ate magic. Contact his mother about that. She might know details that I've forgotten."

"And what about you, young man?" Madam Pomfrey asked, briefly looking up from Draco.

"Not physically wounded," said Harry. "Exhausted, but I'll live." His training once again came in useful as he felt Snape's attempt to reach for him and ducked it. "I have something else to do right now," he added impatiently. "Where's my brother?" Only after he had asked it did he realize that that question could easily have been answered with a "Dead."

"Here, Harry."

Harry turned. Connor was just stepping away from another hospital bed. Harry swallowed as he saw Hermione lying there. He forced himself to bring his eyes back to Connor's face. So many obligations, and he would prioritize and attend to them, but for now, he needed to do this.

"Can you convince the wards at Lux Aeterna to let me in?" he asked.

Connor, his mouth open to, probably, comment on something else entirely, blinked and said, "Of course. Why?"

Harry took one of the stones from his robe pocket, shining with the force of its captured magic, and held it up. "I owe the northern goblins a debt," he said.

Harry appeared easily enough outside Lux Aeterna. He remembered what it looked like; the memories burned all the brighter in his head for the fact that after the one summer he'd spent there, his bond with James had been doomed, and he hadn't known it.

He carefully undid the locking spells on the front door, but relaxed when the wards slid over him, snuffling like dogs, and recognized the feel of someone their master had permitted. They fell before him, and he could step into the grand entrance hall and look up at the ceiling. The windows were flooded with the light of the setting sun. It had taken Harry that much time to convince Snape and Connor and McGonagall and Peter that he couldn't collapse yet, and yes, Draco was wounded but Harry could do nothing to help him right now either, and no, he wasn't going to retreat into a secluded room and cry on someone's shoulder.

Far better than any retreat or seclusion now, which would let him brood on the thought of the deaths he'd caused, was the thought of what light and life and healing he could still bring.

Just to make sure, he did touch the stump of his left wrist and speak to Tybalt first. Tybalt's voice was lazy and self-satisfied, not that the second was unusual. "Yes?"

"You did secure the linchpin?" Tybalt had said that he was on "the brink of success" in his last communication, but refused to say that he was sure his plan was going to work.

"Harry! Yes." Tybalt's voice grew quicker and more eager, and he sounded on the verge of bragging. "Yes, of course I did. I told you I would. My uncle would scold you must severely, you know, for doubting a Starrise."

"Then I ought not to doubt your brother's ability to fight back, either," Harry retorted, but he could feel one tortured knot in him relax. "How did you take the linchpin away?"

"Simple," said Tybalt. "It's actually a good thing that you didn't persuade our families to forsake the notion of common inheritance, Harry, and just tie our assets to one person, the way you persuaded your brother. Then, the linchpin wouldn't have come to me at all unless I killed Pharos. This way, though, I asked the linchpin which it would prefer: a Starrise more in the mode of my uncle, a leader and someone proud who would help restore the fortunes of the family, or a Starrise who was cowardly and a follower and had been so overwhelmed by my uncle that he would never know how to lead on his own."

Harry concealed a chuckle, the first true laughter he'd uttered in more than a day. "And it accepted you?"

"It did." Tybalt's voice soared to a new height of smugness. "My uncle was careful to designate Pharos his legal heir, so that the estate didn't pass to me automatically when he died, but it didn't matter. He forgot that linchpins are concerned more with the fate of the blood family than any one member of it. The wards listened to me, and fastened to me. Because I asked. Augustus never bothered asking if they actually wanted to be bound to Pharos." Tybalt laughed himself. "That's one of the lessons you taught me, Harry. Sometimes all you have to do is ask, and trust in another being's free will, and you'll get what you wanted far more easily than if you tried to compel them. I don't know why there hasn't been a vates before now. You'd think more Lords would have learned compulsion isn't worth it."

Harry shook his head, knowing he was smiling and not trying to stop it. "I don't know if I would frame my principles in quite that way, Tybalt."

"Oh, that's all right," Tybalt said. "You don't have to, because I'll do it for you."

Harry didn't try to resist the uprush of joy in his heart. That was part of the reason he had decided to do this now, after all: so that he would have the strength of some happiness, of some unalloyed triumph, when he had to turn back and face the mixture of triumph and tragedy that Midsummer Day had become. "Thank you, Tybalt," he said. "Doesn't this mean that you're bound to your family, now, and that you'll have to produce an heir?"

"It does," said Tybalt, sounding entirely comfortable. "But it was never my family name that I objected to, Harry. It was my uncle's stiffness and his trying to live in the past and mourn my mother's memory to the exclusion of everything else. And as for heirs, my other uncle, my mother's brother, has plenty of daughters, and one of them, Portia, is already showing signs of being independent and strong enough to lead. John and I have agreed to adopt her."

Harry smiled again. Sometimes, the Light families' insistence on not having magical heirs does make it easier for them to continue their lines. "I wish congratulations and good luck to you both."

"Thank you," said Tybalt. "You're going to proceed now?"

"I am," said Harry quietly.

"Good luck."

"Thank you."

Harry ended the communication spell and turned to his stones and the Midsummer knife. When he called, they began to revolve around him, the Midsummer knife purring and shining as her blade caught the light.

Harry reached out and began to pull the magic he'd gathered back into him. As it came at him, he separated it into two streams. One was the magic purified by his phoenix fire—the magic that had originally come from Dumbledore, and from Voldemort when he'd drained him in the Chamber of Secrets—and the magic purified by the Light when Harry had called on it. The other was the still-tainted magic he'd drawn from the Death Eaters on the battlefield that morning and had had no time to cleanse.

That was all right. For the purpose he had in mind, this tainted magic was perfect.

Harry reached north. He could feel the northern goblins' web, though he could not see it without the special tools that Helcas had shown him—almost two years ago now. The thought saddened him, until he shook his head and forced himself to ignore how much had changed since then.

In front of him was something else, something that had not changed in much too long.

The streams of magic broke through him, charging floods, one clean and one befouled. Harry could feel himself shuddering with many things: weariness, the sheer power of the magic, the temptation to claim it and use it for himself. But all of them faltered before his determination to give the northern goblins the freedom they deserved.

Once, it would have meant sacrificing his own magic to do this. Now, it would mean sacrificing only magic he had acquired for just this purpose.

Since he had to feel out the edges of the web and the linchpins' wards, he paid more attention to his sensation of touch and less to his sight. That meant that when odd images of streams appeared before him, golden and deep green, pouring away from him and to the north, he could ignore them. Visible musical notes thrummed in front of his eyes; he ignored them, too. Sometimes he saw dangling family crests as he identified which linchpin belonged to which wizarding family. That didn't matter. He pushed forward, and at last the linchpins trembled in his hand like a drop of water ready to fall from a leaf, swollen with power, and the magic played all around him, restless rain waiting to be used.

Harry breathed.

The magic rushed out of him, and twisted, and then separated finally and for good into those two streams. The pure, cleansed one twined around the linchpins. The wards that linked them to the web and the bindings on the goblins turned around in interest. Their owners had already given them permission to look at this magic, and Harry could feel their interest and curiosity growing; it was beautiful magic, vaulting, sunlit, a waterfall or a stream of purity. The wards detached slowly from the earth, and reached out to wrap around the beautiful golden magic.

Harry forced himself to envision how many separate cores of power he would need, several dozen for the several dozen linchpins. Then he broke the golden stream forcefully into many quiet pools, each with a linchpin's wards wrapped around it, rooting in it. They were no longer bound to the web, but to those pools, which, not used for anything else, relaxed and allowed themselves to be used as anchors. The Light nature of the magic blended well with the Light nature of the families' ancient wards, anyway.

At the same time, Harry grasped the goblins' web, which had started to shift and slide and send the land once secured by the linchpins hurtling towards the sea, and slammed the dark green stream of tainted magic into it. These pools, when he broke them off, took the form of false linchpins. The tainted magic did not mind doing that, because subterfuge and deception were often tools of the Dark. In moments, the web was secure, wrapped around and tangled on its new burdens, and never noticing that they were not linchpins.

It was, in fact, so concerned with them that Harry found it easy to reach out and pick up all the trailing strands of the web that were previously connected to the northern goblins, and wind them around the pools of Dark magic instead, letting these strands understand that the pools were Dark. The web had been set by ancient Light wizards to confine creatures they were afraid of and wanted service from. It knew all about confining the Dark, and the descendants of its original owners had given permission to this wizard to change things around, so everything must be well. It hummed to itself as it clutched the new, Dark “linchpins” a bit tighter.

Harry’s mind felt strained, the same way it had when he performed the ritual to free the southern goblins. He was seeing several dozen different separate things in his thoughts, holding them all and not combining them, and he made his body an endless conduit for the magic, and he wove and wound and pulled, and by now he had come so far that he had no idea whether he was using his eyes or his sense of touch.

He felt the moment, though, when he freed the goblins. Helcas briefly reached down the flickering strands of the web as they whipped and unwound from his people, and Harry felt a touch like a handclasp.

Thank you, vates.

Harry smiled before the connection broke, and hoped that Helcas had heard his own pleasure and gratitude.

And then he fell, tossed as from a great height by the ending of the magic, and lay on the floor breathing for a moment.

He started when arms came around him. He could have climbed back to his feet when he’d taken a few minutes to rest. He craned his neck, and met his brother’s eyes.

“You didn’t think I’d let you come alone, did you?” Connor asked in disgust when he saw Harry staring at him. “I Apparated in with Peter a few minutes after you left.”

Harry sighed. “Thank you for not stopping me.” Gently, he forced himself to stand and step away. “I did tell you I’m not physically wounded, and the strain of pushing all that magic through me will pass in a moment.” He called the empty stones and the Midsummer knife to him, and slid them into his pockets.

"It was never even a temptation to you, was it?" Connor asked. Harry couldn't read the emotions in his voice. "To hold on to all that magic, to keep it for yourself?"

Harry blinked. "Yes, it was," he said. "Of course it was. But I don't need to listen to the temptation."

Connor studied him for a moment, then nodded slowly. "All right. I can understand that." He slung his arm over Harry's shoulders again. "And now you're going to come back to the school and rest, right?"

That, Harry thought, as he pictured Draco's still face and Hawthorn's broken one and Pansy's ripped body, is what you think.

Intermission: Counting Up the Dead

Hawthorn didn't know how long she had sat with her head in her hands. She didn't even know how she made it to the guest quarters the Headmistress had assigned her, to tell the truth. She remembered the haze of battle, and casting blood curses that give the Death Eaters she cast them on some pain, but not enough, never enough, before the dead her daughter had summoned, or the course of battle, or a Killing Curse, swept them away from her.

She had come away from the battle when the sirens' compulsion started. She thought that, at least. She could not remember being under the compulsion. Far stronger was the urge to kill and kill and kill and keep on killing until the hunger for blood that burned in the pit of her belly was satisfied. And then she had walked away when there were no more Death Eaters to kill.

But right beside that compulsion burned another one. It was a truth that she had acknowledged when Dragonsbane became a full-fledged necromancer, and a truth that had occurred to her as she knelt over the body of her first vengeance kill, and a truth that had slammed home into her as she listened to Harry speak about vengeance a few days after the spring equinox, his eyes bright with disgust.

Death cannot bring back the dead.

She might kill. It would not end. She could not even lose herself in the quest for revenge as Augustus Starrise had done, because she knew the world was waiting, and would not cease to change, or give her her daughter back, just because she slaughtered others. Indeed, go too far in the slaughter, and the world would put her into Tullianum and forget about her.

She hated that she knew that world existed, and that she was alone in it now.

A hand fell on her shoulder, and Hawthorn turned her head to nuzzle it even before she fully recognized the scent. Delilah Gloryflower leaned her chin down on top of Hawthorn's hair in response, and from the other side, Claudia Griffinsnest rubbed her scarred face against her neck.

Remus had been teaching them how to build a pack bond before he chose to leave, Hawthorn thought. She had thought, apparently mistakenly, that it would only endure when in the presence of someone who had been a werewolf from childhood. But her sorrow had drawn her two packmates. She had not been aware they had come to Hogwarts, but here they were, and they were making noises, shared whimpers and growls and protests against the unfairness of the world and of life, low in their throats.

Hawthorn felt a thick bubble building in the back of her own throat. She lifted her hand to wipe at her mouth, thinking she would cough out another bundle of tears. Instead, she found herself howling, a soft call of misery.

Delilah tipped her head back and joined in. Claudia said nothing—Claudia was often silent—but curled herself almost around Hawthorn and watched her with large solemn eyes. A student, apparently drawn by the howling, peered around the corner, but Claudia showed her teeth, without even a snarl, and the girl squeaked and pounded back down the corridor.

Eventually, Delilah and Claudia persuaded Hawthorn to move off the step in front of her quarters and into her room. Hawthorn expected them to leave, but they didn't. Instead, away from the eyes of outsiders, they became more demonstrative; Delilah licked her cheek, and Claudia bit her chin. Hawthorn found herself touching and stroking back, as much with her neck, her cheeks, and her spine as her hands.

"You need to rest," Claudia said, when the silent soothing had gone on for a good many minutes and some of Hawthorn's grief had blended into tear-colored haze, like the shades of gray that she saw as a wolf.

Hawthorn didn't object, because it was as impossible to object to that as to the fact of hunger when it presented itself. She lay down on her bed, and Delilah lay down beside her, arm and hair flung haphazardly over her. Claudia went to watch by the door, but Hawthorn could feel her warmth and smell her scent from there.

She closed her eyes and went away for a little while. The world would still be there when she woke. It would not give her Pansy back. So she could make it wait.

Wait, she said.

George sat with his fingers wound in his twin's. Fred's breathing was shallow. Madam Pomfrey had used healing spells George didn't know on him, and ones he did, and Skele-Gro to replace the shattered bones that had to be taken entirely out of his left leg, and bits of bandage when she couldn't heal all the wounds magically and there were other patients waiting to be taken care of. Her face had been in an agony when she told George that she had done as much as she could for Fred and that all they could do was wait. Making it through this first night would be the deciding point for him. Shock was a complicating factor, and so was how much magic she'd poured into him. Sometimes, when wounded in a way that would have killed it without magic, a wizard's body simply fought back, rejecting the attempts to heal it and continuing on its course of death.

She hoped he would wake up by the morning. She hoped he would.

Only the look of anguish on the matron's face as she turned away had kept George from hexing her for using the word hope.

Now he sat by Fred's side, and watched.

Their parents had already been in earlier, and Ron, and Ginny. Percy was going to come from the Ministry tomorrow morning, Mum had said, distractedly, confusedly. They wouldn't let him leave tonight, important business for Minister Scrimgeour. Bill and Charlie were traveling in from Egypt and Romania; they'd been in Britain last week, but left when it seemed there was no way to break the siege before Midsummer. Mum had stroked and petted Fred's hair and cheek constantly when she was here.

George hadn't told her that Fred's last words had been defending her from his insult, because then he would have had to explain the context of the joke, and because he didn't want to think of them as Fred's last words.

He leaned his head nearer to his twin's chest. No one else was awake in the hospital wing—even the others watching over injured friends or relatives were asleep—but plenty of people were breathing. George sometimes wished they wouldn't. It covered up the sound of Fred's shallow, wheezy breaths, and he had found that merely watching the motion of Fred's chest wasn't enough to content him any more. He had to hear.

Someone had asked him if he felt alone. George couldn't even remember who it had been, whom he had given a withering glare until the person fled with tears running down her cheeks. Ginny? Hermione Granger? No, Hermione was in another bed somewhere behind them, with Zacharias Smith asleep clasping her hand.

Alone made about as good a description of his condition right now as bloodbath did of the battle. It gave the most general outlines to the idea possible, but it didn't tell you anything.

He felt chained to the bed, unable to move away. He felt chained in his mind, too. Before, it had always bubbled with thoughts of the future. Anything moving or not moving, spoken or living or dead, might prompt a new joke idea. And since Harry had given them the Galleons, they didn't need to entertain ridiculous ideas for robbing Gringotts or laboring for years in positions they hated just to get the necessary money for their joke shop. They could go out and start showing Zonko's who the real geniuses in the joke field were right away. They were going to leave school and go out into the real world, where NEWT's didn't matter, where their mother's worries didn't matter, where the Ministry was only something to be ignored when possible and evaded when impossible. They were just beginning.

Everything was just beginning.

And now it might be ending, and George was trying to contemplate a he instead of a they, a future that did not have Fred in it, and getting nowhere. He had to stare. He had to think about the moments passing right now, and listen to Fred's rasping breath. He closed his eyes.

"I won't tell anyone."

George sighed. Someone had awakened and was having a whispered conversation with someone else. Zacharias and Hermione, probably. Smith seemed to be a light sleeper, and he'd regularly whispered things to Hermione as the night went on, stroking her forehead. She hadn't opened her eyes yet, either. George wished he could care more.

"I won't tell anyone," the voice repeated, "that you blubbered so much that I had to come back just to shut you up."

George sighed again and leaned back in his chair, waiting for the conversation to end.

An elbow jabbed him hard in the chest. He opened his eyes, and Fred said, "Are you paying attention? I'm talking to you, you great lump. Merlin, he disturbs a man's peace and then he doesn't even have the courtesy to pay attention to him when he talks—"

That was the last sentence he got to finish on his own for a while, because George had hugged him hard enough to cause his ribs to creak, and then they had to call Madam Pomfrey, who came, gave them both an incredibly hearty scolding with the words "internal injuries" in it, and then fed them a sleeping potion. Well, she gave Fred a sleeping potion, but it didn't matter who drank it, George thought, his hand firmly clasped in his brother's, because they were a them again.

Luna solemnly piled the candles, one on top of each other, their waxy ends sticking together without magic. It was very important that they meld without magic. She'd asked the house elves for them, and they'd given them to her without questions. That was only right.

When the candles were piled, seventeen of them, a perilous, swaying stack against the outline of the window in Ravenclaw Tower, Luna stepped back and cast a spell to rid the area of Wrackspurts. There didn't seem to be any. Satisfied, she drew out several Knuts that had seen travel and travail in their day, and laid them in a circle around the candles. Then she cast Incendio on the top candle. It beamed and burned brightly, and asked her what she had lit it for.

"This is for Cho," Luna told it. "She was seventeen, you know. She just turned seventeen a few days ago. And now she's gone, and she can't light her own candles or collect her own Knuts. Well, obviously. If she's gone."

She paused reflectively for a long moment. It would have been better if she'd had something of Cho's to burn, the way she'd had something of her mother's when she died, but of course Cho's family wouldn't want her to burn her possessions, and no one had wanted to hear of Luna going out on the battlefield to get some of Cho's hair. Something about it being too dangerous. Luna had tried to tell them that it wasn't dangerous on the field, because there were Crumple-Horned Snorkacks coming to chase the spirits of the dead away, but no one had wanted to listen.

"Most people don't want to listen," she told the candle. The flame swayed and agreed. No one listened to candles, either, when they asked why they were burning. Well, no one but Luna, but then, no one listened to her, either. She thought it had made her hearing better.

"Cho was seventeen," Luna went on. "She was a Seeker. She was pretty. She had a crush on Cedric Diggory, and one of the doorways in Hogsmeade told me they kissed there one day. It was in the spring. It was a day when the sky was more white than blue, but that doesn't matter. It was still spring."

She stopped again, thinking of what else to say. She hadn't been Cho's close friend, so she didn't know all that much that the stones and walls of Ravenclaw Tower, softly chattering witnesses to this ceremony, wouldn't already know. The bit of information about Cho and Cedric kissing in Hogsmeade was the only new piece Luna could contribute.

Oh, wait. Of course. Cho's death had been on the battlefield, beyond reach of the walls' sight. So they would want to know why she was gone.

"She rode to battle because she wanted to help," said Luna. "She rode a golden horse. She owed Harry a life debt, but I don't really think that's why she went. She wanted to help." Luna let a moment more pass, and then added, "She died well."

She waved her wand again, and all the candles lit at once. And then the Knuts glowed, too, with replicas of the spells that the wizards who had last owned them had once cast. Luna smiled. She thought Cho would like the light, if she could see it.

"I hope she has fun," said Luna, and then set about blowing the candles out. It had to be done properly. And then she had other people to say goodbye for. She would do it because no one else would explain to the walls and the doors and the stones of Hogwarts where their children had gone.

Hermione did not want to wake up, even though people were asking her to, because it all hurt. She gave an irritated little wriggle and squirm, and someone called, "She's awake!"

No, I'm not, Hermione thought, and tried to hide in a corner of the bed, which must be a hospital bed, because Rosier had wounded her. I'm pretending. It's your imaginations. Go away.

But someone felt her forehead, and someone else pried her eyes open, and someone bellowed into her face, "Hermione, are you awake?"

She had to stare. There was no option, no matter how much she wanted to rest and escape the pain, because it was Zacharias, but he'd changed. He looked older, and wearier, and there was a tiny imprint high on one cheek, like a tattoo or a scar. It was a crouched badger, done in black and yellow.

She tried to reach up and touch it, and Zacharias caught her hand and kissed her knuckles. His eyes shone so bright with relief that Hermione was distracted from the image of the badger.

"You're back," he whispered. "You really are back."

"I haven't decided that yet," Hermione retorted haughtily, sitting up and wincing as tenderness flared all along her chest and her ribs and her belly and her breasts. She'd been slit open from collarbone to navel. She remembered it like a recurring nightmare. She shuddered, even as she managed a smile for Ginny and Connor, who were hovering next to her bed. "Maybe it's your imagination. Now, where did you get that?" She nodded at the badger symbol.

"I summoned Helga Hufflepuff." Zacharias's gaze ran over her, as though he thought she had somehow changed in the time between her falling to Rosier's curse and her opening her eyes. "She possessed my body and rode into battle."

Hermione spluttered. "That's dangerous!" she managed to say at last. Zacharias had told her about that particular ability of a Founder's Heir one day when they were having an argument and he was trying to impress her. It had impressed her mostly as a dangerous and ridiculous thing to do.

"And going into battle wasn't?" Zacharias held her hand again, this time hard enough to hurt, and spoke as if they were the only two people in the hospital wing.

"She could have drowned you," said Hermione, deciding to pretend that no one else was watching, too, "and then you would never have come back."

"I didn't care," said Zacharias, "not when I heard about you."

And that just wasn't fair. Hermione slapped him on the side of the head, and then nodded to the badger scar. "And that?"

“She left it for me as a sign of what she’d done.” Zacharias shrugged. “Maybe it will impress someone. I think my memories are all intact. All the important ones, at least.” He looked her straight in the eyes, showing what memories he regarded as important.

Hermione was almost grateful for the way Madam Pomfrey swooped down on them then, scattering Ginny and Connor and herding even Zacharias away while snapping about how she needed to run some diagnostic tests on Hermione. It made it easier to lie back and think about what the look in Zacharias’s eyes meant, and especially the way he’d held her hand.

He’d said he loved her. For some reason, Hermione’s usually analytical brain had accepted the words and taken them literally. She hadn’t thought he’d meant he was in love with her.

She wondered if he was actually thinking about marriage. Purebloods were bound to think that way, she knew, even Light ones. Knowing Zacharias, he might be planning how best to piss off people he didn’t like by emphasizing both her Muggle heritage and her knowledge of rituals and traditions.

We’ll see about that, Hermione thought in determination as she swallowed the sleeping potion Madam Pomfrey wanted to give her. I want to choose at least some of the people we’re going to piss off. And the wedding date, for that matter, if it actually does go that far. None of this pureblood nonsense about marrying almost the moment you’re out of school, having children early, raising them, and then going on to live your life. What if I want to do something different? I’m not going to let him talk me out of it.

Owen let Michael hug Medusa. He was good at that. He was closer to their mother. Owen was—had been—closer to their father. He had been Charles’s magical heir, after all.

And now he was the head of his family.

Owen looked at the far side of the kitchen while he thought about that, and listened to Medusa’s soft, wordless sobs. What was best for the Rosier-Henlin family? Should he asked to be released from his oath to Harry, so that he could fight for their fortunes and their political futures, while Michael stayed to guard Harry?

But it didn't take long for Owen to conclude that he shouldn't. For one thing, Michael needed him more than their mother, or at least he would by the time they went back to school for their seventh year—at Hogwarts, Owen was sure. The fact that Medusa mourned freely now while his brother was in shock indicated that. They would have two months to spend with her. That was enough of a recovery period. Owen could look into his father's documents and set wheels spinning to draw Rosier-Henlin towards the top again in that time.

And then he would go back, because Rosier-Henlins kept their promises. And, more than that. Owen knew that he wasn't just Harry's ally, or someone who had decided to join the vates for political gain. He owed Harry his life and his sanity, and his brother's life and sanity, and he had sworn himself his companion.

Owen didn't think Harry really knew what that meant, yet. He had read histories of the ancient Lords and Ladies, but understood just enough to reject them, Owen thought. They used compulsion. They often started off with high intentions and then fell into bad ones. They manipulated other people shamelessly, using the attraction of their power and the many loopholes for strong magic built into traditional Ministry politics. They usually ended up treating even their sworn companions horribly. Owen could understand why Harry wanted to avoid that, and so would not Declare himself a Lord.

But there were exceptions. Calypso McGonagall, Light Lady though she had been, and her Sunburst Guard. Lord Windthorn Yaxley, the Dark Lord who had left none of his Sworn Brothers to die alone, and so lost none of them. The Dark Lady Genevieve, who had supposedly first brought Dementors into the world, and retained the love and loyalty of her companions through and despite that.

Their companions were protectors and protected, befriended and friends, loyal and loyally held to, when both companions and Lord were true. And Owen knew, because his father had told him, that there was no greater loyalty than that chosen with eyes open and heart laid down because it was the rational thing to do. Harry would move through the world alone if he could, never asking for things many would willingly give him. So he needed people who would both ask for him and teach him how to ask.

I will remain at his side, Owen thought, catching Michael's eye over Medusa's bowed head. We both will. Father would have wanted that.

And, for the first time since Owen had learned that Charles Rosier-Henlin was among those who had perished on the battlefield, he felt a kind of peace.

She had no choice, but that didn't mean she had to like it.

Indigena had Apparated home to Thornhall. She had screamed in agony there for many minutes, and then one of her house elves had managed to bring her some of the healing potions she kept in her laboratory. None of them had helped. Nor had any attempt to end the curses by sheer force of will, or to lessen the pain.

So Indigena had come to her largest greenhouse, and the cocoon of tendrils she'd prepared long ago, when she first thought that she might someday die with most of her breeding experiments unfinished.

She did not object to dying of old age. And she had even thought, when her Lord called in his debt of honor, that she might not object to dying in battle. The cocoon certainly hadn't been at the forefront of her thoughts.

But now she had found out she did object to it, so she crept, shaking, to her greenhouse, and she had wrapped the vines around her. She felt their roots slide through her skin, linking up with the leaves and flowers that already lay there. She felt a shiver of sap and strength run through her, and the pain of the Bloodless Curse began to ease. The others were continuing yet.

Indigena's eyelids drooped. To work their deepest healing on her, the vines had to put her to sleep. And she might sleep for months before she woke. The vines would do whatever was needed to save her life. When she did, she would be less human than ever.

Needs must, she thought sleepily, as the tendrils drew her down into the dirt and the first great wave of slumber rolled over her.

It was not as though she could not afford to sleep for a while. Her Lord would be in hiding after this serious defeat, and not require her help. The plan he'd assigned her special attention to was already in waiting; Indigena had done the required research and made the necessary arrangements through the Daily Prophet and a reporter who'd seemed delighted to get the information. She'd contacted the paper under a false name, of course, but everything had its price.

She closed her eyes and dropped into the dark sleep of winter, unaware of anything but the healing pulses of sap and the motion of the turning earth, and the very slowly growing need to rest and wake and rise.

Harry waited steadily by Draco's bed. He imagined that he should probably sleep at some point.

And he would. When he felt tired.

One night had passed. This was the morning after the battle. Harry knew that many people were eyeing him sideways, from Ginny—able to think of something now besides her possibly dying brother and possibly dying friend, because they were both awake—to some Slytherins who undoubtedly wondered what he intended to do about Blaise. But no one had actually dared approach him yet. Harry didn't know if it was respect or fear, probably springing from the rumors about what he'd done to the children at the lakeside, that kept them away. Either way, he blessed it, and he waited for Draco to wake up and look at him and listen.

He wasn't bored. He didn't feel hungry, either, and his eyes barely ever blinked. He realized, distantly, that he'd fallen into the kind of patient, motionless waiting Lily had taught him through long winter evenings at Godric's Hollow. Waiting was as much a part of battle as the fighting, she'd said; in fact, it was usually the part that more people failed at, moving too soon and letting an enemy spot them, or moving an entire army too soon and being taken in a prepared ambush by someone quicker and cleverer. Harry had learned to let the whole world run away from him and sit like a stone when necessary. The loudest thing in his ears was his breathing.

He almost regretted that his experience of war so far hadn't involved more scenarios like this. He'd had to scramble, to respond to attacks and ambushes, to rescue people in danger, to suddenly change his plans. There hadn't been many chances to bask in the stillness, to let his mind sink into the silence like a stone itself falling into a dark pool. He stared, and stared, and breathed, and breathed, and the only thing that could call him back was Draco's eyelids fluttering open, which eventually happened.

Harry reached out and stroked his hand, feeling almost unnaturally calm. Draco turned and stared at him, then murmured, "Harry? I—my head still hurts." He swallowed. "Are my parents here? Could I have some water?"

"Of course," Harry murmured, and reached over to fetch the goblet of water Madam Pomfrey had left on the bedside table for him. "Your parents aren't here, Draco. They came and watched over you for a while." Narcissa had tried to speak to him, Harry remembered dimly, but Lucius had touched her arm and shook his head when he saw the state Harry was in, and she'd refrained. "They're at home recovering right now. Your mother took a pain curse in the back that took some effort to heal. She's fine," he added as he saw the rising panic in Draco's face. "But your father was tired. They'll come back in—" he cast a quick Tempus charm as he helped Draco sit up to drink the water "—a few hours."

"Thank you," said Draco. He took a deep breath. Harry realized he was preparing himself for far worse news. "And what's wrong with me?"

Harry smiled gently at him. "Voldemort did tear some wounds in your mind, and mix some of his taint into you. Do you remember Snape closing the worst of the wounds?"

Draco shuddered, and his face turned so white Harry was momentarily worried that he might faint. "Some of it," he whispered.

Harry nodded, and gave him some more water. "He can't heal everything right away, which is why your head still hurts," he said. "We'll work on it in tandem, since we're both Legilimens, later. Snape's confident he can heal all the gaping wounds with my help, and then he'll give you potions that will help repair the rest. He doesn't think you lost memories, but you had some of your other pathways ripped up badly. So you might have physical symptoms for a while. Blurred vision, trouble walking, that kind of thing. Snape said it will all heal."

Draco relaxed a bit. "And the taint?" His voice had more fear in it this time.

"The Seers can help you with that," said Harry. "I spoke with Vera. She reassures me that there are people in the Sanctuary skilled at this. Even though it entered through your mind, it's really more of a soul-wound, like seeing too many of the horrors of war. So it's a good thing we're going to the Sanctuary."

Draco nodded. "When can we leave?" he demanded, sounding a bit more like his old self. "I don't want bits of Voldemort floating around in my soul for long." He made a face. "Did he ask before he infected me with his taint? No, he did not."

Harry felt a spontaneous smile break out on his face. He stooped and kissed Draco's forehead. "You'll leave in a few days, probably," he replied. "Maybe a week. When Snape and I have had time to heal your mental wounds, and he's started you on a regular course of the potions."

"Don't think I missed that, Harry." Draco curled insistent fingers into his jumper. "When you leave, you said. What about you?"

"I don't know." Harry met Draco's eyes, and held them, and let him see his frank uncertainty. "There are situations I need to lay to rest, first. Voldemort announced that I killed those children to the rest of the school. I'll need to talk with their parents. I have to make sure the werewolf situation doesn't explode while I'm gone. I'd like to find out where Acies went, or the dragon who was Acies, and what kind of trouble she's likely to cause. If we can track Indigena Yaxley, who Apparated away alive from the battle, I'd appreciate that, too."

Draco shook his head. "Tell them to sod off," he said. "You need to rest, Harry."

"One reason I defeated Voldemort the way I did was so that we could have a summer resoundingly free of him," said Harry firmly, and helped Draco lean back on the pillows. "I don't want to be called away from the Sanctuary a few days after I get there because of one of these problems. Just let me get them settled, Draco, and I'll follow you."

Draco sighed. "And what happens if they take longer to be settled than a few weeks?"

Harry shrugged noncommittally. "Then they do."

Draco tried to scowl at him, but he was already yawning. "Did anyone we know die?" he muttered sleepily.

Harry sighed. He couldn't keep silent on this, even though he knew it would shock Draco. He didn't want to lie to him, even by simple omission on account of his weariness. "Several people," he said. "Charles Rosier-Henlin." Draco did stare at him in shock, then. "Cho Chang. Catrina Flint-Digsby." He hesitated a moment, and then finished, "Pansy. I'm so sorry, Draco."

"That bitch."

Harry blinked. "What?"

"She knew," Draco spat. "She had to have known that her death was coming, she's a fucking necromancer, and she didn't tell us!" He made a sharp slashing gesture with one hand. "Fuck that, and fuck her!"

"They're not allowed to tell anyone about their visions of death, you know that," said Harry. People were staring, and he didn't want Draco to sound as if he were blaming Pansy for her own death, in case Hawthorn came in.

And then he realized Draco was crying, sharp sobs he was at pains to hide, and he was able to curve an arm around his shoulders and draw him against him, murmuring nonsensical, comforting words. Harry remembered he had known Pansy since they were both children together. Draco's grief would not be as keen as Hawthorn's, but it would still cut.

He murmured and almost sang until Draco went limp and soft in his arms, and Harry realized he had cried himself to sleep. Gently, he arranged his pillows, laid Draco on them, and spent a moment watching his face.

Then he went to find Snape. He was needed on battlefield cleanup—identifying the bodies, where that was possible, and arranging for disposal of the Death Eater bodies, compiling of lists of the dead, and informing the families.

No one approached him as he moved through the corridors of Hogwarts. Harry could see slitted eyes watching him, though, eyes bright with grief and rage and hatred.

It wouldn't be long.
Well. It was done.

Sirius stood in his dog form on the battlefield and looked around, slowly. It was getting to be dawn again. The second day he'd been back in the living world, and already he knew it wasn't the place for him, anymore. Everything was too hard, too substantial, and even the mud wounded his paws. And he'd been right about Connor. He'd moved on, accepted Sirius's death and gone on to live his life. There was nothing Sirius could do for Lily or James or Remus, now, and no way to make things up to Peter even if he'd been able to speak to him.

But Harry...

Sirius was waiting for one more glimpse of his godson. He faced the school and sat down, patiently, on his haunches, snapping at the ghost of a flea that thought it could hitch a ride on the dead Grim.

Harry came out of Hogwarts then, trotting over to join Snape, Trelawney, and Vector as they identified bodies. He did have a brief argument with Snape before he did, Sirius saw, an argument he almost lost. Good. Snape would probably force Harry to get some rest soon. It soothed Sirius to know that his godson was being taken care of by at least one person, even if that person had to be Snivellus.

We certainly didn't do right by him, eh, James?

But Sirius had been dead for more than two years now, and really, the sting of that wound had modulated. What was important was that Harry was living now, and going on in the world he still belonged to, and to which Sirius didn't, any more.

He satisfied himself by trotting close to Harry and watching his eyes. They were too shuttered, too grim, too old, he thought. Harry was making himself into someone who would heal and comfort and soothe other people, and face his crimes—as he saw them—but Sirius wondered if he would take time for himself.

He better, Sirius thought. Or Peter and Malfoy and Snape will yell at him until he does.

He couldn't. His part was done, now, and he was going away.

He licked Harry's hand with a ghostly tongue. He was pleased beyond words to see Harry start and glance down at his hand. He barked, and Harry lifted his head, eyes disbelieving, mouth forming the word Sirius?

Sirius barked one more time, and then the world around him faded and the darkness was back. He looked up, and there above him were the holes into somewhere else, like stars the color of rotting muscle.

The voices called from them. From one came a faint smell of starlight.

Sirius rose, and went home.

Chapter Ninety-Five: The Greatest Of These Is Love

Minerva found Harry talking to Hawthorn Parkinson in her guest quarters, with the door open as though to welcome anyone who might pass by. Minerva stood in silence a moment, watching them. Godric hovered close at her shoulder, but as a shadow, so that no one else could see him.

Harry was currently listening to a low-voiced stream of despair Hawthorn was pouring out, his hand clasping one of hers so hard that Minerva wondered she didn't wince. But it seemed bodily sensation was almost beyond her; what mattered were the words, and the ear willing to hear them. Whenever Hawthorn did stop to ask an anguished question, Harry responded instantly, though Minerva couldn't hear the answers, either. His hand stroked hers, and he never looked away from her face. Now and then he blinked, but he wasn't forcing back tears of his own. Minerva wondered that he could be so dry-eyed.

She hated to disturb him, but it had been three days since the battle, and that meant news had had time to spread—especially since some of the friends and older siblings of the children who'd died by the lake had combined knowledge of what Voldemort had said with knowledge of where their friends or siblings had died, and written their parents. Two of those parents were waiting in Minerva's office right now. She'd argued by Floo with them, until one of them threatened to confront Harry out of her sight and the other threatened to take this straight to the Ministry. Reluctantly, Minerva had allowed them to come through.

"Come in, Headmistress," Harry said, when a pause came in Hawthorn's narration.

Minerva started, then scolded herself. She'd been foolish to think that Harry was unaware of anything happening around him in the wake of a battle like that. She stepped into the room, nodding to Mrs. Parkinson. Hawthorn leaned back against the pillows of her bed, closing her eyes. The strain in her face had eased, Minerva thought.

"Harry, I hate to disturb you," she began.

“But there’s someone who needs to talk to me?” Harry nodded and climbed off the bed. “I thought there would be.” He turned to Hawthorn while Minerva was still trying to understand what that statement meant. “Don’t worry, ma’am,” he murmured. “I think it could go wrong, but you did what you did in the heat of the moment. If Indigena Yaxley is still alive—and most people seem to think that’s what Thornhall being shut up in wards means—then we’ll bring her down eventually. I won’t say that her life is reserved for you to take, of course.”

She was talking to him about her daughter, then, and the revenge she took on her daughter’s killer, Minerva thought, and felt a surge of both helplessness and anger. Why are we leaning on him, depending on him to absolve us? It’s ridiculous. We should be able to take comfort from someone else and let him rest.

Hawthorn gave a quiet laugh. “I would never ask that, Harry.”

“Good.” Harry smiled at her, and then turned to face Minerva. She was startled anew to realize that he was taller than he had been at the start of the year, his head almost reaching her collarbone. “Shall we, Headmistress?” He arched an eyebrow at her, and she nodded and led him down the hall towards the gargoyle.

She kept glancing at him as they walked, trying to gauge something of his mood. She couldn’t. The expression on Harry’s face was serene, bone-deep determination, and nothing more than that.

Minerva had been aware of him and his activities over the past few days, of course. It was hard not to be. Harry seemed to be everywhere: in the hospital wing, helping to heal young Mr. Malfoy of the gaping wounds in his mind; with his grieving allies, talking them out of their grief; listening in silence to those who needed to scream out their pain, whether or not that pain was directed towards him; helping to identify bodies and send them home to their families; helping Severus brew more potions, both the ones Mr. Malfoy would need and the ones he wouldn’t; incinerating the giants’ bodies; speaking with the creatures in the Forbidden Forest, to make sure there were no Death Eaters hiding in the trees.

Minerva had passed him a few times in the hallways, and asked if he was well. Harry had smiled at her each time and nodded, except for the last, when he'd said, "Yes, Headmistress. Believe me, I'm doing what I want to be doing. It's what I wish I could have done during the siege, but I was consumed with grief then. Now I can look outside myself, and I see how many other people need help."

The statement continued to make Minerva uneasy, but she wasn't sure what she could do about it. Most people in the castle did seem to look to Harry, even if only as a pair of welcoming, listening ears. And if Harry had adopted the role of his own free will and wasn't depriving himself of food and sleep to do so—and she had seen no signs that he was—then did she have the right to object?

Harry was singing softly under his breath, Minerva realized, when she came back to herself. "Who are the parents, Headmistress?" he asked, breaking off his song the moment he realized she was looking at him.

"Aurora Whitestag," said Minerva. "Her son Abelard was one of the children who died by the lake, a first-year Hufflepuff. And her daughter Heloise slid into a coma in the hospital wing and never woke."

Harry nodded. "And the other?"

"Philip Willoughby." Minerva hesitated a moment. "He's a Muggle. His daughter Alexandra was a first-year Ravenclaw. She died by the lake, too."

Harry blinked. "I'm glad our owl reached him. I wasn't sure how much the Muggleborn students' families knew about what was happening here."

Minerva pressed her lips together as she thought of the angry, grieving man she'd left in her office. "Mr. Willoughby was very involved in his daughter's life," she said slowly. "He was proud that Alexandra was a witch. He had a fireplace installed in his home so he could use the Floo connection, he regularly receives the Daily Prophet, and I believe that he was learning the history of the wizarding world with her.”

“And?” Harry prompted.

Minerva gave him a look meant to chill him out of asking anything further. Harry just returned it with his serene one, and Minerva sighed. Harry might be one of her students, and in some things he could be treated as one, but not in this.

“And she was his only immediate family,” Minerva admitted. “His wife died some time ago, apparently. He has no other children.”

Harry closed his eyes.

Minerva turned to face him and gripped his shoulders. Now she did think of something she should have done, but, of course, too late, too late. Both Whitestag and Willoughby had threatened to “do something” if she wasn’t back to her office with Harry in an hour at the most. Minerva should have talked about the children under the Life-Web with Harry, and how they mirrored her own sacrifice of killing children too wounded to live at Ottery St. Catchpole seventeen years ago. Minerva had acquired the full story from Severus, but not had any chance to talk to Harry about it.

“Harry,” she said. “He will say many unfortunate things. He already has,” she added, thinking of what he’d said through her Floo connection, which had finally been repaired the day after the battle. “That does not mean you should take them to heart. You did what you had to on the battlefield, what I think needed to be done and what no one else could have managed.”

Harry opened his eyes and gave her a confused look. “That’s not what I was upset about, Madam,” he said. “I know that he’ll be angry and grieving, and so will Aurora Whitestag. How can I possibly condemn them for that? I was only sorry that he’d lost his only daughter, and that Mrs. Whitestag has lost two of her children. I wished I could resurrect them, somehow, but I know there’s no magic that allows one to return the dead to the living world, not truly.”

Again, Minerva felt as if she'd missed something. Harry's face was already serene once more, and he started up the corridor, though he paused a few steps on to look back at her over his shoulder. "Headmistress? Are you coming? Did they ask that you be there when they spoke with me? Perhaps you should rest."

Minerva shook her head and caught up with Harry. As a matter of fact, she did need rest—all the professors did—but there was no way that she would let Harry face this alone. She had not had to do this, since the parents of the children massacred at Ottery St. Catchpole had been told that their children died of their wounds rather than being killed, but her fellow rescue-murderers had not left her alone in the days immediately afterward, either. Minerva would stand with Harry.

And if I can learn what I'm missing, then so much the better. Harry had himself braced when he entered McGonagall's office. It could not have been easy to lose two children or to lose your only child. He told himself that, and kept grief and sympathy at the forefront of his mind. He kept, as well, his own determination to accept what came, and to balance it with the other duties that he had yet to complete. He could not act as if he were above the laws of the wizarding world, not and be a good leader. On the other hand, allowing these two parents to send him to prison just now would not serve Draco, or the grieving people in the castle who still needed to talk to him, or his arrangements for Edith Bulstrode to go to France with a private tutor—Harry had granted Henrietta permission to join the battle so long as she never tried to see her daughter, but Edith was too intolerably nervous with her mother in the same building—or the werewolf problem and the necessity to reply to a letter from Loki he'd received yesterday. He would explain his perception of the situation to Aurora Whitestag and Philip Willoughby, and hope they would be reasonable, and see that he couldn't stand trial for war crimes or anything else right now. He had too much to do.

He'd locked his own emotions deep in Occlumency pools, and called on his magic to support his body and mind. He really should have done this during the siege, but the grief had been too strong for an Occlumency pool then and his magic too occupied with other things. No one was calling on him to use his magic now, except in healing

Draco, but his ear and his mind and his money and his political power. So it could go to making sure his mind stayed clear and thoughtful, and his body strong when it wanted to collapse, and his possible soul-wounds in abeyance.

A woman and a man waited in chairs in front of McGonagall's desk. Aurora Whitestag, when she faced him, had a cascade of dark hair that reminded Harry of her daughter Heloise, before they'd arranged transportation of her body home to her mother. Her robes were white, lined with silver, and simple—the robes of an undeclared witch. Her dark eyes were narrow as she studied him, but she actually nodded to him, and a soft smile ran across her lips. Harry inclined his head back, and turned to face the man.

Philip Willoughby was an impressive figure, fully as tall and strong as Bill Weasley, though considerably heavier. His brown hair was frazzled, and his hazel eyes, which Harry thought were probably as kind as Connor's normally, already bore the look of too many tears and not enough sleep. He stared at Harry as if he were the answer to a riddle he'd been pursuing for years. Harry did his best not to let it disconcert him as he nodded back.

"Mrs. Whitestag, Mr. Willoughby," said Harry, and took a third chair that sat off to the side of McGonagall's desk. She'd placed him closer to her than to the parents, Harry noticed, and subtly shoved the chair back to a more neutral, central position when the Headmistress wasn't looking. "My name is Harry. Please, ask me any questions or tell me anything you wish."

"I want to know the circumstances of my daughter's death," said Philip. "Obviously." His hands clenched over and then into each other, almost tearing the skin. He hadn't blinked yet.

"I would also like to know the circumstances of my son's," Aurora added, in a softer voice.

Harry nodded. "Voldemort attacked the school on the eighth of June, thirteen days before Midsummer," he began calmly. "Besides having Death Eaters attack the carriages that were taking students home, he captured a dozen children—mostly first-years and second-years—and put them in a Life-Web.” He looked questioningly at Aurora, but her face reflected blankness, and of course so did Philip’s, so Harry explained. “A Life-Web gathers many lives and puts them in the control of the caster. Voldemort could will them to die, injure themselves, go mad, become wounded, or suffer in many other ways as long as he held control of that web. Other magic could still affect them, but only until he noticed and ended the spell’s effects. And only he could undo the spell.”

Aurora was staring at him. Philip was looking down at his hands.

“I did what I could to ease their suffering,” Harry said. His grief and rage were somewhere far under the stony surface he’d constructed for himself. He couldn’t be blinded by his own emotions right now. His magic traveled in a smooth, continuous flow through his body, easing muscles that might have tightened, supporting him when he might have sagged, eating built-up weariness. “I tried a healing spell, and I tried to eat the Life-Web—“

“I don’t understand,” said Philip abruptly, looking up. “Eat it?”

“I can eat magic,” said Harry. “I tried to absorb the web into myself. It didn’t work. There are some laws of magic that can’t be broken, and apparently the Life-Web being altered only by its caster is one of them.” He sighed. “Voldemort said he would free the children if I went down to him.”

“And you didn’t even consider that?” Philip’s voice sounded as if the words were torn out of him, probably carrying large chunks of his throat with them.

“Voldemort doesn’t keep his promises,” said Harry. “I would have gone down to him, and he would have continued torturing them.”

“But you don’t know that,” said Philip intently, leaning forward. “Perhaps he would have kept this one. How can you know?” Harry winced; his voice was gradually edging upward. “How do you know that Alexandra isn’t alive only because of your selfishness, and not because of—“

“Because Harry is the only one who can kill You-Know-Who,” Aurora interrupted. She had never looked away from Harry. Her voice was as soft as her smile had been. She leaned back, hands clasped around her knee. Harry eyed her. He found it hard to read her. “He’s the Boy-Who-Lived. If he went down to him, the war would be over. Alexandra might have lived, and Abelard too, but the war would be over.”

“I could have taken Alexandra back home,” Philip said. “No one would ever have to know. She loves this world, and so do I, but I’d trade it for her life.”

Harry winced, and kept his voice respectfully low as he said, “Mr. Willoughby, Hogwarts keeps records of all its students. Voldemort targets Muggleborns particularly, because he thinks they’re polluting the wizarding world. He would have learned about Alexandra’s existence and come after you eventually.”

“You don’t know that,” Philip insisted. “You don’t.”

Harry inclined his head. “Perhaps I don’t.”

“I would like to finish listening to the story,” said Aurora mildly.

Harry turned back to her. “I had to choose. While Voldemort taunted me with the children in the Life-Web, other children were dying behind me on the battlefield, and since my magic is so strong, and I can eat my enemies’ power, I could make a difference in turning the tide there. I didn’t know of a way to make Voldemort’s captives stop suffering. I didn’t know of a way to free them. So I chose to give them heart attacks, as quick and painless a death as I could. Voldemort didn’t sense the spell in time to stop me, and I think he believed I would never kill them anyway, so it worked. And then I turned to rescuing the others.” He turned his hand up. “That was what happened.”

“You don’t seem that torn up about it,” Aurora said, her voice cool for the first time.

Harry met her eyes. “That’s because I’m using Occlumency to suppress my emotions, ma’am,” he said. “I spent a lot of time grieving during the siege of Hogwarts, enough that I almost went outside and let Voldemort have me. My brother made me promise not to, but it was a near thing. And right now, if I let what I was really feeling through, then I'd be weeping too hard to talk to you, and certainly too hard to tell you what really happened or listen to your grief and understand it."

Aurora stared at him again, but Philip had another question. "And if you really can kill You-Know-Who," he asked, knuckling one eye as if that would keep the tears from falling, "why didn't you kill him, and free the children from the Life-Web that way?"

"Because I'd tried before," said Harry, "with the strongest curses I know. Nothing happened. Voldemort has made arrangements to keep himself immortal; that shows because I bounced his own Killing Curse back at him the night he came after me and my brother, and he still survived it. I've wounded him now, and he has to hide. That means I have time to figure out what's keeping him immortal, destroy it, and then kill him."

"You can't, really," Philip whispered. "I thought when Alexandra told me about this Boy-Who-Lived nonsense that it was just that, nonsense. And it is. If you can't kill him when he holds a dozen children captive, then when can you do it? I think you chose your life over theirs." His voice was rising again. "I've been reading wizarding history. Dark Lords, Light Lords, this supposed vates—it's all the same, all about power, and they'll grant exceptions to powerful wizards that they won't to anyone else."

"Well, no more. You may be a powerful wizard, but you're still a murderer, and I'll see you brought to trial for that."

Harry flinched, but forced himself to nod. "I don't know if you would win, but I don't intend to blast your head off or use compulsion to change your mind," he said quietly. "I think there is one difference between me and a Lord, sir. I try not to hold myself above others, and if that means submitting to wizarding law because the Ministry has decided to try me for war crimes, then that's what it means."

"Harry," said McGonagall sharply.

Harry glanced at her with a frown, wondering why she had interrupted. She wouldn't want them to think that she was ignoring their children because she's prejudiced in my favor. The Headmistress of Hogwarts has to be more neutral in public than in private. "I'm not done explaining yet, Headmistress," he said calmly, and then turned back to Aurora and Philip. "I do have other problems to handle first," he told them. "People I'm trying to heal of wounds they received in the battle. Arrangements to make regarding political struggles I'm a part of. Accounts to set up. So, while I certainly can't dictate how you react, that's where I'm coming from. It's not that I don't care about what happened, or feel guilt." He wished he could let a bit of the grief out, but it was too powerful. It would mingle with his grief for Pansy, Charles, Cho, and all the others who had died, and leave him a sobbing wreck. "But I can't stop living my life and only care about what trial you might put me through."

"I, for one, will not be calling for a trial," said Aurora Whitestag quietly.

Philip snapped, "I don't really need your help. I'll pursue this on my own, if I have to, but first I'm going to talk to some of the other parents who lost children."

"Why?" Harry asked her. In some ways, he thought she would have been even more likely to demand a trial, since she would understand the consequences of the magic and the ways of the Ministry better than a Muggle.

"Because I do believe that you are the Boy-Who-Lived, and the only one who can defeat You-Know-Who," said Aurora. One hand trembled, but she quickly caught it with the other and hid it in her lap. "We need you. A trial will only divert your attention and sap your political strength. At the same time, chaos seems to follow in your wake, and having you at Hogwarts is a danger to the other children. So, for the sake of those children who are still alive, and not because I think Heloise and Abelard deserve to see you be imprisoned, I'm going to push for you to be put in private custody, Harry, somewhere far away from Hogwarts, and trained until you can defeat You-Know-Who." She met his eyes, her own open and honest and quietly determined. "Our world needs you. But it needs its safety, too."

McGonagall leaned forward. "Mrs. Whitestag, Mr. Willoughby," she said. "You should understand that Voldemort's early attack was not Harry's fault. The wards failed to protect the children as we thought they would. The blood of the children who died that day is on the hands of Voldemort and his Death Eaters, not on Harry's. And a quick death is surely better than—"

"You wouldn't say that," Philip snarled at her, "if you had lost a child of your own."

McGonagall's eyes were glacial when she looked back at him. "I did, Mr. Willoughby. I am the Headmistress of this school. Every child who died, on the battlefield and before the siege, is a child of mine. And I've been responsible for not just deaths, but suffering, and being the guardian of the suffering and trying to ease them. Harry has been asked to play a role that no one else has, that of guardian and protector of our entire world, and for us to condemn him for the consequences of that role is selfish and hypocritical."

"Someone who is guardian and protector of our entire world should be more responsible," said Aurora. "Not only with his safety, but with the safety of others." She nodded to Harry, her face like a glass mask—set, with light shining from behind. "I am sorry, Harry. I truly think this is the best course. The protection of the living is more important than vengeance for the dead."

"On that, we can agree," said Harry. "But I don't think that imprisoning me is the best answer, Mrs. Whitestag."

"I said nothing about imprisoning you," she murmured. "I do think you should be kept in a private location and trained. Our world needs you, Harry, and not as a student in a school. You have to take on an adult role, and that means that you need to be treated like an adult." She rose and nodded to McGonagall. "Thank you for taking the opportunity to meet with me, Headmistress. I will be in contact." She strode over to McGonagall's fireplace, taking out a pinch of Floo powder and casting it into the flames. A name that Harry couldn't quite catch, and she was gone.

That left Philip, who was leaning back with his head against the chair behind him, his chest heaving as he struggled to control sobs or shouts; Harry didn't know which. He let some moments pass, and then said, "Mr. Willoughby."

Philip's eyes snapped open, and he gave Harry a look of acute loathing, enough that Harry recoiled. Then he rose like an old man and stared at McGonagall.

"I'm going home now, too," he said. "Be sure I'll be in touch, Headmistress."

Harry watched as he hobbled to the fireplace and called, "Willoughby house!" as he used the Floo powder. Harry swallowed all his mingled emotions as he watched him go. He wished Philip wasn't doing this, but how could he condemn the man? He was acting out of love and grief.

"Harry."

Harry started and turned to look at McGonagall. She had her mouth set in a thin line, and she had leaned over and taken hold of his hand without his noticing it.

"Willoughby will have a difficult time bringing you to trial," she said. "You are underage as yet. Wizarding law usually refuses to try someone for war crimes and murder until they are at least seventeen." Harry nodded, thinking of Evergreen, the sixteen-year-old werewolf, whom the Wizengamot had preferred to keep in Tullianum indefinitely rather than condemning him to a permanent stay there, and Gilbert Rovenan, who would have suffered no worse than expulsion and wand-breaking. "I am worried about Whitestag, however. She may press the Wizengamot into trying to take custody of you precisely because you are the Boy-Who-Lived as well as underage. I think few of the Wizengamot members who sat in on your parents' trial would really believe that you do not consider the ethical ramifications of your actions, but in light of what is happening with the werewolves, they may do—something unfortunate—in the name of the safety of the wizarding world."

Harry nodded again. He knew. “What do you think is the best course then, Headmistress?” he asked.

“For Severus to remove you from the school as soon as possible,” said McGonagall bluntly. “You need time to rest, to recover, to heal, Harry, and I do think it would be better done away from Hogwarts, where there are not so many memories to plague you. And if you were in an isolated place where no one could find you easily, then we could easily tell Mrs. Whitestag and anyone who asked that you had gone for training. They would not know the difference. By the time you returned to Hogwarts at the end of August, then we could claim, in turn, that you had completed your training and now were on the path to defeating Voldemort.”

“I don’t know if I can learn the truth about defeating him in that time,” Harry said.

McGonagall laughed. It was not a happy sound. “There are times when you need to think more like a Slytherin, Harry,” she said. “Of course we won’t give out any details when Whitestag and her supporters demand them. They could leak back to Voldemort, wherever he’s hiding. We need to keep them secret for the good of the wizarding world. So you can pursue research when you have time for it, and if it takes a while—no one can blame you for not defeating Voldemort immediately.”

Harry stirred uneasily. He knew the perfect candidate for the isolated place where he would convince most people that he was training in ethics and in magic. The Sanctuary’s location was unknown to many, Vera had reassured him, and the “shadows” surrounding it, which tended to delay owls, also made it impossible for anyone with hostile intent to find it.

But if he went there with the situation still unresolved and brewing, wouldn’t it look like he was running away from efforts to bring him to trial, when he needed to show everyone that he didn’t consider himself above the law?

He said as much to McGonagall. Her answer was unexpected.

“That is what I have been missing,” she exclaimed, slapping her hand onto her desk. Harry blinked at her.

“I had the idea that something was strange about you, Harry, but I couldn’t tell what it was,” she said, her words burring slightly. “You are doing what you can to heal others and help, but you have once again pushed your own healing away.”

“I haven’t,” said Harry. “I promise you, ma’am. I haven’t been neglecting myself the way I used to whenever I got angry. I haven’t drowned in grief. I’m only maintaining this mask over my emotions until I have some time to grieve. And that isn’t yet. As you pointed out, there are other people to be healed.”

McGonagall said nothing, simply watched him as if he were a mouse. Harry was the one who shifted after a moment. He needed to go speak to Connor, and then talk to Snape about his upcoming Apparition to Copley-by-the-Sea. There were some treasures there, powerful and magical but capable of nothing useful, which Harry intended to drain of their power. He would do his best to restore the magic of the children who had been turned into Squibs when that was done.

“Can I go, Madam?” he asked after a moment.

“Go,” McGonagall murmured.

Harry stood up, nodded to her, and walked out of the office, wondering at his own urge to flee.

“Severus. If you have a moment?”

Snape turned in surprise. McGonagall stood watching him from the doorway. Snape smothered his irritation that he hadn’t heard her approach. She had probably had one of the Founders remove his wards.

“Minerva,” he said, with a shallow nod, and cast a temporary charm on the Veritaserum to hold it in its current stage. “Is this about Harry?”

McGonagall smiled faintly and moved into the room. "Of course," she murmured. "What else would I speak to you about?"

"I am Deputy Headmaster." Snape folded his arms and told himself he would not get huffy. No one but Dumbledore had ever been able to make him get huffy. "The defense of the school and the continuation of my brewing healing potions seem likely items."

"This is not a problem truly concerned with defense of the school, though some people would think it is."

McGonagall described the meeting between Philip Willoughby, Aurora Whitestag, and Harry, and what the parents of the dead children intended to do about it. Snape stood still throughout. He noted the names, and thought distantly that it was a pity neither of them was a werewolf.

"And they think they can do this?" he hissed, when McGonagall was done. He had other questions, including why he hadn't been summoned to this meeting, but that was the most prominent.

"When word gets out of what happened to the children in the Life-Web, as it inevitably will?" McGonagall massaged her forehead and sighed. "With the Minister on a short leash with the Wizengamot at the moment? With Harry's name linked, rightly or wrongly, with so much other trouble in our world? I fear that there will be many queuing up to help them."

Snape coiled his wandless magic back inside him. It wanted to lash out and break a head, or at least a leg. But since McGonagall was the only person in the room with him, that wouldn't be productive. "Then he must be taken away," he said. "Your solution is the only one that makes sense, to remove him from the school and pretend that someone is training him to defeat the Dark Lord." He permitted himself a sneer, feeling as if he would burst if he didn't. "As if one could be trained to do that. If that was all it took, Moody would have trained himself into readiness long ago."

"I know, Severus." McGonagall leaned forward. "And I think the Seers' Sanctuary, where he intended to go anyway, is the best choice."

But for the deception to be complete, you will have to disappear as well, to make it seem as if his guardian decided this was the best thing for Harry. And I know that you have no wish to go to the Sanctuary.”

Snape snarled. “I do not.” There were locked boxes in his soul that no one had the right to touch, and doors that would remain shut. But, on the other hand, it was not as if he were going to be healed, as Pettigrew or Lupin had, as Harry and Draco would. He was certain he could remain himself even in the midst of people anxious to “help” him. “But I have never yet spent a full summer with Harry since I have known him, and I think that has helped hurt him.” He met McGonagall’s eyes. “I wish to spend this one with him.”

McGonagall closed her eyes and nodded. “Thank you, Severus,” she murmured. “Good. But then, of course, we have another problem. Harry thinks he will be seen as running away from wizarding law if he goes to the Sanctuary, and that is not something he wants.”

Snape smirked. This one, at least, he knew how to approach. “Leave that to me,” he said.

“You think you can persuade him?” McGonagall frowned. “Forgive me, Severus, but Harry’s convictions of justice are so strong that—“

“Not me,” said Snape. “I agree, he would think I was acting solely out of a guardian’s duties, and he would refuse to listen, because he thinks his own duties more important. But there is someone whom he will never resist.”

“Perfect.” The relief in Harry’s voice was unmistakable to Draco, even more so than the tendril of Legilimency he used to stroke Draco’s mind as he retreated from yet another healing of wounds. “They’re coming along nicely, Draco. The last big holes are almost closed. Some of the effects will linger for a time—that’s what the potions are for, of course—but you should be able to go to the Sanctuary as early as the day after tomorrow.”

Draco opened his eyes, and gave Harry a smile he knew was strained. But Snape had come in earlier and explained exactly what Harry was doing to himself and why, and Draco was horrified and disgusted and more than a little disappointed in Harry. After everything he promised...

"And you won't be coming with me, will you, Harry?" he asked.

Harry started, and then he relaxed and smiled. Draco reached out intently now, and caught the faintest whiff of roses—Harry's magic. It was working to make that relaxation and the smile look natural. Draco growled softly under his breath. He's relying on his magic just to function. He said he wouldn't.

"Of course I will, Draco," Harry said. "I promised. I can't give you an exact date, yet, but I should be no more than a week or two behind. At the very latest. It might take three weeks to settle the werewolf problem—I'm still debating how to reply to the letter Loki sent me—but—"

"You promised otherwise," said Draco, and heard his voice grow darker all on its own. He thought he might have had to feign the emotion. No need. "You promised, Harry. When I was wounded, you said that we would go to the Sanctuary together, and you would spend your time thinking about healing and about me."

Harry's stare sharpened. "Did Snape put you up to this?"

Damn, damn, damn. Draco felt as he had when he confronted his father. Potentially devastating emotional consequences were spinning past him, and he had to choose which one to ride.

He chose the truth.

"He told me what you've been doing," said Draco. "Helping everyone else. Putting aside your own grief. Yielding to these mad plans to bring you to trial or force you to remove yourself from Hogwarts. And now I can smell your magic, Harry. You're using it to just to keep your feet."

Harry ran his hand through his hair, and looked put out. "It would be stupid to do something I've promised I wouldn't, Draco," he said. "I haven't been skipping meals or sleep, I promise. The only reason I've tamped my emotions down with Occlumency is because otherwise I would be a sobbing wreck, and I would get nothing done, including healing you, which I need to happen." The look in his eyes as he said that almost took Draco's breath away. "I can't show that I think I'm above the law, or that I'm frightened of what they can do to me. And yes, I'm using my magic, but it's only to get everything done that I need to. The world doesn't stop spinning just because there was a battle here, Draco. Loki has not stopped being an idiot, for example."

"There are two words you need to learn, Harry," said Draco.

"Only two?" Harry cocked one eyebrow, and the very last remains of Draco's empathy let him catch what felt like a quiver of anger. Harry was enraged, or close to it, but keeping it mostly off his face and out of his voice.

"Yes," said Draco. "In this case, only two."

"And what are they?" Harry's rage was almost gone again, but it reassured Draco to know he had felt it.

"Sod off," said Draco.

Harry nodded once, his lips tightening, and started to turn away. Draco caught the stump of his left wrist.

"I didn't mean that you had to sod off, Harry," he said, lifting one hand to hold Harry's cheek. He could feel him shaking from this close, and his determination increased. Yes, he wanted this for himself, wanted Harry beside him as he healed and rid his soul of Voldemort's taint, but, by Merlin, Harry needed this, too. He'd fought so hard for them to have a summer free of war, and now he was going to sacrifice it on an altar to grief and misguided honesty. Draco wouldn't let him. "I meant, tell them that. There's a point at which you're not granting people reasonable requests, but letting them take advantage of you."

"I know that!" Harry snapped, and the headboard of Draco's bed rattled. Harry's eyes closed, and he pulled himself away until only Draco's grip on his wrist held him there. "You and Snape keep talking about it," Harry went on. "But I don't know where it is. And when I do indulge my grief, it's a horrid mistake, and then when I don't, it's another horrid mistake again. I don't understand you." His mask broke for a moment. Draco could see the misery battering away just beneath the surface, combined with guilt and Harry's terror of doing the wrong thing. Then they went away again as Harry bolted the serene lie back on top of them. "I'm erring on the side of caution," he whispered. "If the choice is between giving up a summer holiday and being a leader, or hiding myself away from the outside world and ignoring problems that won't solve themselves...if I can prevent evil, Draco, and I don't, that's evil, too. And Merlin knows what the werewolves would do if I was out of contact for that long, or the Ministry, or the parents of the dead children. And yes, I hate that they're talking about bringing me to trial, or else taking me away from you and Snape and everyone else I love, and part of me wants to tell them to go fuck themselves. But I don't know where that point is where they're taking advantage of me. Maybe a trial is a perfectly right and reasonable thing to request, and I'm heading down Dumbledore's paths by trying to justify those children sacrificed in the name of war. I don't know, Draco. I've lost my footing, and all the roads look the same unless I can ease pain somehow."

And Draco knew what to do, then. The tumbling swords of consequence could fall where they will. He knew what to say and how to say it.

"And that's why you need to come to the Sanctuary with me, Harry," he murmured, gently. He stretched up from the pillows, ignoring his pounding head, and put his hand behind Harry's neck, pulling him closer. "They can help you find your footing again. I want you with me because I want you there as I heal. I want you there because I want to see you healed. And I want you there because I can see a life beyond the war. This war won't last forever, Harry. What happens if you make yourself into a leader and a weapon, and then someday, our world doesn't need you to be those things anymore? You would fall apart, I think." He tugged Harry forward again, until their foreheads rested against each other. "And I don't want you to fall apart," he whispered. "I want you to stay alive for a good long time."

Harry said nothing. His breathing had a sound of tears. Draco held himself still, and waited. Snape had thought Harry wouldn't be able to resist a plea from him, which was wrong, of course. But more than that, Draco thought Harry deserved a choice, with all his options laid out starkly before him.

"All right," Harry whispered.

Draco felt his heart clamp closed. He pulled away and considered Harry's face, the tight lines and still-shut eyes, carefully. "You mean that?" he said at last.

"Yes." Harry forced his eyes open. "I'm just so tired, Draco. I can't do this for much longer. And even though I do think it's self-indulgent, in some ways, it would be better to retreat and heal myself than break down when the Wizengamot questions me, or when one more person asks me why I didn't save his friend or her sister. I want some joy in my life again. And I don't think I could really have let you go to the Sanctuary alone." Harry swallowed. "I promise. Three days. I promise. I give you my word by bone and blood and breath that I'll go with you then."

Draco couldn't find words to explain what that meant to him. So he kissed Harry instead, the fiercest kiss they'd shared yet, flavored with teeth and tongues and blood. Harry kissed back, forcing some of his grief and rage out, Draco thought. When that was done, Harry hugged Draco hard enough to make his head throb.

"Thank you again," Harry said, "for loving me and having faith in me."

Draco closed his eyes, and let the warmth soak in.

Chapter Ninety-Six: The Second Greatest Is Justice

Harry sat down at his desk in the Defense Against the Dark Arts classroom—it was easier to find space to be alone, now that most of the students had gone home and Acies, of course, was gone as well—and placed a piece of blank parchment in front of himself. It was important that his handwriting in his letter to Loki not be shaky, even if only from the wobbling of a book on his knee.

Now that he had made the decision to go with Draco to the Sanctuary, he had a very clear picture of what he needed to accomplish in the next few days. That meant that the letter he was writing now had to be one that would convince Loki to leave matters alone while Harry was away from the wizarding world and unable to receive owls quickly. Whatever else it did was secondary.

Harry chose bluntness. Subtlety and wit and attempts to make Loki see other perspectives sure as hell didn't seem to work.

June 25th, 1996

Dear Loki:

I am going into hiding this summer, to train in the unexpectedly Voldemort-free time that this battle has produced. That means that I won't be in the wizarding world. You may think this means that you will be able to bite whomever you like, and I will not object. Conversely, you may think the Ministry has the freedom to do whatever it likes to werewolves.

That is not true. I do object, and when I return, if either of those things has happened, I will bring the force of all my magic down on the offender. My oath to help werewolves says nothing about helping them bite others who have not chosen to be werewolves and violate their free will; in fact, my task as vates says that I cannot encourage such things unless I want to risk becoming no more than a Lord. There are other werewolves besides your pack, Loki, and I shall throw my strength behind theirs, so that they will achieve what they want and not what you want. And if the Ministry threatens werewolves,

I will help them—but, once again, I will not do it merely to help your pack, but to help all your kind.

You have claimed to want and need my influence in the political arena. I am removing it for the summer. When I do bring it back, do you really wish to be responsible for my opposing or ignoring you? Your best choice, it seems to me, is to refrain from encouraging the Ministry to hunt you without my protection. Reclaim a moral position and the defensive ground. If you do not, if you are hunted not because you are werewolves and the Wizengamot is unfairly prejudiced against you but because you have bitten others, then you will have a second enemy when I come back.

Harry.

Harry would send that with Hedwig, so that Loki would understand he was serious about this. Then he turned to his second letter. This one, luckily, could be written in a tone of more reconciliation and kindness than the first one had been.

June 25th, 1996

Dear Minister Scrimgeour:

I would like to meet with you within the next three days, assuming that you have the time and freedom to do so. If not, then I will send you a final letter when the three days are over, explaining my position and what I intend to do this summer.

Yours sincerely,

Harry.

That would go with one of the school owls. Harry looked at the next dozen sheets of parchment that waited, and drew in a harsh breath. He had asked McGonagall for the names of the parents whose children he had killed. She had argued with him, telling him that it would serve no purpose for him to write to them, especially Aurora and Philip, and only strain him more. She had relented and given him the names only when Harry assured her that he intended to go to the Sanctuary for the summer.

He didn't want to write the letter, but he had to. They deserved to know all the details of the story, not mere rumors and false information. And they deserved to decide what they were going to do about it. Harry still did not want to be brought to trial, and when he thought about it too closely, there was the impulse to scream and lash out with his magic against anyone who would take him anywhere against his will, but he could not make their decisions for them.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Addlington... He began the first letter, not letting his hand tremble, once again. He would convey as much sympathy as he could through the paper, but shaky handwriting would only give a false impression, either weakness or that he was striving to show that he grieved as much as they did, and of course he never could.
"Harry."

Harry turned around, blinking. Somehow, he had thought that Millicent and her father had left yesterday, but then, he had thought many things in his whirlwind haze of things to do after Draco had convinced him. He'd been on his way to McGonagall's office for something he dreaded more than writing those letters, though, so he slowed and nodded, grateful for the distraction.

"I suppose you've come to say farewell?" he asked, putting out his hand to Adalrico. The older man clasped it tightly, studying Harry's eyes as if he were struggling to see to the bottom of them.

"Of course not," said Millicent, looking vaguely surprised. "Not yet. We want to know what's going to happen to Belville, since he did betray the alliance we're a part of. And Zabini, Findarin, and Tipperary, of course," she finished, with a slight sniff. "I know that the danger was to you, primarily, Harry, and of course two of them won't be returning next year anyway, but Blaise is a different matter. Is he going to remain in Slytherin House, a danger to us all?"

Harry swore, but only inside his head. He had thought Blaise stood a chance of getting off easy, since Draco was still in no condition to come out of the hospital wing and administer the “justice” he’d talked about the night before the battle. Snape was Head of Slytherin, and since Blaise was also one of his House, Harry hoped that sympathy might play opposite Snape’s concern for him. Looking at Millicent’s uncompromising eyes and her father’s stern face, however, Harry had the feeling that that wouldn’t be happening.

“I’m not sure yet,” was what he said, and turned towards McGonagall’s office. Millicent fell into step beside him. Adalrico limped behind, with that gait he’d perfected which didn’t deprive him of any dignity. Harry walked with his head up, never glancing sideways. He could feel Millicent’s gaze growing sharper and sharper all the while.

“You really don’t want anything to happen to him, do you?” she asked at last, in a soft, amazed tone. “Even after he nearly delivered you up to the Dark Lord and ended the war right then and there?”

“He snapped,” Harry said. “He was frightened. We all were. And he didn’t complete the crime. Surely attempted kidnapping matters less than kidnapping that actually happens?”

He saw Millicent turn from the corner of his eye so that she looked at her father. Harry didn’t glance back to see what Adalrico’s eyes and face might have been saying or not saying. His focus was forward.

Then Millicent’s hand clamped on his arm with a pressure he remembered, and knew not to resist. It was the kind she used when he wasn’t eating, or wasn’t sleeping, or otherwise doing something stupid. Reluctantly, Harry turned to meet her eyes.

“He betrayed us as well,” Millicent insisted. “All of them did—well, except the Death Eaters, but the Headmistress did say they’ll likely be turned over to the Ministry anyway, since they didn’t know much about the Dark Lord’s plans. Belville and the other students—Harry, we need justice.”

Harry inclined his head in a quick, shallow nod. “I’m trying to make sure there is justice,” he said. “And not vengeance.”

“You are too focused on that,” said Millicent, voice a soft growl. “In the name of justice, you would let people escape without punishment for what they’d done. You would have done it for your parents, and you’re going to do it here, unless someone else keeps you on track.”

“I would rather let a hundred criminals go free than see one innocent person suffer,” said Harry quietly.

“Even if those criminals cause suffering elsewhere?” Millicent pinched his arm, hard enough to make him wince. “Besides, Harry, have you considered that there’s something that applies to Belville and Blaise but not to the others? Belville was actually part of the alliance, and Blaise knows most of our secrets, both from his mother and from sharing a room with you and Draco. To protect ourselves, we can’t just turn them over to the Ministry. Even explaining their crimes would give our enemies weapons to use against us.”

“I’d considered that, yes,” said Harry. That was what was really making his guts churn. Justice wouldn’t be simple for either Belville or Blaise. It had to be kept private, and his allies were expecting him to handle it.

Millicent said, “I would be more than happy to punish them for you, Harry. And so would my father. And so would Hawthorn—”

“I know,” Harry interrupted her. “But I have to do it myself. I can’t ask any of you to take on a task I’m not willing to perform.” He pulled his arm free of her grasp and walked towards the gargoyle again. “Now come on. I don’t want to keep the Headmistress and our guests waiting.”

He tried to brace himself as he walked, for what he suspected his allies would ask of him. Now that Millicent and her father were there—and he knew that McGonagall had asked Arabella Zabini in—Harry suspected Hawthorn would be, as well.

Worse, he saw, when they rode the moving staircase up to the office. Lucius and Narcissa Malfoy were there. To Lucius, things were very simple.

One took vengeance out of love. So he had gone, during the thirteen days when Draco was trapped in Hogwarts and he and Narcissa could only communicate with him thanks to Rosier-Henlin's spell, to the small house in Finland that sheltered the family of the Death Eater who'd hurt his wife. He'd exacted his own vengeance there. The walls had been blue when he began. They were purple when he was done.

One covered one's own tracks out of caution. So Fiona Mallory was enchanted into her own mind and left there, and wouldn't be able to come out of the trance again unless Lucius decided to release her.

And one made sure that the people connected to one's family, whether or not one loved them, were protected. That made for punishment. Lucius did not care what name he had to give this, vengeance or justice. Harry cared too much about words. What mattered was that Belville and young Zabini had to understand the reason it was unacceptable to betray or harm Harry. He had accepted joining to the Malfoy family. He was theirs. Draco loved him.

Lucius knew he might not be able to arrange their deaths, but he was going to arrange their suffering.

He watched Harry as the young man stepped through the door of the Headmistress's office, and halted, staring at him. A pity he was going to the Sanctuary for the summer, Lucius thought. He would have preferred to have the boys come to the Manor, where he could help them practice both with Dark Arts and with emotional control. Harry needed to get rid of his eyes that widened too easily, the expression that betrayed every emotion. Lucius knew he was capable of being inscrutable; he simply used the talent far too little.

"Mr. Malfoy," said Harry a moment later, and his eyes shifted to Narcissa, sitting in the chair beside Lucius. "Mrs. Malfoy."

"I told you to call me Narcissa, Harry," Narcissa said, rising to her feet and walking over to Harry. She still moved stiffly, a result of the pain curse she'd taken in the back during the battle. Lucius knew the one who had cast it was dead, but watching her made his hand want his wand anyway. She stooped, put her hands on Harry's shoulders, and kissed him. She then whispered something into his ear that Lucius couldn't hear, but he had no doubt what it was. Narcissa had been ecstatically happy when Draco told them last night that he'd convinced Harry to go to the Sanctuary.

"Narcissa, then," said Harry, with a faint smile at her. He darted another glance at Lucius, but didn't ask what they were doing there, to Lucius's infinite relief. He must know that would have been stupid, and Lucius could not enjoy the thought of someone stupid being joined to his family. "Is anyone else arriving?" he asked the Headmistress.

McGonagall sat behind her desk, of course, prim and confident and in control. Lucius studied her, making sure his irritation was veiled. It was better than having Dumbledore as the head of the school—at least she was not a Legilimens and a Lord-level wizard—but she was still a Gryffindor, and she was still doing things that Lucius did not agree with. She had utterly refused to punish Blaise Zabini without his mother present, for example. Lucius saw the way her eyes softened as they rested on Harry, however, and suspected he might have found the fastest way to manipulate her.

"Professor Snape, of course," said McGonagall. "And Arabella Zabini." She hesitated for a long moment, then added, "Both Owen Rosier-Henlin and Hawthorn Parkinson waived their rights to be here. I think they needed more time to grieve." Harry nodded his understanding. "We've tried to find Mr. Rhangnara, but he's apparently in some distant part of the library, Rowena says. I think she approves of him. Miss Pemberley and Miss Apollonis have gone flying. And I did not think it would be a good idea for Mrs. Bulstrode to be here, given her temper."

Harry inclined his head. "I spoke to her about that already. She understood my reasoning." He turned abruptly, staring at the office door, and a moment later, it opened. Lucius nodded. Nothing wrong with his reflexes. But he needs them relaxed and blended with the rest of his life, so that he acts like that every day, and not only in the aftermath of battle. He will make a fine partner for Draco if he can but learn control. And when to use power.

Severus came in first, of course, his gaze traveling rapidly around the room to catalogue threats to Harry. Lucius exchanged nods with him, and hid his own amazement at this deep transformation in the man he had always known as one of the most vicious and violent of the Death Eaters. That Severus could have chosen a son—much less, the blood son of his worst enemy at school—was remarkable in and of itself. That he would consent to speak his love for that son aloud, even during a joining ritual that required such language of its participants, was the real sign of the change, however.

It interested Lucius. He could not help wondering if it made Severus weaker, particularly as the only vengeance he had taken for his son so far was through the legal channels of the Ministry. He would have to test Severus a time or two, and if he was weaker, then Lucius knew what to do.

Behind him came Arabella Zabini. She had wound all the gold and silver bells she possessed in her hair, it seemed, far more than were necessary to proclaim her skill as a Songstress. She walked with her head up, her beautiful face set in faint, smiling lines. She fully intended to stand against them all and walk out of here with her son intact, Lucius suspected. He felt a faint thrill of admiration at her courage and nerve, and contempt for her blindness.

“Please have a seat, Mrs. Zabini, Professor Snape,” said McGonagall, with a cordial nod. Her voice did not even cool on the woman’s name. Lucius had to respect that. He watched the expression on Arabella’s face as she sat down in the chair nearest the door and studied Harry. He could not make out all the disparate parts of it, but fear and anger were certainly there.

“The captured Death Eaters have been questioned under Veritaserum,” the Headmistress began, without preamble. “They were low-rankers and knew almost nothing of Voldemort’s plans. They will be turned over to the Ministry for prosecution.” Her hands folded over each other. “Unfortunately, that leaves us with four people whose cases are not so easy to settle. One, Mortimer Belville, wrote two letters to Voldemort under the name of the Serpent, destroyed the Hogwarts Floo connections, and was trying to poison or rot the food in the kitchens when Harry captured him. The other three are students, Blaise Zabini, William Findarin, and Aidan Tipperary, who fed Harry, and other members of their House, the Draught of Living Death and tried to take Harry to Voldemort during the siege.”

“Where are their parents?” Harry asked abruptly. “The Findarin family and the Tipperary family, I mean? Shouldn’t they be here to see to their sons?”

McGonagall shook her head. “Both William and Aidan are seventh-years, Harry, and seventeen,” she said quietly. “Their parents cannot defend them from deserved punishment. As well, they were not part of our alliance, and I am afraid of what might be revealed in front of them. And Aidan’s family has already disowned him.”

Lucius made a mental note to send a congratulatory owl to the Tipperary family. It would be anonymous. No need to let them know who exactly approved of their actions, heroic and in defense of their family.

Harry took a deep swallow of air, then nodded and finally sat down, in a chair that faced Narcissa’s and was beside Snape’s. “I understand,” he murmured. “I—who are you going to bring out first, Madam?”

“Belville,” said McGonagall simply, and rose and went to a door in the far corner of the office, where, Lucius supposed, she had kept the prisoners.

He studied Arabella Zabini while they waited. The faint traces of deeper emotions had vanished from her face again, and she looked as calm and confident as a queen waiting on her favorite courtier to bring her the heart of her enemy. Her bells gleamed and softly rang as she tilted her head this way and that.

McGonagall came back with Mortimer Belville in tow. Lucius sneered at the man from the corner of his mouth. He had always despised the Belvilles, a once-poor pureblood family that had achieved prominence again only by litigation and “reclaiming” of monies they were supposedly owed for illegal use of their land. That they had taken some of those Galleons from the Malfoy vaults was only a side reason to hate them. The main one was their standards of honor, or rather, lack of them.

When McGonagall released Belville from the Body-Bind, the man put his feet on the floor in a position that didn't allow him to stumble and stared at all of them with narrowed eyes and slightly tilted head. He had obviously prepared for this, Lucius thought, and might even have arguments that he thought would release him from punishment. He noted with infinite satisfaction that Belville's confident look faltered when his eyes passed over Lucius's face.

"I want to know why," said Adalrico, in a voice Lucius remembered from the day he had perfected the Black Plague spores. "None of the rest of us have had a chance to hear your confession yet, under Veritaserum or not."

Belville gave an arrogant shrug, his attention fastened on Harry now. "I wanted respect, notice. I wavered for a long time, but then I thought I was more likely to find that notice and attention in the service of the Dark Lord than in Harry's service. Obviously, I was wrong." He turned his palms up. "But can you punish me? I was only following the best pureblood traditions. When in doubt, choose the winning side."

"You endangered the rest of the children in the school," said Harry, voice without inflection, and so quiet that Lucius was glad he had come. The boy was going to let Belville out without so much as eating a scrap of his magic, he thought. It would be up to someone else to inflict proper punishment. "You destroyed the Floo connections. You went beyond simply offering some service to Voldemort in return for power. You suspected that he would attack earlier than Midsummer, didn't you? That's why you came so early."

Belville laughed easily. "Of course I suspected it. I can show you the very letter from Indigena Yaxley that suggested I'd want to join you as soon as possible." He cocked his head and smiled. "But you've already seen it, Harry. You know all about me. This is only for the benefit of those who don't."

Coward, Lucius thought. Sneaking traitor. He does not have the strength to stand up for his ideals. He noticed the way that Belville looked towards his left arm, and Adalrico's, and Severus's, more than once. He thinks he will be forgiven because others of us have been. I wonder if he realizes that recent crimes committed against a private alliance are far different than crimes from fourteen years ago for which we've been publicly tried and found not guilty?

"I could forgive you," said Harry, voice still just as quiet, "if all you had done was put me in danger—tried to lead me into a duel with Voldemort, for example." Lucius frowned, displeased. That sounded much like Harry was going to try and forgive Zabini, Findarin, and Tipperary for what they had done. But that was not possible. Lucius would not let it happen. "But you suspected the early attack, and did not warn me. You were indirectly responsible for the deaths of over ninety of the students. Then you made sure that those students still alive could not flee the school in the way that would have been safest for them, with the wards against Apparition and Portkeys necessary to protect them from the Death Eaters. You would have poisoned or rotted our food and made the siege harder."

A pressure was growing in the room. Lucius felt it as a band of pain tightening around his temples. He noticed Severus sitting stiffly in his chair, and Adalrico and his heir sniffing discreetly, as if they caught the scent of a thunderstorm.

Harry's magic is building, Lucius realized, staring again at the boy, whose face was now calm and blank, reflecting nothing. He is much angrier than he shows.

Harry took a deep breath, and, with his next words, turned a corner in the path that Lucius had not thought he would turn.

"And I have been told," said Harry, voice thick and slow as treacle with reluctance, "that by trying to doom me, you tried to doom the war. If I am the only one who can defeat Voldemort, then I could not have gone down to him or surrendered my life, no matter what he did to compel me to it." He lifted his eyes, and the masks fell. Lucius could see his rage now, deep and cold as an ocean at the bottom of a cliff. "But he did not give up trying to compel me. And because of that, you are indirectly responsible for a decision that I would rather not have made, a decision that has marked my soul and caused me to mercy kill children rather than leave them to Voldemort's sadism."

The world inside Lucius's head changed very quickly then. He had heard the story of what Harry had done, from Draco, and been sure it was confused somehow. Harry did not have the necessary hardness to choose death over life, a smaller sacrifice over a larger one, in circumstances like that.

Perhaps the Harry he had known did not. But the young man in front of him, who looked as though he had never cried, did. Lucius watched him carefully, and revised some assumptions about what might happen, what could happen, what would happen, with Harry as alliance leader and Draco's joined partner.

"I hope," Harry said softly, "that you like what you had a part in creating, Belville. I am inclined to give you a lesser form of the punishment that I gave Voldemort, who was most directly responsible. I am going to drain your magic." He flicked a glance around the room, whip-quick, dagger-sharp. "If my allies agree that this is a fitting punishment, of course."

Adalrico was grinning, looking younger than Lucius had seen him since he'd taken the Fisher King Curse. "No objections from the Bulstrodes," he managed to say through the grin.

Severus simply shook his head. Lucius could see the ferocity in his eyes, though, and changed another of his assumptions. Love appeared to have made Severus stronger, not weaker.

Well, it has done the same thing for Harry, so I cannot be too surprised.

Arabella said nothing; she was wiser than to try. Narcissa simply gave Harry a warm smile, as if he had received a dozen OWL's.

When Harry looked at him, Lucius chose a careful mixture of pride and cold approval, and let it through into his face. Harry inclined his head in an equally careful nod, and then turned to the Headmistress.

McGonagall smiled like a lioness crouching over a kill. “He hurt my children,” she said. Startled, Lucius thought he heard several other voices speaking with her own, at least two female and one male. “He deserves whatever you do to him, Harry, and this will hurt more than death.”

Harry nodded, and turned to Belville. It was only then, Lucius realized, that dear, dear Mortimer really believed he was about to become a Squib.

He was laughing desperately, backing up a step as if that would somehow lessen Harry’s determination. “Let’s think,” he said. “Let us think here. Let us be rational. I didn’t do much that hurt you in the end, Harry, did I? I was indirectly responsible for your decision and endangering the safety of your schoolmates. You said so. There’s no need to be so hasty. And I know that you don’t like draining people of their magic. You said so. You—“

Lucius felt the indefinable pull as Harry called upon his absorbere gift. The magic went draining from Belville like a wind, swallowed by Harry’s power. Harry didn’t move or make a sound the whole time. He simply watched Belville, until the end, when Mortimer opened his mouth and crumpled to the floor with a sound like a dying cat.

Then Harry turned away, a bit too swiftly, and Lucius caught a glimpse of revulsion on his face.

He still needs to be taught, then. Molded. Lucius’s own breathing was just returning to normal after the sight of a Dark pureblood—minor and annoying though the Belvilles were—becoming a Squib in front of him. He can still feel revulsion, and he should not. That gift is pure power, and nothing more than that. One does not feel revolted when one exercises power.

Harry did look back at Belville after a moment, and then narrowed his eyes. Lucius felt a brief flash of magic. He must have done something nonverbal, because the next moment, the huddled man looked up with wide eyes.

“What have you done to me?” he whispered.

Harry shook his head. "Put a Babbling Curse on you, tied to the secrets of the alliance. If you try to betray anything about us to someone who doesn't already know, then you'll simply spout nonsense, spoken or written. I won't Oblivate you; that would invalidate the point of draining your magic. And one set of Unbreakable Vows was enough. Good luck getting even Veritaserum to break through that curse, Belville." He smiled, and if he was still disgusted, he hid it very well. "Farewell, Mortimer. You can return to your home alone, I'm sure. After all, even Muggles and Squibs can use Floo powder."

"You don't—you don't understand," said Belville, standing. "I only chose the side I thought would win. It has nothing to do with personal enmity!" He was shouting now, the cords in his neck standing out. "I've only followed the best traditions of purebloods. It wasn't personal."

"And that only make you more worthy of contempt." Harry's voice was bored. "Good-bye, Mortimer."

In the end, Belville chose the wiser part of valor, walked over to McGonagall's fireplace, and cast the Floo powder in. Lucius didn't watch him. His eyes were on Harry instead.

It will be interesting to watch how he handles Zabini, Findarin, and Tipperary. He may not need that much help after all.

Harry felt exhaustion tugging at him as Belville vanished. It wasn't physical exhaustion, or magical; with the magic he'd just swallowed humming around his body in contentment, he felt able to learn the Animagus transformation on the instant, if he wanted to. It was mental and moral exhaustion. He hadn't enjoyed that. He'd come so far from enjoying it that he wanted to go back to his room and put his head under the pillow rather than do it again.

Or go to the hospital wing and curl up with Draco. That would be even better.

But he had three days, and three days only—more like two and a half, now—to make sure that everyone else thought him strong enough not to do stupid things during the summer. So he kept the iron mask on as McGonagall floated Blaise, Findarin, and Tipperary out of the room next to her office.

Blaise's face had frozen into a look of shock and dismay and horror. Harry flinched a bit as he looked at him, and then hoped no one had seen the flinch. It did hurt to think one of his own Housemates would betray him, but he understood all the reasons, all the motivations. Blaise had been frightened, and apparently there had been comments from his mother that made him think Harry might lose. Blaise was a Slytherin, a pureblood, and not above using Dark Arts. It was more likely Voldemort might spare his life if Blaise turned Harry over to him than almost anyone else.

Harry had spoken with Arabella Zabini by letter, and she had stated that she had never encouraged her son to betray him. Of course, she had also flatly refused to believe Blaise had done this in the first place. Harry kept his eyes on her as McGonagall released all three boys from the Body-Bind.

Sure enough, Arabella spoke first, her bells ringing as she tilted her head. "Blaise," she whispered. "Why?"

"You said that you missed me!" Blaise cried. His voice was hoarse from lack of water; the version of the Body-Bind McGonagall had used preserved its victims in utter stillness, but did nothing to remedy a throat already dry when the spell began. "You said that you thought Voldemort was strong! What was I supposed to think?"

"That I wanted you to stay safe," said Arabella. "That was always the only content of what I said to you, Blaise, every time we used the communication spell. I certainly did not intend for you to do something like this." The distaste in her voice was plain.

"But I was frightened," Blaise whispered, dipping his head. "That was all."

“A rather elaborate plan for someone who is frightened,” Snape drawled. Harry looked at him warily. McGonagall hadn’t allowed Snape to sit in on the meeting with Aurora and Philip yesterday because, as she had told Harry bluntly, she was afraid Snape would kill them. Now, at least, his guardian was keeping his hand from his wand. “You stole ingredients for the Draught of Living Death from my Potions stores. You used Dark Arts spells to cover your tracks. You used glamours to disguise the fact that it was Harry, and not merely a bundle of blankets, you carried. How did you plan to get through the wards?”

“I know a few spells to chew holes in wards, sir,” said one of the older boys. Harry thought it was Tipperary. His blue eyes were wide and terrified. “I would have repaired them, though! I promise! I didn’t want anything to happen to other people in Slytherin.”

“And you did not think that the Dark Lord might choose that moment to strike?” Snape’s voice grew lower. “That to get Harry through the wards, you would expose others to danger?”

“I—I—” Tipperary tried to find more words, and then seemed to give it up as a bad job. He lowered his eyes to the floor and shook his head.

The other one, Findarin, spoke up more heartily. “We did think the Dark Lord would let us live, sir,” he told Snape. “We’re all purebloods, and we can all use Dark magic.”

“Were you willing to take the Mark?” Snape asked.

Findarin’s swallow was loud in the silence. Harry wondered what his answer would be.

“I was,” he whispered at last.

Snape sneered. “I see that I have managed to teach you nothing in the seven years that you have been a student in my House, Mr. Findarin,” he said, mouth curling. “You were willing to be tortured, to crouch at the feet of a madman, merely to secure a little peace that would be ripped away from you the moment he decided he was tired of you. And did you know that the Dark Lord only accepts those who come to him willingly, not to save their own hides? Strange. In his own way, the Dark Lord is honorable.” Snape’s mouth twisted further, and Harry thought his eyes no longer saw Findarin, Tipperary, or Blaise, but someone else, whose mistake had been much more permanent. “He despises traitors.”

“We—weren’t thinking,” said Findarin, gulping, and Harry was relived to see that that sound brought Snape’s eyes back from wherever they were looking.

“I would not dignify what occupied your head in that moment with even the name of not thinking, Mr. Findarin,” he snapped.

Harry narrowed his eyes. Snape really does need the Sanctuary just as much as Draco and I do. I wonder what he thinks he’ll do to avoid the Seers peering at his soul? Wear a glamour all the time? I don’t think there’s one strong enough to fool them.

“We really didn’t think,” Blaise spoke up then. Harry thought he was seeing this particular turn of his conversation as his best chance to get out of this trap. “We didn’t think. We were frightened. We acted like children. We would probably have got Harry to the doors of the entrance hall, and then not been able to open the wards and had to go back.” He laughed, a touch of desperation lingering behind the sound. Harry could see his hands opening and closing, though he had thought he had them hidden behind his back from everyone but his mother; it was obvious from the way his shoulders were moving. “I’m sorry for it. Can we go home now?”

“Why, Blaise?” Harry asked quietly. “Why you? Why were you the one to break?”

Blaise trembled for a moment, and then turned violently on him. Harry studied him in silence in the moment before he began to speak. Blaise’s face was almost gray, as if the fear lingered for him even now that Voldemort had been wounded and forced to withdraw.

“Because I never asked to share a House with the Boy-Who-Lived!” Blaise spat. “It was all right when you were just a powerful wizard, Harry, and when you had the Dark Lord’s enmity for that, and Dumbledore's. And then your brother revealed you were actually the Boy-Who-Lived. You're the Dark Lord's main target. He's not ever going to stop coming for you, because he hates you. And anyone who stands beside you is going to suffer the same fate as your brother's friends would have, if he were the real Boy-Who-Lived." He wrapped his arms around himself. "I didn't ask for that," he whispered. "I didn't ask to be in the same House as you, the same room as you. I was going to be seen as your friend whether I was or not. And then my mother joined you because the Dark Lord angered her—not because she really approved of you or your cause, just because he stole her books—and I realized that I didn't have a choice. But at least I was still free to hold some distance from you in school. Voldemort wouldn't think the whole House was siding with you, I told myself. Slytherins act for themselves and their own interests.

"And then you were the Boy-Who-Lived." Blaise's breath hitched, and he closed his eyes. "He wasn't going to care who we were, what we wanted, unless I could prove to him once and for all that that I really didn't hold any loyalty to you by giving you up. I just—I didn't want to take the Mark. I didn't want to be hurt. I just wanted to go on living, and I wouldn't be able to do that if you were right there. I wanted to go to France. I told my mother that." He opened his eyes and gave Arabella a pleading, expectant look.

Harry didn't follow his glance. He just kept on looking at Blaise, and wondered if he had ever known him at all.

I think I did, he thought. But the good things in him were crushed by his fear. Just like Lily, come to that. Just like James. Just like Dumbledore, and Sirius.

Harry tasted bitterness for a moment. He hated crushed, wasted, wrecked lives, and he seemed to be surrounded by them.

He turned to Arabella then. She was sitting very straight, her hands clasped together.

"I understand if you no longer want me as part of your alliance," she told Harry. "But I do not think my son should be punished with death or Squib-hood. He did a stupid thing, a very stupid thing that I never encouraged him in, and he is a child, still.” She gave Blaise a look that made him drop his eyes. “But he was plunged into the middle of a war against the Dark Lord that he never chose or asked for, and he did have good reason to think the Dark Lord would target him above others. I think he should be allowed to go to France, the way he wanted.” She stared at Harry.

“Would you go with him?” Harry asked her.

Arabella nodded. “I will not put him in Beauxbatons,” she said. “It is obvious he is unsuited for a school environment.” Blaise flinched. Arabella ignored him. “I would arrange to hire a private tutor, and play some part in his teaching myself.”

“How can I be sure that you would not tell anyone about the secrets you have learned as part of the alliance?” Harry asked her.

Arabella didn’t bat an eyelash. “Put the Babbling Curse on us as well. Bind us with an Unbreakable Vow. Make us swear on a dragon’s bone under Veritaserum. The method you use to make sure of our faith does not matter to me. What matters to me is that my son’s behavior has proven to me that he is conclusively still a child, when I wished to have an adult heir.” Blaise’s flinch went bone-deep this time, and still Arabella ignored him. “I must spend some time seeing to my family, vates. When, if ever, I think him fit to play a part in adult activities, then we will come and rejoin your alliance.”

Harry studied her for a long time. He had not hoped for a solution like this. He had thought Blaise’s mother would insist on his returning to Hogwarts next year and even staying in the same room as Draco and Harry, and Harry did not think he could have allowed that; he would never have felt safe again.

But this...

“I’ll choose the Babbling Curse,” he said. “It’s the least restrictive.”

Arabella slowly inclined her head. Only the extreme stiffness in her neck as she moved revealed how relieved she was, Harry thought. “Thank you, vates.”

Someone behind him made a noise of protest. Harry turned and followed it straight to Millicent. "He'll be out of the school," he told her. "He won't endanger you again. He won't be able to endanger us indirectly, either. It's for the best, Millicent. He's still a child."

Millicent understood that. Perhaps she understood better than he did, Harry thought, since she was also a Dark pureblood heir, and one expected to act like an adult from a very young age. The disgrace would be worse for Blaise than many other punishments. "Very well," she muttered.

"And if I say that I find this unacceptable?" That was Lucius, his voice light as frost. "If I say that I think someone who tried to kill the joined partner of a Malfoy heir deserves a worse punishment?"

Harry turned around and gave Lucius a smile as light as his voice. "I would say that you may wish to amend your wording, sir," he said, "lest your own punishment land a bit too close to home."

Lucius's face paled, though only for a moment. He was remembering Tom Riddle's diary, Harry knew, and what part he had played in hurting and weakening the joined partner of a Malfoy heir for most of a year. Satisfied that he got the point, Harry looked again around the circle, searching for other objections.

There were none. Harry nodded to Arabella. "Then you may go to France, Mrs. Zabini." He cast the Babbling Curse on both her and Blaise, and anchored it firmly to the notion of speaking about the alliance to anyone outside it. "I hope that you'll return with an adult heir."

"So do I," said Arabella. She rose and held out her hand, and Blaise at once scurried over to take her wrist. "Come, Blaise."

"I hope you recover your courage," Harry told him. Blaise kept his head down and didn't look at him. Harry could see a faint tremble racing up his spine.

When the door had shut behind the Zabinis, Harry faced Findarin and Tipperary again. "I don't know you," he told them. "You aren't my friends. But I can't shield you from what the law says should happen to you in a case like this, either, because you aren't underage."

"Indeed," said McGonagall. "They will be recorded as expelled from Hogwarts, not merely leaving, and their wands will be broken."

Findarin's face went pale, and Tipperary looked as if he would have liked to cry. Instead, he just nodded.

And, like that, it was done. Harry was glad. He wanted to go back to the hospital wing, and not only to see how Draco was doing.

First, of course, he had to wait and watch as their wands were broken. Both boys screamed when that happened. Harry winced, but kept his eyes straight ahead, knowing Lucius and Adalrico were both watching him.

When that was done, then finally, finally, he could go. He got to the door before Snape caught up with him and put a hand on his shoulder.

"A moment, Harry," he said. "I brewed Draco's latest potion before I came here. I will go with you."

So then he had to wait while Snape talked with McGonagall. Something about the Potions schedule for next year; Harry supposed that was only reasonable, since Snape would be gone most of the summer in the Sanctuary with them. Then they were on their way down the moving staircase. Harry pushed his face against the stone wall and let it scrape lightly on his cheeks to keep him awake, as well as hide his expression.

"Harry."

Harry tensed. "Sir," he acknowledged, without turning around.

"May I ask what finally decided you on going to the Sanctuary?" Snape's voice was distant, respectful.

Harry sighed. "Because I can't do this anymore," he said. He turned around and folded his arms over his chest. "I want to think about other things than the fate of the world, and the fate of werewolves, and the fate of the Ministry and the laws. I—every time I've tried to retreat, before, the world's always there, and it shoves itself in. And I'm not doing it good service like this, either, when every decision I make feels like it tears out a part of my soul. I'll do it better by resting for a while in a place where the outside world's not permitted to intrude." He lifted his shoulders and felt his mouth curve into a smile not far from a sneer. "You're always telling me to be a little selfish. I suppose I finally decided to listen."

Snape's hand closed over his shoulder, and he pulled Harry near him. Harry tensed himself to struggle, but the grasp didn't demand anything of him, and a moment later, it began to move, gently stroking over his neck and hair.

Harry tried to make himself relax. But now that justice, if one wanted to call it that, was dispensed, the list of things he had to do had reappeared in his head again, circling his thoughts like moons around a planet.

With a groan, he realized that he wouldn't be able to go and see Draco after all. He had to write to the MacFusty wizards, who owned the Hebridean Black sanctuary, and ask if they would watch out for Acies in her dragon form.

He tried to turn towards the dungeons when they came out of the moving staircase, and Snape's hand restrained him. Harry glanced up at him and shook his head. "I'm sorry. Something I have to do."

Snape said nothing. He just turned towards the hospital wing, tugging Harry along with him. It was not a hard clasp. Harry could have broken out of it if he truly wanted to.

He didn't truly want to.

He trailed behind Snape, and tried to tell himself that going to see Draco wasn't self-indulgent. After all, Draco needed Snape's potion, and he needed Harry and Snape to check his mind again and make sure the damage was healing properly.

Draco was watching the doorway when they came in. His face lit with a wide smile the moment he saw Harry, and Harry told himself again it wasn't what he'd come to the hospital wing for.

But some of his weariness did leave him at the sight. Harry blinked his eyes open, muzzily. His sight remained blurry until he could retrieve his glasses, which had been lying on a low table not far from him.

He remembered sitting in a chair and talking to Draco. Someone must have moved him to this hospital bed when he fell asleep. From the look of the sky through the windows, it was deep night, and that had been hours ago.

Harry heard a soft flutter of wings and a hoot, and he reached up to find a tiny barn owl struggling to land on his shoulder. He shifted around so she could, then retrieved the letter she carried. It bore his name, both his first and the last name he'd shed, in unfamiliar handwriting.

He looked at the signature first when he opened it. It was from the Addlingtons, one of the families of the children he'd killed.

Then he looked at the top of the letter, and found that it contained nothing but insults, beginning with "you murderer."

Harry took a deep breath. He should read through it and witness what they said about him, in their anger and justified grief. Of course he should.

Instead, he crumpled up the letter, dropped the ball beside the bed—Snape or Draco could read it over later, if they wanted to, to insure there was nothing important there—and shook his head at the owl. "No reply," he muttered.

The owl stared at him for a long moment before she took wing again. Harry leaned back against the pillow and closed his eyes.

He was so tired. He hurt already.

He owed other people things. But there was no reason to torture himself. To do that would be to become the martyr Snape had warned him against becoming.

Maybe that's the point where people take advantage of me, and I've found it at last, Harry thought hazily, as his mind clouded over again, and he fell asleep with his glasses on.

Interlude: The Liberator's First Letter

June 25th, 1996

Dear Minister Scrimgeour:

I hope you will excuse me writing to you like this, under a false name—almost a title, in fact—and without offering a way for you to owl me back. However, I fear for my life if my family finds out I'm writing you. My fear is no longer enough to hold me silent, but I cannot risk your owl.

My family has strong connections to the Order of the Phoenix, which I understand you're still trying to track down. I know only a few names myself, but I can suggest you look at:

-Auror Hector Dalrymple.

-Madam Malkin, who runs the robe shop of the same name in Diagon Alley.

-The reporter Gina de Rousseau, at the Daily Prophet.

Not all are deep in Order politics. Madam Malkin, I think, only permits her shop to be used as a gathering place for Order contacts. But all are bound in some way to the evolving web that once used Albus Dumbledore as its anchor and now uses another—a more formidable enemy, because his reputation is not widely known.

Tell me, Minister, have you ever heard of Falco Parkinson?

But you cannot owl me, and I cannot ask you to trust me at all until you have learned whether this information is good. Therefore, I will close this letter for now.

Please do not make an attempt to find out who I am. My father wants little to do with the wizarding world, and my mother, though she is more tolerant than my father, lets him have control over my life. I have reached the age of twenty without ever having left the house more than about once a month.

It is not only my own freedom I am fighting for, Minister, but that is a part of it.

The Liberator.

Chapter Ninety-Seven: The Third Greatest Is Loyalty

Rufus drummed his fingers on the desk and stared at the two letters that had come yesterday. To one, of course, he'd sent a reply at once, naming a time for today that he hoped would work. To the other, no reply was possible.

Who is the Liberator? Rufus picked up the parchment and smoothed it down again. He had used some of the more common charms to identify handwriting, and none of the Wizengamot members, nor someone else high-ranking in the Ministry, had written this. Rufus, of course, was not prepared to simply accept that the writer was what he sounded like—a young wizard living in a family with ties to the Order of the Phoenix—but he had assigned a few Aurors to look in on Madam Malkin's when they had time, and Tonks to observe Gina de Rousseau. Tonks might struggle to keep her feet at times, but she was, for obvious reasons, the best Auror in the Department at passing unnoticed.

"Sir?"

Rufus looked up. That was Wilmot, who'd been on guard outside his door. "Yes, Edmund?" Rufus made his voice as calm and welcoming as possible. Wilmot had been jumpy lately. Of course, he did seem to have a strong reaction to the moves that Rufus had made with the Wolfsbane, and they were drawing closer to the full moon again. Whatever troubles the man had in his past involving werewolves, the mood in the Ministry would only accent, not help him overcome.

"The room you designated as the Apparition location for the vates just twinged its wards, sir."

Rufus nodded. "Thank you, Edmund."

Wilmot lingered another moment. "There are two people with him, sir."

Rufus smiled. Soothing nervous Aurors was one of his areas of expertise. "I would be surprised if he had come alone," he said. "You may go to escort them up yourself, Wilmot. The notice-me-not glamours the room placed on them should pass muster with most of the Department, though.” The room he’d described in his return letter to Harry, where he’d dropped the Ministry anti-Apparition wards in order to give him a chance to enter unnoticed, was a small interrogation room in the middle of the Department of Magical Law Enforcement.

“And you’re sure that you’ll be safe, sir?” Wilmot gazed at him, anxious lines curling around his blue eyes.

Rufus didn’t look at the far right corner of his office, but only because of practice. Percy Weasley sat there under a powerful glamour, ready to fire some of the spells he was picking up in Training if anyone unexpected came through the door. “I will, Wilmot. There’s Edges at one end of the hall and Grant at the other. I’ll survive.”

Wilmot jerked out a nod, and then turned and left. Rufus heard a snort from Percy’s corner. The young man didn’t seem to trust the older—but then, he was passing through the stage of the Training in which new Aurors were instructed not to trust anyone. Rufus had spent a month in absolute paranoia. Of course, his instruction had been Alastor. It was one of the many reasons Rufus mourned losing Moody to Harry. No one could put the alertness and constant vigilance in a young recruit’s head like Mad-Eye Moody.

“That will do, Weasley,” said Rufus. The glamour would fool the sight of almost anyone but Rufus himself, but it covered sounds less well. So Percy had to put up with folding his arms, leaning back, and sulking. Rufus returned his gaze to the door again.

He wondered what he would say to Harry. He wondered if the young man—he wouldn’t be a boy after the Daily Prophet’s reports on some of the happenings at Hogwarts—understood what he was walking into now, how the world had changed while he endured a siege and a battle and a mercy-killing.

A week ago, Rufus might have been too cautious to meet with Harry, even if he had been able to leave Hogwarts then. The world had exploded. The Daily Prophet was equally full of reports that painted the students as innocent victims of a monstrous tyrant and ones that hinted that if Harry had been properly managed and the Boy-Who-Lived moved to a safe place while there was still time, then this wouldn't have happened. The British wizarding world was a cauldron of hysteria and panic that could overflow at any moment. Rufus considered it a true miracle that no parents had gone to the battlefield and tried to break through the Dark Lord's Death Eaters to rescue their children.

And then had come the battle that destroyed, so far as the press was concerned, every single Death Eater on the field. And Voldemort had vanished entirely from sight since then. And the majority of the children had come through alive, and some of them were all too eager to talk about how the great Harry had saved them all—or might have hurt them, but had instead saved them all.

So a new current had joined the brewing cauldron, and it was all moving so fast now that Rufus didn't think his enemies knew what to do any more than he did. The main difference was that most of them weren't used to surviving chaos in Slytherin House and in the Auror Office, and he was. He would balance better than they did, and react faster.

And it meant that there was an enormous explosion of goodwill building up for Harry, right alongside the enormous explosion of ill-will. Rufus intended to make him aware of that weapon, if he didn't know it yet.

"Someone here, sir," Percy said, a moment before the wards on Rufus's door twinged to let him know that Wilmot was here with their guests.

Rufus gave Percy an approving glance, which caused Percy to blush and duck his head. Young Weasley's special talent was outguessing wards, knowing a moment before they did what they were going to sense and say. His instructors had been excited enough by it that Rufus had had three separate reports about Percy's skill on his desk before the end of the day on which he'd first displayed it.

"Come in," Rufus called, before even the first knock could sound.

Wilmot opened the door and came first, of course, because he wouldn't want one of the visitors shooting a curse at the Minister. Rufus wasn't sure his caution wasn't justified. The figure walking on one side of Harry, he saw as the wards on his office removed the notice-me-not glamour, was Severus Snape. On the other came Peter Pettigrew, the innocent man Rufus's own Department had imprisoned in Azkaban, the result of Dumbledore's concerted, and successful, attempt to fool them all.

Rufus was torn between the urge to apologize every time he saw Pettigrew and the urge to interrogate him again until he admitted the Aurors had been right all along and that they hadn't been blinded by the emotion of the night the Dark Lord fell. He stood to nod to both of them, and extend his hand to Harry.

"Harry," he murmured.

Harry nodded to him and leaned forward to clasp his wrist. He was pale, the circles under his eyes so pronounced that Rufus didn't think the glasses would distract anyone's attention from them, but he looked balanced and calm—determined to make it through, really. His magic hummed around him with a strength that made Rufus feel clear-headed and eased just being in his presence. That was a weapon, too, though Rufus was not sure if Harry would see it as such.

"Thank you for making time to see me today, Minister," Harry said formally, and sat down in one of the three chairs Rufus had had Wilmot bring in earlier. He'd guessed three visitors, though his only true basis for that had been the fact that Harry had come with Severus Snape and Remus Lupin the last time he arrived. Rufus congratulated himself on his foresight. "I wasn't sure if you would. I know that the Wizengamot has largely tied your hands on the werewolf issue."

"They've tied my hands," Rufus agreed, and then waved his wand beneath his desk. Wards closed around the room, making what was said inside inaudible even to the ears of Edges and Grant, the Aurors waiting in the hall. It was a dangerous precaution; at least once a Minister had been assassinated behind such soundproof wards. But Rufus needed to make sure that no Wizengamot spy, or ordinary citizen doing what he thought was the best thing for the Ministry he served, could hear this and pass it on. "Or they think they have. Your Midsummer battle upset the political balance of absolutely everyone, Harry."

Harry tensed, but lifted his eyebrows politely. "Oh?" Beside him, his guardian put his hand on his wand. Rufus gave him a sharp glare, and Snape lifted his hand, though he was scowling. The man needs more lessons in how to be a Slytherin, at least when his son is in the room, Rufus thought, and turned back to Harry.

"Yes," he said. "Our world is more intensely interested in you than they have ever been, Harry."

Harry frowned. "Because I'm the Boy-Who-Lived?" Rufus nodded his approval. The boy was at least testing out the limitations and basis of his new power, rather than believing the first person who told him it existed.

"Not only because of that," he said. "Because you fought your first great battle against You-Know-Who and survived, Harry. You did more than survive. You drove him from the battlefield. Is it true that all his Death Eaters are dead?"

Harry shook his head. "Indigena Yaxley managed to get away, and there are a few who were never confirmed dead. It's hard to tell though, sir, since so many of them were recruited in other countries."

Rufus smiled. Headmistress McGonagall had informed him of the way Voldemort tended to recruit Death Eaters in some of those other countries. He was looking forward to using the information she'd owed him. "And how many Death Eaters would you say were on the battlefield, Harry?"

Harry's headshake this time was slower. "Over five hundred, sir, but once again, exact numbers are hard to come by."

"Over five hundred will do," said Rufus. "It's the number the Daily Prophet's been reporting, as a matter of fact. Over five hundred Death Eaters, Harry, and only a few of them might have survived.” He leaned forward. “And Voldemort?”

“Wounded,” said Harry quietly. “I cut a hole in his magical core. Whenever he tries to use his power, it will slip away from him, and the same thing will happen to any magic he absorbs.”

Rufus laughed. Harry frowned at him. “I don’t understand, sir,” he said. “You’re speaking as if I have a chance at winning supporters. There must be people who hate me for what I did at the siege.” He was pale, but he held Rufus’s eyes. “Philip Willoughby and Aurora Whitestag have already contacted you, I suppose?”

“They have,” said Rufus. “Frankly, Willoughby’s case will only convince zealots. Whitestag is more of a problem, because she sounds rational, but there are ways to combat even that, Harry. Do you want me to tell you what they are?”

Harry nodded. His eyes were still wide, blinking occasionally. Rufus stifled the urge to laugh again. He really doesn’t know what I’m getting at. I should explain it now, before it gets him further confused.

“You’ve saved lives as well as taken them,” said Rufus quietly. “You made sure that Hogwarts came through the battle intact.”

“There were also the wards, and Headmistress McGonagall, and Auror Moody—” Harry began, his face vaguely alarmed.

“That will matter only to the detail-obsessed,” said Rufus. “You must understand, Harry, that while there will be people who look at your mistakes and hate you for them, there are others who accept you so thoroughly as the Boy-Who-Lived that you are their hero. And now they have something to venerate you for other than the destruction of Voldemort as a baby, or even turning back the storm on Midwinter, which not many of them know the details of. There’s a new mythology growing around you already, Harry.”

Harry sighed. “Minister, I’ve been through this before. When the Prophet was calling me the Young Hero last year, it didn’t prevent them from printing stories that called me an abuse victim and weak for it, or Argus Veritaserum's articles that said I wasn't being true to my ideals."

"This groundswell is stronger," said Rufus. "You think, or only believe, that the other one must be the strongest, Harry. That would have something to do with the guilt you're carrying?"

Harry gave a slashing nod. Snape turned around and stared at him in concern. Work on him this summer, then, Rufus thought, hoping the other man would hear his thoughts. Remind him that just because he has done evil does not mean he has done no good—and that becomes especially true if we assume that it is good and evil in the eyes of other people.

"There are supporters who will come to your side," said Rufus, "vindicated for their faith in you, thrilled to the depths of their beings by what you have done in this battle, and rejoicing in their freedom when they hear about You-Know-Who's wound."

Harry's face grew impossibly more distressed. "And they'll be following me, sir, for all the wrong reasons," he said. "I don't want to be branded a hero because I'm also branded a killer."

Rufus shook his head. "Whatever else, whoever else, you want them to follow, Harry, your best bet of getting them to follow that ideal or that person is to use the power you have. They'll listen to you because you're the Boy-Who-Lived, first, and because you won this battle—rather resoundingly. And as for admiration of killing..." Rufus turned his hands upward. "Our society is wounded and sick at the core, perhaps. But once again, to heal that you need to approach it from the inside out, unless you want to use your magic to force others to act better."

Harry's face had actually changed on his last words, so that he looked something like thoughtful. He glanced up at Rufus and nodded when his speech was done. "I—thank you, Minister," he said. "You've given me something to think about." He leaned forward. "I'm afraid I won't be able to put your advice into motion right away, though. I'm planning to leave for the summer."

“And go where?” Rufus asked.

Harry exchanged a look with Snape and then with Pettigrew. Snape shook his head. Pettigrew nodded.

Harry moved his hand in a quick, sweeping gesture that created a box of white light around himself, Snape, Pettigrew, and the Minister. That shut Wilmot and even Percy out; Rufus was certain Harry had noticed Percy from the moment he walked in. Inside the box, Harry leaned closer.

“I have a sanctuary to retreat to for the summer, sir,” he said. “I deliberately made Voldemort’s defeat as crushing as possible so that I wouldn’t have to rush back the moment he stirred and try to prevent a raid or confront him. Of course, I didn’t anticipate how—boiling—the wizarding world would be because of things like my mercy killing.” He paused a moment. “We’re going to tell other people that I’ve been removed from Hogwarts so that I can train how to kill Voldemort, and that should satisfy Whitestag and her cronies for a time. I’ll be in a place where I can’t quickly receive owls, though, so I won’t be able to keep up with what changes here myself.”

Rufus blinked for a moment. Then he said, “And what will you do at the sanctuary, Harry?” He could not imagine that there was anything Harry would consider more important than his duty to the wizarding world, or, at least, his duty to the magical creature part of it.

Harry gave him a small, fragile smile. “Heal, sir,” he murmured. “I haven’t healed the wounds from my parents’ abuse completely yet, though I’ve tried. But here—there are simply too many things happening, too many causes that need my help. I’m going away for two months of rest so that, by the time I return, I can be all the stronger for handling them.”

Rufus stared at him. For a long moment, the words he wanted wouldn’t emerge from his throat. Then he said, “You haven’t healed?”

Harry shook his head. “I haven’t had time, sir. Really, no need to look so surprised.” He chuckled. “I would be surprised if you have the time to attend weekly sessions with a Mind-Healer in St. Mungo’s, either.”

"I have made the time when I needed it," said Rufus, "in the wake of the Capto Horrifer, for instance. Many other Ministry employees did the same thing, Mr.—Harry." He studied the young man in front of him again. Yes, many things made sense now. What was absolutely astonishing was that he had managed to walk into the office under his own power, in Rufus's opinion.

Harry blinked and hitched up a shoulder. "Then I suppose it's time, Minister," he said. "I didn't know the wizarding world and the shifts in opinion were quite that violent, though. I did want to tell you I would be out of reach." He sat back in his chair and took a deep breath. "Can I count on you to manage the brewing cauldron for me while I'm gone, and try to keep it from spilling over?"

"I would prefer to manage it for you," said Rufus bluntly. In the name of Merlin, I would have ordered him to take a rest, as I can do with my Aurors, if I thought it would do any good. "I know how to use the power of your name better than you do, Harry, and it seems that I am also more willing to do so."

Abruptly, Harry frowned. "But I shouldn't make you do something I would be unwilling to do myself—" he began.

"Harry," Snape hissed, leaning closer to his ward. Rufus watched in interest as Harry turned and looked up at him, his attention shifting from polite and focused to utterly intent. So this is what he looks like when he trusts someone enough to really listen to him. "You need to be protected, as much as possible, from the shrill invective the press will hurl at you. The Minister is offering to do it. When someone offers to do something like that for you, the proper course is to thank them."

Harry opened his mouth in what looked like the beginning of an argument.

"And you have promised by blood and breath and bone to go with Draco to the Sanctuary tomorrow," Snape finished.

Harry shut his mouth. For a long moment, he chewed his lower lip instead, and then he nodded firmly and turned back to the Minister.

"I thank you for the offer, sir," he said. "It has to be done, and I won't be here to do it." For a moment, he looked wistful. Rufus knew that look all too well. Some of his more work-addicted Aurors had worn it at times. Harry was trying to think of some way around the oath, or, at least, of how he wished there was a way around the oath.

"All of that is true," said Rufus, before Harry could really manage to change his mind. "We'll begin with the Boy-Who-Lived proving himself again, with the announcement of Voldemort's real condition, and with the deception that you've gone away to train. All of that will provide a good weapon, and answer to those who think that you must do more. I would like to see what 'more' they mean, after the Midsummer battle."

Harry blinked as if waking from a dream, and then nodded slowly. "I am also trying to bring the werewolf problem to a resting place, Minister," he said. "I've informed Loki that I'll side with the Ministry if he bites more people, and with him if that's the reason the Ministry is hunting his pack. And of course I can always side with werewolves who are not part of his pack. For as much chaos as they've caused, Loki's group is small, I know."

"I would not be so sure of that," said Rufus. "We've heard of Loki for years from rogue werewolves. I thought him a myth, but if you've met him in the flesh—"

"And received a letter from him." Harry nodded. "And, yes, it's always possible that he commands more people than I know about, but he does not speak for all the werewolves in Britain. Even if he did, then I would work for equal rights, and then make sure that werewolves were tried for biting the unwilling, or for murder if they killed their victims. They can't live both inside and outside our society, Minister, protected by our laws when they want to be and then doing things that are only legal by their own. Sooner or later, they'll have to make compromises."

Rufus found himself smiling. When Harry was animated, he was a sight to see. And this shine in his eyes was probably what made people ignore the dark circles under them, and so this was a double-edged weapon. Rufus reminded himself to see clearly. Husbanded, Harry's fire might burn for a long time, and accomplish the reforms that he so wanted to see accomplished. But it could burn out too easily.

"Understood, Harry," Rufus murmured. "And you will get no argument from me." He hesitated a moment, but he could not see Pettigrew and Snape spreading this any more than he could Wilmot, and Harry deserved to know. "I have arranged for confiscated Potions ingredients to be turned over to a cousin of mine," he told Harry. "He loves to brew, but is more interested in pure creation than credit or money; the moment he is done working on one potion, he moves on to the next. He has always wanted to brew Wolfsbane, and it's complex enough to keep him happy for a time. I've been distributing Wolfsbane to those registered werewolves too poor to afford it—on the quiet, of course, since the Wizengamot would have a fit if they knew."

The shine in Harry's eyes became so bright that Rufus found a trace of the impulse to follow quivering in his body. This was the leader Harry's allies had found, then, if only for a glimpse, the young man who would risk everything he had for someone else, whose greatest commitment was free will, who offered gratitude and admiration freely but couldn't see why others offered it to him. This man was looking at Rufus as if he'd just announced that the Ministry was repealing all the anti-werewolf laws, and Rufus had to fight to keep from simply grinning and basking in that gaze.

And this is why he's so dangerous, he thought, to temper himself. I can't let my own admiration for him and all he's survived blind me to the fact that he might not always want what's best for the Ministry. In the case of the werewolves, that's certainly true. I can't do things for his approval. I can't take him as my own leader.

"Thank you, Minister," said Harry quietly. "This means more to me than you can know. I know you don't—like werewolves." He picked his way among the words as if he thought he would step on a bladed one.

"I don't like 'em," Rufus said, "because almost all the ones I see are rogues who've bitten or killed someone, and only a few are horrified about it. But I think I am coming to see that not all werewolves are the same. Not even all Death Eaters are the same." He pointedly didn't look at Snape and Pettigrew, because that would have been too easy. "And I can help 'em—the ones who did register, the ones who try to obey our laws and are treated like shit because of it."

Another thoughtful look came across Harry's face. "You know," he murmured, "there might be some people I could introduce you to, Minister, when I come back."

"When you come back, Harry," said Pettigrew firmly. And either he had more of a hold over Harry or his semi-argument with Snape had taught him better, because he lowered his eyes and nodded sheepishly.

"That's true," he said, and looked up at Rufus, extending his hand again. "Thank you, for everything."

"You're more than welcome." Rufus clasped his hand again, and looked into his eyes, and made himself see the shine and the dark circles and the danger that lurked there—danger all the greater because Harry would never know for certain who was following him for his ideals and who for his person. "Good luck in your healing, Harry."

Harry nodded once, and then dismissed the ward that had protected the latter part of their conversation. Wilmot left with him and his guards to escort them back to the Apparition point.

Rufus sat back down and reflected for a moment. Then he felt a dangerous grin widening across his face.

That conversation gave me ideas. He nodded at Percy. "Fetch me the records of Amelia Bones's employment," he commanded.

Percy blinked and frowned even as he bent to fetch them. "Sir?"

"I want to find out how long it's been since she's taken a mandated rest period," said Rufus, and exchanged a shark-like smile of delight with Percy.

Harry had noticed it before, but now he was sure of it. Wilmot was nervous, enough that he could hardly bear to walk down the corridor beside them. Harry could see it in his slightly widened eyes, of course, the way any human wizard would display it, but also in the way he showed his teeth when someone called suddenly from behind an Auror desk. Remus had shown the same signals when he felt upset enough.

"What's the matter?" Harry asked at last, using another small ward so that only he and Wilmot could hear what the man would say.

Wilmot bent down and whispered, "I have some reason to suspect that Loki is visiting the Ministry today."

Harry knew his back had stiffened, but he forced himself to keep walking. "You have some reason?" he asked at last.

"I was once more in contact with the London packs than I am now," Wilmot murmured. "I gave that up a few years ago, when Loki started to have more dominance than I was comfortable with, but I still passed along word of laws that affected us, and other possible problems, the moment I learned of them. And now Loki, under the impression that that makes me loyal, told me that he might find his way into the Ministry a few days before the full moon."

"He intends to bite a target here?" Harry demanded, feeling his magic twine and tighten around him. He caught a glimpse of Snape trying to break through his ward, but he was too angry to care.

"He does," Wilmot said. "Or at least he hinted that, and I am intelligent enough to translate the hints, I think."

Harry restrained the impulse to pick up one of the Auror desks and throw it. "Who?"

"The Minister."

Harry nearly stopped walking and demanded to know why Wilmot hadn't told Scrimgeour, but he understood in another moment. A threat to the Minister's life would result in questioning under Veritaserum. Wilmot would explain, willingly or unwillingly, how he got the information. And the knowledge that he was a werewolf himself would result in his being sacked, left unable to know anything about future assassination attempts on the Minister.

"Do you know where he might have come in?" Harry breathed.

"Unfortunately, no," said Wilmot. "He can use that damn pack magic to vanish, you know. He'll be especially careful since this is just a scouting mission. And I think—"

Harry caught a blurred glimpse of pale hair as something appeared off to the side and moved at him. It was Loki, Harry knew, and he was coming with strength and speed that Harry didn't think he could match, in those few moments of numb surprise.

Wilmot moved at the exact same moment. He seized Loki's arms and whirled, slamming him into the wall and holding him there. Harry heard gasps from the Aurors around them, and dismissed the ward that had concealed his and Wilmot's conversation. He looked at Peter.

"Stall them," he insisted. "Tell them that this is just a grieving parent who wants justice for what was done to his children at Hogwarts."

"But what about—" said Peter.

"No time," said Harry, and then shifted nearer to Loki and Wilmot. Snape was coming behind him, his steps slow as death. Harry reached back and gripped his wrist once, asking, pleading, for him to hold on to his hatred and not fling a spell. It was especially important since they were in the Ministry and a Dark Arts curse would bring the Department of Magical Law Enforcement down on them like a pack of rabid wolves.

What an appropriate metaphor, Harry thought. Then Snape squeezed back, and Harry was free to move over to the little scene against the wall, while Peter explained matters to the Aurors and made excuses for the sudden presence of the Boy-Who-Lived in a calm, carrying voice.

Loki was staring at Wilmot with his teeth bared. This close to the full moon, Harry thought, he looked feral. His teeth were slightly longer, and his pale hair wild. And perhaps it was just the effect of shock at Wilmot's betrayal, or not being in control of the situation as he had been when he confronted Harry by the lake, but he looked far more vulnerable, too.

Wilmot had his teeth against Loki's throat, lightly scraping it as he spoke. Harry had to use magic to sharpen his ears so that he could hear.

"—gave my loyalty to someone else, Loki. I won't allow you to hurt him."

"How would you justify killing me?" Loki whispered. "Now, here?"

"I don't have to justify killing you," Wilmot said. "I have to justify manhandling you, and that's all. You would have to justify lunging at the Boy-Who-Lived, and I don't think you can do that right now."

Loki stared at Wilmot, the amber of his eyes growing deeper. Wilmot laughed, a sound that trailed off in a growl.

"Do not try that charisma shit on me, Loki." He snapped his teeth again, this time taking a flap of skin and worrying it between them, to make his point. Harry could feel Snape breathing hard behind him, and reached back to grip his wrist again. "I am not a member of your pack."

"I did not come alone," Loki said, already more relaxed, moving back into the calm, dominant persona Harry remembered of him. "Members of my pack are scattered throughout this room. They could bite. And the bite of a werewolf even in human form can have—unpredictable effects."

Wilmot smiled, and Loki let out a little gasp of pain. "They won't move while you're in danger, Loki," he said.

“They will go from here if you put me in Tullianum,” Loki countered, his head tilting back as though he were inviting Wilmot to tear his throat open, “and bite as many others as they can on the full moon. They’ll run without Wolfsbane.” His eyes shifted sideways to Harry. “And he won’t be here to stop it from happening.”

“Will you refrain from biting those victims if we let you go?” Harry asked. Behind him, he could hear Snape sucking in a deep breath and then saying nothing. He was grateful. His mind was swarming with the consequences of this, if Wilmot did arrest Loki. Loki would not only betray Wilmot’s position in the Aurors—there was nothing to stop him—but his pack would go mad, and for all Harry knew it would begin a rebellion or a full-out war, instead of a biting of chosen victims.

“You will have my word,” said Loki. “We have chosen the Minister for this moon cycle.” He was speaking more and more shallowly as Wilmot’s teeth pressed closer into the skin of his throat. “Or we had, until I saw you. I thought you might appreciate being adopted fully into our pack, vates.”

Harry ignored that, and turned to Wilmot. “Can we trust him if he gives his word?”

“We can,” said Wilmot, “since his pack is here. An alpha lives or dies by his sworn word.” He was trembling with frustration, staring hard at Loki. “I wish there was more we could do,” he said. “There must be.” Loki winced as Wilmot’s teeth made a faint stream of blood trickle down his neck. Harry heard a chorus of phantom growls, and could almost feel the pack pressing closer.

And Harry knew what more could be done.

He stepped forward, and let his magic flap and flash around him, breaking free from its confines. Loki stared at him at once. There was something deep within those amber eyes that was more wizard than werewolf, Harry thought, even on the days of the full moon, and he knew the other man recognized the strength of his magic.

“This is what you are up against,” said Harry softly. “This is what you have pushed me into.” He stared steadily at Loki. “I will have a promise from you now. You will swear that your pack, including you, will make no attacks on chosen victims for the next two months, until September’s full moon.” That was for as long as he would be in the Sanctuary, and as much as Harry thought he could reasonably ask for without triggering either the pack’s protective instincts or Loki’s independent spirit, to the point that he would insist on dying as a sacrifice just to avoid giving that promise.

“And if not?” Loki asked.

“Then I will drain your magic now,” said Harry. He felt his mind shifting again, moving into that crystal-clear place he had been when he killed Dumbledore. “I know how to behead a pack. Your power base will snap and scatter.”

“It will mean open war,” Loki said.

“So does this,” Harry hissed at him, dropping almost into Parseltongue. “You consider me bound, Loki. And it is true that my oath to the werewolves and my vates commitments bind me from simply killing you the moment you make trouble, or trying to constrain you never to bite anyone again, even in self-defense. I have to try to leave your free will free, and your people have suffered enough that I do not want to take a strong leader who could better their lives from them. But when you push me into a corner, I will strike back.” He was shaking, he could feel himself shaking, but his magic was also getting ready. A black snake appeared, winding around his neck, and hissed at Loki on its own. “I have to leave, I am bound to that, and I have to protect the free will of both the werewolves and the Ministry; I am bound to that. But if it is the only way to keep both oaths, I will accept the utter destruction of one pack. You have proven impenetrable to reason so far, Loki. Can you learn it?”

Loki kept looking at him as if seeing him for the first time. Then, finally, he said, “You—you are trying.”

He can learn. Perhaps. But Harry remembered the werewolves with their teeth on Draco’s and Snape’s and Moody’s throats, and held himself wary. "I am trying," he said. "And I must leave tomorrow, and I do not want to leave the wizarding world in chaos. Understand. I am the most powerful friend you have at the moment, since you have worked so hard to alienate the Wizengamot, and panic is brewing in the rest of the wizarding world. I will not be here. That means that, yes, you might get away with biting innocent victims. On the other hand, the Ministry might hunt your pack to death in the meantime. I won't be here to prevent that, either. I tried to explain this in the letter. I see little evidence that the words even cracked the wax in your ears."

Loki said, "I will swear, on my word as alpha, that neither I nor anyone else in my pack will bite except in self-defense until September's full moon."

Harry nodded sharply and stepped back. The arrogance was already returning to Loki's voice. He knew he could not push.

Loki could, though. He turned to Wilmot with a lazy smile as the Auror lifted his head and murmured, "The Minister might receive an anonymous owl, you know, a few days in the future, telling him about a certain werewolf in his staff."

"And then they would question me with Veritaserum, to determine how I avoided detection for so long," Wilmot said, his voice also casual. "And I would tell them everything I knew, of course, including the location of a certain London pack. And all the weaknesses I knew in that pack. Tell me, Loki, does Gudrun still have a bad left leg?"

Loki began a bubbling snarl in his throat. Harry let the black snake rear up and hiss again, while the air around him grew cold enough to make their breath steam. Loki glanced at him and cut the snarl off.

"A truce," he said. "For now." His eyes were locked on Harry, shining brilliantly. "Vates," he said.

Wilmot backed away and said, "That is enough. You have a right to your anger and your grief, and since you didn't actually succeed in assaulting Harry, then I suppose he won't want to press charges." Harry shook his head in relief; Wilmot must have heard the story

Peter was telling. "But you must leave the Ministry now. I will escort you out, personally." He gripped Loki's elbow. Loki went tamely, muttering. The other Aurors sat down behind their desks, and, Harry assumed, the rest of the pack followed their leader.

Harry closed his eyes. He felt sick and shaky, even as the snake around his throat dissipated into mist and flowed back into him. He was caught between two conflicting and equally strong impulses. One was the impulse to flee to the Sanctuary right now, before anything else could happen.

The other was to stay here and make sure that nothing else like this could happen, that people kept talking instead of fighting.

Snape's hand closed on his shoulder and steered him firmly the few remaining steps towards their Apparition room, the expression on his face likely preventing the Aurors from clustering around either to insult him or thank him. Harry sighed and shook his head as he walked. He couldn't stay. The oath he'd sworn would start choking him if he tried.

He had to wonder, though, if even the Sanctuary would be able to keep him from thinking about the werewolf problem.

Chapter Ninety-Eight: G.U.T.O.E.K.O.M

Harry sighed and sat back against the wall as he picked at his breakfast. The letter from the MacFusty clan had finally arrived, and they'd reassured Harry that they'd seen Acies settling on a barren rock in the middle of the Hebrides, probably drawn by the presence of their Hebridean Black dragons, and going to sleep. It was the starvation sleep, as one of the handlers called it; she would be ravenous when she woke, but it was likely she wouldn't wake for a good two or three months. The MacFusty wizards had been Dragon-Keepers for so long that they retained some records that were—or purported to be—about the British Red-Gold. Harry trusted them to keep an eye on her, at least.

He glanced at his breakfast and picked at it again. It still looked as unappetizing as it ever had. He supposed he could have waited until someone else woke up so that they could provide the conversation to season the food, at least, but he hadn't wanted to. He hadn't slept last night, so it had seemed easy to go to the kitchens, ask for the necessary components to make a sandwich from the house elves, and then retreat up to the top of the North Tower.

Waiting for the MacFusty letter had been only part of the reason for his insomnia. There was also the anxiety about leaving the wizarding world for so long, now that he was on the verge of doing so.

Can I justify abandoning everything I have to do?

Harry picked up the Daily Prophet lying beside him and gave it a good shake out. The wind promptly tried to tear it from his hand. Harry snorted and leaned his back on the stones of the Tower, turning so that he could read the headlines in the fall of early sunlight. A few days past Midsummer, the days had started to shorten, but not by much as yet.

YOU-KNOW-WHO WOUNDED

The headline led off a front-page story by Rita Skeeter. Harry was happy she had got to write it, at least. He skimmed through the story, noting with a faint smile that Skeeter declared as true and proven things that most other reporters hedged around with words like “alleged.” Either she was just that confident, or Scrimgeour had contacted her as the chosen message-bearer. Or perhaps she had been a beetle inside his ward yesterday afternoon, but Harry doubted that. Scrimgeour’s wards had been tight enough to identify an Animagus.

Five hundred Death Eaters dead...You-Know-Who wounded and unable to command the field...Boy-Who-Lived to undergo training during this summer...

Harry wondered for a moment if he should contact the Minister and make sure he’d told Skeeter these details, then shook his head. He’ll see the article, and if he thinks she needs a talking-to, he’ll be the one to give it.

He folded the paper, half with his hand and half with magic, and set it aside. As he did, he saw a shiver of movement from the Tower stairs. His hand turned over automatically, gathering magic.

“I am not welcome to sit with you?” Every tone in Argutus’s voice was wounded.

Harry laughed in spite of his mood and held his left wrist out. Argutus flowed over and coiled his neck around it at once, flicking his tongue out in a contented motion. “Snakes don’t sit,” Harry murmured, leaning back so that the Omen snake’s scales could feel the sunlight.

“Excuses,” said Argutus, even though the Parseltongue word he’d used to mean “sit” translated more like “coil in a relaxed posture.” “I think that you have spent too much time alone today.”

Harry opened his eyes with a frown at that. “It’s only six-something, Argutus.” He could have cast a Tempus charm, but he was enjoying the drape of the snake around him too much to make an effort to move. Argutus had grown large enough and long enough to lap over his shoulders and arms and curl the tip of his tail around his waist. “I haven’t been alone that long. Besides, no one else is awake.”

“You were awake all night.”

Harry remembered, then, that Argutus had taken to the convention of days starting at midnight with extraordinary enthusiasm. He thought humans were very clever to have figured out a point in the dark when a new day could begin. Harry had found him a few times during the siege studying clocks.

“That’s true,” he said, and let himself yawn widely, since his right arm was pinned by Argutus’s shifting coils anyway. A year old now, Argutus was close to full-grown if not already there. “But I’ll rest tonight, Argutus. We’re going to the Sanctuary. That means that we can rest as long as we like for two months, and no one will be nagging us to get out of bed.” It was what he imagined the Sanctuary to be like, at any rate. Since all he really knew of the place came from Vera’s vague descriptions and his one venture into Peter’s mind to remove the phoenix web, Harry didn’t know if the Sanctuary was all white beds, or if that was only one room of it, or even only a representation, without any anchor in reality.

“You need to rest some more. And you need to not be alone.” Argutus sounded as bright and determined about the matter as Millicent had—

Or, no, the comparison was not quite right. Reluctantly, Harry let himself turn to thoughts he’d been avoiding. Argutus sounded a lot like Pansy, when one got right down to it.

“I’ll have the time to rest when we get to the Sanctuary,” he argued, standing. “And I don’t think the Seers will leave me alone.”

“Neither will I.” Argutus adjusted himself so that his head still rested on Harry’s left wrist, but his tail was wrapped more securely over his waist, and the majority of his body covered Harry’s chest and shoulders like some mirrored shirt. Harry could feel his delicate strength, which would suddenly become massive strength if Argutus should ever decide he wanted to crush something. “I have a surprise for you.”

He said nothing more than that, even as Harry made his way down the stairs towards the hospital wing, and finally he had to ask, “What is it?”

“If I told you, it wouldn’t be a surprise.”

Harry was startled into a laugh before he thought about it. That was a distinctly English phrase, which he had translated once for Argutus. He hadn’t thought the Omen snake would remember it.

“Why are you surprised now?” Argutus asked, his tongue flickering out. “Now is not the time for surprises. Now is the time for farewells.”

“You don’t know how accurate you are,” Harry whispered, a heavy weight settling in his chest again. Not only did he not want to say farewell to some of the people he would bid it to—most notably his brother—but he couldn’t shake the feeling that some of them would be gone when he returned to the wider wizarding world. Without him here to protect them, could they survive?

“Now is not the time for sorrow, either,” said Argutus sternly, as they passed through Trelawney’s empty classroom and towards the ladder to climb down. “Now is the time for glad smiles and hugs and perhaps sausages, if there happen to be any lying around.”

It comforted Harry sometimes to remember that, clever or not, Argutus was still a snake, and had his priorities absolutely clear. “Would it have made a difference if I offered to come to the Sanctuary with you?”

Harry pulled back from hugging Connor and stared at him. “What?”

Connor’s eyes were quiet and thoughtful as he watched Harry—a look that Harry had come to dread, though it was an improvement over the snotty blankness he had used in third year. It usually meant he was about to say something perceptive and discomfiting. He had looked like that the whole time he spoke at their parents’ trial, in Harry’s opinion.

“If I’d said I’d go to the Sanctuary with you,” Connor clarified. “Would you still have been as reluctant to go as you are now, Harry?”

“I’m not reluctant to go—“

“Harry, your hand is twitching.” Connor snorted. “That means you’re lying.”

Harry looked down at his hand. “I’ve never noticed that,” he muttered. “And neither have Draco or Snape.”

“They’re more used to watching your face.” Connor shrugged. “Anyway. I want an answer. If I’d offered to go to the Sanctuary, or said that I wanted to heal there and asked you to come with me, would you still look as if it’s tearing the heart out of your chest to go?”

“It would be tearing the heart out of my chest to stay behind,” Harry tried to counter, “given that Draco is going, and—” I’m not going to say anything like “he’s my heart.” That’s too ridiculous. “—And he’s the only one who can make me see sense when I’m being stubborn. Even Snape doesn’t help as much as he does.”

Connor nodded. “But you still don’t want to go. And I’m asking you if it would have made a difference if I were the one asking you to go, and not Draco.”

“What are you, a terrier?” Harry muttered.

“Growl, growl,” Connor said.

Harry sighed and flexed his fingers. But, in the end, he owed his brother the truth.

“I would still be reluctant,” he said. “I would probably be more reluctant, because I trust you to take care of yourself now, unless it’s something like healing after a battle.” He met Connor’s eyes directly. “That’s why I’m glad that Peter’s going with you to Lux Aeterna this summer, and not just so that you can learn to like each other better. I’m worried about that sword.”

“It’s Light,” Connor said, his face changing.

“And what have we learned about Light objects and wizards who use them without questioning them?” Harry asked in his best professor’s tone.

Connor shook his head. “So you’ve got over your dependence on me, then? You wouldn’t want to go to the Sanctuary automatically, the moment I asked you to, just because you wouldn’t want me to heal without your overseeing every step?”

That had been why Harry was reluctant to start this subject in the first place. He still loved Connor, he always would, but Draco had taken a place of importance to him that no one else had. Harry had known that since he’d frozen while Voldemort’s dragon held Draco and threatened him. He might have been able to think if it was anyone else. He had been able to think of a plan while Snape was Voldemort’s prisoner, after all. But hold Draco hostage, and his mind turned to slow-grinding ice.

“Yes, that’s true,” said Harry at last. “I’m sorry, Connor—“

He lost his breath, and the chance to speak the rest of that sentence, when Connor’s arms wrapped around him and he squeezed. “Don’t be,” Connor whispered in his ear. “I’m glad, Harry. I’m so glad. I don’t think I could bear it, now that I know the truth about our childhood, if something in you had been broken and would never recover. I love you, and I want you to be able to have a life apart from me.”

Harry smiled faintly and hugged back, when he could get his arms into a proper position. “That’s not a problem any longer. But I do hope that you’ll always be a part of my life, Connor.”

Connor laughed and stepped away from him. “I think I will, now that I’ve learned to tolerate both a Malfoy being your joined partner and a greasy git being your guardian.”

“Are you quite done, Harry?”

Harry blinked when he realized Snape was standing in the doorway of the Gryffindor common room, the Fat Lady’s muffled protests coming from one side of him. He had a rigid look on his face, as if he were struggling to keep from taking points from Gryffindor even though it was the summer and there were no points to take.

Connor refused to look intimidated. "Professor Snape, sir," he said, with a cheerful little nod. "Come here to escort Harry to his next farewell, just in case slime monsters jump out from around a corner and eat him on the way?"

"Slime monsters," said Snape, in a tone that combined viciousness and boredom both at once. "That is the kind of creature a limited Gryffindor brain would conceive."

Connor said nothing for a moment. Harry looked back anxiously at him, wondering if he would have to soothe genuine anger. He didn't understand it when he realized that Connor's face was stretched in a wide and almost Slytherin smile.

"Why, Professor Snape," said Connor innocently, "I thought you might have learned some admiration for Gryffindor brains. You've trained me in dueling for almost eight months, after all." Snape snorted as if that meant nothing. And it probably didn't, Harry knew. Snape tended to judge all his students by the most competent of them, which meant that unless Connor surpassed Harry in dueling, Snape would probably never respect him. "And then there was my plan to compel the Death Eaters on the flying horses to smash the sirens' tank," Connor continued innocently. "I thought you had some admiration for that."

Absolute silence from Snape's end of the room this time. Harry stared at him, at the surprise written clearly, if momentarily, on his face, and then had to fight the helpless urge to snicker.

He didn't know. Oh, he really didn't know.

Snape recovered in a moment. "That was Harry's doing, and not yours," he said coolly. "If you are quite finished insulting my intelligence, Mr. Potter, then—"

"Why should I be? You've never finished insulting mine. And it's quite strange, at least to me, that you think I would stand here in front of Harry and lie about that. My brother's not the person he once was, Professor. He would certainly protest if I tried to take credit for something he'd done. Instead, as I remember, he was rather concerned about Voldemort holding his boyfriend at the time." Connor moved forward a step, eyes wide and grin now the supposedly helpless and naïve Gryffindor one. "You should worry about insulting him, Professor, by suggesting that he'd let me take credit for that, and that he was less than perfectly concerned about Draco."

Snape said nothing. After scrutinizing him for a moment, Harry realized it was because he had nothing to say.

He turned and gasped Connor's wrist. Connor cocked an eyebrow without taking his gaze from Snape. "Shhh, Harry," he whispered. "I want to enjoy the moment. It's not like it'll happen often."

"I congratulate you on achieving something I've never done for this long," said Harry formally. "In the contest to make Professor Snape act as if the Kneazle had his tongue, Gryffindor House wins."

Connor laughed, and that seemed, at last, to snap Snape's stillness. He looked at Harry, and one glance was enough. Harry gave Connor one more quick hug, and then fell into line behind Snape. He supposed he couldn't blame Snape entirely for wanting to escort him. His lack of sleep last night and his solitary trip to the Tower this morning had not inspired confidence that he might actually go to the Sanctuary, at least in Snape and Draco, oath aside.

Connor waved to him as they departed through the portrait. Harry waved back, and let his last vestiges of worry for his brother melt away. Connor looked entirely comfortable, standing there amidst the red and gold, and if shadows still haunted his eyes from the battle, they would fade.

He and Snape moved halfway down the corridor before Snape said, in an experimental voice, "I suppose you will not tell me this was a joke."

"I know better than to prank you, sir," said Harry.

Snape glared at him for a moment with the reference to the Marauders, but there was no heat behind it. "But he really did not—"

"Yes. He did."

"He could not have—"

"Yes. He did."

Snape fell silent again. Harry could feel him thinking, though, and so he supposed, regretfully, that he couldn't enter that particular silence in the contest to make it seem as if the Kneazle had Snape's tongue. Connor was still the winner there.

"I'll be leaving for two months," Harry repeated as patiently as he could, and held out his hand to Thomas Rhangnara again. "That's why I won't be here to help you research." He studied the man for a moment. His dark hair was crowded with cobwebs, and now and then he swiped at the dust on his cheek as if he knew it was there but didn't know what to do with it. "Have you been home to visit your family at all?" Harry added, mind suddenly filled with horrible visions of Pricilla Burke and her children never knowing if Thomas had survived the battle because he was lost permanently in the Hogwarts library.

For the first time, he coaxed an expression other than wide-eyed dreaminess out of Thomas. "Of course I have," he said indignantly. "And I have been able to go back and forth. The Headmistress has said that I may investigate the library as I like. She'll leave it open for me during the summer."

Harry shook his head in amusement. "And do you remember what I just told you about my going away for the summer?" he prompted gently. Behind him, Snape shifted, but kept his mouth shut. Harry had been reluctantly impressed with his self-control over the past few days, from the confrontation with Belville until now.

"I wish you could stay," said Thomas. "You can provide us with information about centaur magic that we still don't have."

“The centaurs in the Forbidden Forest are friendlier to wizards, now that their web is broken,” Harry offered. “You may be able to learn something from them, as long as you ask carefully.”

Thomas came close to looking deliriously happy. “Thank you,” he said. “I will ask them. And I will be polite about it.”

He probably would, Harry thought. Most people, even centaurs who weren’t used to the norms of wizarding society, would know that Thomas couldn’t possibly mean any offense. He simply wasn’t used to asking for things the way other people were.

“And I know that you have to go,” Thomas continued, “but I wish you could be here to see gootokom released.”

Harry frowned. “What?”

“Gootokom.” Thomas caught his expression of incomprehension then. “Sorry,” he said. “It’s an acronym, one that we’ve created a pronunciation for when we’re talking about it.”

“Who’s we?” Harry asked, and heard Snape shift again.

“Research wizards from every country with a wizarding community,” said Thomas promptly, his face brightening. “We’re calling what we’ve discovered G.U.T.O.E.K.O.M The Grand Unified Theory of Every Kind of Magic.”

Harry blinked a few times. Then he said, “But if you don’t understand centaur magic, then how can it be every kind of magic?”

“That’s one thing we’ve wondered about,” Thomas admitted, a tiny frown wrinkling his brows. “The magical creatures we’ve managed to study so far fit within the parameters, but we know precious little about so many others. And there are all the dead and extinct species that might possess magic like nothing we’ve ever seen and which our theory can’t account for. So some members of our group think that we should change the name to the Grand Unified Theory of Every Kind of Wizarding Magic. Of course, other members of our group argue that if some magical creatures’ powers behave in accordance with our theory, than every one will, and so we can get away with the name. I don't tend to think like that, myself. One example is unicorn knots. They—“ “Rhangnara,” Snape said then, his voice on the edge of a growl. Harry could understand the next words, even if Thomas didn't. Do not get Harry so fascinated that he will not want to go to the Sanctuary.

Thomas blinked, and then nodded. “The theory is ready to be published in a preliminary form,” he told Harry, voice full of excitement. “I've been working on this for years, but that's nothing compared to some of the decades that people have spent on this. You ought to know what some of the wizards in France with connections to the Veela Council have gone through; they've got information on veela magic for us, but only with years of wheedling.”

“So you'll publish it,” said Harry, happy to hear about something that didn't concern war and death and politics, for once. “And you think that I should be here to read it?”

Thomas looked straight at him, and Harry saw the haze in his eyes clear. He was reminded, then, that just because Thomas often went on dreamy flights and tangents of fancy didn't mean he couldn't think.

“I do wish you could be here, yes,” said Thomas. “This theory is going to strike a blow at the very notion of pureblooded wizards, Harry.”

Harry thought for a moment, and then blinked as he realized what the likely reason was. “Magic doesn't follow bloodline,” he whispered.

Thomas shook his head. “It doesn't, not all the time. It interacts with bloodline, but it's nothing as simple as pureblooded wizards having magical children and the magic declining if those children marry Muggles or Squibs or Muggleborns—which was what most of the purebloods all over Europe believed for centuries. The occurrence of Squibs in their own family lines should have taught them better,” Thomas added in a mutter. “It's wilder and more random than that. Pureblood is a cultural distinction. It has none of the physical merit that most of the pureblood wizards try to make it have.”

Harry supposed he should find this appalling. The chaos that such a theory would cause once it got out and about was hard to contemplate. Harry knew that, while many European wizarding communities did not have purebloods completely dominating them, they had a sizable proportion of them, and fights over “blood purity” were sometimes more vicious than in Britain. Thomas and his group of research wizards were innocently proposing to overturn a good many of the beliefs that anchored politics and behavior in the British wizarding world and elsewhere.

And they anchor prejudice and pride, too.

Harry couldn't help himself; the people who detested him for it could blame it on his halfblood status, if they liked. He gave a smile of vicious delight at the thought of the people who had humiliated him at Draco's festival forced to eat their own words, or turning red with rage at the thought of Muggleborns being children of magic even as they were.

Then he thought of what Lucius's face would look like when he found out. Oh, he wished that someone he trusted could be there to snap a photograph of it.

“In fact,” Thomas was babbling on, “one interesting thing we've found is that halfblood wizards are sometimes among the most powerful.” He gave a nod to Harry, and then to Snape. “Not always, of course; there are lots of other factors that could interfere and make them less powerful. And those factors vary depending on the type of magic they receive, and the magic in the vicinity, and whether one parent is Muggleborn or Muggle or Squib or Muggleborn with Squib ancestors or...all kinds of things. But the strident effort to keep from interbreeding with Muggleborn wizards and witches is ridiculous.” Thomas scowled. “I love my culture as much as the next wizard, and if I'd found evidence that proclaimed the bigots were right after all, I'd have to accept that. But I didn't, and they shouldn't try to argue against what we keep finding—not just in Britain, but all over the world. They just shouldn't argue against it. Otherwise, they'll be stupid.” That was, obviously, his ultimate interest.

Harry had to ask one question, despite Snape's impatient shuffle from foot to foot. "And what is it that makes Muggleborns appear and some Squibs appear in pureblood lines? Can you summarize it for me quickly?"

"At core, at bottom?" Thomas smiled. "Well, that's something we still disagree a bit about, because there are a few of us arguing that the choice is completely random. I don't think it is. I think, and most of them are coming to agree with me, that it comes from free will. The magic chooses who it wants to wield it. Interacting with bloodline and place and a dozen other factors, of course. Or maybe more than a dozen. Petrovitch did identify thirteen, but I don't know if I can take—"

"That is enough," said Snape firmly. "Harry, Vera wants us to leave at noon. And you must still say farewell to others."

"That's true," said Harry, reluctantly. He nodded to Thomas. "I'm sorry. You can send me an owl detailing the matter if you like, though it will take a few weeks to reach me with all the shadows around the Seers' Sanctuary."

"I would like that," said Thomas. His face glowed gently. "This is one reason I've been so interested in your work, vates. If I'm right, then free will is the most basic component of magic, and all magic is a great deal more sentient than we ever gave it credit for. And your work as vates respects that more than a Lord who merely orders his magic, and the minds and free wills of others, around."

Harry caught his breath for a moment. Some of the gloom that had gripped him as he worried about what would happen to the wizarding world while he was gone dissipated. "Thank you, Thomas," he whispered.

"No problem at all." Thomas gazed at him with a fond smile. "I do rather like you, Harry, and your approach to magic has won my admiration."

Harry smiled at him and took his leave, with Snape's hand on his shoulder. His mind was buzzing with new ideas, though, especially given that he'd spent part of the three days before he'd promised Draco he would go to the Sanctuary draining Black artifacts of magic and giving the power to the newly-made Squibs. He had to chuckle.

“What?” Snape demanded. Harry wondered if he’d been rattled at the thought of pureblood prejudices being wrong, or something else.

“I was thinking of what would happen if I absorbed magic from something else, or an enemy, like Belville’s magic,” said Harry, and waited.

“And?” Snape insisted, after a moment.

“And then gave the magic to a Muggle,” Harry finished innocently. “Many people get nervous because I can take their magic away, but what about making wizards? I can see why it hasn’t been done often, if at all. First you’d need to be an absorbere, and then you’d need to sacrifice the magic, which most people are reluctant to do. Dumbledore certainly never envisioned me doing it, and Voldemort never would. But what would happen if I did?”

“Save the revolution for after the Sanctuary,” Snape said gruffly. “Besides, the magic would likely drain away from them at once.”

“Perhaps I could create a magical core—“

“Rhangnara will make you as awful as himself, before he is done,” Snape muttered, and dragged Harry firmly down the hallway, while Harry busied himself in picturing Lucius’s response to that. Hawthorn had never felt so ashamed in her life as she watched Harry hold both her hands in his and stare at her. “And you’ll be all right this summer?” he asked. “You won’t be alone?”

“Delilah and Claudia will stay with me,” said Hawthorn softly. “Do not worry about it, Harry. I leaned on you too much in the first days after the siege, and for that, I am ashamed. I can only plead the blindness and madness of grief.”

Harry blinked at her. “I don’t know what you mean,” he said. “I was offering solace and comfort to anyone who needed it, and you needed it more than most, Mrs. Parkinson. Your husband your daughter, both gone.” He drew in a breath like fishhooks. “You had a right to mourn.”

Hawthorn tried to think of what she could say to get her meaning across and not have Harry reject it at once. Then she shook her head and pulled him into an embrace. Harry went along with it, though he lay stiffly against her and took a long moment to hug her back. He was still startled whenever someone did this to him, Hawthorn thought, still a bit wary.

“I will mourn,” she said softly. “But I won’t mourn them forever, Harry. It’s why I wouldn’t have made a good necromancer. I’m not ready to sacrifice life, to give up closeness to the living world as both Pansy and Dragonsbane did. I want to retreat for a short time, even as you will, and then I am ready to embrace it.” She thought of the pain in her Dark Mark she had feared was infected, which had stopped the morning of the battle. She now thought it must have been the moment when Harry wounded Voldemort so badly that he was forced to go into hiding, though she had been involved in her grief and hadn’t noticed. A quick check with Snape, Lucius, Adalrico, and Pettigrew had revealed that their pain had stopped as well. Whatever the Dark Lord had been trying to do with their Marks, it hadn’t worked.

“That is brave of you,” said Harry.

“What you did was braver.” Hawthorn crouched down in front of him so that he wouldn’t have to strain his neck to look up at her. “To continue the struggle even though you had people asking things of you they would have no right to ask, grief or not. Harry, one thing I hope you learn in the Sanctuary is how to know when people are taking advantage of you, and how to refuse them.”

Harry rolled his eyes. “Everybody says that,” he said.

“Everybody has a point.” Hawthorn kissed his forehead, on the scar, and resisted the temptation to lick it. Such gestures were for the pack. “I will see you, well and healed, in the autumn.”

Harry nodded, and stepped away from her, turning to look at Snape. Snape nodded, and guided him towards the hospital wing.

Hawthorn stood straight, watching them go, and then went towards her own room. She would stay in Hogwarts a few more days. She would take Wolfsbane on the nights of the full moon and run in the Forbidden Forest with Delilah and Claudia beside her. Then she could begin to think about healing.

On my own, this time, she thought as she shut her door behind her. I was tottering, but that was no reason to lean on the first shoulder that was offered, without thinking to look and see if that person needed support of his own.

Learn, Harry. Heal. Return to us stronger. That is for our sake, and the sake of the alliance, and your own. I want to see what you will become when you are healed.

Harry wrapped his arms around himself and tried to control his shivering. He thought he had everything he needed. His trunk was beside him, full of his school supplies, his clothes, his alliance gifts, and his Christmas gifts, as well as some books from the Black library, shrunk to fit. Argutus coiled lazily around his body, and the Many snake was wrapped around his neck. He'd said farewell to everyone he could think of, including Connor twice, when he'd shown up to the hospital wing and hugged Harry as if he'd sworn an oath of his own to do it for at least twenty minutes.

He was not cold. With the sun beaming down on the North Tower, where they waited for the carriage that would convey them to the Sanctuary, Harry could not be cold. And Argutus would have complained if he were.

He was shivering because he did not know if he could do this, after all, because the thought of going into a place like the Sanctuary and willingly letting other people see him hurt like mad.

"Harry."

Harry turned around. Draco, who'd said a private goodbye to Lucius and Narcissa this morning, was there, floating on an enchanted hospital bed. He watched Harry with sharp eyes, and Harry forced himself to incline his head.

"It's all right," Draco said softly. "I wouldn't ever take you to a place that would hurt you more than it would heal you, and I wouldn't ask you to go to a place like that for my sake, either. I truly believe it will be all right."

Harry walked over to him and leaned on his shoulder, letting Draco put an arm around his neck and hold him close. At least Draco would be there, he thought. He would have someone he trusted and loved, and someone who needed him, so that Harry could tend to Draco if his own healing became too much.

"Harry."

He turned. Vera had mounted the stairs, with a shrunken trunk of her own in her hand, and behind her was Snape, with his trunk and Draco's. Snape's scowl was as present as ever.

"It will be all right," Vera said, echoing Draco's words, which Harry supposed she must have heard. "We understand that the moments before healing can be just as terrifying as the moments of enduring the abuse. We know that. But you need this so badly."

Harry inclined his head in a shallow nod, and worked to keep himself from hyperventilating. He concentrated on Vera as she stood with her head back, studying the sky for a moment, and then smiled and pointed.

Harry turned, and saw a small white shape moving rapidly through the air towards them. Harry strained to see some sign of winged horses pulling it and couldn't manage. The carriage was white, carved of some material that radiated rainbow colors like mother-of-pearl, and looked just large enough and round enough for four to travel comfortably. It had no wheels. When Harry truly squinted, he thought he could see some sign of a golden rope running across the sky, on which it slid, but the rope faded away without trace when he looked for it again.

The carriage stopped with a gentle bump against the Tower, and Vera nodded to them as she opened the door. "Draco should enter first,” she said, “to find a safe resting place and insure he is not jostled.”

Snape floated Draco inside, and then entered himself. That left Vera, holding the door, and Harry, standing at a distance from the carriage and feeling the greatest surge of reluctance he’d felt since he first dreamed the plan to go to the Sanctuary up.

“Harry,” said Vera again, and stretched out her free hand. “They will be well without you for two months.”

“You can’t know that,” Harry said. “You can’t See the future.”

“No, we can’t.” Vera’s face was infuriatingly serene. “But it is time, Harry, that they learned not to depend solely on you. The Lady Wolf knows it. Your Malfoy’s parents know it. Your Headmistress knows it. The others will learn. You are vates, and Boy-Who-Lived, and many other things, but you cannot be the answer to every problem, the bandage to every wound.” Her voice softened, as if she understood how much Harry hated hearing the words spoken aloud. “Especially when you have wounds of your own.”

Harry closed his eyes. He would hurt if he stayed in the wizarding world, but at least he would feel that he was doing his duty.

Blood and bone and breath. You swore.

Sometimes there is a higher duty.

Slowly, he stepped forward, climbed into the carriage, and took the seat beside Draco, not looking Vera in the eye. He felt Draco’s arm stretch around his shoulders again and tug him tightly against him. Argutus gave a crooning hiss.

“I can show you your surprise soon,” he said. “Do not be sad. Now is not a time for sorrow.”

Harry felt the carriage bobble as Vera climbed in, and then the door shut. They rose and skimmed, faster and more smoothly than would have been possible on a broomstick, towards a direction Harry thought was the east and south.

He kept his head buried in Draco's shoulder, and did not look up, and tried to ignore his terror.

Chapter Ninety-Nine: Sanctuary

Harry woke slowly. He opened his eyes and saw cloth, then realized the pain in his neck had accelerated to the point of waking him up. He must have spent hours with his head buried in Draco's shoulder.

He sat back, rubbing at his neck, and Draco stirred and murmured, then shifted sideways and leaned against the carriage door. Harry glanced over his head. He could barely see anything, a combination of smudged glasses and the night that seemed to have fallen outside.

"We are in the shadows."

Harry jumped. Vera, who sat across from him, watched his every motion like a cat watching a mousehole—no, not quite that blatantly, Harry thought. But it was unnerving. He turned back to the shadows, squinting. He couldn't see a sign of light, not even the stars or the nearly full moon. "I didn't realize they looked like this," he said softly.

"Yes," Vera said. "We made a bargain with one of the dead magical species long ago, cousins of the Dementors. We could not use illusions, even to shield the Sanctuary and help us preserve our sanity, but they could. In return for their shielding us, we Saw a way for them to die at last."

Harry looked at her in wonder. "How long ago was that? Do you know what they were?"

Vera shook her head. "The records call them shadow-weavers, or shadowborn, and why not? But we have never been able to make that match with any history of magical creatures and wizards. Perhaps they were not even cousins of the Dementors, as the legend claims. We See the present most clearly, Harry, and recording the past is of assistance to us only in understanding our patients. I suspect those ancient Seers, once the shadow-weavers had done what they promised and left the world, did not care enough to retain the name."

Harry turned back to the windows one more time without answering. Her gaze had been piercing when she said that they understood and kept their patients' pasts recorded, and he couldn't blame her for that. But he didn't have to stare into her face in some sort of silent communication.

He flinched when he realized that he could see something in the shadows this time. It was the bird with claws on its wings, teeth in its beak, and the lizard tail. It kept pace with the carriage, though Harry knew, if the vehicle had maintained its smooth, easy speed, that could not be easy. It turned its head towards the window and shrieked. Harry heard the shriek as mocking laughter. He wondered what would happen if it tried to enter and wound him, and if even a Seer could notice it. But the bird swerved off a moment later, and buried itself in the shadows with a flit of its tail.

"Harry?"

Harry realized he was shaking, his right hand clamped over the stump of his left wrist. He began counting to Mermish in his mind to make himself relax. When he thought he wouldn't shriek or plead for help, he gave Vera a fragile nod. "I'm well. I just saw something out the window that startled me."

Vera gazed at him in silence for a moment. "No one can see anything in the shadows," she said softly. "Nothing that is really there, at least. Hallucinations are, of course, excepted, and so are illusions."

Harry bowed his head and shrugged. "I suppose I'm just lucky, then," he said lightly.

He wasn't sure how much of his thoughts Vera could read. Sometimes she seemed able to discern the exact shape of what he was thinking; sometimes she seemed to refrain from that by courtesy; and sometimes she seemed to know his thoughts only as they related to his soul-wounds. She knew what he felt about his parents, but not the exact words in which he expressed those feelings.

"The strongest sensation about you right now is your terror," said Vera, her voice like running water. "I cannot determine exactly what causes this particular terror unless you tell me. Will you tell me, please, Harry?"

Harry shook his head and glanced over at Snape and Draco, unable to believe they hadn't commented so far. But Draco was asleep, and Snape had his eyes closed, an expression of intense concentration on his face that Harry recognized. He was reinforcing his Occlumency barriers, no doubt hoping that if he built them thick and high enough, the Seers couldn't read him. He wouldn't notice anything about the outside world until he was done, which might not be for hours.

"You cannot hide behind them." Vera's voice was gentle and pitiless. "There will be Seers at the Sanctuary who help all three of you separately, Harry. And though your Malfoy and the Bitter One do indeed carry scars of their own that will need time and healing, that does not mean you will spend every hour tending to them."

"Draco needs me," said Harry stiffly. "And Snape will be horribly uncomfortable if I'm not there. He only agreed to come because of me."

"That is true," said Vera. "I did not say that every hour would be spent not tending to them, either. But you must learn to relax and give yourself over to healing, to take time for yourself and not only for others."

Harry shut his eyes and did his best to ignore her. He wished he could vanish as deeply into his own mind as Snape could, but here his training hindered him. Lily had shown him how to be so alert to the world that he couldn't forsake it unless danger to Connor was involved. Harry had expanded that to include "danger to someone else," but it did mean that he heard every small shift from Vera, every nuance of Draco's breathing, every time Snape let out a subconscious murmur as he worked on the barriers.

"I thought you knew this." Vera's voice was flavored with disappointment now. "Why agree to come to the Sanctuary at all, Harry, if you did not want healing for your soul?"

"I don't know how to do what you want me to do," Harry whispered.

"And what is that, Harry?"

“How to just—” Harry shook his head. “I thought this would be wonderful because I could leave thoughts of the outside world behind. But thoughts of the outside world are coming with me.” His mind traced the arc of the bird’s dive past the carriage windows. Even the parts of the outside world that I don’t understand. They’re here. “I’ll scramble to keep from focusing on myself. That’s what I always do. If you insist that I can’t talk to Draco and Snape all the time, I’ll still worry about the werewolves, and the Ministry, and my reputation, and the war with Voldemort, and all the other problems I thought I came here to escape. I wanted this to be a holiday, but I don’t think it can be. I’ll make it not be so. I’m sorry.”

Vera didn’t reply for a long moment. Then she said, “Harry, you do not understand the nature of the Sanctuary. There is a reason that we can do things for the soul-stricken there that we can do nowhere else. It uses place magic, much like the Room of Requirement or the Ancient Vale.”

“Ancient Vale?” Harry echoed blankly, finally opening his eyes.

“The place you call Woodhouse.” Vera leaned over to him and patted his hand. “You think you will sabotage your own healing because you don’t know what the Sanctuary is like yet. In a short time, you will.”

Harry grunted noncommittally and looked out the windows again. The shadows still rushed past, featureless, and only the slight swing and creak of the carriage around them said they were moving at all. He could understand why owls took so long to reach the Sanctuary unless the Seers specifically opened the paths for them. It would be easy to get lost here.

The Sanctuary did seem to not be of a piece with the world around it. Harry didn’t think that was going to matter, though. He could feel worries building to a head in him already.

Will Loki really keep his bargain? Wilmot said he must if he swore his word in front of his pack, but do we know his pack was there? Perhaps he was bluffing.

What am I going to do if it turns out that more people blame me for the murder of those children than will work to exonerate me? I would have to stand trial, according to my own principles, but that will put my fight for everything and everyone else behind. Can I stand a sacrifice to Willoughby's grief and hatred, or the grief and hatred of other parents?

And I am swearing myself often to oaths lately. Is that compatible with being a vates? It reassures others, but should that be my primary concern?

The worries rushed and washed over him, and Harry sighed. He really had wanted this to be different, but he didn't see how it could. At least he was with Draco and Snape, and he knew Voldemort was extremely unlikely to attack while he was gone.

He might, though. What if he heals the wound in his magical core right away?

Harry shifted unhappily. Vera's gaze felt like a pin, holding him to the soft dragon-hide of the seat while he struggled to get away.

They broke abruptly into light, and Harry blinked. It looked to be no later than mid-afternoon by the angle of the sun, though he was sure he had slept hours, and they had been in the shadows for longer than that. He glanced at Vera, who said simply, "The shadow-weavers included wards that prevent even carriages from reaching the Sanctuary unless they are absolutely certain of their path, and that path is winding."

Harry looked out the windows again, and caught a glimpse of white as the carriage turned. Now he could feel the turns. He wondered how many circles the carriage had been forced to take in the shadows in the process of proving itself.

Now a glimpse of gold, and the carriage came down like a homing pigeon seeing its roost. Harry saw a large flat area ahead of them, and assumed it was where the carriage would land. After a short, fast hurtle between gleaming walls, that was exactly what happened.

The jolt woke Draco, and Snape, if he had not come out of his trance before and avoided showing it so that he wouldn't have to deal with Vera, returned from his meditation. He scowled instinctively. Harry found himself hoping that would stay the same. Snape needed help from the Sanctuary, of course, but if they changed him out of all recognition and against his will, could this be said to be a good place?

"Welcome."

Harry looked in surprise at Vera. Lines of tension that had carved her face had relaxed, and as she stood and opened the door, Harry felt that he had never seen her smile before.

"This is the Seers' Sanctuary," she said in a solemn voice as she ushered Snape out the door first, then Harry, and waved her wand to help float Draco. "More than that, it is a place of honor and homage, and a shrine to the present."

Harry thought it had the sound of a ritual welcome, and then he stepped out of the carriage and into such a strength of magic that he gasped. Suddenly, the need to speak ritual words on arriving at a place like this seemed much less strange.

He stared around. The walls on either side of them appeared to be made of golden brick, or white stone; they shimmered so much it was hard to be sure of both color and material. Tilting his head back, Harry could see a golden spiral hanging in midair, which straightened when it approached the walls. That was the path their carriage had taken, he thought. It faded as it climbed higher, until it became the transparent wire he had found so hard to see when the carriage came to rest on the North Tower.

"Do those paths run all over Britain?" he asked Vera.

Vera gave him a considering glance. "All over the world," she said, and then gently grasped Harry's shoulder and turned him around.

Harry saw the Sanctuary then, a dense mass of pillars and roofs and windows and balconies and gardens, flowing into and overlapping each other. He blinked. Some of them looked ash-blackened, some red, some white, some gold, some the pallid blue of shadows on winter snow. They appeared to fall away from them, down a slope, but Harry didn't know if that was reality or an illusion created by the immense number of roofs that ended one above another. He shook his head. "I thought it would be all white and gold," he said.

Vera laughed softly, and the air picked up the sound and made it echo more than it should have. Harry shivered. Most wizards had given up on place magic long ago; wands were portable, and that was important for a society that had to travel often from one place to another to work, visit relatives, conduct politics, and entertain itself. But the great advantage of place magic was its echo effect. A community of wizards located long enough in one place, all of them doing magic, would build up that magic, and the weight of the past would seep into the present and the future, cradling them and making new spells more powerful than they might otherwise have been—which in turn amplified and rebounded into and resonated with the place magic already there. Harry could feel the heaviness of the air, a heaviness that made it seem as if it were always summer in the Sanctuary, and knew that things would indeed be as different here as Vera had promised him. He shivered and wrapped his arms around his body.

"We are a shrine to the present," said Vera firmly. She pointed over Harry's shoulder to one of the red roofs, which seemed, as far as Harry could tell, to belong to a temple-like house whose doors were all open. "That room, for example, enshrines a magic that none of us have ever seen before, and which we don't know how to practice. We have dared to speculate that it comes from Albania, but we don't know that. When it dies out, that room will vanish. There are rooms here for every kind of magic practiced in the world, Light and Dark."

"Why?" Harry whispered.

"At first, it came from Seers bringing dangerous artifacts here to keep them from the hands of those who would misuse them," said Vera, guiding him down a series of steps from their landing. Snape followed, floating Draco; Harry could hear them conversing in low voices, but when he tried to listen, it was Vera's that claimed his attention. "So many accumulated, and so much wizard magic went on in the meantime, that rooms of their own started forming spontaneously. And, of course, Seers went out into the world and brought back memories of what they had seen, and some were actual practitioners of arts other than Seeing, or possessed other gifts. More and more rooms came into being. But they always vanish when the last remnant of that art or that species dies out. We do not linger in the past. We see souls as they are, and work towards what they will be.”

“It’s not only that, though, is it?” Harry lunged for the same sense of alarm he’d felt on seeing the bird outside the carriage windows. The fear felt distant, though, like a dream. And it wasn’t compulsion, or a muffling of his thoughts, the way that Connor had described the Potter sword as doing to him so that he could kill. It was, instead, as if someone had spoken sternly to him and reminded him that the bird was not here right now and he should concentrate on what actually lay in front of him. “There’s something more here than just gathering magic. That’s not the Sanctuary’s purpose.”

Vera nodded with a faint smile. “Looking into souls teaches us all compassion sooner or later, Harry.” She guided him gently around a broken place in one of the steps, where fallen leaves from—somewhere—danced in an eddy, caught by a whirl of wind. “The Seers who start out unimpressed or hateful do not retain that edge, even if it takes them years to lose it. We notice too much, and while there are some people in the world, like Albus Dumbledore, who may be twisted beyond all redemption or repair, there are many more who only appear that way.” She cast a speaking glance over her shoulder at Snape. “So our purpose becomes healing, challenging of wounds, going forward. And that purpose interacts with the valley. Violence is not permissible here. None of the truly dangerous and Dark artifacts can function. They are still enshrined, still honored, because they exist, and their existence deserves notice. But they are neglected if their only purpose is to hurt.”

“What happened to Remus?” Harry asked. “Did he still transform?”

“Yes,” said Vera softly. “The werewolf curse is a curse, Harry, rather than a soul-wound. But he did not need Wolfsbane when he did so.

When he transformed, the Sanctuary simply forbade him to hurt anyone. He learned how to run and enjoy his strength, instead.”

Harry blinked. “Do you eat meat at all?”

Vera laughed. “No, unless it dies naturally. Or, if we have a guest who requires it, it must be brought in from outside the Sanctuary. Understand, Harry, we do not insist that everyone who comes here change at once to suit us. It is simply easier not to have violent thoughts, or to kill. One’s thoughts settle into the groove already traced here.”

“It sounds to me as if the past does influence you,” Harry muttered, as they reached the bottom of the stairs. The view of the Sanctuary had changed, now, but it was still so varied and so distinct that Harry found it hard to locate one point that he wanted to stare at more than others. He did study the house they seemed to be approaching, which was a five-pointed purple roof set upon pillars open to the world. Wind whisked in and out between them with a sweeping sound. Harry could see more of the small eddies at play in between the pillars. He recognized, after a moment, that they weren’t normal winds at all, but magic—magic doing just what it wanted, playing because that was what it wanted to do.

Vera laughed again. “Oh, it does, if you consider having the same purpose for centuries to be focusing on the past. But, once again, Harry, we do not retain the past and brood on it.” She smiled at him. “The Sanctuary does not like that, either, and though it will not force our guests out of those thoughts as readily as it will out of thoughts of violence, it will continually remind you of what is around you, so that it is extremely hard to get lost in your own mind.” Another glance towards Snape, whom Harry was beginning to feel sorry for. “That is why you should not worry that you will be unable to forget the outside world. The valley will help, patiently wearing away at you until you think about what is in front of you, not behind.”

Harry swallowed. “I’ve tried that,” he said, as they reached the side of the pillared house. He could see several people waiting for them, one tall one clad in white robes and several shorter ones in dark. The tall one appeared to be a man; he wasn’t sure about the gender of the others. "I tried to forgive my parents last year and move forward, and it didn't work."

"That's because you did not truly forgive them," said Vera, "only said that matters would be different when you had not faced every nuance of the abuse. The Sanctuary will put the past in front of you, Harry, because that is the way the magic deals with it, and blend the past with the present so that you can reach your future."

Harry closed his eyes. He truly understood for the first time what he was getting into, and his resignation, the idea that he would have to think about his other problems because he had no choice, was gone. Instead, he broke into another fit of shivering as the terror returned full force.

Vera's hand brushed his shoulder. "I will be the one working with you," she murmured. "Do not fear, Harry. Yes, it is hard, but the Sanctuary does not propose to shut you up in a room with the nightmares of your past and let you scream alone. It looks to what is and what will be, and it takes the road through fear towards the morning." Harry could hear her smile.

The other Seers came forward to greet them, then, with no more than a few sharp glances. Harry thought he might know part of the purpose for their long, slow approach; the Seers would need time to absorb their glimpses of new souls without getting overwhelmed. Vera had hidden when she and Peter first met with him at Hogwarts, to think about what she saw.

Harry became aware, as the tall man approached, that the Many snake had not uncoiled from his throat to hiss since they entered the Sanctuary. Argutus, who had dropped off his body sometime on the stairs to slither off into the undergrowth, had expressed no fear, either. The message of the very air was peace, Harry thought, as he stretched out his hand to grip the man's.

The Seer nodded to him. His hair was very dark, his eyes a pallid yellow that spoke of a Light pureblood background. "My name is Joseph," he said. He studied Snape and Draco for a moment, and then smiled. Harry thought the smile reminded him of some of Connor's, when he had planned a strategy that would be sure to catch the Snitch this time. "You are Harry, and Draco Malfoy, and Severus Snape. Yes, Vera has told us something about you. And I look forward to working with you, sir." He inclined his head to Snape.

Harry glanced back in time to see Snape narrow his eyes. "I did not come here to be healed," he said, voice missing a small bit of its normal snap. "I came here because my son needs to heal."

Harry swallowed the lump in his throat that those words produced, and turned back to Joseph. This really might be as good as watching a Quidditch game, he saw, when Joseph refused to back off, or even look intimidated. "You did not come here to heal," said Joseph, "but that is what will happen."

Snape made a snarling sound.

Joseph smiled at him.

"My name is Nina," said another Seer, one of the ones in the darker robes. She stepped forward around Joseph and gave Harry one look from brown eyes filled with compassion, then turned to Draco. "I would like to work with you, Mr. Malfoy, unless you have any objections."

Draco looked a bit better than he had before they entered the carriage, and even on his dignity, though Harry didn't know how he managed that while reclining on a bed of air. He nodded. "That will be acceptable," he said.

"You were on the move for hours, Vera," said Joseph. "Would you like to come inside and eat?"

"Yes, please, Joseph," said Vera, and Harry heard weariness in her voice for the first time. "It's been months and months in a mirror-world."

Harry glanced at her a few times as they walked between the pillars into a cool, dark room filled with tables. One of them was set with goblets of water, and plates of bread and cheese and fruit that made

Harry's mouth water. "Why did you stay so long at Hogwarts, if it hurt so much?" he asked, as he bit into a pear and had to close his eyes at the juice. "I thought you would go back to the Sanctuary in just a few months, especially since I didn't talk to you that often."

Vera took a long drink of water before she replied. Light danced on the silver of her cup—more magic playing, Harry thought, and varying the gleams like an artist. "I was determined not to return until you were ready to come with me," she said softly. "Your soul's been ripped open and apart too many times, Harry. This time, I mean the healing to be final."

Harry bowed his head so that she wouldn't see the tears that were suddenly, and ferociously, and inexplicably, prickling at his eyes. Damned Sanctuary getting to me, he thought, and swiped at his face. Draco frowned at Harry's back. What's the matter with him? He hasn't talked to me since we arrived. Is he hurt? Is he ignoring me? Does he think that just because we'll be speaking to separate Seers it's appropriate that we not talk any more?

Fuck that. Draco was going to talk to Harry all he wanted, and he hoped that by the time the next ritual of their joining arrived, just a bit more than a month away, Harry would have overcome enough of his training to want more than a kiss.

He started to reach into his robe pocket for his wand and direct himself to float over to Harry, but Nina interrupted him. She was a short woman who appeared to drift about rather than walk, and who had nevertheless managed to fetch Draco the cup of water and the plate of bread and cheese he asked for before he realized she had moved. "Do you prefer Mr. Malfoy or Draco?" she asked him.

Draco snorted. "It would be stupid to stand on ceremony when you can see my soul," he said in a drawl. "Draco will do." He glanced again over at Harry, who was still talking to Vera, and stifled a surge of irritation. Perhaps she can tell me what the matter with him is. "Is it a rule that guests must talk only to the Seers and not to each other?"

Nina blinked, then smiled. "Of course not, or you and Mr. Snape would have been stopped on the way down the stairs."

"I'd call him Professor Snape," Draco warned her. "He's very prickly about his titles."

"I can See that," said Nina. "And I am glad not to be working with him. Now, what prompted you to ask that question?"

"Harry isn't talking to me." Draco fought down the urge to whine. He already might look pathetic, floating around like an invalid and bearing gaping wounds in his soul that would be as visible to these people as if they were wounds on his body. "I want to know why."

"The Sanctuary blends the present with the past," said Nina. "It does that so that most of our guests cannot hide from themselves. I only had time to truly understand about half of what I saw in Harry's soul, but I would imagine that he is caught up in such a whirlwind, such a change, that it is all he can think about at the moment. I'm sure he doesn't mean to ignore you."

Her last words rang with confidence, not a soothing tone, and Draco was satisfied. Of course, they could tell if he does mean to ignore me. "I'm not thinking about the past yet, though," he pointed out.

"Give it a bit more time," said Nina. "For everyone, it is different. I have seen traumatic memories overwhelm our guests, and people who simply stared off into space and smiled at the images there. For you, it seems to be appearing in the form of old uncertainties. Or are Malfoys usually so insistent that their boyfriends talk to them, their first time in a strange place?" Her smile was sly.

"He's not my boyfriend," said Draco, striving to sound like his father. "We are dancing out a ritual that will take three years, and will make us joined partners by the time it's done."

Nina's smile widened, and Draco realized that of course she must have been able to See that, and had enjoyed teasing him. "You're going to be like this, aren't you?" he accused her.

“Probably,” Nina agreed. “When I first looked into my own soul, I saw my sense of humor wound through everything. It seemed wiser to use it than to ignore it.” She cocked her head at Draco. “And wiser, I think, to leave Harry alone for the first few hours he’s here. He’ll talk to you tomorrow, I’m sure, and every day thereafter. But you both need some time apart.”

It suddenly hit Draco that, along with making sure Voldemort’s taint didn’t infect him, or as part of that, he would have Nina practically hanging on his every word.

That could be flattering, he thought, and smiled at her. “Will you listen to anything I want to talk about?”

Nina smiled. “Of course.”

“Even if it involves Harry and bedding him?” That was the one thing Draco wished he did have someone to talk to about. But of course Snape and his parents were not candidates, and Harry wasn’t at the point yet where he did much more than blush and look uncomfortable.

“Of course,” Nina repeated. “But expect me to want to talk about you, as well.” She examined him as though he had food on his robes. “Your soul’s interesting.”

Draco smiled. There’s a compliment I’m never going to get from anyone else—except perhaps Harry, when he feels ready to give compliments. I think I can be happy here.

Snape knew now that Occlumency barriers were not sufficient to prevent one of these Seers from Seeing whatever he liked.

He was not dealing well with the discovery.

Joseph had not yet attempted to speak to him beyond his first greeting. He stood near the table, sipping water from a goblet of his own, and eyed Snape with an expression that reminded Snape far, far too much of Sirius Black just before he played a prank. Snape held himself straight, and refused every offer of food or drink with a glare of such rage that the Seers had given up even looking at him.

Vera was talking to Harry, and the woman she had introduced as Nina to Draco. Snape supposed he should be grateful that the man supposed to “speak” with him had not approached him so far.

Inevitably, of course, Joseph did. Snape readied himself, touching one vial of a potion in his pocket that could be absorbed through the skin and would render the person it touched instantly immobile. The man’s sleeves were wide and open, at least, unless that was a glamour—but Snape thought he would have sensed it if it were. His wand was securely fastened to his belt, inside a holster, and it would take him a moment to pull it out. He walked as though he had nothing ready for a joke strapped to his legs, and he held his hands where Snape could see them.

Of course, he can read my mind, or at least my soul, if what Harry says is true. Snape stared at him. So he would know that I am expecting a prank, and he would not play one now.

Joseph’s smile slipped off his face. Snape felt a brief pang of bitter pleasure at that minor victory. He halted a few feet away and studied Snape seriously, then shook his head.

“Sometimes, guests coming to the Sanctuary do prefer to go through healing on their own,” Joseph said. Now he looked like Scrimgeour. Snape would not let that fool him. Once a prank-player, always a prank-player. He had always been the victim of bullies like this one, children of a charmed life, who thought that not only was Snape their rightful prey but nothing they did to him really mattered. “But I do not think you are right for that,” the insufferable man went on, as if Snape did not know exactly what he was. “You will fight every revelation that comes to you. You came out of love, but you can barely acknowledge that love right now. You’re trying to build walls around you that won’t let any emotion through as long as you’re here.

“The Sanctuary was created to wear down such walls.” Joseph paused for a moment, eyes very quiet, and then said in an equally soft voice, “You’re hostile even to me, and while I can understand that, seeing the knots the world has put in your soul, it will get you nowhere. I am not someone you’ve met before, with a stake in torturing you. I am not someone who finds your soul as ugly as you think it is. I am someone who wants to help heal you.”

Snape hissed softly, and had the satisfaction of seeing Joseph take a step back. “I know what I am,” Snape said, keeping his voice low so that no one else could intrude on the conversation. “I saw my own soul at seventeen, thanks to a potion. Then I sat in a room with my mother for three days, while she died, and I learned truths that no Seer could ever show me. I will thank you not to think that healing is what I desire or can accomplish.”

“It’s going to happen nevertheless,” said Joseph. “And you should know that I’m impervious to insult. When Vera told us about you, we all agreed that I was the best choice to work with you.”

“I do not plan to talk with you,” said Snape flatly. “I do not plan to let you heal me, as you keep claiming. I cannot prevent you from seeing my soul, but I am here to see to the healing of my son, and that is all.”

Joseph didn’t even react to the statement that Harry was Snape’s son. He simply nodded. “I would not expect you to change overnight, poisonous and deep as your hatreds are,” he said. “I will sound the wells of them, and do what I can to purge you of them.”

“Why?” Snape snarled, some of his frustration with the place breaking loose at last. “Why would you want to do this?”

Joseph smiled, and the look that made him resemble Sirius Black was there again. This time, Snape could give it more nuances—not the look that Black had just before playing a prank, but the gleam of challenge, the glint that said he would be a part of Snape’s life whether Snape wanted him to be or not. “You can call it aesthetics,” Joseph said. “I prefer looking at souls at peace with themselves to souls at war. Or you could call it compassion, though I understand that counts for little in your world. Or you could call it the thrill of the hunt, which you almost certainly will.”

He leaned forward until he was a few inches from Snape, and whispered, “The important thing you should know about me is that I will not go away. I’ll do whatever I can to make this healing comfortable for you instead of challenging, but I do not give up.”

Snape sneered and turned his back, striding towards Harry. It was high time that he rested. Snape knew he had slept in the carriage, but it hadn't been for long.

He ignored Joseph's eyes on his back. He had other defenses beyond the Occlumency barriers, which, he could see now, had been feeble. He had been a Death Eater, and a spy, and a teacher of some of the worst menaces to wizarding kind in Potions. Anyone who tried to heal him would lose the battle to the reserves of pure spite he could summon.

And I will never mention my mother again. It is the air of this place. I was not prepared. But I will raise walls that cannot be eaten by its acid.

Harry woke slowly the next morning, and lay there, staring up at the ceiling. He had slept without dreams, and certainly without visions, unless you counted a vague dream of Draco a few minutes before he woke.

He knew his first session with Vera was today. He knew that he would go downstairs and have nothing to do but eat, talk with Draco and Snape, and concentrate on healing himself.

He closed his eyes and sat up.

“Harry?”

Harry opened his eyes and smiled as he watched Argutus come in through the window of the room the Seers had given him. It was fairly high above ground, or perhaps only fairly high up in the tumble of buildings that made up the Sanctuary. The walls were white stone, and it was filled with windows that had no shutters or glass, and were simply open to the wind. Harry could ward them with magic if he chose, of course. The bed was a vivid splash of blue in the middle of all that, and the mirror on the wall and the pool of water, actually set into the floor, in a corner were equally intense splashes of silver.

Harry's trunk sat at the bottom of the bed, since he hadn't unpacked yet.

He was glad, at the moment, that the room was rough stone on the outside, too, so that Argutus could climb up and twine around him. He didn't immediately put his head on Harry's left wrist, this time, but wrapped around his shoulders.

"I have your surprise ready for you now," he said.

Harry chuckled. "So soon?"

Argutus wriggled his tail in impatience. "Look."

For a moment, Harry didn't know where he was supposed to be looking. Then he realized that Argutus had turned so that his neck, and not just his head, rested near Harry's left wrist. He looked, and saw his stump reflected in Argutus's shimmering scales.

Above the stump danced a wisp of darkness. Harry whispered, "What is that?"

"The magic the child-eating woman used to prevent you from regrowing your hand," said Argutus at once. "I could reflect runes, and it came to me that I should learn to reflect the Dark magic, so that you could see it and identify the curses. Then you can undo them, and you can have a hand again." He turned his head and lashed his tongue gently against Harry's cheek. "Surprise."

Harry swallowed. He had put off researching the Dark curses Bellatrix had used because it would take too long, and anyway, he still didn't want to admit he was weak and sometimes wanted a second hand back. But now, if he could see the curses themselves, it would be much easier to work out a way to undo them.

And he had no real excuse to avoid getting a second hand back if he could undo them.

"What's the matter?" Argutus flicked his tongue again, this time uncertainly. "You're crying."

Harry swallowed again and wiped at the tears with his hand. "I—it's a wonderful gift, Argutus, thank you," he said.

"That doesn't explain the crying."

Harry tried to, but managed to say only, weakly, "I think—I think I'm going to change, now, really change, and I'm not sure if I like it." Not even the air of the Sanctuary could soothe the tight bubble of pain and panic that soared up in his chest, or not immediately. What am I going to become? What if I do lose some of the morals I still have, like not using force? The hand was not really the sign of that possible loss of his moral compass, but a catalyst for it.

Harry felt as if the world were falling away from him. He buried his face in his arms, and felt Argutus coil around him, though just tight enough to comfort, not constrict his breathing. He swallowed again and again and again, and told himself that he wouldn't sob, wouldn't cry any further.

He had thought he would still recognize himself when this summer was done. Now, he wasn't sure.

"Harry? Should I find the nice lady and fetch her? She does not understand me, but she could follow me."

Harry shuddered.

Then he sat on the terror, and said, "No, Argutus. I'll—get her. I'm supposed to go down and talk to her anyway, soon."

"You are brave."

"I leave that up to my brother," Harry muttered, and sat for another moment shaking and wishing he did not have this terror, that he could either accept what was to come or cling to what he had been, and just do it strongly either way, damn it, not showing any weakness. One crack in himself could lead to a shattering he knew that neither he nor the wizarding world could sustain.

Then he picked himself up, winding Argutus gently around his waist so he wouldn't dangle, and went to talk to Vera and tell her about the possibility for getting his hand back—and, doubtless, why he wasn't sure he wanted it back.

He didn't know if it was the bravest thing he had ever done, but it felt like it at the time.

Chapter One Hundred: At Peace

"But I'm not sure I want my hand back," Harry said, when he'd shown Vera Argutus's reflection of the Dark spells and what it meant. "I just know that now I have no excuse to avoid breaking the curses."

They were sitting in one of the Sanctuary's higher rooms, full of air and light. Harry could feel the throb of contained magic from the rooms next to them, and wondered tiredly for a moment what housed there. He leaned against the back of his chair, which was crushed velvet or some material even softer, and shut his eyes.

"Why don't you want it back?" Vera asked him.

Harry didn't open his eyes, but he nodded. This was the reason he had come to her about it. Draco or Snape wouldn't have asked the question in such a reasonable tone. Draco had never understood Harry's feelings about his lost hand at all, and Snape, on edge with people able to see his soul, would have snapped. And Harry understood both those reactions, so he couldn't even blame them.

"Because it would be a sign of admitting weakness," said Harry, "if I cared about that to the exclusion of anything else. I do know some people who would have stopped at nothing until they'd broken all of Bellatrix's curses and had their missing limbs back. I'm not one of them." He opened his eyes and watched Vera for a moment. She sat in a chair with its back to one of the windows, her hands clasped in her lap, her eyes intent on his face. It made her look surrounded by light, diminished by the light, as if Harry were speaking to the sun instead of her. He could handle that.

"And because I didn't want to devote time to it," Harry said, even more quietly. "It was unimportant, next to so many of the other things I was doing. How could I say that I cared more about my hand than about working for the rights of werewolves, or reconciling with Snape, or studying the Dark curses that Voldemort used?" He shook his head, feeling his hair scrape lightly against the chair. "I only have so much time. I used to try to extend that time by skipping meals and sleep. Draco and Snape objected to that. But with having to do that, I'm left with a limited amount of hours, and some of that goes to schoolwork and to things I must do, and the rest of that, as much as I can spare, to the things I want to do: building the political alliance against Voldemort, especially, and vates work. I was already faltering and dropping threads because I did not have enough hours to weave them all in. Researching my hand—that fell far, far to the bottom of the priority list. It would have benefited no one but myself.”

“You could have asked someone else to research it for you,” Vera observed quietly. She didn’t accuse, she just made the statement, and Harry found himself relaxing. He’d become used to studying someone else’s mood before he said something, especially in the last week with all the grief over the siege. There were things that someone could not bear to hear, and other things that could be said, but only at a later time. Vera seemed like a person to whom he could say almost anything. She was also a person he did not have to be strong for, and Harry appreciated that gift more than he could say.

“I suppose I also need to learn how to delegate,” said Harry, winning a faint smile from her. “But, if I had, I still would have asked someone else to research the curses Voldemort used or my allies’ pasts or proper greetings for magical species I haven’t met yet, not my hand.”

“And why not?”

Harry eyed her. “Same reason at the bottom of both weakness and not wanting to take time for it, I suppose,” he said. “It’s too personal.”

Vera nodded. “Do you wish to research these curses over the summer, Harry? I should warn you that the Sanctuary does not have extensive libraries. We do have rooms where you can venture to observe the effects of magic like this, and see what it does.”

Harry blinked. “You’d offer me a choice?”

“Of course I would,” said Vera.

I should do this. Snape asked me to at least think about it. Draco would be thrilled if I did this. Harry looked at Argutus, draped like a shimmering curtain over his shoulders. “And Argutus gave me a gift with his reflections that I shouldn’t neglect,” he murmured aloud.

“You are talking about me, but in that language. I heard my name.” Argutus poked him with his nose. “What did you say?”

Harry heard Vera make a soft noise—chuckle or sigh, he could not have said. He looked up at her, and she asked, “Is he wanting to know what you said? I know he can’t understand English.”

Harry nodded.

“Explain the situation to him. You might be surprised at his response.”

Hesitantly, Harry focused on Argutus and let his words emerge in Parseltongue. “I don’t know yet if I want my hand back, Argutus,” he said. “But I do appreciate what you did for me, and I think it would be selfish to neglect that gift.”

Argutus was quiet for a moment. Then his tail coiled up and wrapped gently around the side of Harry’s head.

“It is your gift,” Argutus said, turning to flicker his tongue along Harry’s cheek again. “You should do what’s necessary to you with it. I want you to want what you want.”

Harry stared at him. He wasn’t sure if he was more shocked by what Argutus had said or by hearing such sophisticated reasoning from an Omen snake.

“And what did he say?” prompted Vera.

“He said—” Harry began, and then saw Vera shake her head and realized he was still speaking Parseltongue. Sheepishly, he focused on her and repeated, “He said that the gift was mine to do what I want with. He wants me to want what I want.”

Vera’s face lit with a soft smile. “And so do I, Harry,” she said. “And so do many of the people around you, I would think, though they may override it by making commitments to your safety first, or they may draped it in metaphors about your training that make it seem as if you have no free will. But your Malfoy and the Bitter One are, perhaps, overly close to you. Do not think about what they might want, Harry. Do not think about what politeness demands of you, or politics, for once in your life.” There was an urgency in her voice he’d never heard before as she leaned forward and laid a hand on his knee. “Think about what you want, for once in your life. I will not push you. Argutus will not push you.”

“That’s why I came to talk to you about this in the first place,” Harry whispered.

“Yes, exactly.” She beamed at him. “Not to say that your Malfoy and the Bitter One would not be displeased if you learned to want things just because you want them, but it is not their choice, Harry, it is yours.”

Harry cocked his head. “And you don’t think it’s selfish?” he asked. Probing at this felt like testing a loose tooth with his tongue. It hurt, but he couldn’t keep himself from picking at it.

Vera shook her head. “If you need someone to tell you it’s not selfish, Harry, I will,” she said. “It’s not. Do you think what your Malfoy wants of you in the joining ritual is selfish, simply because it will take three years and binds you to taking no other partner during that time?”

“But I don’t want any other partner, anyway,” said Harry, bewildered. “And, well, that’s Draco, and not—” He stopped.

“Not you.”

“Yes.” Harry stared down at his hand and the darkly-glowing stump. I had thought I was doing selfish things. I wounded Voldemort enough to give us this Voldemort-free summer, after all. I yelled back at Snape and Draco when they pressed me too hard. I had thought I knew what I wanted. Perhaps not completely, not yet.

Around him, chains seemed to be flying away, and the intense terror that had lurked within him since he had come to the Sanctuary began to thaw. He looked up at Vera. “You won’t recommend that I get another hand?”

Vera shook her head.

“You won’t recommend that I change in ways that I don’t want to?”

Again she shook her head. “I will point out when I think that your stated reason for a decision is not the one your soul is showing me,” she said. “That is why I am the one speaking with you, after all. I can see things you can’t. But you have been aware of the basics of what I see for a long time now, Harry. And you are no longer a child, and you are certainly very far from selfish. You are allowed to make your own decisions, to want what you want, and if you do not want another hand and you do not want a surname, both of those are your choices. And so are dozens more.”

Harry closed his eyes. The terror was even smaller now. “I—I’d like to walk for a while now, Vera,” he said. “I need time to think.”

“Good, Harry,” Vera said, a smile lightening across her face.

“Good, what?” Harry gave her a confused glance.

“Thinking about it,” said Vera, standing. “There was a time not so long ago when you would have thought about anything but that.”

Harry nodded to her, confused and bewildered and free, and wandered out of the room in a half-daze. He paused outside the door to put Argutus down, though. He wanted to be completely alone. Snape woke in an unfamiliar bed, his wand in his hand, his head already turning towards the threat. It had been a knock on the door, carefully placed on the one patch of clear wood not protected by Snape’s wards. Snape supposed he should have known Seers would see that one patch, but he was still disappointed that this one hadn’t hit another place first and burned his hand.

“Good morning, Snape,” Joseph’s voice called cheerfully from beyond the door. “I’m here to tell you that there is refreshment waiting for you in the same room we ate in yesterday, if you’re hungry. Also, we’ve set up a potions lab for you in the room next to this one.”

"I had already chosen my lab," Snape called back. He knew his voice was low and ugly, but he could not help it. He'd had a nightmare about Voldemort laughing as he taunted him, an imagination of what would have happened if the Dark Lord had discovered him during his days of spying. "I would have appreciated if you had left my supplies where I put them."

"Couldn't do that, I'm afraid," said Joseph, voice firmer now. "That's the roosting place of a flock of Diricawls. They need it. If you had bothered to read the plaque we'd placed on the wall, you would know that."

Snape grunted. The truth was, he'd seen the plaque, but not wanted to take the time to read it. He resented everything about the Sanctuary, and after making sure he would know the way from his room to Harry's room, Draco's room, and his lab, he'd gone to sleep.

"You can try to irritate us," said Joseph. "I know you're good at that. But the truth is, none of us irritate easily, though there are many who will leave you politely alone. I'm not going to do that."

Snape rose with a snap and a snarl. He strode across the room and jerked the door open. Joseph looked at him with one eyebrow raised. It did not please Snape at all that they were the same height and shared the same gestures. At least he'd been a bit taller than both Sirius Black and James Potter.

"I want you to leave me alone," he said. "I want you to stop trying to heal me. If you force me to change against my will, then I can only conclude that you practice Dark Arts. I came here to accompany my son, not to heal."

"So you've said." Joseph's expression was calm. "But the Sanctuary itself works on the souls of those who come here. It's rather like plunging into a pool; you're still going to get wet even if you only entered it so that your child wouldn't drown. If you do want to be left completely alone, then I will leave you completely alone. But the transition is not an easy one. The way the Sanctuary reaches out to you is generally through dreams in that case. They are memories of the past, seen from another angle. They will not let you hide.”

Snape shook his head. “The comparison is not apt,” he said, wondering why the man would not simply depart. “Or it is only in a way that you do not wish it to be. I could work charms to keep myself safe from the water. I will take Dreamless Sleep Potion to keep myself safe from the dreams.”

Joseph sighed. “I suppose that might work, yes, since you’re a Potions Master,” he murmured.

“So disappointed?” Snape was delighted by the first crack he’d seen in the older man’s façade since they arrived. “You wanted to drag me kicking and screaming into your smiling world? Did you think I would be so easy to work with?”

“Frankly, no,” said Joseph. “My motivation is compassion. That is the one I told you about yesterday, that I knew you would not understand. I have seen souls marked by hatred as deep as yours is, and I know your past was not an easy one. I wish to heal you for the same reasons Vera wishes to heal Harry. But Harry’s grand reasons for not healing so far have been lack of time and lack of understanding between what is a wound and what is wholeness. Yours have to do with a large amount of self-blame. You consider yourself implicated in the ruin of your soul.”

Snape curled his lip. “How very, very clever of you to notice.”

“Not so clever,” said Joseph. “A Seer who hadn’t observed any soul but her own yet could make that one out.” His eyes locked on Snape’s. “It has to do with why you do not think of yourself by your first name. It has to do with your mother. It has to do with the Mark you took and think, still, makes you a Death Eater in some way beyond the physical. It has to do with the hatreds that eat pieces of your life even now. One of them nearly destroyed your relationship with Harry.” Snape flinched, despite his fury, at the reminder of what going cold had done. “And the other is eating you alive now, inside and out. Werewolf fear.”

“None of this is your right to comment upon,” Snape whispered tightly.

“I can See it,” said Joseph. He was calm, and that infuriated Snape further. He could not think of the last time someone so close to him when he was in a mood like this had been calm. “If you truly do not want help in healing, then no, it’s not my right to heal you. But I think I should tell you that I understand you. Just being a bastard does not drive me away, because I understand the reasons that you are a bastard. And I can see where these hatreds are leading you. You may yet lose Harry, if you act on your hatred of lycanthropy.”

“You cannot predict the future!” Only when he finished it did Snape realize how close to a cry that had been.

“Character is destiny.” Joseph studied him intently from beneath a lock of dark hair. “But we can change our own destiny if we change our own character. I truly believe that. And so that means that this is a chance for you, Severus Snape, to change it, if you don’t want my help or the help of anyone else. But I will warn you: persisting in stubborn pride will lose you everything. Your life is tied closely to Harry’s now. Anyone could See that, too. And he is changing, willingly changing, as a result of being in the Sanctuary and working with Vera.”

“If you mean to say that he will change to someone who will not love me—“

Joseph shook his head. “I don’t think that’s possible. I do think it’s possible that he will change into someone who cannot forgive you, if you act on that hatred gnawing out a place in your heart. You acknowledge your love for him, if only to yourself. Do you truly want your fear to triumph over that, and lose everything in a mistaken moment?”

“That will not happen,” Snape said tightly.

“It already has.” Joseph’s voice was a near whisper now. “Granted, for a potion that Harry doesn’t know about yet. But how does creating a poison for werewolves do anything but feed your fear and put a weapon into your hands? What will you do if that weapon proves irresistible?"

Snape did not bother with telling the man to get out. He simply raised his wand and spoke the Severing Curse.

Nothing happened. Joseph gave him an acutely disappointed look. "The Sanctuary prevents use of Dark Arts," he said quietly, and then turned around and left.

Snape shut the door and stood on the other side of it, eyes closed. He could control himself. He would control himself. So the air of this place was like acid, but if he had no Seer and it tried to reach out to him through dreams, he could resist it. Joseph had acknowledged as much.

He felt, as if it were a second heart in his chest, the presence of the werewolf poison in his trunk. He had not dared to leave it in his lab, just in case Harry wandered in and recognized the silvery potion for what it was.

You are already lying to him. What comes next?

He knew that, if Harry did change into someone who valued his own self-worth and his moral judgments again, then it was entirely possible he would not forgive Snape this. He understood Snape's fear, he had said as much. But then, he understood the werewolves' anger and frustration, and Snape had still heard him threaten to drain Loki's magic in a steady voice. Push far enough, and Harry would strike back. And the distance one could push might grow smaller as he became more and more his own person.

How much of his tolerance have I already eaten?

Snape had lived most of his life secure, if not exactly content, in the knowledge that he had made his own mistakes. Other people had their share of blame, but the largest was his own. There were exceptions, such as the prank when Black had tried to kill him, but they were few. His own were such large mistakes that he didn't have to try to repair them; he already knew they were irreparable. And that meant he didn't have to be nice, or love, or to live in the sharp and confusing world that Harry kept trying to deal with. He could stay still. There was no effort involved, only the sharp, bitter, broken glass of self-knowledge and self-satisfaction.

His love for Harry had not changed that. He had retreated from being cold, but he still didn't consider that he could let the coldness go. Why should he? He was unnecessarily bitter, and knew it. He was scarred, and knew it. He took great pleasure in existing, both bitter and scarred, long after his enemies had tried to kill and break him.

But what would happen if he did lose Harry's forgiveness because of one of his scars?

He knew the answer. It would not be worth it.

He felt the presence of the werewolf poison like a suppurating wound, now.

He did not acknowledge most of what Joseph said, Snape told himself. He did acknowledge the truth that Harry had come here seeking healing and was probably on the way to it.

And if he changed, then Snape could not remain as he was. He wondered, now, if it was only the long delays and setbacks Harry had suffered on the road to healing that had enabled him to remain as he was so for long.

That is a terrible thought.

But accurate.

Snape had never made a practice of hiding from his own observations, either, and those who tended to flinch at his tongue had only his scorn.

He was still not willing to speak to Joseph. These wounds were his own. And destroying the werewolf poison would be a useless gesture. He knew how to make the potion, now. He could duplicate it easily, especially considering the ingredients he'd brought.

Not a coincidence that you brought those ingredients, is it?

But he would not take the Dreamless Sleep Potion. He would wait for the dreams. He would change, if at all, on his own and at his own pace.

Besides, he doubted that the dreams could truly change him. Why should they? He had been through horrors that would have throttled lesser minds, and they had all been real.

Draco stretched his hands luxuriously over his head. Now this was more like it. The Seers had given him a bed that rivaled his own at Malfoy Manor, and a room that had murals on the walls with white-blond wizards excelling in all sorts of battles and treaty negotiations. One even had a man Draco was sure was his ancestor becoming Minister of Magic.

“Draco?”

He looked up. Nina was poking her head around the edge of his bedroom door, and she carried a tray with covered dishes that steamed. Draco felt his mouth water. “Come in,” he said, “since you have food.”

Nina laughed and carried the tray in, balancing it gently on the edge of his table. Draco eyed it approvingly. It was made of silver, and the first dish Nina held out towards him was lightly steamed vegetables, the only kind Draco would generally consent to eat. Raw carrots and the like made him sick. He took up his fork, sipped from the glass of orange juice that stood next to his plate, and finished a few dainty bites before he asked, “Do we have a daily schedule?”

Nina shook her head and sat down in a chair next to the bed. “No. That would be counterproductive. If nothing else, the day after a shattering revelation, such as tends to happen to our guests from time to time, is not the one to insist on a brisk run or swim.” She smiled again, but Draco saw her eyes were serious, and braced himself. “Draco, if I can ask something—what’s your father like?”

Draco blinked. She must see something of him in me, but I suppose, since he's not here and she can't read his soul, this is the next best thing. "Proud," he said. "Cold. Stern. He only loves my mother and me, and he gets vengeance on anyone who hurts us." He smiled as he remembered what his father had told him about getting vengeance on the Death Eater's family who had hurt his mother. "He's a proper heir of the Malfoy line, and he's always emphasized that for me. I managed to surprise him when I showed up early to confront him and gain his respect. He didn't intend to confirm me as his magical heir, but he did." Draco knew he was bragging, but Nina had said she was there to listen to him. Who else should he brag to?

"And your mother?" Nina asked.

Draco shrugged and ate another few bites before he answered. "Also proud. She would kill if anyone threatened me or Father, and she fights beside Father in battle—you wouldn't believe how graceful they are together. But she's more skeptical about pureblood ideas than Father. She was the one who insisted that I attend Hogwarts, and I think it's because she wanted me to meet Muggleborns face to face and then still see if I could kill them. But she stayed married to Father even though he was a Death Eater, so she can't resent them all that much. She was also the one who named me. My father wanted to name me after his father, I think. I know that she loves me. There have been times when I'm unsure about Father, but I always know with Mother." He paused, and then decided that this would be the safest place to say something he hadn't even felt comfortable telling Harry. "I think she was happy when the Dark Lord fell, to tell you the truth," he said in a low voice. "She knew he would probably return, but she had the peace and time to raise me. She didn't want me to grow up in the middle of a war."

Nina nodded.

"Why did you want to know?" Draco asked, as he spread butter on a piece of toast.

Nina scanned his face. Whatever she saw there must have reassured her, because she said, "I see echoes of them both in you, Draco. And I can see you that you admire your father and thought most of your life that you'd be just like him. But you're far more your mother's son."

Draco was in the middle of eating the toast, and nearly spat out a large bite. He did manage to swallow it, though, because it wouldn't have been dignified for a Malfoy to spit. "Excuse me," he said, when he could speak again. "That's a rather large assumption to make on a day's acquaintance."

Nina laughed. "Draco, I think you forgot the part where I can see your soul."

"I am a Malfoy," Draco insisted. "I am worthy of my family's heritage, or I wouldn't have been confirmed as the Malfoy magical heir."

"Why would you think that being your mother's son made you unworthy of your Malfoy heritage?" Nina drew her knees up and placed her cheek on one of them, staring at him.

"I just—she's a Black, that's all," Draco said, a little recovered now. "Of course, it's still an honorable name and line, if you discount the insanity, but I'm not Draco Black."

"Blood has very little to do with it," said Nina. "We see someone's character, Draco. As far as blood goes, you're half Malfoy and half Black. As far as character goes, it's almost all Black. I think your mother made as sure of that as she could. Your father sounds overwhelming, but I don't think he won their war."

The image of his parents warring over how to raise him was a new one on Draco. And yet, if he thought about it, he could see where Nina might take that impression. His mother had named him, his mother had insisted on sending him to Hogwarts when Lucius had wanted Durmstrang, and he had not begun training in the pureblood rituals until he was six, despite Lucius saying his father had started him on the path to being a proper Malfoy when he was much younger.

And there were other little things that—

“Sweet Merlin,” Draco breathed. “My mother’s more subtle than my father is.”

Nina chuckled. “Considerably, I would think, from your description of her. And you do have the potential to follow her.” She scrutinized Draco carefully. “Not exactly, of course, because your relationship with Harry is very different from the way Narcissa’s with Lucius’s sounds. But you do have the potential to be subtle and insistent and a great political success. It sounds like your father is feared.”

Draco nodded fervently.

“But you could be adored.”

Draco’s mind flooded with images, only a few of which involved Harry. Many were of him charming Harry’s political enemies at the Ministry, even the Minister himself, who had good reason to dislike Malfoys. Others involved him making haughty purebloods forget about Harry’s halfblood status, as he hadn’t managed to do at his own festival, a failure that still galled him. And he saw his mother’s shining face in there, too, as Narcissa returned from yet another dance done to persuade some Dark families to become Harry’s allies. He wondered, for the first time, why she had done that instead of his father, if his father really was the better politician.

The thought of being half Black, or mostly Black, suddenly didn’t sound half bad.

Especially because I’m not insane.

He looked up at Nina. “I think I’d like to be adored.” He ignored her laughter. “Can you help show me how?”

Nina inclined her head, eyes sparkling. “We can work on that.” Harry halted on a terrace and stared down into what looked like a jungle scene. It was all crawling green vines, crowded with blue flowers. Water fell with a thunderous crash from a cascade half-buried in the vines. Harry saw birds skimming through the drops, bright flashes of green and white and pink, calling in voices that might have sounded harsh but barely managed to pierce the waterfall.

He sat down and looked up at the sun, standing near noon.

He was completely alone, again. He had put the Many snake back in his room, and he had avoided other guests and Seers in his walk, though he had sometimes heard footsteps and voices to let him know they were there.

And, for the first time, being left alone with nothing to focus on but himself was not driving him mad.

Harry closed his eyes. The sun blazed on the back of his neck, comforting heat. He lifted his hand and the stump of his left wrist, and let them both rest there, feeling the difference between them, alive, crawling fingers that scratched an itch and flicked at the sweat sliding down his skin, and scarred, ended arm.

He let himself think of having a second hand.

Carefully, he stripped the idea of all the contexts that automatically came with it: what his allies would think, what Snape and Draco would think, how it would make him look to the public if he came back from this retreat with two hands—whether Aurora Whitestag and her supporters would commend snidely on him trying to heal instead of studying how to defeat Voldemort—and how long it might take to break Bellatrix's curses and how he couldn't afford the time.

He put them all away in an Occlumency pool and looked at the idea of getting a second hand on his own.

Do you want this?

You don't have to make any decision that you don't want. Fuck what Snape and Draco would say. Your choice, Harry.

He waited, sending the question out into the maze of himself, wanting to see what echo would come back.

And like a wind, the answer came.

Maybe. I don't know yet.

Harry could feel his smile widening. He opened his eyes and watched as a parrot hurtled, squawking, from one vine to another, drenching its tail in the water on the way.

And "maybe" is perfectly fine.

Tears stung his eyes for a moment. He leaned back on the terrace and folded his arms behind his head, staring up at the sun until afterimages danced in front of his eyes.

Wonder stirred in him, lifting its head and looking cautiously around, before it romped into him and became his major emotion.

I can make those choices. I really can. And if Snape and Draco really love me, they're not going to make bargains with me over it, and no one is going to push me, and whatever I decide is, finally, fine.

The birds took off a moment later because Harry was laughing, hurling the sound like a spear down into the vines and the water, to fall and be lost in the middle of cool green.

I'm free.